On the above concise recital it has been observed, that no cause is assigned for the General's resolution to remove, no necessity is pleaded either for want of provisions, or annoyance from the enemy. It is therefore matter of astonishment to many, that the General should form a resolution so early in the season, to remove from a tolerable climate to a much worse; and the more so as he was suffered to quit the town unmolested, and to embark the whole body of his troops with as much composure as if the Provincials had been assembled with no other design but to take leave of their friends. It has therefore been conjectured from this, and the frequency of messages that passed between the armies, that some convention by way of truce, or cessation of hostilities, or other secret compact, must have been concluded between the leaders of the contending armies; or it is scarce to be credited, that the Provincials could all of a sudden be rendered motionless and not bestow one formal salute upon their departing guests. Indeed, two noble Lords, high in administration, have solemnly declared, in an august assembly, that no agreement whatever was so much as proposed by either party: but such is the incredulity of the people of England, that, unless actions correspond with words, they place little or no faith in ministerial intelligence. Bailey, the orthographer, observes, that on ship-board, he that is caught fibbing on Monday morning, is made to serve under the swabber the rest of the week; but this, we may suppose, is only among the understrappers. The commissioned gentry are exempted from this disgrace, and, by a late decision, persons of a certain rank, for petty peculations, may plead their privilege.

An article of an equivocal import, and which will bear a double interpretation, and afford Jews and stockjobbers an open field field to speculate, was published in the Pennsylvania Gazette, just three days previous to the resolution taken by Gen. Howe, to remove from Boston. It here follows, properly authenticated:

Philadelphia, in Congress, March 4, 1776.

“Resolved, that the restraint be taken off, which by a resolution of the 26th of last month was laid upon vessels loading or loaded with produce for Great-Britain, Ireland, or the British West-Indies, in consequence of a permission granted for arms and ammunition imported into these colonies.

As this resolution is said to be in consequence of permission granted for arms and ammunition imported, &c. the question is, by whom this permission is granted; not by the Congress, it may be presumed, for they have always encouraged the importation of those articles; and it would be injurious in the highest degree to suspect the General of any such permission. Who then could authorize this grant? As we are equally strangers to the licensers on both sides, and would willingly avoid giving offence to either party, we refer the solution of this puzzling problem to the speculatists at Jonathan's, who, if they guess right, may probably, at one lucky hit, enrich themselves and their families for ever. We cannot help observing, however, the hazard of relying on this dubious permission, for should it happen not to be properly ratified here at home, those who are eager to take advantage of it, will, probably, as the adage is, catch a Tartar; for by meeting a British act of parliament full in the face, they will neither be permitted to get the gunpowder, nor to return back to tell the cause of their disappointment.

It is reported, and, it is said, on unquestionable authority, that the Congress have signified to every trading power in Europe, that their ports are open to receive their commerce, and that no treaty with Great Britain shall ever take place, to which the continuance of this commerce for two years after its conclusion should not be a preliminary article. In consequence of this declaration, though the French Ministry have not openly countenanced a direct trade, yet they have taken no effectual measures for preventing the American ships from loading in their ports. The Snow, Dickenson, lately brought into Bristol by the subtlety of the mate, has confirmed the truth of this friendly intercourse, which was only before suspected. This vessel had a regular consignment to Messrs. Montandouin and Frere, merchants, at Nantz; and the orders from the owners to the Captain were, “(besides the goods that might be shipped by the consignees in return for the cargo) to receive on board any quantity of arms and ammunition that should be offered for account of the Congress by any person whatsoever.”

The cargo of the Dickenson consisted of 2221 barrels of flour, 260 boxes of spermaceti candles, 13 casks one bag bees-wax, and 5600 barrel-staves, the whole, together with the ship, valued at upwards of 7000l. A French Nobleman, who, with another of the same nation, had been in treaty with the Continental Congress, was to have sailed in this ship, but, being heavy laden, their baggage was put on board a lighter ship, of which there were six who sailed about the same time for the same port.

This ship, of which Capt. Meston was commander, brought likewise a list of privateers fitted out by order of the Congress in January last, with the commanders names and force, together with lists of the row-gallies in the river Delaware, which, being very particular, evidently shews a premeditated design of running away with the ship before she set sail from the port of Philadelphia.

Such are the preparations of this deluded people, as they are compassionately called by the King's friends, to defend themselves against what they think the invasions of power. It, indeed, appears like stemming the ocean with a cobweb! But what is too mighty for Providence to effect! The ruin that is brought upon them by the captures of their ships on one side, and their gain by the feeble attempts of their privateers on the other, bear at this time a very unequal proportion; and that disproportion will, no doubt, for some time increase, as none have hitherto been seized by the Americans but transports or store ships: but as soon as they are given to understand that all their trading ships are to be seized, they will not then be so tardy in making reprisals. Hence a kind of pyrratical war will commence, and merchants will be encouraged to rob merchants, for the promotion of trade and the benefit of the gentlemen belonging to the courts of civil law. But who, amidst this general desolation, are to pay the poor manufacturers! Surely, these consequences, which are obvious to every capacity, could not escape the wisdom of our Legislature. What then shall we say! May we not be permitted to call to mind upon this occasion, the words of the Abbe Bernois upon a similar one,—“That, when God, in his providence, has determined that certain grand revolutions shall take place in the kingdoms of the world, he first of all deprives the rulers of the people of their wisdom, and, by abandoning them to their own blind pursuits, so brings it to pass, that they themselves shall be the instruments of their own and their countries ruin.”

Resolutions of the American Congress in full Assembly.

That Michael Hilligas, and G. Clymer, Esq.s. be joint treasurers to the United Colonies.

That the Provincial Assemblies do chuse treasurers.

That each colony do provide ways and means to sink their proportion of Bills emitted by this Congress.

That the proportion of each colony be determined by the number of inhabitants.

That each Colony pay its respective quota in four equal payments, the last on or before the last day of Nov. 1782.

That

That the Continental Bills, so emitted, be received as cash in all payments for taxes, and in all payments whatever.

That the treasurers, whenever they have silver and gold in their hands for the redemption of Continental bills, shall advertise the same, signifying that they are ready to give silver or gold for such bills to all persons requiring the same in exchange.

That the Continental treasurers be allowed 500 dollars each for their services.

The Provincial treasurers to be paid by their respective colonies.

A letter to Gen. Howe, recommending Long-Island, in the province of New-York, as the only spot in America for carrying on the war with effect against the rebels, is certainly worthy of notice. "It is, says the letter-writer, 130 miles long, is very fertile, abounding in corn and cattle, is very populous, and Suffolk county in particular, all good and loyal subjects. It has a plain on it 24 miles long, which has a fertile country about it; is 20 miles distant from the city of New-York; Connecticut opposite to it; New-Jersey about 50 miles distant; Philadelphia 110; Maryland 130; Rhode-Island 150: so that in this fertile island the army can subsist without any succour from England or Ireland; and from their encampment in the above plain, they can in five or six days invade and reduce any of the above colonies at pleasure." What then can retard the conquest of America!

It is reported that the Indians have begun scalping on the Ohio, and that the Commanding Officer at Detroit offers 20l. a scalp.

In consequence of the letter from Lord Dunmore to the Hon. Mr. Corbin, already mentioned, that gentleman waited on the Governor, on board his ship, to request his Excellency to call an Assembly, which he declined. And on reading that part of the answer to his letter which says "that we [the Provincial Convention] were not authorized or inclined to intermeddle in the mode of negotiation, which must be left to the Congress," the Governor said there was nothing America could ask in a constitutional way but would be granted; but if they relied on the Congress, they had nothing to expect from Parliament.

The Colonels Armstrong, Thompson, Lewis, Howe, Moore, and Lord Sterling, are appointed Brigadier-Generals in the Continental army.

The command of the Provincial army at New York has been conferred on General Schuyler.

Dr. Franklin has resigned his seat in the Assembly of Pennsylvania (Mr. Rittenhuise is chosen in his stead), being appointed by the Congress to go on business of importance to Canada.

A letter from Rhode-Island concludes in this manner: "We are almost ruined, trade at an end, provisions dear, people over head and ears in debt, and ready to tear each other in pieces; and, in fact, there is great uneasiness among the people in general in America. In some of the provinces it is much if there is not a civil war among themselves."

ARTICLE I.

Hypocrisy Unmasked, or, a short Inquiry into the religious Complaints of our American Colonies. To which is added, a Word on the Laws against Popery in Great Britain and Ireland.

"The noblest of all Religions is the Religion of Humanity."

Walpole's Lives of Noble Authors.

THE Author states that the disaffected Colonies have for some time, in imitation of the Holy Leaguers in France, and Cromwell in England, endeavoured to connect the interests of party with the security of Religion, and to build the most desperate views of ambition, on the mistaken piety of mankind.

He says, they have "for some time played off their spiritual artillery upon the British nation, and endeavoured to kindle the flame of enthusiasm among our people, by representing the grant of the Popish religion to the Canadians, as a measure highly alarming to every Protestant of the empire.

"Their adherents on our side of the Atlantic, have sustained them vigorously in this service, and where they could not engage us to support the political complaints of America, they have addressed us pathetically on the dangers of the church.

"Hence opposition has lately exhibited preachers from the turf, and reformers from the gaming-table. Hence men whose lives are a scandal to all religion, have suddenly started up into champions of the orthodox faith, and hence the whole army of patriots have pronounced the Quebec act a more dangerous innovation, if possible, than even the imposition of a revenue upon the Americans.

"Highly to the credit of our national good sense, these attempts to excite a spirit of persecution among us, have been treated with the contempt which they merited, and we have neither judged it honourable for our country, to violate the public faith, nor beneficial for the Protestant cause, to trample upon the rights of humanity.

"Yet, as the popular clamour against the law for regulating the government of Quebec still continues, it may be proper (for the purpose of undeceiving the misled) to shew in a few words, first, that Popery, so far from gaining an original establishment under the Canada act, was established in an English Colony above a century before Canada belonged to the crown of England; and secondly, that the Catholic religion, so far from being in the least disagreeable to the disaffected Colonies, is not only allowed under the hands of the very congress, to be perfectly consistent with the freedom of the Protestant Provinces, but to be a right which the Canadians possess from the immediate gift of God.

Difficult forever as the proof of these positions may appear at a first view, nothing is more easy, and therefore I submit myself, without any further preliminary, to the judgment of the reader.

"Sir Cecilius Calvert, Lord Baltimore, the first proprietor of Maryland, was an avowed Roman Catholic, and obtained a charter for that Colony, solely with a view of establishing a settlement, where he himself, as well as others of his church, might enjoy the free exercise of religion. Before the Charter just mentioned, that tract of country, now distinguished by the name of Maryland, composed a part of Virginia; but it was judged expedient, for the purpose of planting this Catholic Colony, to dismember Virginia, to declare the new plantation wholly independent on the Virginian laws, and to render it solely subject to the crown of England.

"The division of Virginia in this manner to indulge the Roman Catholics, was not the only favour conferred on them; on the contrary, they were distinguished with immunities superior to all the other Colonies; and Maryland was the first settlement honoured with the title of Province; "That the country thus granted (I speak the language of the charter) might be eminent above all other parts of the said territory, (English America) and dignified with higher titles."

"The powers with which the popish proprietor was himself invested, were very ample; the whole executive authority of the state was centered in his person; and, in cases of emergency, the whole legislative authority also. In these cases, his ordinances were deemed of equal validity with the public acts of the Provincial legislature, and were only so far restrained, as neither to injure the rights of the subject, nor to oppose the laws of England. He had the liberty of levying troops, and the privilege of conferring titles, provided the titles he conferred were not used in the Mother-Country. He was empowered to pardon all offences, whether before or after judgment. He was even made the universal patron of all the Protestant churches which might be erected in the Colony; and finally, to complete the encouragement of popery, the inhabitants of Maryland were expressly exempted from taxation, a favour which had not been bestowed upon any one of the Protestant Colonies.

"The reason for this partiality in the crown to the Roman Catholic religion, is easily accounted for; in the reigns of James the First and his son Charles, the ministry attempted to make the Colonies solely dependent on the person of the king, and in these unsettled periods of our constitution, the Commons were sometimes checked, when they ventured to consider America as an appendage belonging to the kingdom. The Roman Catholics therefore being judged most devoted to the claims of monarchy, were treated with the greatest degree of regard by the sovereign; and as the laws would not allow them an equality with Protestants in England, it was judged politic to grant them a superiority in America.

Besides, the more discordant the religions and the constitutions of the several provinces were*, the greater the probability appeared, of their feverally attaching themselves to their common head; and as the republicans emigrated very fast, it was thought proper to counterbalance their influence, by a Colony heartily disposed to favour the pretensions of the crown.

"The Maryland Charter was granted by Charles the First, to Lord Baltimore in the year 1632, just 143 years previous to the act for regulating the constitution in Canada; yet the disaffected Provinces did not discover 'till the year 1774, that popery had ever been established in any part of British America. Nay, what is still more extraordinary, the Marylanders themselves, are now become such excellent Protestants, that they never heard of an establishment given to the popish religion, till the late obnoxious law for settling the government of Quebec. They totally forgot that their own existence as a Colony, is owing to this very religion which they abhor, and so zealous are they for the uncorrupted doctrines of Christ, that they oppose the Catholic communion, at the immediate expence of every principle which is founded upon Christianity."

The charge of Hypocrisy is brought from the printed votes of the Congress, in which they thus address the People of England:

"Nor can we suppress our astonishment, that a British parliament should ever consent to establish in that country a religion, that has deluged your island in blood, and dispersed impiety, bigotry, persecution, murder and rebellion through every part of the world."

And when they address the Canadians they use these words:

"These are the rights you are entitled to, and ought at this moment in perfection to exercise. And what is offered to you by the late Act of Parliament in their place?—Liberty of conscience in your religion?—No—God gave it to you, and the temporal powers, with which you have been and are connected, firmly stipulated for your enjoyment of it. If laws divine and human could secure it against the despotic caprices of wicked men, it was secured before." Here are American wisdom, justice, and piety, for the people of Great-Britain! The religion which in page 38th the parliament had no authority to grant, belongs in page 72 by right divine to the Canadians; and though there it has dispersed "impiety, persecution, murder and rebellion, through the world," yet here it becomes the immediate Gift of God!

"The Congress in page 38th are afflicted because administration has been too favourable to the religion of Canada. In page 72, they are afflicted because administration has not been favourable enough; and the better to raise discontents among the French Provincials, tell them "that the crown and its ministers are empowered as far as they could be by parliament, to establish even the inquisition among them." To complete the whole, the Congress thus address the Canadians in page 27: "We are too well acquainted with the liberality of sentiment distinguishing your nation, to imagine that difference of religion will prejudice you against a heartly amity with us. You know that the transcendent nature of freedom elevates those who unite in the cause, above all such low minded infirmities. The Swiss Cantons furnish a memorable proof of this truth. Their union is composed of Catholic and Protestant states, living in the utmost concord and peace with one another, and they are thereby enabled, ever since they bravely vindicated their freedom, to defy and defeat every tyrant which has invaded them."

N O T E.

* This accounts for the different forms of Colony government; Papists were not tolerated in Massachusetts Bay, nor by the last American Charter in Georgia.

II. An Examination of the Rev. Mr. John Wesley's Primitive Physic: shewing, That a great Number of the Prescriptions therein contained, are founded on Ignorance of the Medical Art, and of the Power and Operation of Medicines; and that it is a Publication calculated to do essential Injury to the Health of those Persons who may place Confidence in it. Interspersed with Medical Remarks and Observations. By W. Hawes, Apothecary. 8vo. 1s. 6d. Cadell.

"Highly as we think the public indebted to many of the medical practitioners of the present times, there are few to whom it owes greater obligations than to the worthy author of this publication. The part he has taken in the institution of the society for the recovery of drowned persons, in conjunction with his ingenious colleague, Dr. Cogan, does him particular honour. And though his zeal in the cause of Dr. Goldsmith may have been misconstrued, as tending to decry a powerful and efficacious medicine; he certainly acted the part of a judicious apothecary, in advising against its indiscriminate and injudicious administration.—In the present case, it is to be lamented that the infamous publication, to which it is intended as an antidote, did not fall sooner into his hands; as it is morally impossible (if what the author of it declares, respecting its sale, be true*) that it must not have been eventually the cause of many murders! We can hardly speak of it, indeed, with common patience; as, whatever excuse may be made for the quackery of ignorant old women, we cannot help thinking that a man of Mr. Wesley's education, knowledge of the world, and pretensions to religion, conscious as he must be of his ignorance of medicine, and his influence over others, if possible more ignorant than himself, deserves, for this piece of physical empiricism, neither more nor less than to be hanged. For in murder, accessories are principals, and though he might not be guilty of malice aforethought, he certainly did it at the instigation of the devil, not having the fear of God before his eyes; which in a professed divine is truly diabolical.

The recipes contained in Mr. Wesley's Primitive Physic are no fewer than one thousand and twelve; from the remarks on many of which, Mr. Hawes sufficiently proves, that no person can "with any degree of safety, rely on a compilation so extremely injudicious; the pretended remedies contained therein, being often of no use, and those which might be of utility, generally unattended with such directions, or regard to times and circumstances, as would be necessary to render them efficacious; and, indeed, often calculated only to produce the most dangerous and fatal effects."

We shall content ourselves with quoting only two.—"No. 445. For a Bloody Flux, drink cold water as largely as possible till the flux stops."—Well said, Dr. Sangrado; it is plain that, if the patient be carried off by the flux before it stops, he will not have drank cold water enough, or as largely as possible.—"No. 683. To one poisoned, give one or two drachms of distilled verdigris." A dose that would effectually poison twenty or thirty people, though not poisoned before. But this, Doctor Wesley says, is an error of the press that has escaped the corrector in one or more of the twenty or thirty editions of this publication. For drachms read grains. We should be apt, indeed, to make many grains of allowance for errors of the press, by which we ourselves are so often made to write nonsense. But Mr. Hawes assures us that this excuse is an "artful evasion; for this error is in the fifth, the eighth, and the sixteenth editions; and there is the greatest reason to believe, that it has passed through every edition; for though Mr. W. has been publicly called upon to point out the edition in which there was not this error, he has not been able to point out any one." Mr. Hawes, indeed, sufficiently exposes the effrontery of this reverend quack. His pamphlet, however, is not confined merely to the pointing out such errors as might prove most fatal; his medical remarks and observations serving to set those persons right whom Mr. Wesley may have misled. We earnestly recommend it, therefore, as particularly useful, and even necessary, to all such as possess and pay any regard to Mr. Wesley's Primitive Physic.

III. The Rambles of Mr. Frankly. Published by his Sister. Vol. 3, and 4. 5s. Becker.

An entertaining, sentimental novel, far superior to most of modern date. We would recommend it to all those who ramble to masquerades: a very pleasing account of the personages and conversations at one of them is here given; after reading of which, we could not help wishing that our Bishops would cause the following petition to be inserted in the Litany, "From masquerades, and the expence, folly and guilt of attending them, good Lord, deliver us." The following extract is the reflection of a couple just returned from one of those scenes.

"WE

NOTE.

* Having gone through, as Mr. Wesley informs the public, twenty or thirty editions.

"WE have lost this evening,"—said I;—we went for pleasure—but have only been the unwilling witnesses to the discontent which the generality of the world carry about with them, even to those places where they go to be amused. Did we know the value of a day, or even of one short hour of time, we should not be the prodigals we are."—"Surely," cried Julia, with a smile, "we are a strange pair. Our hearts in unison seem to experience exactly the same feelings. Like you, I return tired, dissatisfied, and out of spirits. My dress brings a blush to my cheek—it becomes not a mother, and a wife. However, there were many much older and superior to ourselves to keep us in countenance."—"Folly has a large train of followers—but pleading the example of a multitude, is no excuse for the follies of an individual. Not one hour of life has promised to call again, my Julia,"—said I;—"therefore we will go to no more masquerades—neither shall our hearts or persons be disguised."—We retired to rest, and undoubtedly slept the sounder for having formed a rational resolution."

IV. Young James, or the Sage and the Atheist. An English Story. By M. de Voltaire. 2s. 6d. Murray.

Our author, notwithstanding his great age, must still write—and his manner continues animated and lively. He is here an advocate for the existence of God, and points out some of the pernicious effects of Atheism, but intersperses in his story many sneers at passages of Revelation, and a few of the primitive fathers of the church. We shall present our readers with his comparison between an Atheist, and a superstitious person.

"The belief of a God, the rewarder of good actions, the punisher of bad, and the forgiver of sins, is then a belief the most useful to mankind; it is the only check to power which insolently commits public crimes; it is the only curb upon those whose cunning renders their crimes secret. I do not desire you, my friends, to mix with this necessary belief superstitious which dishonour it, and which may even render it destructive. The Atheist is a monster who will devour merely to appease hunger; the superstitious person is another monster who will tear mankind to pieces from duty. I have always remarked that an Atheist may be cured, but that the radical cure of a superstitious man never happens. The Atheist is a man of sense, who is mistaken, but who thinks for himself; the superstitious person is a brutal fool, who never had a single idea of his own. The Atheist will violate Iphigenia, ready to give her hand to Achilles; but the fanatic will piously cut her throat upon the altar, and believe that Jupiter is much obliged to him. The Atheist will commit sacrilege, that he may have wherewithal to treat a courtesan; but the fanatic will celebrate an auto-da-fe in the church, and roar out a Jewish song, while he is burning a Jew. Yes, my friends, Atheism and Fanaticism are the two poles of an universe of confusion and horror; the little Zone of virtue lies between these two poles; walk steadily in that path; believe in a good God, and be yourselves good. This is all that the great legislators, Locke and Penn, require of their people.

V. A Liturgy on the universal Principles of Religion and Morality, to be used at a Chapel in Margaret-street, Cavendish-Square. 2s. Payne.

As of all the projects that have ever been formed, there is not one so absurd, and that hath so much mischief and wickedness to answer for, as that of bringing mankind to an uniformity of opinion by the influence of penal laws; so of all the projects that have ever been formed respecting religious worship, our author's is the most extraordinary. It is to bring Jews and Gentiles, Christians, Mahometans, and Deists into one chapel, and induce them to join together in social worship. For the use of persons who entertain such generous sentiments as these, which far exceeds those of Jesus Christ, (whose notions it seems were too contracted) this liturgy hath been composed, and we believe there is not a word in it which can give the least offence to any free-thinker in the universe, unless the confessions "we have followed too much the evil devices and desires of our hearts—We earnestly desire never to repeat our offences, but as a testimony of our sorrow for them, to renounce every thing displeasing to thee."

VI. A Sermon preached at the opening of a Chapel in Margaret-street, Cavendish-square, on Sunday, April 7, 1776. By D. Williams. 6d. Payne.

This sermon was delivered to recommend and justify the above liturgy. The sermonizer hath abilities, but we are sorry they are not better employed. He hath used the usual arguments in favour of public worship, and too justly observes that at present if a gentleman occasionally visits his estate, he hath not religion enough to attend his church, and as the people look up to him they follow his example, and public worship is deserted. The general dissoluteness and wretchedness of the people are to be attributed principally to these causes.

VII. Some Reasons for approving of the Dean of Gloucester's Plan of separating from the Colonies; with a Proposal for a further Improvement. 6d. Conant.

Humorous and satirical. As the Dean had asserted that upon our separation from America, the trade will be more flourishing, by the same arguments our author proves the necessity and advantage of cutting off Ireland; and so the more we think and reason on the idea of reducing the British dominions to a proper size, the more satisfaction we receive—we shall find every commodity within ourselves, get rid of all burdens and taxes, and render the castle of our ancestors impregnable.

XIV. Freedom, sacred to the memory of General Richard Montgomery, commander in chief of the Continental Forces, in the Reduction of of Popery and Canada, Whose glorious fall in the support of Constitutional Liberty, against the Encroachments of arbitrary Power, (in the form of Quebec, on Sunday the 31st of December) closed the important Year 1775.

"Ostendunt terris hunc tantum fata!" Virg.

This piece, as written by a gentleman in this country, and first printed here, demands our particular notice. It celebrates the death of general Montgomery, previous to which he takes a retrospective view of the Stewart reign, and American colonization; enlarges on the tyranny used towards the colonies, and enumerates the instruments employed by the ministry for that purpose, viz. Scotch rebels, Popish priests, and Swaddling preachers. He then shews the actions of his hero to his fall before Quebec.

The author seems to be enthusiastic in the cause of liberty, and treats those, whom he thinks are enemies to it, with great freedom, though in some places with rather a degree of acrimony. He hath enriched the poem (which consists of 540 lines) with copious explanatory notes. We shall extract some of his lines as a specimen of his poetical style.

Speaking of the first settling of America, he says,

"In those curs'd Scottish times, the few unbracke

To stern Oppression's ever galling yoke,
And by the noblest emulation led,
Of honest fathers, who had bravely bled,
Leaving those sons unquestionable heirs
Of what they might not alienate from theirs,
Immortal Liberty! But by a crime
Would damn their memories to the latest time.
That honest few, enduring ill to see
A land of freedom, then no longer free,
For voluntary 'exile straight prepar'd
All that the storms of tyranny had spar'd;
And well they might in compass of an hour,
For little 'scap'd the ravages of pow'r.
Yet oh! what pangs each honest exile feels,
As from some friend, or aged fire he steals
His ling'ring steps! while soothing hope, that stays

Desponding minds would point to happier days.
But to the deep descends each little train
Push'd on the horrors of the angry main,
In firmer hope, 'midst Savages to find
A fate less dreadful than they leave behind.
At length, the perils of the ocean o'er,
A boundless empire calls them to its shore:
So Troy's fam'd chief, his native land undone,
'Scap'd with his aged fire, and darling son,
Thro' many an angry storm, and many a toil,
Reaches at last Antonia's fruitful soil.
And moor'd each shatter'd bark, and canvas
fur'd,

Found the then empire of the Western world.
The natives hail them, Nature's blessings share,

For here indeed they had enough to spare,
In Nature's rude, uncultivated state
Profusely shower'd, and all those blessings great;
For Heav'n had stor'd, but as in Nature's womb

Enormous wealth for millions yet to come,

Nor had the bounteous giver e'er decreed
Those millions, for the lust of one, to bleed,
Of one, whose narrow, undiscerning soul,
In time might strive to arrogate the whole.

The settling planters with Herculean toil,
From woods and monsters vindicate the soil;
To healthful lawns convert the drear abodes
Of wolves and serpents, crocodiles and toads;
And where the wild late heav'd its tow'ring
head,

Now herds or flocks, or yellow harvest spread;
The gazing Indian views with strange surprize,
Instead of deserts, towns and temples rise,
Whole nodding forests sunk into the main,
And in their place the habitable plain;
Sees the lop'd woods a double blessing yield,
The trading vessel and the cultur'd field;
While tillage and while traffic, hand in hand,
Cover the ocean, and enrich the land:
Sees plenty issuing from a thousand Springs,
And health and happiness unknown to kings;
While quick migrations from each distant clime Performs what elie had been the work of time."

When he comes to describe Mr. Wesley he is particularly severe.

"Laughs not the crowd while crafty Man-field rakes,

And ummages for help the very jakes?
While, hoarse in bellowing slavery's endless cant,
He calls a brother to eke out the rant?
While he for vilest ends (the means as vile)
Bids Wesley roar, what mortals but must smile?
And well that vagrant plays the jesuit part,
Taxis on his tongue, but murder in his heart;
(As erst his Master, with like purpose fell)
Wrests Heav'n's artillery to the cause of Hell!
With meagre looks and hypocritic face,
And all the sanctity of old grimace,
The slow sly greybeard hastens to his stand,
And deals his nonsense round the sleepy land.
If then Scotch rebels, priests and swaddlers fail,
What other imps of Hell shall next prevail?"

His description of the attack on Quebec is in these words.

"The victor troops arrive, invest the town,
Not as our modern troops by sitting down;
But in a council quick conven'd, agreed
To mount her battlements by escalade;
The harass'd few, in four divisions form,
Resolv'd to die or carry all by storm;
From tyrant power their bleeding country save,
Or bravely falling, gain an honour'd grave.

But lo! the inauspicious moment come,
Veil'd, as befits, in winter's horrid gloom;
The trumpets charge, Montgomery leads the strife,

In quest of glory, prodigal of life!
Good Heav'n! shall slaves a life like this survive,

As slaves alone were only fit to live?
Is there from virtue no peculiar shield
For those who dare the dangers of the field?
The trumpets charge the wakeful town alarms,
Who throng the battlements in horrent arms;
Firm he assails them; but ah! the hour!
That virtuous few o'ermatch'd by tenfold
pow'r,

Shall lay expiring on the hostile mounds,
All cover'd o'er with honourable wounds.

Mark we the Chief, where undismay'd he stands

Foremost in fight, and animates his bands,
Or bearing forward, nobler deeds inspires
Wrapt in the center of conflicting fires!
Within, without, the mingling troops engage,
And all the horrors of the battle rage:
Within, without, all nature seems to bear
A labouring part in the tempestuous war.
Pierce fly the leaden showers above, below
The weeping balls along the ramparts glow;
From deathful guns see instant thunders break,
And strongest bastions to their centers shake;
St. Laurence hears with wonder ev'ry roar,
And stays her course convuls'd from shore to shore:

Broad pregnant tires, their brazen bosoms bare,

Belch forth vast flames and rend th' affrighted
air;

Deep from their wombs the hollow thunders roll,

And dusky smoke rolls onward to the Pole.

Not neighb'ring Niagara louder roars,
As down its sides a flood of water pours;
Not deeper gloom involves the black'ning skies,
While from the gulph beneath dark vapours rise.

Fierce in the conflict, sluic'd at ev'ry vein, Life's generous current smoking down the plain,

Bravely they close in fight; while all around
Carnage, and death, and ruin, load the ground.
And now the Chief victorious in the fray,
As on his arm the fate of empires lay,
Mow'd down whole files of war; for yet he bore

The hottest fight, and rul'd the loud uproar,
And had but Heav'n prolong'd the glorious hour,

From threaten'd bondage, and from papal
pow'r,

The western world deliverance had found,
Quebec's proud towers laid level with the ground:

But, bravely borne amid the thickest fires,
Montgomery falls! and Freedom's self expires,
Or seems at least, yet o'er her champion's graves

Arisen, shall devote ten thousand slaves:

Alas, ten thousand of the Tarquin line,

A slight atonement for a life like thine!

If, to have liv'd, an honour to the age,

If, to have stay'd fell persecution's rage,

If from the worst captivity to free,

Be worthy praise, that praise is due to thee!"

XV. *An Heroic Epistle from Donna Teresa
Pinna y Ruiz, of Murcia, to Richard Twiss, Esq; F. R. S. with several explanatory Notes, written by himself.*

"Young Adam Cupid—he who shot so trim,
"When king Cophetua lov'd the beggar maid."

Printed for W. Wilson, Dame-street.

[Price, a British sixpence.]

The modest Mr. Twiss, the hero of this poem, having been evidently illiberal and unjust in his remarks on this country, in his late publication of a Tour in Ireland: we suppose some Hibernian genius has taken this pleasant method of retaliation, in which he has been uncommonly successful, particularly in exposing Mr. Twiss's adventures and inaccuracies. The writer of this epistle supposes it to come from a Spanish lady, Donna Teresa Pinna y Ruiz, with whom Mr. Twiss mentions that during his stay in Murcia, he spent every evening (in music and dancing). She upbraids the perjured traveller with having quitted her and Spain, for Hibernia and the Irish beauties, in the following poetic numbers:

"Ye western winds, from ocean's bosom rise,
And bear to perjurd Twiss his Pinna's sighs!
Ye newborn gales, that tan the lemon grove,
In clouds of essence wait the voice of love!
Yes—waft my sorrows to th' Iernian plains,
And bid their Author share Teresa's pains.
Fly, fly, my nightingale! the tale to bear;
Or thou, my parrot! pour it on his ear.
Ah! could my monkey swim the wat'ry way,
And grin my woes, and chide his long delay."

The verification all through is uncommonly harmonious, and enlivened with a rich vein of humour. After her arrival in Dublin, thinking herself slighted, she pursues him through all the stages in the neighbourhood of Dublin.

"When city belles in Sunday pomp are seen,
And gilded chariots troll round Stephen's-

Oh, splash his stockings, and avenge my woe.
Perhaps some Syren wafts thee all alone,
In magic vehicle, to cares unknown;
High low machine, that bears plebeian wight
To distant teahoule, or funereal rite:
Still as it moves, the proud pavillion nods,
A chaise for mortals, noddie term'd by gods.
Where Donnybrook surveys her winning rills,
And Chapel-izod rears her sunny hills;
Thy sumptuous board the little loves prepare,
And Sally Lun, and Jaffron cake are there.
Blest saffron cakes! from you may Dublin claim

Peculiar pleasure, and peculiar fame.

Blest cakes! plump, yellow, tempting as the breast

Of gypsey, heaving thro' the tatter'd vest!
Once imocks alone neglected saffron dy'd, (Unwath'd to wear them was the maiden's pride)

The generous drug, more honour'd than of yore,

Now fills the bellies it adorn'd before."

But hearing that her lover fell within the vagrant act, she repairs to the House of Industry.

"The gypsey damsel tyrant Haugl ten claims,
And, envious catiff! mars thy rising flames.
The sable cart—detested object—rolls,
And rumbles dire dismay to vagrant souls:
The mutes around it stalk—a grisly band—
The bloody halberd arms each iron hand.
All, all the ragged to their empire bend,
Old, young, blind, lame, the fatal cat ascend.
Not shrieking infant for his yowl he spares,
Not bearded grandfire for his silver hairs,

Not

Not maiden coy, with rage and terror pale,
 * He dooms, he bears her to his proud serail.
 E'en when the ballad-finger's note is loud,
 And fears and wishes sooth the melting croud,
 When artle's love, and love's disport, she sings,
 Or heroes pendent in unworthy strings;
 Sudden the cart—the fatal cart appears,—
 The captive minstrel steeps her song in tears.
 But, ah! my fears, my boding fears arise,
 (Within the vagrant act my Richard lies) Left thou the cart's unenvied height shouldst gain,

And ride triumphant through the hooting train.
 Once only skilled to feed the toad and asp,
 Say, canst thou oakum pick, or logwood rasp?"

If the ingenious author of this Epistle may be guessed at by his style and humour, we think we may not hesitate in attributing this entertaining production to the same pen as the celebrated Epistle from Mr. Howard to Alderman Faulkner.

LES PLAISIRS CHAMPETRES.

The musical score is written for two staves, likely representing a piano and a lute or guitar. The key signature has two sharps (F# and C#), and the time signature is 2/4. The score consists of five systems of two staves each. The first system includes a treble clef on the top staff and an alto clef on the bottom staff. The music features various rhythmic patterns, including eighth and sixteenth notes, and rests. There are trills (tr.) marked above certain notes in the third and fourth systems. The score ends with a double bar line in the fifth system.

Hague, April 26.

LETTERS from Poland mention a very important piece of news, which is, that the court of Russia has declared that it is willing to give up to the republic all the territory ceded by the convention of Peterburgh, provided the crown of that kingdom be declared hereditary in favour of the present king.

Petersburgh, April 26, N. S. This afternoon, between five and six o'clock, died after a few days illness, her imperial highness the great duchess of Russia. This fatal event has given her imperial majesty and the great duke the deepest affliction; and her loss is most sincerely and universally lamented throughout the empire.

Madrid, April 26. A mine of diamonds and topazes has lately been discovered near the gate of Segovia, within a foot of the surface of the earth.

Bologna, April 27. The senate of Venice seem not at all inclined to comply with the desire of the Pope, by revoking the edict of the 3d of January, which is the principal subject of difference, between that republic and the holy see; but on the contrary, the senate are resolved to sell the revenues of all the monasteries in their dominions. They began with the Abbies, which the late Mr. Scavognano enjoyed, which were sold by auction. The produce of these sales is to be kept in a separate stock, out of which the monasteries are to be supported, and the rest is to augment the revenues of the poorest bishopricks of the state, in order to put them more upon an equality with the rest. The same advices add, that the senate will soon send the prelates Morosini and Canassoni to Rome, who will be charged with a negociation to terminate the differences in an amicable manner.

Rome, April 29. The steps which have lately been taken contrary to the power of the Pope (formerly so respected) encrease daily.

In Italy the republic of Venice has already set the example. The court of Naples has also come to a resolution to sell the ecclesiastical estates in that kingdom, without regard to the Pope's permission.

Paris, May 1. M. De Braud, formerly officer of the republic of Poland, at present employed in the port of Brest, has made a trial on board the king's ship, the Normandy, of a composition to prevent the worms, with which he some time ago tempered two planks of the sheathing of the said ship; the result of which, on the return of this ship is, that the whole of her sheathing is found to be worm-eaten throughout, except the two planks so tempered as aforesaid, which are now as sound, in every respect, as when first laid. M. de Braud proposes to bring this valuable composition to the highest perfection.

Paris, May 6. The king has lately formed eleven new regiments, and appointed the eleven colonels who are to command them. The count de St. Germain had put an officer upon that list, whom his majesty thought proper to strike off; and the count having remonstrated to the king upon this subject, it is said his majesty made answer, that he would have nobody in his service who should take upon him to write satires.

Paris, May 8. They talk much here of a war between Spain and Portugal. The count d'Aranda has made a demand of the 24,000 men which had been stipulated in the late reign, in case of a war. But before the demand is complied with, his majesty will endeavour to settle the differences between those two powers.

Paris, May 12. This day his most Christian majesty declared the marquis de Noailles his ambassador to his Britannick majesty, in the room of the count de Guines who was at the same time created a duke, by the title of duke de Guines.

HISTORICAL

LONDON, April 30.

THEY write from the island of Jersey, that on the 21st of last month, two American vessels arrived at St. Malo's, and unloaded their cargoes in less than thirty hours. There were on board them two American gentlemen, thought to have come from the General Congress, as they set off for Paris the day they arrived, and, we are informed, were received as men of character, as they were at court, though they staid only three days at Paris, and then returned on board the said vessels, which were loaded with powder and all sorts of warlike stores, while the gentlemen were at Paris, as every thing was in readiness for their loading and unloading. They sailed both together; they are about 280 tons burthen each. There are several others at other ports at this present time upon the same business.

May 5. Two men of war and four frigates are ordered to be got ready with all expedition, to sail to St. Helena, and wait there for the homeward-bound East-Indiamen, which they are to convoy to the river: intelligence having been lately received that several armed American vessels have failed for that coast, in order to attack them on their return.

8. The fleet of American privateers under the command of commodore Hopkins, which was sent out some months since, and supposed to be gone to intercept the homeward-bound Indiamen that touch at St. Helena, it now appears have made their first attempt on New Providence, which they have taken possession of. The governor and his family are gone to St. Augustine. This island is so situated as to command the Jamaica and other West-India trade.

10. The ministry received advice that the packet dispatched by lord Dunmore, with intelligence and letters from his lordship, governor Martin, &c. &c. was lost off Scilly. The dispatches are all lost, but the crew are saved. She met General Burgoyne not far from Newfoundland, all well, and nothing material.

13. The command of the Provincial army at New-York has been confirmed on Colonel (now General) Shuyler.

22. Yesterday the Exchequer loan bills, the lottery bill, the insolvent debtors bill, and thirty two other public and private bills, received the royal assent, by virtue of a commission; the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, and lord president of the council, sat in their robes as commissioners.

24. Yesterday, about ten minutes before three o'clock, his majesty went to the House of Peers, and having given the royal assent to seventeen public and private bills, was pleased to make the following most gracious speech to both Houses of Parliament:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The conclusion of the public business, and the advanced season of the year, make it proper for me to give you some recess; but I cannot put an end to this session without assuring you, that the fresh instances of your affectionate attachment to me, and of your steady attention and adherence to the true interests of your country, which you have shewn through the whole course of your important deliberations, afford me the highest satisfaction.

"No alteration has happened in the state of foreign affairs since your meeting; and it is with pleasure I inform you, that the assurances which I have received of the dispositions of the several powers in Europe promise a continuance of the general tranquillity."

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"It was with real regret and concern that I found myself under the necessity of asking of my faithful Commons, any extraordinary supplies; I thank you for the readiness and dispatch with which they have been granted; and they are the more acceptable to me, as you have shewn, in the manner of raising them, an equal regard to the exigencies of the service, and the ease of my people; and you may be assured that the confidence you repose in me shall be used with proper frugality, and applied only to the purposes for which it was intended.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"We are engaged in a great national cause, the prosecution of which must inevitably be attended with many difficulties and much expence: but when we consider that the essential rights and interests of the whole empire are deeply concerned in the issue of it, and can have no safety or security but in that constitutional subordination for which we are contending, I am convinced that you will not think any price too high for the preservation of such objects.

"I will still entertain a hope that my rebellious subjects may be awakened to a sense of their errors, and that, by a voluntary return to their duty, they will justify me in bringing about the favourite wish of my heart, the restoration of harmony, and the re-establishment of order and happiness in every part of my dominions. But if a due submission should not be obtained from such motives and such dispositions on their part, I trust that I shall be able, under the blessing of Providence, to effectuate it by a full exertion of the great force with which you have intrusted me."

Then the lord chancellor, by his majesty's command, said,

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is his majesty's royal will and pleasure, that this parliament be prorogued to Thursday, the first day of August next, to be then here holden; and this parliament is accordingly prorogued to Thursday, the first day of August next.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Waterford, June 18.] About ten o'clock on Sunday morning the Tyrone yacht sailed (with a favourable wind) from this port for Milford, with Clayton Bayly, Esq; of Kilkenny, Mrs. Bayly, sister to Sir Haydock Evans Morres, five Corke gentlemen for Bristol, several common passengers, and Lieut. Boucher, of the navy, with dispatches for government from the Commodore on the Newfoundland station: This gentleman arrived in a vessel from St. John's, had but fourteen days passage, and got into this port only the day before the Tyrone sailed; he hopes by this dispatch to be able to deliver his packet at the Treasury Office, London, by twelve o'clock to-morrow (Wednesday). He informs us that Hayes, who broke out of Clonmell Coal last winter, in which he was confined for being concerned in the barbarous murder of Ambrose Power, Esq; was discovered and taken at St. John's a few days before he came away, and is coming home in irons, to receive the just reward his villainy merits.

DUBLIN.

Tuesday, June 18.

This day two hundred and forty-two of the members chosen to sit in the new parliament came to the house. At half past four his excellency the lord lieutenant came to the house of peers, and sent for the members, when he ordered them to return, and chuse a Speaker. Being come back,

Sir John Blaquiere rose, and addressing himself to the clerk of the house, said, in the last parliament it had fallen to his lot to move for the thanks of the house to its speaker, for his impartiality and integrity, and his strenuous maintenance of the dignity of parliament. His motion was then carried, without one dissenting voice, with an unanimity which did the right honourable gentleman the highest honour. And indeed the whole history of the last parliament bore ample testimony of his fitness, by every public and private virtue, for that high and important office. Since therefore the public had experienced that gentleman's eminent abilities in the last parliament, (which he would not lessen by attempting to enumerate) he would take the liberty to propose the Rt. hon. Edmund Sexton Pery to be speaker of the present parliament.

The

the right hon. James Fortescue seconded the motion.

Mr. Sterling, the clerk, put the question; when there being several dissenting voices, the members proceeded to divide, and the clerk was directed to call over the names, which he did according to the list returned by the clerk of the Hanaper, each member present answering to his name.

As they proceeded to tell, Mr. George Ogle said he had some doubts concerning the returns, and was afraid some gentlemen were present who had no right to vote for a speaker. He therefore desired to be informed if all the returns for boroughs, &c. had been made by the sheriffs of the several counties to whom the writs of election had been sent, and had issued precepts in consequence of those writs.

Mr. Attorney General replied, the clerk had called the members over by the list sent him from the hanaper-office. If the clerk of the hanaper had sent any wrong returns, the house (as soon as it was one) could look into that error.

Mr. Yelverton supported what had been urged by Mr. Ogle, and said it would be proper to order the clerk of the hanaper to attend with the original returns; but Mr. Attorney General reminded the gentlemen that they could proceed upon no other business but the choice of a speaker, and that they were not a house till then.

The members being divided on the question, that the right hon. Edmund Sexton Pery be declared speaker of the honourable house of commons, the tellers counted

Ayes, 141; Noes, 98.

Mr. Pery was then led up to the chair, and being placed therein, he in a short speech thanked the commons for the honour done to him, and then was led by Sir John Blaquiere and Mr. Fortescue, preceded by the mace, to his excellency (who had waited above an hour in the house of peers) for his approbation. Being approved, he returned, and then putting on his gown, took the accustomed oaths and subscribed the declaration, and sat down in the chair, whilst the oaths were administered to every member present, after which the house adjourned.

Wednesday, June 19. The house was employed till near half past four o'clock in administering the oaths to such members as had not taken them the preceding day, which being done, Mr. Speaker read to the house

His Excellency's Speech as follows:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I have the king's commands to acquaint you, that his majesty hath been graciously pleased to call you thus early together, in order to give you an opportunity of dispatching such parliamentary proceedings and matters as you shall judge to be immediately necessary for the public service.

The speech was read a second time at the table, and then entered on the journals.

An engrossed bill was then received from the lords, which recited that the act in being, allowing persons in office a longer time to qualify, pursuant to the laws against popery, would expire on the first day of next August. Therefore this bill enacted that the act should continue for two years more. It was read twice, then committed (Mr. Robert Fitzgerald in the chair) read a third time, passed and sent back to the lords.

Preparatory to the issuing the writs for calling a new parliament, the privy council had sent over two bills (according to Poyning's law) which were returned from England, as approved, and Mr. Attorney General presented them to the house. The first he presented was a bill to continue for a longer time, the act to prevent frauds committed by bankrupts. The other was a bill granting certain duties therein specified to his majesty, to be appropriated to paying the four per cent. interest on a former loan. These two bills met with a different fate. The bankrupts bill was read the first time, and it was moved to receive a second reading to-morrow; but Mr. Barry saying it required some consideration, as several amendments were necessary in the bankrupt law, Mr. Attorney General agreed to postpone the second reading till next Wednesday forenoon.

But as the other was a money bill, Mr. Barry Barry was of opinion that the house could not even afford it a reading; for by a standing order, so old as the year 1718, no money bill could be brought in till a committee of accounts, and a committee of ways and means had made their respective reports.

This, though founded on a strict precedent, did not satisfy several gentlemen. Mr. George Ogle moved to reject the bill in the first instance; Mr. Attorney General replied, as he had moved for a reading, his motion must be decided upon before any other motion could take place.

Mr. Burgh, fearful the independent gentlemen would oppose the reading of the bill, declared that unless it was read, the house could not assert its right of holding the purse of the nation, with that firmness it would wish, which was the end at which he aimed. For if the bill should be denied a reading, it would rather appear that it was dropt in conformity to a standing order, than that it was rejected for having originated in a wrong place. Whereas it would be proper to destroy the bill merely because it was a money bill, not framed by the commons.

Mr. Barry Barry still urged the force of the standing order, which operated against a first reading, though indeed he wished some mode could be adopted that would mark the utter dislike of the house.

Mr. Burgh answered, the objection might be easily got over; for any parliament was not strictly bound by the orders of another preceding parliament, until those orders were revived. Now, as no resolution has even been proposed to revive the standing orders, they were not as yet binding on the house.

Mr. Ponsonby agreed with Mr. Burgh, that the standing orders were indeed but a dead letter till revived by a vote.

Mr. Attorney-General said he would, to accommodate gentlemen, withdraw his motion, for an immediate reading, and move to postpone all further consideration of the bill to a distant day. But this he was not allowed to do; the question was carried to read the bill, and when it was read, Mr. George Ogle resumed his motion to reject the said bill. He was seconded by Mr. Montgomery of Cavan, and it was carried almost unanimously.

This point being gained, Mr. Burgh then thought it a proper time to move for reviving all the standing orders of former Parliaments, which was carried in the affirmative.

When this business was finished, several gentlemen arose to present petitions complaining of undue elections. On which Mr. Speaker read a clause of the British Act for deciding upon undue elections, which prescribed the practice to be not to allow a preference or priority to any petition, but that they should be all given to the clerk, who should write on separate papers the names of the petitioners, and the county, city, or borough, where the cause of complaint arose, and then they should be drawn out one by one to settle their priority. This method was relished by the House, who agreed to a like resolution, on a motion made by Mr. Hellen, in the very words given by the Speaker, and then the petitions were given to the clerk.

A complaint was then made by Mr. Recorder of Dublin, that several high sheriffs had misbehaved in regard to the general election, by returning elections for cities and boroughs in their counties, before those for the counties had been returned. This he thought demanded the attention and the censure of the House, which ought to fall lighter or heavier as the sheriff appeared to have acted from an error in judgment, or from a sinister end. To ascertain which he moved, that the clerk of the Hanaper office do attend this House to-morrow. Sir John Blaquiére and Mr. James Fortescue requested the gentleman to withdraw his motion, as there would not be time to enter into the enquiry. Mr. Barry Barry also was of the same opinion, as it could answer no good present purpose, and it would be wrong to proceed now on such a disquisition, as the sheriffs would have no opportunity to defend themselves. On this principle Mr. Recorder agreed to withdraw his motion till next sessions.

Thursday, June 20.

The clerk having written the names of the several places for undue elections, of which petitions had been presented, on several pieces of paper, they were put into a glais and drawn out, to settle the priority of their consideration in the following order:

1. Borough of Newry—Richard Johnson and J. Bowes Benson, Esqrs.

2. Borough of Callan—George Agar and Hon. George Butler.

3. County of Westmeath——Richard Malone, Esq.

4. Co. of Tipperary—Daniel Toler, Esq.

5. County of Roscommon,——Arthur French, Esq.

6. Co. of Limerick—Hugh Massey, Esq.

7. Co. of Kerry—John Crosby, Esq.

8. Borough of Dungarvan,——Godfrey Green, Esq.

9. Co. of Clare—Nich. Westbey, Esq.

10. Borough of Antrim——Alex. Stewart, and Skeffington Thompson, Esqrs.

11. Borough of Fethard, in Tipperary——William Burton, and George Gore, Esqrs.

12. Trinity College—Right hon. Philip Tisdall.

13. Borough of Wexford—J. Grogan, Esq.

14. Borough of Maryborough—John Tydd, Esq; and Gen. Walshe.

15. Borough of Swords—John Hatch, and Stephen Popham, Esqrs.

16. County of Fermanagh—William Irvine, Esq.

17. Bor. of Irishtown—Eland Mossom, Esq.

18. County of Kilkenny—Rt. hon. Henry Flood.

Ordered (on the motion of Arthur Pomeroy, Esq;) that the Speaker be desired to appoint a chaplain; and the Speaker accordingly appointed his brother, the rev. Mr. Pery.

Sir Edward Newenham moved for the thanks of the House to the rev. Dr. Thomas Carr, for his long services as chaplain to that House, which was carried.

Ordered a new writ for a new member for the borough of Carlow, in the room of the Rt. hon. John Ponsonby, who made his election for the county of Kilkenny.

The House was sent for by the Lord Lieutenant to the House of Peers, where his Excellency gave the Royal Assent to an act to allow a further time for persons in office to qualify; and then prorogued the Parliament to the 20th of August next.

May 27th] Early in the morning, three cruel villains seized William Graham, one of the watchmen of St. Audeon's parish, who was going to his stand on Usher's-quay, and threw him over the wall into the river; the tide being out he fell upon the stones, and was so much bruised that his life is despaired of.

June 4.] Being his Majesty's birth day, the same was observed as usual: at noon the following ode, written by Benjamin Victor, Esq; and set to music by Richard Hay, Esq; was performed.

R E C I T A T I V E.

Thou fairest daughter of the various year,
O June! how bright thy flow'ry scenes appear!

The greatest Prince, the foremost son of fame,

To thee bequeathed the glories of his name.

A I R.

A I R.

Perfect virtues, manly grace,
Let the harmonious choir display;
The brightest of the royal race,
Animates the breathing lay.

A I R.

Supreme of all celestial pow'rs,
Bless our Monarch's social hours;
Ev'ry earthly bliss prepare,
Faith and truth deserve your care.

R E C I T A T I V E.

With modest confidence come forth
Neglected truth and pining worth,
By GEORGE belov'd and known:
But fear the light'ning of his eye,
Ye splendid faults and every lie,
That skulk behind the throne.

O happy Britain, joyful hour,
Where reigns humanity with pow'r,
Integrity with art!
Unwearied bounty still bestows,
Yet still the public current flows,
Entire in every part.

To GEORGE our king renew the strain;
These are the blessings of his reign.

10.] At night, as two young men and the captain of the Norfolk, were going on board at the North wall, one of them slipped off the plank, and brought the captain along with him. The tide being about half ebb, the captain swam on shore, but his companion in the misfortune, not being so well acquainted with that cold element, sunk under water immediately, then rose again, and continued alternately in that distressed situation until he was dragged out, quite senseless, by the young man who had escaped, and who having, with one hand, laid hold of a bawler which hung across the surface of the water, with the other, contrived to lay hold of his companion. The young man was brought, to all appearance dead, into the Glass-house, where hot salt and ashes being applied to his body, and being afterwards rolled backwards and forwards on a barrel, a great quantity of water issued, and the symptoms of life returning he was blooded, and in about three hours came to himself.—Were a little care and proper methods taken with people who are apparently drowned, and supposed to be past recovery, many lives would be saved.

By a letter from Sir John Fielding, London, to the right hon. the Lord Mayor of this city, we are informed, that ——— Connor, a bookbinder, (for whom a reward of 50l. was offered, being supposed to have cut off the head of one Howell, a constable, in Stoneybatter, and conveying away the dead body in a sack, but being discovered by a revenue officer, who desired to know what the sack contained, thinking he had a prize, threw it down and made off) Patrick Murphy, Patrick Carroll, and Henry Haslam, having all taken places to go with the Liverpool coach from London to Liverpool, were apprehended the 3d inst. by one of Sir John's officers, and on searching them, several pick-lock keys, loaded pistols, an iron crow, and other implements of house-breaking were found. Whether their expedition was intended for Liverpool or this kingdom we cannot learn, but it was thought of a dangerous nature. Connor took the name of James Smith; and the above Carroll is thought to be one Plunket.

Extract of a Letter from Derry, June 2, 1776.

“Last Tuesday the right rev. and right hon. the lord bishop of Derry, accompanied by the Mayor of our city and several gentlemen to the top of the tower of our Church, laid the first stone of the spire: The best judges who have seen its design, allow that it will far exceed in elegance and beauty any thing of the sort that has ever been attempted in this kingdom. The tower is already heightened above twenty feet; and this delightful superstructure, which is to be raised 130 feet, will undoubtedly be the greatest ornament to the whole country around, must excite the curiosity of strangers to visit us from remote parts, and raise a spirit of emulation in the different places of consequence throughout the kingdom. As all the materials are now collected at a very great expence, we have all possible reason to hope, from the experienced abilities and excellent character of its undertaker, that this beautiful fabric will be completed before next November.

Paul THE Maylor
HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For JULY, 1776.

A Desire of enabling our Readers to form a Collection of the Portraits of all those Gentlemen who have rendered themselves remarkable on the Provincial Side of the American Dispute, has induced us to give in this Month's Magazine, an elegant Likeness of Major-General Arnold.

Having in our last given a very copious Account of the American Publication, intitled Common Sense, Justice and the Impartiality professed by the Hibernian Magazine, oblige us to take an equal Notice of an Answer to the above Pamphlet, stiled Plain Truth, printed also in Philadelphia.

THIS answer is ascribed to the pen of the learned Dr. Franklin, but whoever the author is, he seems a strenuous advocate for the liberties of the Americans, whilst he very ably attacks the doctrine of Independency, broached by the writer of Common Sense. We shall extract so much as may give our readers a competent idea of the merits of this piece.

He sets out with remarking very judiciously in answer to Common Sense. "In the beginning of his pamphlet the author asserts, that society in every state is a blessing. This in the sincerity of my heart I deny; for it is supreme misery to be associated with those who, to promote their ambitious purposes, flagitiously pervert the ends of political society." After which he observes, "the judicious reader will therefore perceive, that malevolence only is requisite to declaim against, and arraign the most perfect governments. Our political quack avails himself of this trite expedient, to cajole the people into the most abject slavery, under the delusive name of independence. His first indecent attack is against the English constitution, which with all its imperfections, is, and ever will be, the pride and envy of mankind. To this panegyric involuntarily our author subscribes, by granting individuals to be safer in England, than in any other part of Europe. He indeed insidiously attributes this pre-eminent excellency to the constitution of the people, rather than to our excellent constitution: to such contemptible subterfuges is our author reduced. I would ask him, why did not the constitution of the people afford them superior safety, in the reign of Richard the third, Henry the eighth, and other tyrannic princes? Many pages might indeed be filled with encomiums bestowed on our excellent constitution by illustrious authors of different nations."

He then traces the progress of government amongst the Jews, and then goes on thus: "Having defined the best government, I will humbly attempt to describe good kings by the following unerring rule. The best princes are constantly calumniated by the envenomed tongues and pens of the most worthless of their subjects. For this melancholy truth do I appeal to the testimony of impartial historians, and long experience. The noble impartial historian Sully, speaking of the almost divine Henry the fourth of France, says, 'Thus was this god-like prince represented (by the discontented of these days) almost throughout his whole kingdom, as a furious and implacable tyrant: they were never without one set of arguments to engage his catholic nobility in a rebellion against him; and another to sow sedition among his protestant officers and gentry.' Hume says, that the cruel unrelenting tyrant, Philip the second of Spain, with his infernal inquisition, was not more detested by the people of the Netherlands, than was the humane Charles with his inoffensive liturgy, by his mutinous subjects. The many unmerited insults offered to our gracious sovereign by the unprincipled Wilkes, and others down to this late author, will for ever disgrace humanity. For he says, 'that monarchy was the most prosperous invention the devil ever set on foot for the promotion of idolatry. It is the pride of kings which throws mankind into confusion: in short continues the author, monarchy and succession have laid not this or that kingdom only, but the world in blood and ashes.' How deplorably wretched the condition of mankind, could they believe such execrable flagitious jargon! Unhappily indeed, mankind in every age are susceptible of delusion; but surely our author's poison carries its antidote with it. Attentive to the spirit of his publication, we fancy ourselves in the barbarous fifteenth century; in which period our author would have figured with his 'Common Sense'—and blood will attend it."

His next task is to shew the evils of democracy, and he instances the state of Holland and Switzerland in these words. "Our author asserts, that Holland was in a few weeks over-run by the arms of France, and almost miraculously saved by the gallantry of her Prince of Orange, so celebrated afterwards by the name of William the third. Almost from that period, until the treaty of Utrecht, Holland was a principal in wars, the most expensive and bloody, ever waged by human kind: the wounds she then received were unhealed in 1744, when reluctantly roused from her pacific lethargy, she was dragged into war; and losing her impregnable Bergen-op-zoom and Maastricht, was again on the brink of becoming a province to France, when happily liberated by the British nation. In the war of 1756, Holland continually insulted in the capture of her ships by our cruisers, preserved a humiliating neutrality. If victory indeed had not crowned the British banners, the Dutch indubitably would have assisted their natural allies, in whatever quarter of the globe attacked; for it is incontestibly true, that the existence of Holland, as a state, depends, and invariably will depend, on the prosperity of Great Britain. Since the murder of Barneveldt, and the immortal De Wits, by the deluded furious people, Holland hath too often been convulsed by anarchy, and torn by party. Unfortunately, alas! for the cause of humanity, the rugged and incult deserts of Switzerland preclude not ambition, sedition and anarchy. Her bleak and barren mountains do not so effectually secure precarious liberty, as daily vending her sons to the adjoining nations, particularly to France, by whom the Thirteen Cantons could be subjected in as many days, did the court meditate so senseless and delusive an object.—Nugatory indeed, if we consider that France derives more substantial advantage from the present state of Switzerland, than if she exhausted herself, to maintain numerous battalions to bridle the Cantons. A moment let us suppose, that our author's asseverations of Holland and Switzerland are as real as delusive: his inferences do not flow from his premises; for their superior advantages do not arise from their popular government, but from circumstances of peculiar local felicity, obliging the princes of Europe to defend them from the omnipotent land force, if I may so speak, of France. After impotently attacking our sovereign and the constitution, he contradicts the voice of all mankind, by declaring, that America 'would have flourished as much, and probably much more, had no European power taken any notice of her.'

The author makes the following remarks on the settlement of America. "Previous to the settlement of these provinces by our ancestors, the kingdom of France was convulsed by religious phrenzy. This, and Sebastian Cabot's prior discovery, perhaps, happily afforded the people of England an opportunity of locating these provinces. At length, peace being restored to France by her hero, Henry the fourth, his nation in turn was seized with the rage of colonizing. Finding the English claimed the provinces on the Atlantic, they appropriated the snow banks of Canada, which which we dare not suppose they would have preferred to these fertile provinces, had not the prior occupancy and power of England interfered. I hope it will not be denied, that the notice taken of us at this time by an European power was rather favourable for us.—Certain it is, had not England then taken notice of us, these delectable provinces would now appertain to France; and the people of New England, horrid to think! would now be counting their beads. Some years after the æra in question, the civil wars intervening in England, afforded to the Swedes and Dutch a footing on this continent. Charles the second being restored, England reviving her claim, rendered abortive the Swedish pretensions, and by conquest, and by granting Surinam to the Dutch, procured the cession of their usurpation, now New-York. I do indeed confess my incapacity to discern the injury sustained by this second ‘notice taken of us by an European power,’ in default of which intervention, the Swedes, to this hour, would have retained their settlement, now the famed Pennsylvania; and the Dutch, consequently had retained theirs. Some time after this period, the people of New-England were employed in framing and executing laws, so intolerant and sanguinary, that to us they seem adapted for devils, and not men.

“Indeed it is worthy of note, that the inhabitants of Jamaica, Barbadoes, and Virginia, at that very time, enacted laws, breathing the spirit of humanity, and such as men could bear. Soon after the period in question arrived the great and good William Penn, with his philosophic people called Quakers, together with toleration, industry, and permanent credit. The people of England, encouraged by the extension of their laws and commerce to those colonies, powerfully assisted our merchants and planters, insomuch, that our settlements encreased rapidly, and thrived apace. It may be affirmed, that from this period, until the present unhappy hour, no part of human kind ever experienced more perfect felicity. Voltaire, indeed, says, that if ever the golden age existed, it was in Pennsylvania. France, disgusted with the unhappy situation of her American colonies, had long meditated the conquest of one of our middle provinces: to accomplish this purpose, she extended a line of forts on our frontiers, and actually fortified the place now called Pittsburgh. Justly alarmed by these encroachments, in the hour of our distress we called aloud on Great-Britain for assistance, nor was she deaf to our cries. The English ministry, after in vain exhausting all the arts of negotiation, declared war against France. After spilling torrents of blood, after expending one hundred and ninety millions of their dollars, and four or five millions of ours, they gloriously reduced the French settlements. Surely it will not be said, that this last notice taken of us by the people of England, was injurious to us? Our enemies alledge, that this last intervention by bloating us with pride, will eventually ruin us, and render the people of Britain objects of derision, for lavishing their blood and treasure in defence of provinces; ‘a match not only for Europe (according to our author) but for the world.’—Our author next remarks, ‘that the commerce by which she hath enriched herself, are the necessities of life, and will always have a market while eating is the custom of Europe.’

“I reply, than our exporting grain is as it were of yesterday; that the recent demand was principally occasioned by the distractions in Poland, and other parts of Europe, and probably will totally or partly fail, soon as the fertile country of Poland, and more fertile Ukraine, shall again become cultivated. I believe the Europeans did eat before our merchants exported our grain, and perhaps will eat when they cease to export it. I deny, that this momentary commerce hath enriched us; and I could adduce numberless melancholy proofs of the contrary. I shall only remark, that in the most fertile and delectable wheat country in America, bounded by Chesapeake-bay, and almost adjoining that of Delaware, a tract of the best wheat land, ten years ago, would hardly have exceeded a guinea and a half per acre; indeed in 1773, such land, covered with wood, would scarcely have sold for four guineas an acre; an undoubted proof of want of people, industry and wealth; particularly so, if we consider that our crop of corn and wheat on such land, judiciously cultivated, would actually repay the supposed price. Our author asserts, ‘that our present numbers are sufficient to repel the force of all the world; that the continent hath at this time the largest disciplined army of any power under heaven; that the English navy is only worth three millions and a half sterling,' which, in effect, would reduce it to thirty five ships of the line, twenty ships of forty guns, twenty of thirty-six, and eight of twenty guns. 'That if America had only a twentieth part of this force, she would be by far an over-match for Britain: that independence is necessary, because France and Spain cannot assist us until such an event.' He also affirms, 'that Great-Britain cannot govern us; and that no good can arise from a reconciliation with her.'

The author of Common Sense is convicted of ignorance of the true state of Great Britain and her colonies, by the following calculations:

In the English provinces, exclusive of negroe and other slaves, we have one hundred and sixty thousand or one hundred and seventy thousand men capable of bearing arms. If we deduct the people called Quakers, Anabaptists, and other religionists averse to arms, a considerable part of the emigrants, and those having a grateful predilection for the ancient constitution and parent state, we shall certainly reduce the first number to sixty or seventy thousand men. Now, admitting those equal to the Roman legions, can we suppose them capable of defending against the power of Britain, a country nearly twelve hundred miles extending on the ocean? Suppose our troops assembled in New England, if the Britons see not fit to assail them, they haste to and desolate our other provinces, which eventually would reduce New England. If, by dividing our forces, we pretend to defend our provinces, we also are infallibly undone. Our most fertile provinces, filled with unnumbered domestic enemies, slaves; intersected by navigable rivers, every where accessible to the fleets and armies of Britain, can make no defence. If, without the medium of passion and prejudice, we view our other provinces, half armed, destitute of money and a navy, we must confess, that no power ever engaged such potent antagonists under such peculiar circumstances of infelicity. In the better days of Rome, she permitted no regular troops to defend her. Men destitute of property she admitted not into her militia (her only army,) I have been extremely concerned at the separation of the Connecticut men from our army; it argued not an ardent enthusiasm for liberty and glory. We still shall have an army before Boston, and I should be extremely happy to hear substantial proofs of their glory: I am still hopeful of great things from our army before Boston when joined by the regiments now forming, which want of bread will probably soon fill. Notwithstanding the predilection I have for my countrymen, I remark with grief, that hitherto our troops have displayed but few marks of Spartan or Roman enthusiasm. In the sincerity of my heart I adjure the reader to believe, that no person is more sensibly afflicted by hearing the enemies of America remark, that no general ever fell singly and so ingloriously unrevenge before the inauspicious affair of Quebec. I am under no doubt, however, that we shall become as famed for martial courage as any nation ever the sun beheld. Sanguine as I am, respecting the virtue and courage of my countrymen, depending on the history of mankind since the Christian æra, I cannot however imagine, that zeal for liberty will animate to such glorious efforts of heroism, as religious enthusiasm has often impelled its votaries to perform. If the cruel unrelenting tyrant Philip the second of Spain, had never attempted to introduce into the Low Countries the infernal Tribunal of the Inquisition, it is most probable, that the present States of Holland would to this time have remained provinces to Spain, and patiently paid the fiftieth penny and other grievous exactions. Certain it is, that the fanatics of Scotland and people of England had never armed against the first Charles, if religious enthusiasm had not more powerfully agitated their minds than zeal for liberty; the operations of which on the human mind hath, since the æra in question, ever been more languid than the former most powerful passion. These hardy assertions are supported as well by notorious facts, as by the learned Hume, and other judicious historians. I cannot here omit remarking the inconsistency of human nature. The Scotch, the most furious enthusiasts then in Europe, were slaughtered like sheep by Cromwell at Dunbar, where their formidable army hardly made any resistance, if we except that made by a handful of loyalists, destitute of that passion. Certain it is, that those enthusiasts were often cut in pieces by their countryman the gallant marquis of Montrose, whose troops (Highlanders and other loyalists) held Presbyterianism in contempt.

"With the utmost deference to the honourable Congress, I do not view the most distant gleam of aid from foreign powers.

powers. The princes alone capable of succouring us are the sovereigns of France and Spain. If, according to our author, we possess an eighth part of the habitable globe, and actually have a check on the West India commerce of England, the French indigo and other valuable West India commodities, and the Spanish galleons, are in great jeopardy from our power. The French and Spaniards are therefore wretched politicians, if they do not assist England in reducing her colonies to obedience.—Pleasantry apart, can we be so deluded to expect aid from those princes, which, inspiring their subjects with a relish for liberty, might eventually shake their arbitrary thrones? Natural avowed enemies to our sacred cause, will they cherish, will they support the flame of liberty in America, ardently intent on extinguishing its latent dying sparks in their respective dominions? Can we believe, that those princes will offer an example so dangerous to their subjects and colonies, by aiding those provinces to independence? If independent, aggrandized by infinite numbers from every part of Europe, this continent would rapidly attain power astonishing to imagination. Soon, very soon, would we be conditioned to conquer Mexico, and all their West India settlements, which to annoy, or possess, we indeed are most happily situated. Simple and obvious as these truths are, can they be unknown to the people and princes of Europe? Be it however admitted, that those princes, unmindful of the fatal policy of Richlieu's arming Charles's subjects against him, and the more fatal policy of Lewis the fourteenth permitting our glorious deliverer to effect the Revolution: I say, be it admitted that those princes, regardless of future consequences and the ineptitude of the times, are really disposed to succour us; say, ye friends of liberty and mankind, would no danger accrue from an army of French and Spaniards in the bosom of America? Would you not dread their junction with the Canadians and Savages, and with the numerous Roman Catholics dispersed throughout the Colonies?"

He goes on thus:

"Let us now examine our author's account of the navy of Great Britain. 'It is, says he, worth no more than three millions and an half sterling.' This in effect will reduce it to ten second-rate ships of war, ten third-rate, fifteen fourth-rate, ten ships of forty guns, ten of thirty-six, and eight of twenty. 'If America, says he, had only a twentieth part of the naval force of Britain, she would be by far an overmatch for her; because, as we neither have or claim any foreign dominion, our whole force would be employed on our own coast; where we should in the long-run have two to one the advantage of those who had three or four thousand miles to sail over before they could attack us, and the same distance to return, in order to refit and recruit. And although Britain by her fleet hath a check over our trade to Europe, we have as large a one over her trade to the West-Indies, which, by lying in the neighbourhood of the Continent, lies entirely at its mercy.'

"Were it lawful to joke on so serious an occasion, I would remind the reader of our author's modesty, in saying, 'that we claim no foreign dominion;' since we have the most numerous and best disciplined army under the Heavens, and a navy sufficiently strong to combat that of Great Britain; for our present naval armament compose a fleet more than equal to a twentieth part of the British navy (according to our author's estimation.) Notwithstanding our author's delicacy, relying on the well-known utility of melasses to the New England governments, I hope they will order admiral Manly to seize Jamaica and the other West India islands. The admiral cannot be at a loss for men; since, according to our author, 'a few social sailors will soon instruct a sufficient number of active land-men in the common work of a ship.' I do indeed confess, that the British ships of war are constantly equipt altogether with very social sailors; and as constantly drub the French ships, double manned with active land-men, though sufficiently instructed by a few social sailors.—The reader will perceive, that our author has humbled the naval power of Britain with more facility than France and Spain could have done; and has also expelled her from our ports with happier success than did Spain, who was compelled to yield her Gibraltar and Portmahon for the convenience of her fleets and commerce.

"I would blush for poor human nature, did I imagine that any man, other than a bigot, could believe these ridiculous stories, these arrant gasconades, respecting our numerous and best disciplined army under heaven, about our navy, and a few social sailors, and that France

France and Spain will not assist us (who by-the-by, according to our author, are able to conquer them) until playing upon words, we declare ourselves independent. Can a reasonable being for a moment believe that Great Britain, whose political existence depends on our constitutional obedience, who but yesterday made such prodigious efforts to save us from France, will not exert herself as powerfully to preserve us from our frantic schemes of independence? Can we a moment doubt, that the sovereign of Great Britain and his ministers, whose glory as well as personal safety depends on our obedience, will not exert every nerve of the British power to save themselves and us from ruin?"

His sentiments on the boasted union of the Americans are very forcibly expressed.

"What is this union so highly vaunted of? whence the marching and counter-marching through almost every province to disarm those denominated Tories?—I perfectly agree, that glorious is our union—I execrate those who say, it has been cemented by every species of fraud and violence; yet notwithstanding I dread its fragility, were an army of Britons in the middle of our country. As the author of Common Sense is now in the grand monde, and cannot be acquainted with the language of many people in the provinces, I will communicate the general purport of their discourse—"We, say they, do not see through the wisdom of the present times. We remember with unfeigned gratitude the many benefits derived through our connections with Great-Britain; by whom but yesterday we were emancipated from slavery and death. We are not indeed unaware, that Great Britain is uniformly reproached with defending us from interested motives. In like manner, however, may every ingrate reproach his benefactor; since all benefactions may be said to flow from no purer fountain. With predilection we view our parent state, and wishfully contemplate on our late felicity, almost realizing that state of old, so beautifully feigned by the poets. We venerate the constitution, which with all its imperfections (too often exaggerated) we apprehend almost approaches as near to perfection as human kind can bear. We shudder at the idea of arming with more virulence, more unremitting ardour, against the parent state than against France; by whom our rights, civil as well as religious, certainly were more imminently endangered. With horror we reflect on the former civil wars, when every crime, odious and baneful to human nature, were alternately perpetrated by the soldiers, particularly by the independents."

"If premiums (says our author) were to be given to merchants to build and employ in their service ships mounted with 20, 30, 40, or 50 guns, the premiums to be in proportion to the loss of bulk to the merchants; fifty or sixty of those ships, with a few guardships on constant duty, would keep up a sufficient navy; and that without burdening ourselves with the evil so loudly complained of in England, of suffering their fleets in time of peace to lie rotting in their docks."—Yield the palm of ingenuity to our author, ye De Wits, Colberts, Pelhams, and Pitts. He hath outdone ye by constructing a beautiful navy, alas! on paper only.—First, no nation in Europe depends on such ships for her defence. Secondly, such ships would be unfit to contend with capital ships. Thirdly, in the hour of danger, these ships on their voyage or return would alternately be taken by an active enemy. Lastly, six times as many such ships would be unequally matched with that part of the naval power of Great Britain, which she actually could spare to combat on our coasts. This cannot be thought exaggeration, if we consider that the British navy, last war, carried about seventeen thousand guns, and upwards of ninety-five thousand social seamen. "No country (says our author) is so happily situated, or internally capable of raising a fleet as America. Tar, timber, iron, and cordage, are her natural produce." He speaks of forming a fleet as if he could do it by his fiat. A third rate ship of the line fitted for sea is allowed to cost 74,000*l.* sterling, which at the present exchange is about 129,000*l.* Now as labour, sail-cloth, cordage, and other requisites are dearer than in Europe, we may reasonably suppose the advanced price at twenty-five per cent. which makes the amount 154,000*l.* We must next suppose our navy equal to that of France, which consists of sixty-four ships of the line (fifty gun gun ships inclusive) twenty-five frigates, with ships of inferior force. In case of independence, we cannot admit a smaller naval force. Indeed, when joined to the fleets of France and Spain, the navies so united, and navigated principally by landsmen, instructed by a few social sailors, will be vastly inferior to the squadrons of Britain. The amount therefore of such a navy will only require the trifling sum of 12,625,000*l.* currency, which I am very unwilling to believe we can spare, being scarcely one fourth the value of our property real and personal. With excellent management, our navy would last eight, nine, or ten years: we therefore would find it extremely convenient to rebuild it constantly at the expiration of that term: of this there cannot be a doubt, when we remember with our author, 'that ship-building is America's greatest pride. The vast empire of Russia is almost shut out from the sea, wherefore her boundless forests, her tar, iron, and cordage, are only articles of commerce.' I reply, that Russia, containing ten times our numbers, is destitute of industry and commerce. She has ports sufficient to build and contain a navy to subdue the world. Destitute, as we have remarked, of industry and commerce, her navy is inconsiderable; and being equipt with landsmen, cannot figure against ships navigated by social sailors. Who can doubt the ability of Spain to build a navy as formidable as that permitted to Great Britain (by the author of Common Sense)? In her island of Cuba, possessed of an immensity of fine cedar, she might construct a navy as formidable as that of Great Britain, but to what purpose, other than to adorn the triumph of her enemies; unless she could arm her ships otherwise than by active landsmen, instructed by a few social sailors. Our author says, 'that the Terrible, Capt. Death, stood the hottest engagement of any ship last war, yet had not twenty sailors on board,' (though her complement of men was upwards of two hundred).

We do indeed confess ourselves doubtful on this head, and therefore wish our author had produced his authority. We do apprehend, that naval actions very generally depend on seaman-ship, that is, on dextrously working the ship during the combat. Now the judicious reader will remember, that ships of war in engagement cannot be navigated by a few social sailors, nor even by a bare competency, unless such sailors are more invulnerable than was the great Achilles."

Plain Truth thus forcibly detects the Author of Common Sense of fomenting discord through villainous ambition. His words are:

"I humbly apprehend our author's meaning is truly conspicuous. This Continent, fifty years hence, infallibly will be richer and much better peopled than at present; consequently abler to effect a revolution. But, alas! ere that period, our author will be forgotten: impelled therefore by his villainous ambition, he would rather precipitate his country into every species of horror, misery, and desolation, than forego his fancied protectorship. 'But if you have (says our author) and still can shake hands with the murderers, then are ye unworthy the name of husband, father, friend, or lover; and, whatever may be your rank or title in life, you have the heart of a coward and the spirit of a sycophant, &c. To talk of friendship with those in whom our reason forbids us to have faith, and our affections wounded through a thousand pores instructs us to detest, is madness and folly.'

Ye that are not drunk with fanaticism answer me. Are these words dictated by peace, or base foul revenge, the constant attendant on cowards and sycophants? Does our author, so perfectly versed in scripture, mean to conduct us to peace or desolation? Or is he fit to legislate for men or devils? Nations after desolating each other (happily for mankind) forgive, forget, and reconcile; like individuals who quarrel, reconcile, and become friends. Why therefore may we not forgive and reconcile?—By no means; it blasts our author's ambitious purposes. Many of the unhappy men, criminally engaged with the Pretender, reconciled by humane treatment to that family against whom they rebelled, served in their armies a few years after. Indeed the conduct of the Canadians to our troops as effectually illustrates our doctrine as it reprobates the antichristian diabolical tenets of our author.—"The unwarrantable stretch likewise which that house made in their last sitting, to gain an undue authority over the delegates of that province, ought to warn the people, at large, how they trust power out of their own hands. A set of instructions for the delegates were put together, which, in point of sense and busi-

finess, would have dishonoured a school-boy, and after being approved by a few, a very few, without doors, were carried into the house, and there passed in behalf of the whole colony. Whereas, did the whole colony know with what ill will that house hath entered on some necessary measures, they would not hesitate a moment to think them unworthy of such a trust.' This very insidious charge we cannot read without indignation. If the Pennsylvanians had happily adhered to their virtuous resolves, it is more than probable, that a constitutional reconciliation had ere now taken place. Unfortunately rescinding their opinions, they perhaps adopted the sentiments of certain persons, by no means superior in virtue and knowledge. Those not inebriated with independency will certainly allow, that the instructions to their delegates were dictated by the true spirit of peace, justice, and exalted policy. If inspiration had dictated those resolves, obnoxious as they are to independency, our author had reprobated them. How dare the author of Common Sense say, 'that they attempted to gain an undue authority over the delegates of their province?' Who so proper to instruct them as those chosen by the people? Not in the hour of passion, riot, and confusion, but in the days of peace and tranquil reflection. The gentleman whom our author impotently attacks in this and other innuendos, will be long revered by his grateful countrymen and the friends of mankind, as well for his true patriotism and extensive abilities as his unbounded benevolence.

Nations, like individuals, in the hour of passion attend to no mediation; but when heartily drubbed, and tired of war, are very readily reconciled, without the intervention of mediators; by whom belligerents were never reconciled until their interests or passions dictated the pacification. If we may use our author's elegant language, mediation is 'farical.' I grant, however, that the idea of our forcing England by arms to treat with us is brilliant. 'It is unreasonable (continues our author) to suppose, that France and Spain will give us any kind of assistance, if we mean only to make use of that assistance for the purpose of repairing the breach, and strengthening the connection between Britain and America; because those powers would be sufferers by the consequences.'

Considering 'we have the most numerous and best disciplined army under heaven, and a fleet fit to contend with the navy of Britain,' we must suppose our author's brain affected by dwelling constantly on his beloved independency, else he would not have the imbecility to require the assistance of France and Spain. The manner of his prevailing on France and Spain to assist us is also a strong proof of his insanity. Did those powers hesitate to succour the Scotch rebels in 1745, because they did not declare themselves independent? It then was their interest to create a diversion, alas! too serious in the sequel for the deluded rebels in that kingdom: and were they now interested in aiding us, they undoubtedly would do it in spite of quibbles. In such case, ere this time their armies and navies had joined us without interruption: for we must confess, that the efforts of Britain hitherto would not have precluded the republic of Genoa from aiding us. Suppose our author had a son, or an apprentice, eloped to his intimate acquaintance, and desired to enter into his service. If this person replied to the youth, I know your apprenticeship is unexpired; notwithstanding, declare yourself a free man, and I will hire and protect you. I demand, would such odious, ridiculous duplicity render our supposed person less criminal in the eyes of our author, or render the example less dangerous to his own apprentice?

After having treated on the notions of commerce and toleration, advanced by the author of Common Sense; the following paragraph concludes Plain Truth.

Volumes were insufficient to describe the horror, misery, and desolation awaiting the people at large in the Syren form of American independence. In short, I affirm that it would be most excellent policy in those who wish for true liberty, to submit by an advantageous reconciliation to the authority of Great Britain; "to accomplish in the long run, what they cannot do by hypocrisy, fraud, and force in the short one." Independence and slavery are synonymous terms.

At the end of this pamphlet are added two small tracts, one entitled Rationalis, the other, part of a letter signed Cato. These enforce the arguments used by the author of Plain Truth. Rationalis argues from scripture, in defence of kingly government; and Cato shews, by extracts from the resolves of the Congress, that the notion of independency, never entered the heads of that assembly, nor is countenanced by it.

On the Manners of Women in warm Climates—In temperate Climes—Happiness produced by cultivating the Female Mind—Education of Women highly important in a Monarchy.

LETTER VI.

IN days of innocence, when modesty is the ruling passion of the female sex, we find great frankness in external behaviour; for women who are above suspicion are little solicitous about appearances. At the same period, and for the same reason, we find great looseness in writing; witness the Queen of Navarre's tales. In the capital of France at present, chastity, far from being practised, is scarce admitted to be a female virtue. But people, who take much freedom in private, are extremely circumspect in public: No indecent expression nor insinuation is admitted, even into their plays or other writings. In England the women are less corrupted than in France, and for that reason are not so scrupulous with respect to decency in writing.

Hitherto of the female sex in temperate climes, where polygamy is prohibited. Very different is their condition in hot climes, which inflame animal love in both sexes equally. In the hot regions of Asia, where polygamy is indulged, and wives are purchased for gratifying the carnal appetite merely, it is in vain to think of restraining them otherwise than by locks and bars, after having once tasted enjoyment. Where polygamy is indulged, the body is the only object of jealousy; not the mind, as there can be no mutual affection between a man and his instruments of sensual pleasure. And, if women be so little virtuous as not to be safely trusted with their own conduct, they ought to be locked up; for there is no just medium between absolute confinement and absolute freedom. The Chinese are so jealous of their wives, as even to lock them up from their relations; and so great is their diffidence of the female sex in general, that brothers and sisters are not permitted to converse together. When women are permitted to go abroad, they are shut up in a close sedan into which no eye can penetrate. The intrigues carried on by the wives of the Chinese Emperor, and the jealousy that reigns among them, render them unhappy. But luckily, as women are little regarded where polygamy is indulged, their ambition and intrigues give less disturbance to the government, than in the courts of European princes. The ladies of Hindostan cover their heads with a gauze veil, even at home, which they lay not aside except in presence of their nearest relations. A Hindoo buys his wife; and the first time he is permitted to see her without a veil is after marriage in his own house. In several hot countries, women are put under the guard of eunuchs as an additional security; and blacks are commonly preferred for their ugliness. But, as a woman, deprived of the society of men, is apt to be inflamed even with the appearance of a man, some jealous nations, refining upon that circumstance, employ old maids, termed Dueñas, for guarding their women. In the city of Moka, in Arabia Felix, women of fashion never appear in the street in day light; but it is a proof of manners refined above those in neighbouring countries, that they are permitted to visit one another in the evening. If they find men in their way, they draw aside to let them pass. A French surgeon, being called by one of the King of Yemen's chief officers to cure a rheumatism which had seized two of his wives, was permitted to handle the parts affected; but he could not get a sight of their faces.

I proposed to examine more minutely the manners of women, as resulting from the degree of restraint they are under in different countries. In the warm regions of Asia, where polygamy is indulged, the education of young women is extremely loose, being calculated for the sole end of animal pleasure. They are accomplished in such graces and allurements as tend to inflame the sensual appetite: they are taught vocal and instrumental music, with various dances that cannot stand the test of decency: But no culture is bestowed on the mind, no moral instruction, no improvement of the rational faculties; because such education, which qualifies them for being virtuous companions to men of sense, would inspire them with abhorrence at the being made prostitutes. In a word, so corrupted are they by vicious education, as to be unfit objects of any desire but what is merely sensual. The Asiatic ladies are not even trusted with the management of household affairs, which would afford opportunities for infidelity. In Persia, says Chardin, the ladies are not permitted, more than children, to chuse their own dress : No lady knows in the morning what gown she is to wear that day. The education of young women in Hindostan is less indecent. They are not taught music nor dancing, which are reckoned fit only for ladies of pleasure : They are taught all the graces of external behaviour, particularly to converse with spirit and elegance : They are taught also to sew, to embroider, and to dress with taste. Writing is neglected ; but they are taught to read, that they may have the consolation of studying the Alcoran : which they never open, nor would understand, if they did. Notwithstanding such care in educating Hindostan ladies, their manners, by being shut up in a seraglio, become extremely loose : The most refined luxury of sense, joined with idleness, or with reading love-tales, still worse than idleness, cannot fail to vitiate the minds of persons deprived of liberty, and to prepare them for every sort of intemperance. The wives and concubines of grandees in Constantinople are permitted sometimes to walk abroad for air and exercise. A foreigner, stumbling accidentally on a knot of them, about forty in number, attended with black eunuchs, was in the twinkling of an eye seized by a brisk girl, with the rest at her heels : She accosted him with loose amorous expressions, attempting at the same time to expose his nakedness. Neither threats nor intreaties availed him against such vigorous assailants ; nor could the vehemence of their curiosity be moderated, by representing the shame of a behaviour so grossly immodest : An old Janizary, standing at a little distance, was amazed : His Mahometan bashfulness would not suffer him to lay hands upon women ; but with a Stentorian voice he roared to the black eunuchs, that they were guardians of prostitutes, not of modest women ; and urging them to free the man from such harpies.—All in vain.

Very different are female manners in temperate climes, where polygamy is prohibited, and women are treated as rational beings. These manners however depend in some measure upon the nature of the government. As many hands are at once employed in the different branches of republican government, and still a greater number by rotation, the males, who have little time to spare from public business, feel nothing of that languor and weariness which to the idle make the most frivolous amusements welcome. Married women live retired at home, managing family affairs, as their husbands do those of the state : Whence it is, that simplicity of manners is more the tone of a republic, than of any other government. Such were the manners of the female sex, during the flourishing periods of the Greek and Roman commonwealths ; and such are their manners in Switzerland and in Holland. In a monarchy, government employs but a few hands ; and those, who are not occupied with public business, give reins to gallantry, and to other desires that are easily gratified. Women of figure, on the other hand, corrupted by opulence and superficial education, are more ambitious to captivate the eye than the judgment, and are fonder of lovers than of friends. Where a man and a woman thus disciplined meet together, they soon grow particular : The man is idle, the woman frank ; and both equally addicted to pleasure. Such commerce must, in its infancy, be disguised under the appearance of virtue and religion : The mistress is exalted into a deity, the lover sinks into a humble votary ; and this artificial relation produces a bombastic sort of love, with sentiments that soar high above nature. Duke John de Bourbonnois, anno 1414, caused it to be proclaimed, that he intended an expedition to England, with sixteen knights, in order to combat the like number of English knights, for glorifying the beautiful angel he worshipped. Rene, styled ' king of Sicily and Jerusalem,' observes, in writing upon tournaments, that they are highly useful in furnishing opportunities to young knights and esquires to display their prowess before their mistresses. He adds, ' that every ceremony regarding tournaments, is contrived to honour the ladies. It belongs to them to inspect the arms of the combatants, and to distribute the rewards. A knight or esquire who defames any of them is beat and bruised till the injured lady condescends to intercede for him.' Remove once a female out of her proper sphere, and it is easy to convert her into a male. James IV. of Scotland, in all tournaments, professed himself knight to Anne Queen of France. She summoned him to prove himself her true and valorous Champion, by taking the field in her defence against Henry VIII. of England. And, according to the romantic gallantry of that age, the queen's summons was thought to have been his chief motive in declaring war against Henry, his brother-in-law. The famous famous Gaston de Foix, who commanded the French troops at the battle of Ravenna, rode from rank to rank, calling by name the officers, and even some private men, recommending to them their country and their honour; adding, 'that he would see what they would perform for the love of their mistresses.' During the civil wars in France, when love and gallantry were carried to a high pitch, Monsieur de Chatillon, ready to engage in a battle, tied to his arm a garter of Mademoiselle de Guerchi, his mistress.

But when unlawful commerce between the sexes turns common, and consequently familiar; the bombastic style appears ridiculous, and the sensual appetite is gratified with very little ceremony. Nothing of love remains but the name, and, as animal enjoyment without love is a very low pleasure, it soon sinks into disgust when confined to one object. What is not found in one, is fondly expected in another; and the imagination, roving from object to object, finds no gratification but in variety. An attachment to a woman of virtue or of talents appears absurd: True love is laughed out of countenance; men degenerate into brutes. Women, on the other hand, regarding nothing but sensual enjoyment, become so careless of their infants, as even, without blushing, to employ mercenary nurses: 'The women of a certain rank in France find that they lose too much by child-bearing; and for that reason, even tho' married, live in a state of celibacy. But population is not advanced, even by those who, from a desire of seeing themselves perpetuated in their descendants, conform to the purpose of marriage; for their delicacy counterbalances their fertility. How few of the first and second rank of women in France suckle their children? It would be easy to count the number. This indispensable duty of a mother has now ceased to be one with us.'—As such woful neglect of education is the fruit of voluptuousness, we may take it for granted, that the same obtains in every opulent and luxurious capital. Such a course of life cannot fail to sink them into contempt: Marriages are dissolved, as soon as contracted; and the state is frustrated of that improvement in morals and manners, which is the never failing product of virtuous love. A state, enriched by conquest or commerce, declines gradually into luxury and sensual pleasure: Manners are corrupted, decency banished, and chastity becomes a mere name. What a scene of rank and dissolute pleasure is exhibited in the courts of Alexander's successors, and in those of the Roman Emperors!

Gratitude to my female readers, if I shall be honoured with any, prompts me to conclude this sketch with a scene that may afford them instruction, and cannot fail of being agreeable; which is the figure a woman is fitted for making in the matrimonial state, where polygamy is excluded.

Matrimony, among savages, having no object but propagation and slavery, is a very humbling state for the female sex. But delicate organization, great sensibility, lively imagination, with sweetness of temper above all, qualify women for a more dignified society with men; which is, to be their bosom friends and companions. In the common course of European education, young women are trained to make an agreeable figure, and to behave with decency and propriety: Very little culture is bestowed on the head; and still less on the heart, if it be not the art of hiding passion. Education so slight and superficial is far from seconding the purpose of nature, that of making women fit companions for men of sense. Due cultivation of the female mind would add greatly to the happiness of the males, and still more to that of the females. Time runs on; and, when youth and beauty vanish, a fine lady, who never entertained a thought into which an admirer did not enter, finds in herself a lamentable void, occasioning discontent and peevishness. But a woman who has merit, improved by virtuous and refined education, retains in her decline an influence over the men, more flattering than even that of beauty: She is the delight of her friends, as formerly of her admirers.

Admirable would be the effects of such refined education, contributing no less to public good than to private happiness. A man, who at present must degrade himself into a fop or a coxcomb, in order to please the women, would soon discover, that their favour is not to be gained but by exerting every manly talent in public and in private life; and the two sexes, instead of corrupting each other, would be rivals in the race of virtue. Mutual esteem would be to each a school of urbanity; and mutual desire of pleasing would give smoothness to their behaviour, delicacy to their sentiments, and tenderness to their passions.

Married women in particular, destined by nature to take the lead in educating their children, would no longer be the greatest obstruction to good education, by their ignorance, frivolity, and disorderly manner of living. Even upon the breast, infants are susceptible of impressions; and the mother hath opportunities without end of instilling into them good principles, before they are fit for a male tutor. Coriolanus, who made a capital figure in the Roman republic, never returned from war without meriting marks of distinction. Others behaved valiantly, in order to acquire glory: He behaved valiantly, in order to give pleasure to his mother. The delight she took in hearing him praised, and her weeping for joy in his embraces, made him in his own opinion the happiest person in the universe. Epaminondas accounted it his greatest felicity, that his father and mother were still alive to behold his conduct, and enjoy his victory at Leuctra. In a Latin dialogue, about the causes that corrupted the Roman eloquence (injudiciously ascribed to Tacitus, because obviously it is not his style) the method of education in Rome, while it flourished as a commonwealth, is described in a lively manner. I shall endeavour to give the sense in English, because it chiefly concerns the Fair Sex: 'In that age, children were suckled, not in the hut of a mercenary nurse, but by the chaste mother who bore them. Their education during nonage was in her hands; and it was her chief care to instil into them every virtuous principle. In her presence, a loose word or an improper action were strictly prohibited. She superintended not only their serious studies, but even their amusements; which were conducted with decency and moderation. In that manner the Gracchi, educated by Cornelia their mother, and Augustus, by Attia his mother, appeared in public with untainted minds; fond of glory, and prepared to make a figure in the world.' In the expedition of the illustrious Bertrand du Guesclin against Peter the Cruel, King of Castile, the governor of a town, upon being summoned to give it up, made the following answer, 'That they might be conquered, but would never tamely yield; that their fathers had taught them to prefer a glorious death before a dishonourable life; and that their mothers had not only educated them in these sentiments, but were ready to put in practice the lessons they had inculcated.' Let the most profound politician say, what more efficacious incentive there can be to virtue and manhood, than the behaviour of the Spartan matrons, flocking to the temples, and thanking the gods, that their husbands and sons had died gloriously, fighting for their country. In the war between Lacedemon and Thebes, the Lacedemonians having behaved ill, the married men, as Plutarch reports, were so ashamed of themselves, that they dared not look their wives in the face. What a glorious prize is here exhibited to be contended for by the female sex!

By such refined education, love would take on a new form, that which nature inspires for making us happy, and for softening the distresses of chance: It would fill deliciously the whole soul with tender amity and mutual confidence. The union of a worthy man with a frivolous woman can never, with all the advantages of fortune, be made comfortable: How different the union of a virtuous pair, who have no aim but to make each other happy! Between such a pair emulation is reversed, by an ardent desire in each to be surpassed by the other.

Cultivation of the female mind is not of great importance in a republic, where men pass little of their time with women. Such cultivation, where polygamy is indulged, would to them be a great misfortune, by opening their eyes to their miserable condition. But in an opulent monarchy where polygamy is prohibited, female education is of high importance, not singly with respect to private happiness, but with respect to the society in general.

*Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed; or Memoirs of the disappointed Nabob, and

THE nabobs have of late attracted the attention of the public in a more particular manner than usual, and excited a general curiosity to become more intimately acquainted with their memoirs and characters. Our present hero is descended from a mercantile family, and having received an education suitable to that line of life, in which it was proposed he should move, he was placed in a counting-house to learn the routine of business. Having a relation in the India Company's service, he took young Sykes over with him as a writer, who being of an enterprising disposition, soon recommended himself to the late lord Clive, who put him into the road of

of making a very rapid fortune. After availing himself of the various commotions of the East, he returned to Europe, with about a brace of plumbs, to enjoy his Asiatic luxury. The good things of this world his fortune could amply command; but ambition stimulated him to be a member of the senate, and he was resolved to leave no stone unturned to procure a seat in the house of commons. He was recommended to an experienced and artful agent, who had long dealt in boroughs, and knew the price of every one in the kingdom to a fraction. He for once, however, reckoned without his host: he indeed got his master returned; but being intoxicated with Shaftsbury punch, he forgot there was a tribunal to which the candidate was to appeal before he obtained his seat; and after all his expence, trouble, and stratagem, the election was set aside.

The disappointed nabob bore his misfortune with a becoming fortitude, resolving to wait for a more favourable opportunity to carry his point. In the mean while he planned a tour for the watering places, where he entered into all the spirit and gaiety of those lively circles. The gentlemen of the long shuffle levied some taxes upon him, which he very readily paid, and enabled them to figure away several weeks at his expence. But the ladies engrossing the greatest part of his attention, he received far more pleasure in filling their quadrille pools, than in maintaining the chevaliers d'Industrie, who constantly attend these places.

At Brighthelmston he was particularly struck with the charms of Mrs. M——rs. This lady was the wife of an officer then abroad, and who accompanied a lady of easy fortune upon this tour. As to her own finances they were extremely slender, which made a tete-a-tete party at quadrille always agreeable to her; as our hero, very gallantly, always lost upon these occasions, which furnished him with others of a more tender nature, and which, it is generally thought, he failed not to improve. As they lodged in the same house, their visits were as frequent as they judged proper, without the prying eye of curiosity interrupting them. It is true the whisper went round at the rooms, that the nabob and Mrs. M——rs were upon very social terms, which was in a degree corroborated by her appearing with some new jewels, that before this acquaintance, she had never been seen to wear. Add to this, a rupture had ere now taken place, between Mrs. M——s and her female friend, who made no ceremony of declaring she did not approve of Mrs. M——'s conduct. But as the prudes at Brighthelmston are not near so numerous as the coquettes and demi-reps, Mrs. M—— did not want for companions in the rooms and elsewhere. Mrs. M——'s ingratitude having been publicly hinted at by her late friend; to convince the world she was not beholden to her for the elegant appearance she made, Mrs. M—— dressed with greater eclat than ever. This step, however, tended only to increase the suspicions of an amour already circulated against her.

Upon Mrs. M——'s return to the capital, she found herself pregnant, and as it was necessary to get rid of her burthen as secretly as possible, she applied, in consequence of an advertisement, to a certain matron's near Soho, where she remained from the time of her situation being visible. Here Mr. S—— frequently visited her, and supplied all her wants in their most ample latitude; and, indeed, they were far from trifling. In these retreats the mistress of the house being apprized how requisite it is for the party to remain concealed, she thinks no extortion too great, being convinced, that she will not be called legally to account from prudential motives. This, therefore, is considered as a harvest that should not be in any respect neglected. Nay, this trusty matron, not contented with fleecing her lodger in every article she charged, did not hesitate making free with Mrs. M——'s cloaths, and even her money; yet she did not dare remonstrate, much less prosecute her. At length, however, she was released from this disagreeable confinement, a short time before her husband returned from abroad. Mrs. M——'s late landlady gaining this intelligence, she acquainted her by letter, that unless she complimented her with a considerable sum, by way of hush-money, she would communicate her amour to Mr. M——s, with all its circumstances. Her late lover was now upon the Continent, and she was uncertain where a letter would reach him; it was, therefore impossible to comply with Mother Midnight's demands, and Mr. M—— was made acquainted with the whole transaction.

The captain had seen fighting enough, and sufficiently established his courage; therefore finding his rival was no less than a nabob of the first magnitude, he resolved to commence a prosecution for crin. con. against him ; but our hero soon returning to England, the affair was compromised for a considerable sum, without coming before a court of judicature.

The disagreeable consequences attending this affair, made our hero more careful for the future, how he infringed upon the nuptial bed. He steered clear of these quick-sands of love, and for some time attached himself to a Flemish Brunette, with whom he had made an acquaintance at Brussels. This connexion, would, probably, have continued much longer, had he not discovered her infidelity with his valet de chambre, to whom she pretended to be a near relation. Mademoiselle and Monsieur, being detected by the discovery of another servant, who was jealous of the valet's being his master's favourite) they were turned adrift at midnight to search for another habitation.

Soon after the Flemish Brunette was discarded, the disappointed nabob met with Miss R—d. She is tall, genteel, and graceful ; her eyes, that teem with love, are sure to captivate wherever she plants their battery. Her vivacity keeps pace with her good sense, and Miss R—d may, without a compliment, be pronounced an accomplished woman.—Her gallantries had made some noise in the world, and our hero was, therefore, not without hopes of succeeding in declaring his passion.

Miss R—d started in the world of gaiety about eighteen, and she had soon many admirers ; but having little or no fortune, she met with no man of any rank that offered her his hand in an honourable way. She had an utter aversion to tradesmen and mechanics, and thought it less dishonourable to be the mistress of a nobleman, than the wife of a plebeian. To this mistaken notion of grandeur may be ascribed all her errors.

Lord B—— first discovered the penchant of Miss R—d in favour of nobility, and availed himself of this predilection. He frankly, though delicately, made her a proposal, which she listened to, and in a few days he visited her upon the most familiar footing. He found her, as he expected, a most amiable female ; and for some time their hours glided away with reciprocal fondness—but variety, dear variety, at length prevailed, and his lordship being struck with the charms of the enchanting Mrs. A—st—d, he relinquished Miss R—d for this lady.

ed so much beauty and merit in the discarded fair one, that he made her such proposals as prevailed with her to admit his visits. His excellency was both generous and gallant, two qualities that failed not to gratify our heroine's most sanguine wishes. The politeness of the French courtier, his elegant address, and assiduities, gave this alliance all the appearance of an honourable love adventure ; the count's delicacy never suffering him to give the slightest hint of an unrefined passion before a third person : and most probably had not the count returned to the continent, this connexion would have still subsisted.

There is reason to believe that Miss R—d since that period had some other admirers before her acquaintance with our hero, but they must have been of a very transient nature. Our readers may be surprised that a lady so fond of coronets, should condescend to accept of a commoner ; but there are charms in a handsome settlement, which few ladies in her line can resist, notwithstanding their partiality for nobility. This being the case, and Mr. Sykes entertaining a real passion for our heroine, we may suppose, that all her wants are anticipated, and that she is as happy as wealth and love can make her.

The English Theatre.

MONDAY, June 10, Mr. Garrick performed, for the last time, Don Felix, in the comedy of the Wonder, for the Fund for decayed Actors. The play was preceded by a prologue suitable to the occasion, and spoken by Mr. Garrick (for which see the poetry.) After the comedy, in which every actor seemed to exert his greatest abilities, Mr. Garrick came forth and addressed the audience in the following words :

" Ladies and gentlemen,

" It has been customary with persons under my circumstances, to address you in a farewell epilogue. I had the same intention, and turned my thoughts that way : but, indeed, I found myself then as incapable of writing such an epilogue, as I should be now of speaking it.

" The jingle of rhyme, and the language of fiction, would but ill suit my present feelings."

[Here, for a moment, he was incapable of proceeding, until relieved by a flood of tears.]

" Whatever may be the changes of my future life, the deep impression I have of your kindness, will always remain main here (putting his hand on his breast) fixed and unalterable.

"I will very readily agree to my successors having more skill and ability for their station than I have; but I defy them all to take more sincere, and more uninterrupted pains for your favour, or to be more truly sensible of it, than is your most obedient and grateful servant."

This address met with general and repeated applause from all parts of the house, which was crowded with a polite and brilliant audience.

As this gentleman's theatrical career is now terminated, our readers may not be displeased to meet with a few anecdotes of his life, with some remarks on his talents and abilities.

Mr. Garrick is the son of an officer of rank in the army. He was born at Hereford, in the year 1717. After receiving a very liberal and polite education, he engaged in commerce, as a wine-merchant, in which pursuit he continued for some years; but not meeting with the success he expected, he declined it; when being persuaded by his friends he had uncommon abilities for the stage, he appeared the first time in public at the theatre in Goodman's-fields, in the character of Richard III. when he met with such uncommon applause, as convinced him his friends had not flattered him. This was in 1740, and he soon after quitted that part of the town for the more polite circle of Covent-Garden, where he played to crowded houses, and in every character received additional applause. His merits as an actor, in almost every walk, are so universal, that it would be needless to enter into a detail of them here, Ireland, as well as England, has borne witness of his excellencies. Nevertheless it must, in justice be acknowledged, in some particular parts he has had his rivals, if not his superiors. Mr. Barry, in Othello, surpassed Mr. Garrick; in Romeo it was a nice competition for many successive nights; but the elegance of Mr. Barry's figure, at that time, seemed to preponderate the scale in his favour. Mr. Powell's Jassier, and his Castalio, it was judged by many Mr. Garrick could not reach. Weston was, perhaps, the best Scrub that ever appeared upon any stage; and his Abel Drugger was pronounced, by the dramatic connoisseurs, nearly upon a par with Roscius's. But then Mr. Garrick's universality rendered him superior to any performer the writer of this article ever saw, or probably ever will see; and he can make no comparisons but from hearsay, between him and a Betterton, a Booth, a Wilks, &c.

In the year 1747 he commenced joint patentee [with the late Mr. Lacey] and chief manager of Drury-lane theatre. About the same time he married the amiable and accomplished Signiora Violletti, who was possessed of a very easy fortune. This lady had danced upon the stage, but had retired from it for some time, to be the companion of the countesses of Burlington, who made her this ample provision upon her marriage.

We are now to consider Mr. Garrick as a manager, and his conduct in this respect has not escaped from many severe animadversions. He has often hit the taste of the town, but has sometimes mistaken the sense of the people. His ill-timed representation of the Chinese Festival, just at the breaking out of the last war, had the effect that most unprejudiced people thought; the galleries and pit took the alarm at such a number of foreigners being imported upon the occasion! and though all national prejudices should be laid aside, especially in our amusements, yet it failed not to prevail upon this occasion, greatly to Mr. Garrick's detriment. However, it must be acknowledged, that this gentleman has constantly studied to please the town, spared no expence to effect it, and has generally succeeded. If the erroneous taste of the public has induced him to run into some absurdities, it was to gratify the vitiated palates, which could not be pleased with rational entertainments. Had they been disliked they would have been damned; but as they met with applause, this is the surest test of their suiting the genius of the times.

In considering this gentleman as a writer we must allow him considerable merit; and although most of his dramatic pieces are imitations from the French, he has always given such a novel turn of wit, humour, and character, that they are far superior to the home-spun manufactures of our modern writers. His Lethe, Lying Valet, Guardian, &c. are undeniable proofs of this assertion. His judicious alteration of many old plays have also evinced his taste and delicacy. His prologues have constantly met with universal approbation—but there is one poetical piece, which has been generally ascribed to him, and which he has never denied, that will do immortal honour to his pen, this is the Ode on the Death of the late Mr. Pelham.

Mr. Garrick may, upon the whole, be considered as a phenomenon of this age; and in the collected character of actor, author, and the agreeable companion, we, probably, "ne'er shall look upon his like again."

Mr. Foote opened his theatre in the Haymarket on the 20th of May, but as he introduced nothing new till the 12th of June, we did not trouble our readers with an account from that quarter. He then represented, for the first time, a new comedy under the title of the Contract, which was honoured with their majesties presence.

The characters were as follow :

Commodore Capstern,	Mr. Bannister.
Col. Lovemore,	Mr. Parsons.
Capt. Sprightly,	Mr. W. Palmer.
Martin,	Mr. Whitfield.
Miss Eleanor,	Mrs. Gardner.
Maria, by a young gentlewoman.
Betty,	Miss Platt.

After sixteen years absence, the colonel and Miss Eleanor meet in London. They had so long ago contracted together a marriage; but both having before this time altered their sentiments, they artfully attempt being mutually disagreeable, that the contract may be dissolved. One of the lady's inducements for this behaviour is, that she has become enamoured with Capt. Sprightly; and the colonel entertains a similar passion for Maria. Accordingly the contract is destroyed. But this is scarce effected, before they discover there is a mutual penchant between the captain and Maria; and the commodore prevails upon the old lover to consent not only to the young ones marriage, but to renew their former contract, saying, "he loves to do good-natured actions, for, in his opinion, every honest man, while he's aboard of this world, should contribute to the happiness of the crew."

This petite piece is said to be translated by Dr. Franklin, from the French of Desfouches. We cannot say that it abounds in either wit or humour, though the dialogue has merit. One particular passage met with great applause. "The most happy government, is that enjoyed under a good king;" chiefly, we suppose, on account of its being an indirect compliment to a royal auditor. Upon the whole, the parts being well performed, the piece went off very well; and Miss Essex, the new performer, entered into the spirit of her part.

Mr. Foote on the 19th of June, in the comedy of the Cozeners, introduced a new scene*, obviously levelled at a certain female, (I mean lady) who has made more than one public appearance, and done considerable execution as well with her eyes as her pen. The story has been repeatedly told, though never with so much humour before. She applies to a Mercer, orders a considerable quantity of silk, takes him in her own coach to a mad doctor, there leaves him to settle with Esculapius, who will immediately satisfy him. Mrs. R. departs and leaves the mercer with the son of Galen, who, instead of giving a draft, as Mr. Prig expects, upon the doctor's banker, he produces a large phial, and upon Prig's refusing to accept of it, he has a strait waistcoat clapt on him, and is upon the point of being conveyed to the private mad-house at Chelsea, when Prig exclaims, "Oh, damme, send a citizen of London to a mad house, when he brings in his bill; Jack Wilkes's affair was but a flea-bite to this—I shall get swingeing damages."

This conceit had its effect, and the audience gave it a due and general plaudit.

The Maiden's Leap. A curious Anecdote.

A Daughter of the first earl of Gowrie was addressed by a young gentleman of inferior rank in the neighbourhood, a frequent visitor of the family, who never would give the least countenance to his passion. His lodging was in the tower separate from that of his mistress;

Sed vetuere patres quod non potuere vetare.

The lady, before the doors were shut, conveyed herself into her lover's apartment; but some prying Duenna acquainted the countess with it; who cutting off, as she thought, all possibility of retreat, hastened to surprize them. The young lady's ears were quick; she heard the footsteps of the old countess, ran to the top of the leads, and took the desperate leap of nine feet four inches over a chasm of sixty feet, and luckily lighting on the battlements of the other tower, crept into her own bed, where her astonished mother found her, and of course apologized for the unjust suspicion. The fair daughter did not choose to repeat the leap; but the next night eloped, and was married.

LETTER II.

S I R, Calais.

I Told you in a former letter, that I write as a citizen of the world at large, not as of any particular nation; otherwise I should, as an Englishman, express my concern to see daily, I may say hourly, such quantities of English gold brought over here, none of which ever returns to Britain. I am convinced Monsr. Dessen has not changed for Louis d'ors fewer than three hundred guineas in the course of this week; all which, in the course of another, will be melted down at the mint in Lisle. Suppose then, that the other public houses here, which are chiefly supported by the English travellers, may have taken two hundred; add to this the immense sums paid in English gold for brandy, tea, &c. at Dunkirk, Boulogne, this, and other ports of the coasts, and it may reasonably be supposed, that there are not less than a thousand English guineas brought here weekly during the summer, with half as much laid out by the smugglers * during winter. I confess this is a random computation; but it seems to me more probable that I am under the mark than above it. Perhaps these two trades, of travelling and smuggling, may in time, by rendering money scarce in England, make the necessaries of life cheaper; for certainly, where money is cheap, every commodity will, in proportion, be dear. The English money in this town passes through but few hands, and therefore has not increased the price of provisions here, so much as might be expected; and as I am a sort of a house-keeper, I will give you the expence of my yesterday's dinner, as bought by a French female servant for the housekeeping of an English family.

The reader will easily calculate the difference of expence, between such a bill of fare in London, or in any great city in England; then he will be astonished that the distance of twenty one miles from Britain shall render a difference of living more than cent. per cent. for, omitting the wine, which is a luxury, the Swiss cheefe, and half the butter, no man, of whatever rank or fortune, could have desired a better dinner; for the mackrell were the largest and the finest I ever saw; and the asparagus and butter better than any I have eat this season in England. Now supposing it necessary my petit cuisiniere should go to confession for having made the market penny, she will carry my pardon in her pocket, though a Frenchman would have dined three pence cheaper. Dunkirk.

I NSTEAD of seeing your regatta on the Thames, I have taken my amusement at Dunkirk, where the annual shew on St. John's day was, according to the French account, more than ordinary superb. This shew may in some respects be compared to the lord mayor's, being chiefly made up of those who go to see it, or to look at one another; with this difference, that instead of the fine state coach which contains the body of the lord-mayor, a giant, sixteen feet high, with two living children, one in each pocket, about six feet high, becomes the principal object of admiration. — This giant stalks along the streets, followed by an innuenerable company of people, while the two babies are calling out for more pap, and yet their dear mamma, not less in stature than her husband, follows quite insensible to their piteous cries! —

It

It is inconceivable how much delight this piece of mummerly gave to every person present, of whatever age or sex; and I confess that for a while I joined in the laugh with many thousands of men, women, and children, to whom God has certainly shewn some particular favour; for to laugh, to sing, to be merry, and to be free from care, seems to be the happy lot of a Frenchman only.—What added greatly to the festivity of the day was the presence of the Count D'Artois, the present king's brother, who is a sprightly young man, about eighteen years of age. He came to review the Swiss regiments on duty in this town, of all which he is captain general. It was here that the young prince first had a sight of the sea, an object which seemed to attract his attention greatly, and he made a little excursion on the water.

You will now perhaps expect I should give you some account of the basin, the harbour, and the works said to be carrying on here. But I shall only tell you, that a trusty Scotch Engineer keeps a watchful eye over what is doing to a harbour which, in my humble opinion, seems better calculated for a nest of smuggling cutters, than for the rendezvous of fleets, or armies. Remember, however, that I write as a citizen of the world.

LETTER IV.

Calais.

IN spite of the enlarged and liberal way of thinking which learning and philosophy have infused among Englishmen, I believe there are few of us who do not imagine, that friendship and sincerity are the peculiar growth of Great Britain, and that our perfidious neighbours, the French, are so utterly unacquainted with these first and greatest ornaments of the human mind, that the words friendship and sincerity might have been omitted in the vocabulary of the French language. Friendship is indeed a plant which grows but thinly in any climate, but it is unjust and illiberal to suppose it to be the growth only of a particular one; for man, without it, is a busy, mischievous, and dangerous animal.

I was led to make these reflections from the following affecting scene, which lately passed under my own eyes, and amongst a set of men with whom I am well acquainted.

About ten days since a general officer arrived here with the king's orders to divide as fine a regiment as any in Europe, consisting of four battalions and two thousand men, in two distinct corps. When the general performed this painful and disagreeable office, I had the mortification of seeing sons separated from their fathers, brothers from brothers, and friends united by many years acquaintance, and cemented by severe services, not only separated for ever perhaps; but the very name of the corps in which one half of them had so long served, and acquired reputation, was taken from them. I saw (sad to relate!) a fine body of brave and gallant men almost wholly dissolved in tears; nor am I ashamed to own that I dropt an affecting period at the same time, and mingled my own private sorrows with their public misfortunes.

A few nights since, the officers of these two corps in service, but one only in friendship and affection, eat their parting supper together: I will call it (for I mean no profanation) their last supper; and one of them, for whom I have a particular regard, told me the next morning, that few of them could either eat or speak, though an elegant entertainment was provided.—Then, said I, (in the true character of an Englishman) I suppose you circulated the glass pretty freely before you parted. Oh! mon Dieu, no, said he, not a drop of wine was drank more than usual; we never drink to excess upon any occasion, and certainly should not upon so melancholy a one as this. I was struck with shame and confusion; having the day before drank my share of three bottles of burgundy with a parting friend; but I will do so no more.

I will not (for obvious reasons) say what a corps of English officers would have done upon so trying an occasion, especially (as the case was here) if the repast had been given in a room over a cellar containing some hogsheds of excellent burgundy at half a crown a bottle; but I may I hope without offence say, that love and friendship, sobriety and temperance, are not the growth of Great Britain only. LETTER V.

S I R,

Calais.

IN a former letter I hinted to you the prodigious quantity of gold, and particularly new guineas brought here weekly by English travellers, smugglers, &c. not one of which ever returns. Mr. Dessen, of the Hotel d'Angleterre in this town, is not only a rich publican, but a wealthy banker; and upon the arrival of every Englishman, after the first first civil reception is over, he asks him if he has any guineas to change for Louis d'ors? —Gentlemen, at least English gentlemen travellers, are apt to think it beneath them to traffic, even in money. Dessen, therefore, often gets a great number of guineas for Louis d'ors, by each of which he gains nearly 10*d*. English! —When the Englishman returns from Paris, and makes the same request of obtaining guineas for his Louis d'ors, Mr. Dessen has no gold, but as much English silver (i. e. Birmingham buttons without shanks) as he pleases; and by this means good gold is detained abroad, and the bad silver all returned to its native country.

I know a gentleman who brought with him to France fifteen hundred guineas, who made his tour to Paris, and returned to England upon the nett profit of them. I have no reason to doubt his veracity; and if I had, I can confirm the truth of it from my own knowledge; for, going a few days since, to St. Omer's, I had occasion to change a 2*5*l. bank note there; the gentleman who took it of me (an utter stranger) gave me nine livres profit, which was more than bore my expences for three meals, and lodging for myself and horse; and yet perhaps, it was less than I might have obtained at Paris. This circumstance struck me in a singular manner, because, when I was at that town nine years ago, not a person in it knew what a bank bill was, and I was obliged to stay in pawn at my auberge, till I had sent my servant to M. Dessen's at Calais (24 miles) to procure me cash.

LETTER VI.

PERHAPS a diary of a journey by land from Cadiz to Barcelona, in Spain, may be useful, if not entertaining to many of your readers, especially as I travel to see, not to make the show. Under this idea, therefore, I shall from time to time send you a sketch of my journey, and as I go very slowly, with a French cabriolet and my own horse, and shall often turn out of the right road to see what is curious, and make such remarks as may be useful to those who follow me, (and I could wish amusing to those who do not) you will hear often from me. I shall point out the houses where I am best received, and mark those where they think imposing on strangers meritorious, with the expence at each inn; but let it be remembered that I constantly dine under a hedge on bread and cheese, cold chicken, a bottle of wine, fruit, and such other things as a little basket will contain, and at night have only such a meal as my betters need not be ashamed to partake of: my plan, like that of lords North and Bute, being economy, and I am not ashamed to own, that I spare every sous I can, for two very obvious reasons, because I hate imposition and cannot afford it.

August 13th, Calais.

Left that town, after a residence in it of about two months, with the utmost satisfaction. A town in which Monf. Dessen gives the gout, and lady F——t (Calais Nancy Day) the ton! Yet not without a painful parting with a French officer of the regiment du Maine, whom I found sensible, honest, and sincere; strange as this may appear, yet it is true, that now and then a Frenchman, though born twenty one miles from Dover, may possess as good a heart and as many virtues as an Englishman. I took my last look at the white cliffs of Dover without feeling the mal du pais; for I left only a few people (under half a score) which could induce me to wish to see it again—ate my cold chicken under a hedge, drank lord C——n's health, but thought myself obliged to lord A——y, found the road good, and the country fine, from Calais to St. Omer's; but the tobacco plantations near that town made me think I was arrived in Virginia; a circumstance however, which my faithful, and only servant, took no notice of, though he is a native of that rebellious country. I took him with me, lest Sancho should have been excepted against, in his Majesty's most gracious pardon to those rebels who return to their allegiance.

St. Omer's, August 14 (27 miles from Calais.)

The Convergence, the best inn for the English; bad stabling; the house not very clean, nor very dear; gained twelve livres by the change of a 20*l*. bank note at the English college; stopt at the convent at Andras on my way, to take leave of my daughter, who is a Nun there; found several women of bad character, boarders at that convent, and what is more extraordinary, found it was a circumstance well known to the lady Prieure; but they are poor, and money tempts all mortals. L——y J——r was lately a pensioner at this convent. One of her amusements there was shooting sparrows, for she killed none of the officers.

Bill at St. Omer's 9 livres, for supper, beds, beds, horse, &c. for myself, my wife, and two daughters.

Lelliers, August 15 (31 miles from St. Omer's).

Passed through Acre (twelve miles from St. Omer's) a large well fortified town; put up at the White Swan, by mistake, being recommended to the canon d'Or. Lay in the same bed, they said, the Duke of Gloucester lay; dream't that I was a beggar; glad to find when I awoke, that I am only

LETTER VII.

Rheims, in Champaigne.

PERHAPS, Sir, some account of this town, which is the principal of the province, may be acceptable to your readers. It is famous, you know, for being the place where the Kings of France are crowned; and it is famous, I know, for producing wine, which will make every man as happy as a king.

Few people of any rank reside in this town; but it abounds with opulent tradesmen. And here are many well-built houses and noble edifices, one of which is a publick hospital for the reception of the sick. Without the Porte Neuve are the most noble walks of any in this kingdom. The town is situated in the midst of a dreary flat country, of an unpleasing aspect; but the plenty of delicious fruits, garden-stuff, game, &c. which is to be seen in the markets, would induce a stranger to believe it abounds with every thing that is good for man, or beast. It is however seven years since they have had a tolerable vintage. The present promises abundance; and the high flavour of the grapes, the preparation of the coopers, hoop-makers, &c. all seem to indicate a prosperous wine harvest. Rheims was once the residence of the Romans; and besides the triumphal arch mentioned in my last,* there was another on the other side of

N O T E.

* There is no mention of this arch, in either of his former letters; but we have it in our power to supply this deficiency, by the following extract from the friendly correspondence of our ingenious and attentive traveller.

In a letter from the same place, he says, "I have seen here a most curious piece of Roman antiquity. It is a triumphal gate, of three arches, built by the Romans; but when, or by whom, is not known. Under the centre arch, in spite of the depredations of time, are seen Romulus and Remus sucking the

the town, which for many ages was the principal entrance to the city. It is called at this day La Porte Bassée, i. e. Basilicoris; but unfortunately very little remains of it are now to be seen. But that which gives to this town its principal beauty is the cathedral, in which the present and so many former Kings were crowned. Nothing can be more beautiful; and perhaps I may venture to say it is the most elegant gothic structure in the world to behold, and what no man can enter (as I observed to you before) without feeling a reverential awe towards that Being to whose glory it was raised: nor is it defiled within with any of those gaudy trumpery paintings and votive offerings which are so commonly seen in other Romish churches. Here I have had an opportunity of tasting genuine unadulterated white champaigne. Most of that which is sent to England has sugar in it; and that put in it too by the maker. This is done to fit the harder and common wines to the English palate; but wines of the first kind need no such address. There are two sorts of champaigne, one called Mousier, the other Non Mousier; but the same wine will be either: the cause is, one is bottled in the month of March, before the fermentation is quite over; the other, later in the year; but the misfortune is that by remaining so long in the cask, it loses of its delicious flavour, and it is for this reason that champaigne is never good when sent to England in casks; for it is not the climate but the cask which this exquisite wine cannot long bear. The great warmth of the sun, at this time; the fruit, the flowers, and the well-ripened grape, unassisted by art, all conspire to prove wolf. The arch is thirty-five feet high, and fifteen wide; and is supported by fluted columns of the Corinthian order. The smaller arches are thirty feet high, and eight wide; and under one of these is Leda embracing Jupiter, in the form of a Swan. This noble piece of antiquity is little known, as it is under lock and key, and not to be seen by every careless traveller. And it is moreover so obscured by what has been built about and under it, to support the arches, that its greatest beauty is not discernible, without much attention. There was another triumphal arch, at the other end of the town, which for many years was one of the town-gates; but they have suffered it to fall.

Your humble servant,
A WANDERER.

HAVING taken a route of many leagues out of my way (if a Wanderer can be said ever to be so) to see the remains of a Roman city, lately discovered in Champagne, and of which I have seen some accounts in your paper, perhaps some further particulars of so curious a piece of antiquity, and of a town of which history makes no mention, may be acceptable to you.

This town then was situated on an easy rounding surface of a beautiful oval mountain, now called Chatlet; the base of which is washed by a fine river, which fertilizes the vales beneath, and commands a beautiful prospect. When I had passed the town of St. Dizier (the greatest part of which, with the great church, had just before been laid in ashes by the carelessness of a baker) about two leagues, I found a small auberge, opposite to which is a horse-ferry to pass the river, where a road leads up to the house of Mons. Grignion, who has an iron-work situated under the foot of that now celebrated mountain: and it was the digging there for iron ore, and some Roman coins, which were found about the surface, that led Mons. Grignion to make farther enquiries, and which have at length laid open to broad daylight, the cellars, wells, streets, which sustained about eight hundred houses, temples, and other buildings, which for many ages, "like the baseless fabric of a vision," had not left a visible wreck behind.

And now I must observe, that from the various accounts I have seen published in the Journal Encyclopedique, and other writings, that I had all along understood it to be a Roman subterranean city, which had been buried in its own ruins by some violent convulsion of the earth, like Herculaneum near Naples, than which nothing can be more erroneous; for the mountain wears evidently now the same form nature gave it, and the town was destroyed by fire: but the larger stones having been removed to erect other buildings, and the refuse and rubbish falling into the cellars and wells, the whole surface of the mountain has, for many ages, been as smooth as if the ground had never been broken; which may be seen by that part (and a great part, in all probability, it is of the town) which has not yet been opened. Many hundred cellars, with the stairs leading down to them, are now cleared of the refuse; the bottoms of which are none of them above seven feet from the present surface; and there is such an infinite quantity of pieces of charcoal to be seen amongst the rubbish (for nothing is more durable) and so many pieces of melted glass (of which I picked up several) that though no one knows by whom the town was built, it is very evident by what means it was destroyed. Mr. Grignion the elder was unfortunately gone to Paris, but his son, on whom I waited, gave me a very kind reception, and every information I could wish; and I have been so delighted with what I have already seen, and expect so much entertainment from what I am yet to see, that I shall rest my horse, and amuse myself here for a few days, and therefore shall defer being more particular, 'till I have seen more, and have been better informed. To-morrow M. Grignion has promised me a long examination of some thousand different pieces of Roman utensils, coins, weights, measures, statues, &c. which are now in his cabinet, but preserved for the King's, who has hitherto been at the expence of laying the foundation of the town open.

When I have seen these things, and examined more minutely the place from whence they were gathered, you shall hear further from your humble servant,

A WANDERER.

Chatlet, near St. Dizier, in Champagne,

P. S. Future travellers, who have not either time or inclination to cross the river to visit this mountain, cannot fail of seeing Mons. Grignion's house opposite to the ferry, and the Chatlet just above it, where a pole is fixed (visible from the road) in the centre of the Roman town.

Dijon.

AS I wish future travellers, but most especially Wanderers like myself, may find some benefit by my having gone before them, I shall lay before your readers some account of this most delightful and well-situated town, which is in every respect the cleanest, and in my opinion, the properest town in France for an English family to reside at, or a young man to be placed in, to acquire the language; as it is spoken with more purity here, even by the Bourgeoisie, than in Paris, or any other town in France. The English have already found out these agreeable circumstances, and the publicans endeavour most shamefully to impose upon those who arrive here, till they can dispose of themselves in private lodgings, or a ready furnished house, many of which are to be had. The landlord of the Ville de Lyons had the hardness to charge me for one night and for one bad room, and two buggy beds, four livres; and the host at the Duke of Burgoyne's head, eighteen livres a week for my horse, though the highest price to a native is about nine! I would advise, therefore, a family, or single gentleman or lady who propose spending any time at this town, to write a letter to Monsi. Vienne Epicier Rue Guillaume, desiring either to have his lodgings, or that he will procure them some to go to immediately on their arrival. His own first floor has every thing in and about it which can be wanted for a small family; the price three guineas a month, and an honest, sensible, useful acquaintance to a stranger, into the bargain. The Croix d'Or is within a few doors, where a dinner may be had well dressed at a reasonable price.

There are in this town, during the winter, a great number of persons of fortune and family, who pique themselves on shewing civilities to strangers. The walks in and about it are good, and command every way a variety of pleasing prospects. The wine and fruit is delicious, and all provisions at a price an Englishman will not call dear *.

N O T E.

* — Writing from the same place to a friend of the Editor's, our traveller says, "This is a most delightful country indeed; and Dijon is a very clean town, abounding with fine houses and public buildings. I drink a bottle of excellent burgundy at dinner; and another at supper; the expence of both one shilling English. The peaches grow here upon standards, and look as ill as if they were without flavour, but they are superior to any wall fruit. For twelve miles before I reached this town, my eye was never more highly gratified: such a sky above, and such a country beneath!—I found here three or four English gen-

About four leagues from Dijon is a very rich convent of Monks, with whom I had the great luxury of eating a dinner, a few days ago, where besides a great variety of dishes served up with all the French elegance, we tasted wine of different years, from sixty-two to seventy-two, and such as I am convinced can scarce be tasted any where else: I am sure not in England; for though I had often before met with what I thought excellent burgundy, I am now convinced I never had before tasted that wine in perfection. Age is essentially necessary to give burgundy a high flavour; but beside this those Monks have some particular growths of wine which they, the King, and Prince of Conde, wholly engross, and which no price can purchase. These Monks are indeed obliged to entertain all travellers who require it, but it must be some particular party, and some lucky circumstances combined (which happened to be my case) to procure a bottle of the polite old Abbot's from his oldest wine-binn. This is a repast which unfortunately for the ladies, and as unfortunately too perhaps for the Monks, they cannot partake of—no women are admitted within their walls. The ladies never return their visits. Opposite to an irregular building called the Prince of Conde's palace, in this town, is a noble Equestrian statue of Lewis the XIV; fixed however upon a mean pedestal, and in a place by no means worthy of so fine a piece of workmanship. This is one of the arts in which the tlemen, who are agreeable well-bred men, and have a most excellent well-furnished lodging, for fifteen shillings a week. You will be surprised when I tell you that my expences on the road (though I lived well, and had a wife and two children with me) amounted only to four guineas from Calais to Rheims, and three guineas from Rheims to Dijon: four hundred miles! Yet we had a good supper, good beds, and a bottle of the best wine the house afforded; and our horse was well provided for: but we dined always under an hedge. At two of the Inns where we lay, we had a good supper, a good bottle of wine, the horse well fed with hay and corn, three beds well sheeted, and the bill four livres, ten sols; about four shillings English. This was the consequence, however, of taking a road but little frequented by the foolish extravagant, English puppy travellers. * * * *

French

French are so much superior to the English. The church of the Chartreux, a convent of silent Monks, about a quarter of a mile from this town, has some pictures, and a monument, (the workmanship of above four centuries since) which is worth going further to see: a fight also which Ladies, who do not love to wear breeches, cannot partake of. There is also a public Academy for the instruction of youth in drawing, painting, and sculpture; and Monf. Devouge, the master, is a very ingenious artist. Upon the whole, by what judgment I can form of Dijon from a fortnight's abode in it, I should prefer it, either for my own residence, or the instruction of my children, to any town in France, as it seems to abound with more virtues, and fewer vices.

A WANDERER.

P. S. It should not be forgot, that Monf. S—— a woollen-draper in this town, but who calls himself a banker (because Harries, of St. James's-street, employs him to remit money) seizes all letters which come to the post-office, directed to English gentlemen, and thinks he has an exclusive privilege to clothe, feed, and provide for them every article they want; but it is at an expence of forty per cent. for his civilities.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

S I R,

IF you think the inclosed narrative worthy a place in your truly entertaining Magazine, the insertion will perhaps contribute to the useful entertainment of many of your readers. I would by no means attempt to publish an affair of this sort, if I had not the permission of two of the principal persons concerned; besides, it may tend in a great measure to exculpate a young creature in the minds of her friends and acquaintance, from crimes, of which, tho' she is guilty, yet, in my humble opinion, she is highly excusable, as not being originally instrumental to her misfortunes: the contents will satisfy you in the rest.

I am, Sir,

Your constant reader and admirer,

HILARIO.

The Character of a Man of Gallantry.

AMONG the various characters which chequer society, that of a man of gallantry is one of the most conspicuous, and not the least admired in every polite circle, particularly amongst the fair sex; but it is one of those which can attract liking only on a slight superficial review, although it casts a ray of false lustre round it; yet on examination, the actions which compose it, will be found to be such, as virtuous, serious reflection can never approve; actions, for which, were they committed in middling life, simple death would be accounted a favourable punishment.

Notwithstanding the numberless unpardonable treacheries committed by men of this cast against the fair sex, frequent examples evince that there are many females still unguarded; deceived by flattering politeness, and pledges of honour (which it seems 'tis deemed no harm to break thro' where an amour is in question) they see their folly when too late to retract. Every woman who regards her honour, should shun a man of this character as the worst of evils, for in whatever agreeable light the world may consider it, on examination it will be found nine times in ten, to cover a villain, whom neither a sense of honour or gratitude can deter from the gratification of his criminal passions, and who will not stop at the basest means to attain his evil ends of credulous, too credulous, defenceless woman. This remark is somewhat severe, but a thousand examples besides the following can testify that 'tis just.

A few nights ago, as I turned the corner of Parliament-street, curiosity led me, amongst a number of others, to enquire into the cause of a crowd on Cork-hill; my notice was chiefly attracted by a female voice, by the tenderness of which, I easily judged the speaker not of the common cast; on enquiry I found a woman of the town had been knocked down by some ruffian, and was still seized by a number of others; she was dressed tolerably decent, and had something in her manner by which it might be judged she had not long followed that way of life; she demanded, in a most pathetic tone of voice if there was no gentleman present, who had honour and good nature enough to succour a distressed female, and free her from the ill-usage of the mob? As I was next her she particularly requested my protection; I could not refuse it.—At the sight of a drawn sword the mob dispersed and we were left alone; she expressed, her gratitude in sentiments the most tender and affecting; and in a stile which convinced me still the more that she had been bred in genteel life. I walked with with her to Essex-bridge, where I told her she was now past danger, and wished her a good night; she requested as I had given my protection so far, that I would add to the favour by seeing her to her lodgings, which were in the next street: As I am one of those persons who are fond of pursuing an adventure to its utmost, and as one which seemed not a little extraordinary now offered, I consented to go with her. She told me her name was Adams, that she lived in Strand-street, and seemed not the least anxious to conceal her way of life. When we came to the house, we ascended a shattered pair of stairs to a wretched apartment wherein she lodged; and even that was not entirely her's: she enquired of the old woman, who seemed to be the mistress of it, if some persons had been there to enquire for her? she answered in a surly manner; and I could hear her in a threatening tone ask for money, and mutter the words Constable and Marshalsea; Miss Adams endeavoured to soothe her, and on my appearance she seemed to be somewhat better satisfied. Miss Adams said she had not drank tea, and desired the old woman to make some. Tea was brought, I was pressed to drink, and though I had drank tea before, and neither the cleanliness nor regularity of the hostess or equipage were inviting, I complied. Miss Adams apologized for every defect in her entertainment, and when tea was over she asked me if I would drink some punch? I told her I was not fond of punch, but liked a glass of wine, and with her permission would send for some; after some pressing she consented, and I sent the old woman for it; when we had drank some glasses, Miss Adams became a little cheerful: her person (which I should have before described) was naturally agreeable, her size about the middle stature, and her face composed of a set of very regular features; her conversation was not less agreeable than her person; and to complete the whole, some little musical flourishings of her voice told me she had one; I asked her to sing, she complied, but first stepped to a closet whence she brought a guitar, on which she played with much judgment, and accompanied with one of the most ravishing harmonious voices I ever heard: she sung several songs, and in short, the whole of her deportment pleased me beyond expression. I intended to ask her what extraordinary misfortunes could sink a woman of her person, youth (for she seemed not to be more than twenty) and accomplishments, to a life so wretched as that which she followed, but was prevented by an accident. While we seemed to forget every thing but cheerfulness, the door was rapped at, 'twas opened, and an old gentleman walked in, who by his dress seemed to be a clergyman, he enquired if a Miss Simpson lodged there; while he spoke, Miss Adams shrieked, and cried, Oh! Heavens—my dear father! and swooned away.—The good old gentleman approached, and seizing her hand pressed it to his heart, and in a faltering voice exclaimed, Oh! My dear unfortunate daughter—my darling Susy—and burst into tears. Could a heart possessed of a tender sentiment be unmoved at such a scene? We were all for some time lost in tears and amazement, but as soon as we were a little recovered, each was busied in endeavouring to restore Miss Adams, or rather Miss Simpson, which was with difficulty effected; for as often as she saw her father she again swooned. When she was a little recovered, I offered to withdraw, but was requested both by her and her father, not to leave them for some time; I complied with their request; at her father's desire, she consented to be removed to other lodgings: a coach was called, and a few minutes brought us to her father's apartments. It was now late, and I thought proper to depart, but was earnestly requested to favour them with my company next evening: I promised and came accordingly.

Miss Simpson seemed to be now entirely composed, her father told her he had been informed of her evil way of life; but that whatever were her actions, as a father he forgave them from his heart, and should never mention them to her without her own permission, as he was certain they were occasioned, more by the treacherous delusions of others than any evil inclinations of her own; and what confirmed him stronger in his opinion, was, the early proofs of her virtuous conduct which he experienced while she was with him, and the continual assurances of her friends, while absent from him: he added, that he should be glad to hear from her own mouth, an account of the misfortunes which plunged her to distress, and parted her so long from him, and if she thought proper he should be bet-nal Providence whom I have since so often offended) that while I remained under her care, an immoral thought never found a place in my heart. But alas! how little to be depended on are the most favourable and promising prospects in human affairs!—This cloudless morning of life, this pleasing sunrise of virtue was, in a short time, overshadowed by the most abject, criminal misery.

My cousin and I went one evening to drink tea at the house of a lady whom we used to visit; there was a large company there, and among the rest a military gentleman, lately come from Gibraltar: he was a near relation of my cousin's, and introduced me as such; he was something above the middle stature, his age about twenty-eight, perfectly accomplished, and of a most polite and winning address; during the whole evening he was the very life of the company; the time passed away very agreeably, and as it was rather late when the company broke up, Lieut. C——ns insisted on seeing my cousin and I home, his offer was accepted—a coach was called, and drove home. It was too late to ask the Lieutenant in at that time, but my cousin requested the favour of his company next evening; he accepted her invitation and came accordingly; in the course of the tea-table chat, he told my cousin he had dined that day with some company at the lady's house where we drank tea the evening before; that a party for the Dargle had been proposed and agreed on, that he was desired to add a couple of ladies to the number; that he had made bold to name her and me, and asked pardon for so doing without first knowing our pleasure, but nevertheless hoped we would make good his promise; a request so polite could scarcely be refused. My cousin consented; on the morning appointed, we went to the house in town from which we were to set out, where coaches waited for the company: my cousin sat with two ladies and an old gentleman in one of the coaches, and it was my lot to be with two young ladies in the same coach with Lieut. C——ns. During the time of our little journey, I was pleased beyond expression with the lieutenant's discourse and address, and I must confess, not a little the more so, as he seemed to address himself chiefly to me, and pay me a peculiar deference, and we spent the day very agreeably. On our return the discourse turned on several interesting subjects, in which the lieutenant delivered himself with a great deal of good sense and experience, which pleased my cousin so much that the next time she and I were together, she expressed her approbation, in the highest encomiums on his good breeding and parts. A few evenings after, the lieutenant came to pay us a visit, and invite us to the play: my cousin said it was utterly out of her power to go that evening, upon which he said it would be doing him and the lady (mentioning a particular friend of her's) at whose request he came, and who was to accompany us, a particular favour, if she would permit me to go. My cousin (who looked on him not in the light of a cool, superficial acquaintance, but a man of prudence and an intimate friend) thought there was no impropriety in committing me to his protection, more particularly, as the lady, her intimate friend, was to be with us. While we were at the play, the lieutenant shewed me the greatest respect, and paid me many compliments, which, however humility might lead me to think myself unworthy of, yet there was something in his manner which shewed too much sincerity to leave me any room to suspect him of flattery, or at least to doubt that he spoke as he thought. Such a behaviour from such a man could not fail to make impressions on a heart less susceptible, and of more experience than could be expected from a girl of sixteen. I own my heart felt a tender uneasiness, of which I hardly knew the cause; the lieutenant's good breeding, his accomplishments, and in particular, his polite and tender behaviour towards me, were ever uppermost in my mind; I was pleased with him; I liked—yes—I loved him. Whether my heart was rendered more easy or unhappy, by the following circumstance, I could not then, nor can I now tell. He accompanied some ladies, with my cousin and I, to Ranelagh Gardens one evening; and whether encouraged by any thing in my behaviour towards him, I could not tell, but as we were alone in one of the walks, he took an opportunity of making the most solemn protestations of love for me; I was too much embarrassed to make any reply; he perceived my disorder, and with one knee to the ground, renewed his protestations in the most solemn manner, and seizing my trembling hand, pressed it affectionately to his lips; I was so confused, I knew not where I stood; a thousand ideas rushed upon my heart, and overcome with joy and astonishment, I fainted away: at my recovery, I found myself surrounded by my cousin and her company, who were all busied in their endeavours to restore me. The lieutenant concealed the cause of my indisposition, so did I; and though the evening's entertainment was not near over, left the night air should prejudice me we departed: the lieutenant waited on my cousin and I home; he had no opportunity of speaking to me on that subject any more that evening, but came next day to enquire after my health, and expressed his pleasure at seeing me quite well: the night but one following, was that of the king's birth day, on which there was to be another entertainment at Ranelagh; the lieutenant presented my cousin with tickets for herself and me, and told us he was to meet some company of our acquaintance there, and if we thought proper he would wait on us and conduct us there; his offer was too kind and polite to be refused; we consented to go. The evening following, when we were at the gardens, the lieutenant did not fail to seek an opportunity of being alone with me, nor was I unwilling to favour his design, we sauntered on slowly, while my cousin and the rest of the company left us behind: here again he renewed his protestations in the most honourable terms, and pressed me to give him some answer. I saw the inequality of our fortunes and stations in life, and an improbability of the success of his proposals; I knew likewise, tho' he could pretend to alliances much more honourable and advantageous, yet there was so much friendship and politeness in the whole of his behaviour to me, that I had no room to doubt his veracity, or suspect his honour. I had, alas! too much sincerity to belie the sentiments of a heart, which my involuntary weakness shewed but too plainly a few evenings before; in short, my confession filled him with seeming transports of joy.

Though my cousin warned me continually against the company and wiles of young men, told me the evil consequences which too frequently attended young girls who had been too credulous of their protestations, and pointed out to my judgment, several faults which were easily perceived in male characters, improper to hold any communication with, yet I saw none of those faults in the behaviour of lieutenant C—ns; he had nothing of that affectation which characterises the fop; none of those studied airs or expressions which distinguish the concealed superficial lover; he was all sincerity, (as I thought) all easy politeness: but perhaps—nay! certainly, I thought too favourably of him; but whatever were his deceptions, they were practised out of the common road, and perhaps he was the most criminal, because the least suspected villain.

The liking my cousin constantly expressed of him, in my presence, contributed not a little to raise my esteem for him still the higher. From that evening, when he was assured by a reciprocal confession that his passion had met with success, his politeness and tender assiduity were redoubled: he left no opportunity unemployed to rivet my attachment to him still stronger. My cousin's confinement, by a slight fit of illness, favoured our intimacy. When she recovered our meetings were less frequent, but that was supplied by an epistolary correspondence, which was kept up with punctuality on both sides. I know not by what insatiation I neglected to acquaint my cousin (my best friend) with our proceedings; I believe it proceeded from a bashfulness which I shall ever have reason to repent. The lieutenant's visits were frequent to our house, and were received by my cousin with the highest marks of friendly esteem. He came one evening to acquaint us, that his regiment was ordered for America, and that he was commanded to join them within a month in order to embark: this news was a dagger to my heart; I was impatient to talk with him in private; an opportunity which he seemed as anxious for, and soon found means to accomplish. As we went to church together that evening, he told me that the longest time he could stay in the kingdom could not be more than two months, and expressed the most earnest wishes that affairs between him and me were brought to a conclusion by our marriage, as he could not bear to run a hazard of losing me. This proposal thoroughly convinced me of his honourable intentions, and the transports I felt at the assurance of being united for life to the man whom my soul loved, are easier imagined than expressed: I agreed to his proposal, but said I could not think of taking such a step without first acquainting my cousin and you. He said he would wish both present; but at the same time observed, that 'twould clash with both our inter-rests very much, as his fortune was but small, and he depended on a rich aunt in town for a very considerable estate, and which he should never enjoy if he married without her consent, as she recommended a match with a young lady of fortune, whom he could not like; that in order to avoid, as much as possible, giving offence to his aunt, it was absolutely requisite to keep our affair private; and by the common course of nature she could not live long: in all human probability, a few weeks might banish all his fears on that head, and he would then be at liberty to avow his marriage with me openly.—This story was very plausible,—my credulous heart believed all he said, and in truth (as I before said) his behaviour from the beginning left me no room to doubt his veracity; I agreed to his proposal, and the Sunday following was appointed for the celebration of our nuptials; he said, in order to be more private, 'twas better to retire to some of the outlets, where he would have a clergyman prepared, without waiting for a licence, by which the affair might spread and come to his aunt's ears; to this I agreed: but the chief end now to be attained was, how to evade the notice of my cousin. This the lieutenant soon effected by bringing in his aunt's compliments to my cousin, requesting leave for me to spend a few days at her villa, which was only a few miles from town, as she had some business for me to do in the millinery way, which must be done at her own house; this was really the case, and proved an opportunity very favourable to our intentions. My unsuspecting cousin did not scruple to put me under the protection of a man whom she always looked on as a friend, and a gentleman; the lieutenant came to the door in a coach, on the morning appointed, and I went with him, as it were, to his aunt's villa; but as soon as we got out of town, the coachman was ordered to drive to Leixlip: we were soon conveyed there to the house of a woman, with whom the lieutenant seemed well acquainted; we were not long seated in the room, which the lieutenant had hired for our accommodation, when a person in the garb of a clergyman entered, and we were married without any other witness. We were now happy to the utmost of our wishes; I staid from home about ten days, five only of which I spent at the lady's house, and the remainder at our lodgings in Leixlip. When I went home, I (according to my husband's desire) kept every circumstance concealed from my cousin; our visits were frequent, and so private, as entirely to avoid her notice. The lieutenant's stay in Dublin was much longer than I expected, and a circumstance happened which I thought would be the means of completing my happiness.

About two months after our marriage, the old gentlewoman his aunt, died, and left him sole heir of an opulent fortune; I now thought there was no bar to the enjoyment of my most sanguine wishes. The lieutenant said he was going to the country for a few days to take possession of the estate, at his return would make our marriage public, as he had no inconvenience now to fear. After he returned, he seemed in no haste to perform his promise; I reminded him of it twice or thrice, but he found means to avoid answering me by changing the discourse; I perceived, for some time, a cool indifference in his behaviour towards me, which chagrined me not a little: I went one day to his lodgings, and pressed him somewhat earnestly to publish our marriage, and told him I thought myself rather indifferently used, as appearances might shortly raise suspicions in the minds of my cousin, and acquaintances in general, which I thought him bound in honour to prevent, and therefore requested he would be expeditious. He endeavoured to laugh it off; but as I pressed the matter with some warmth, he answered in a peremptory tone, that he would act as he thought proper, adding with an oath, that if I went to that, I was not his wife. I was startled at this declaration, and desired he would explain himself. He told me there was no occasion for that, as I knew very well there was no marriage between us. I was shocked at such barefaced falsehood, and immediately produced the certificate which I received from the clergyman who married us; he took it from me, tore it, and threw it out of the window; and said, the person who performed a sham ceremony (as he called it) between us, was no clergyman, but a waiter.—I was no longer able to contain my passion; I called him villain and infamous liar: he immediately rang the bell, and in a few minutes his servant entered, of whom he desired me to take strict notice, and asked me if that was not the person who married us? I recollected his features, and found he was the same.

I now saw plainly I was betrayed; the sense of so gross and unpardonable an injury from a man, whom, of all his sex, I thought the most incapable of a dishonourable action, deprived me of utterance: the lieutenant then added, if I knew when I was well I would be silent on the affair; that, though he did not regard what the world would say, yet as soon as he knew a syllable of it to transpire, he would immediately leave me to shift for myself; and then flung out of the room in a passion. I remained for some time insensible; when I a little recovered my surprise, I reflected on my situation; and notwithstanding so convincing a proof of his villainy, I could not help loving him; tho' I was convinced I had committed no fault in the eyes of God hitherto, on account of my innocence in the affair, as I kept my cousin till then totally unacquainted with our affairs, I dared not consult her on the occasion; all the resource I now had was a dependance on lieutenant C — ns's exploded honour. In about a week afterwards I again came to his lodgings; he seemed in a great measure to reassume his usual tenderness for me, and told me the world should never know but I was his wife; that he would still publish our marriage, but that he should defer it for some time for some reasons which, he said, were improper to be communicated. I was satisfied with any excuse, as I was proud of a reconciliation on any terms.

We lived together for several weeks in perfect harmony, and our visits to each other were so frequent as to raise suspicions in the mind of my cousin. The effects of our intimacy now became visible, which convinced my cousin she was right in her suspicions; she called me to a severe account, and I concealed nothing except that of the lieutenant's denial of our marriage. With this, she seemed satisfied, and immediately sent for the lieutenant to his lodgings; the messenger returned with word, that he was that morning gone for Corke, in order to embark for America. This was news as astonishing as it was unexpected to me, and served to confirm my cousin in her suspicions of my evil conduct; I could not believe the messenger; I went myself to his lodgings and was assured of his departure; such unprovoked ill-treatment distressed me beyond expression: my cousin told me she would write after him immediately, and I requested she would inclose a letter from me to him, in which I expressed my surprise at his abrupt ill-natured behaviour, and requested that he would at least assure my cousin of the affair, and thereby clear my honour from the foul suspicions of a person whose displeasure I feared more than death. In about a fortnight my cousin received a letter from him, in which he blankly denied his marriage with me; and said, that if my pretended honour had received any injury, it it was more owing to my own wanton forwardness than any thing else; and, that he had not been the first nor principal person concerned. It is impossible to describe the mixture of rage and disappointment I felt, when my cousin communicated the contents of this letter to me; though I had before received a convincing proof of his villainy, I never thought him capable of this fresh act of it. To be denied by my husband, the man whom my soul loved and revered as the most amiable of his sex, to forfeit the good opinion of a woman, to whom I was infinitely obliged, who shewed a more than motherly tenderness for me since I came under her care, and to whom I thought my behaviour in every other respect had given the most convincing proofs of innocence and virtue, and to encounter the tongue of scandal, which the busy censorious world is too apt to employ on the most spotless characters, were circumstances too heavy for my soul to bear: the conflict in my mind, threw me into a fit of sickness, which lasted about a week, and as soon as I was well, my cousin called me one day into her chamber, where, in a long pathetic speech, she expatiated on the heinousness of my conduct, and told me, notwithstanding my crimes, she loved me too well not to be deeply affected, and that my behaviour lay so heavy on her, that in all probability it would shortly put an end to her life; but added, it was incompatible with her honour or character, to keep me any longer in her house; she then put five guineas in my hand, and desired I would leave the house immediately. In vain did I remonstrate; she said, that whatever feelings the lieutenant might have, she was certain he had too much honour to assert a lie in so material an affair, and again desired I would immediately begone; she told me she would take care to write to you, sir, and lay the affair before you in a proper manner; and so saying, she thrust me out of the room.

It is impossible to express the anguish of my mind at this juncture ; I left the house, and wandered about the streets several hours in a state of delirium, till, roused by the approach of night, I went to seek refuge for a few days at the house of an acquaintance, but found my affair had reached her ears, and she denied me admittance. I went to several acquaintances, and met the same reception ; for by the industry of my cousin's shop-women, my story had been spread through the whole circle of our friends, and every circumstance was aggravated to the greatest crime. Thus, with every friendly door shut against me—the heart of every friend callous to remembrance—pointed at as I passed through the streets—I knew not how to act : Though the lieutenant had used me very ill, I could not hinder my heart to love him ;—though I received such strong proofs of his villainy, yet I imagined if threw myself under his protection, when he saw me friendless, and knew himself to be the occasion of my distress, he could not be so callous to the feelings of humanity, as to refuse his assistance. Satisfied in some measure with these reflections, I determined to go to Corke the first opportunity ; on enquiry I was informed there was a return post-chaise in town, which would set out for Corke next morning : in this I agreed for my passage at two guineas (which was half what money I had in the world) and in four days arrived at Corke. Here, after a tedious enquiry, I found out the lieutenant's lodgings ; I went there, and as soon as he saw me, he asked in a surly tone, what I wanted with him ; I told him my situation, and requested in the most submissive manner, that as he had been the means of ruining my character—my honour—and every thing dear to me, and banishing me from my friends, that he would reflect on his usage to me, and not leave me friendless and unprotected in a strange country, and open to all the miseries which threatened my situation. He told me he wanted none of my canting, and desired me to begone. I then requested he would give me so much money as would bear my charges back to Dublin ; upon which he took half a guinea out of his pocket, and threw it in my face, and declared with a dreadful imprecation, that if ever I presumed to follow him again, he would horse-whip me to death ; so saying, he thrust me violently out of the room, and shut the door in my face.

It is impossible to tell whether grief, despair, or resentment, had the ascendancy in my soul at this juncture ; all the money that remained of my little stock (after defraying the necessary expences of my journey) was a guinea, which, with what he gave me, was all that I had to depend on for a support. My trunk, in which were all my clothes (except a few clean linnen that I kept out for convenience on the road), was cut from behind the post-chaise, by some villain at one of the inns where we halted on the road, so that when my little money was out, I had nothing even to sell or pledge to procure me a subsistence. I was now four months gone with child ; in such a situation I knew not where to turn for shelter ; I enquired for a private lodging, and was directed to the house of a widow woman in a back street near the 'Change. The disorder of my mind threw me into a fit of illness, in which I miscarried ; my illness lasted about a month, after which I began to recover, and by the time I was able to go out, I found not only my little stock expended, but that I was upwards of three guineas indebted to the woman with whom I lodged ; this she often demanded, and I as often declared myself unable to pay, but for quietness sake told her I expected a supply of money in a few days ; this excuse had been too often made to be any longer useful to me ; she came to me one morning, and told me if I did not pay her by that time next day, she would positively send me to jail ; this threat struck terror to my heart ; I knew no way to avoid the effects of it ; to elope from a woman who had been so kind to credit me in so distressed a situation, and in a place where I had no acquaintance, was a thought my soul abhorred. I imagined I appeared in too criminal a light in the eyes of my friends, to expect any assistance from them.—While I was in this dilemma, an officer whom I knew to be an intimate acquaintance of the lieutenant's in Dublin, called at my lodging ; when he enquired after my health and situation, I frankly owned the truth ; he told me the lieutenant had acquainted him with our parting before he sailed for America, which was only a few days before ; and added if I would consent to live with him, he would pay my debts and make me happy. Here I wish to draw a veil over the rest.—But let not rigid virtue, surrounded by assuence, and untouched by distress condemn me, without maturely turely considering my situation—driven from my friends—my honour blasted—and my character lost, past retrieving, I had now nothing worth preserving:—the fear of starving—the horrors of a prison, from which I had no hopes of ever being released, were arguments which I dare say would stagger the greatest fortitude; in short I was obliged to consent—obliged to have recourse to crimes for that subsistence, which virtue in my situation denied me. I had no alternative but that of encountering abject poverty in its most wretched form, and dying a martyr to rigid virtue, without having even the name of it.

With this gentleman I lived about four months, and was turned over from him to another, and so from one to another for the space of two years. Use familiarized crimes to me, and continual dissipations prevented any thoughts of conversion; to mention every particular circumstance of my life would fill a volume; let it suffice to say, that I have now these three years and an half lived the life of a common prostitute, a life so full of complicated miseries, that I am convinced by experience and numberless examples, that for one who embraces or follows it through mere wantonness, there are twenty forced into it by distress or the treacherous wiles of man. About two months ago I came to Dublin with a serjeant, whose scanty allowance being too small to afford us both a subsistence, I was obliged to have recourse to the street, where this gentleman a few nights ago was the means of saving my life.—But Heaven, whose merciful providence has hitherto spared me for conversion, to compleat the work has now sent you in my way, in order to give me an opportunity of being reconciled to you. I have now, Sir, given you an account of my criminal life, in which I have so long dared to continue in open disobedience of the laws of a merciful God; these crimes I now renounce in the presence of that God, and throw myself on that paternal goodness by which you have promised me forgiveness and protection, and thereby given me the long-wished for opportunity of returning to the paths of virtue." Here she dropped on her knees and embraced those of her father; he raised her tenderly and pressed her to his bosom, while tears of joy plentifully bedewed his venerable cheeks; he then dropped on his knees, and broke out in raptures of praise and thanksgiving.—Humanity could not resist the emotions of sym-thetic joy at the conclusion; and could a person possessing a feeling of honour or humanity hear the narrative of her life, without being moved by sentiments of detestation and resentment against the villainous author of her sufferings.

Sir, said Mr. Simpson, the action is of itself criminal in a high degree, but when the crime of ingratitude is joined to it, it (if possible) doubles the guilt; know then, Sir, that this very man was raised from the rank of a common soldier in the regiment wherein he enlisted, to avoid the severity of his father, a half-pay officer of very small fortune, to the rank of lieutenant, (which he now enjoys) by the interest of Sufy's uncle, whom I before mentioned, and that chiefly at my request; and from me he received a liberal education gratis, through mere pity to his youth and innocence, his father, who was of a morose disposition, absolutely refusing to pay for his schooling.

Mr. Simpson then told his daughter, that her cousin died about two years ago, and that her death was in a great measure hastened by the grief which Sufy's behaviour occasioned; that at her decease her little substance devolved to him and his children; his eldest daughter died of a consumption, which he said was owing to the same cause; he said that ever since he heard of her way of life, he made several, but fruitless enquiries after her; he said he was at last informed that she was in Dublin, upon which he came to town immediately, and by mere chance met the son of one of his parishioners, who was a servant to an officer in the barrack, and who told him where she lodged.

It was now late, and I took my leave for that night, and promised to call next morning, which I did, and at their request accompanied them a few miles out of town, on their journey home.

And are these some of the ornamental actions which compose the character of a man of gallantry? can such a conduct ever entitle a man to the name of "a favourite of the fair sex?"—No surely, virtuous reflection can never approve it—generous humanity must ever detest it. The story needs no high colouring, 'tis in its simplest dress sufficiently affecting, without any farther expatiation. Nay, 'twere an insult to humanity to dictate feelings to the susceptible heart: even let the greatest libertine ask his own heart seriously, whether 'twere not a less criminal action to sheathe his sword in the heart of the innocent girl, and thereby put her out of the way of wretchedness, than to plunge her in debauchery, infamy and ruin, and render her family for ever unhappy.

Memoirs of General Montgomery. By Dr. Smith, of Philadelphia.

THE general had received a liberal education in Ireland, his native country, before he went into the army, and was indeed endued with talents which would have led him to eminence in any profession. His own he studied with facility, which soon distinguished his military abilities; but war and conquest having no other charms to him than as the necessary means of peace and happiness to mankind, he still found leisure, in the midst of camps, to cultivate an excellent taste for philosophy and polite literature. To these he added a careful study of the arts of government and the rights of mankind; looking forward to that time when he might descend into the still scenes of private life, and give a full flow to the native and acquired virtues of a heart rich in moral excellence.

Above eighteen years ago he had attained the rank of captain in the 17th regiment, under general Monckton, and stood full in the way of higher preferment; having borne a share in all the labour of our American wars, and the reduction of Canada. Ill-fated region! short-sighted mortals! little did he foresee the scenes which that land had still in reserve for him! little did those generous Americans, who then stood by his side, think they were assisting to subdue a country, which would one day be held up over us as a greater scourge in the hands of enemies!

He therefore chose America as the field of his future usefulness; and as soon as the blessings of peace were restored to his country, and duty to his sovereign would permit, he took his leave of the army, and having soon connected himself by marriage with an ancient and honourable family in the province of New York, he chose a delightful retirement upon the banks of Hudson's river, at a distance from the noise of the busy world. Having a heart distended with benevolence, and panting to do good, he soon acquired, without courting it from his neighbours, that authority which an opinion of superior talents and inflexible integrity never fail to create.

In this most eligible of all situations, the life of a country gentleman, deriving its most exquisite relish from reflection upon past dangers and past services, he gave full scope to his philosophic spirit and taste for rural elegance. Self-satisfied and raised above vulgar ambition, he devoted his time to sweet domestic intercourse with the amiable partner of his heart, friendly converse with men of worth, the study of useful books, and the improvement of his favourite villa, Nor from that happy spot did he wish to stray, until he should receive his last summons to happiness more than terrestrial.

But when the hand of power was stretched forth against the land of his residence, he had a heart too noble not to sympathize in its distress. From that fatal day—and oh! that it had never found a place in the volumes of time—from that fatal day in which the first American blood was spilt by the hostile hands of British brethren, and the better genius of the empire, veiling her face in anguish, turned abhorrent from the strife of death among her children—I say, from that fatal day, he chose his part.

Although his liberal spirit placed him above local prejudices, and he considered himself as a member of the empire at large; yet America, struggling in the cause of liberty, henceforth became his peculiar country, and that country took full possession of his soul, lifting him above this earthly dross, and every private affection. Worth like his could be no longer hid in the shades of obscurity, nor permit him to be placed in that inferior station with which a mind, great in humility and self-denial, would have been contented. It was wisely considered that he, who had so well learned to obey, was fittest to command; and therefore, being well assured of his own heart, he resigned himself to the public voice, nor hesitated a moment longer to accept the important commission freely offered to him, and, with the firmness of another Regulus, to bid farewell to his peaceful retirement and domestic endearments.

His principles of loyalty to his sovereign (whom he had long served, and whose true glory consists in healing those streaming wounds) remained firm and unshaken. Love to our brethren whom we must oppose; the interchange of good offices, which had so intimately knit the bonds of friendship between them and us; the memory of those better days in which we fought and triumphed together; the vast fabric of mutual mutual happiness raised by our union, and ready to be dissolved by our dissensions; the annihilation of those numerous plans of improvement in which we were engaged for the glory of the empire—all these considerations conspired to render this contest peculiarly abhorrent to him and every virtuous American, and could have been out-weighted by nothing earthly, but the unquenchable love of liberty, and that sacred duty which we owe to ourselves and our posterity.

Hence, as appears from his papers even in the full triumph of success, he most ardently joined his worthy friend * General Schuyler in praying that “heaven may speedily re-unite us in every bond of affection and interest; and that the British empire may again become the envy and admiration of the universe, and flourish till the consummation of earthly things.”

The Canada expedition is one of those measures, which the enemies of American peace having first rendered necessary, will now strive to misconstrue into hostility and offence. But when authentic proofs were obtained, that a people professing a religion, and subjected to laws, different from ours, together with numerous tribes of savages, were instigated and preparing to deluge our frontiers in blood, let God and the world judge whether it was not mercy to them, to ourselves, to the whole British empire, to use the means in our power for frustrating the barbarous attempt.

Indeed there was benevolence in the whole plan of his expedition. It was to be executed not so much by force as by persuasion; still appearing in the country with such respectable strength, as might protect the inhabitants from the insults and vengeance of those who were striving to make them lift up their reluctant arm to the shedding fraternal blood. It was further wished to kindle up the expiring lamp of liberty among them; to open their eyes to its divine effulgence; and enable them to raise their drooping head, and claim its blessings as their own.

This was a work, in all its parts, suited to the genius of a Montgomery. He had a head and heart which equally pointed him out as a fit guide in such an undertaking. He understood and could well explain the blessings of a free government. Persuasion dwelt upon his tongue. He had a soul, great, disinterested, affectionate, delighting to alleviate distress, and diffuse happiness. He had an industry not to be wearied out; a vigilance not to be imposed upon; and a courage, when necessary, equal to his other abilities.

But still, with a few new raised men, of different colonies, and perhaps different tempers; ill supplied with arms and ammunition; worse disciplined; unaccustomed to look cannon in the face; to make or mount a breach—in such circumstances, I say, and in the short space of an autumnal and winter campaign, in the rigorous northern climes, to achieve a work which cost Great-Britain and the colonies the labour of several campaigns, and what was a sacrifice of infinitely more value—the life of the immortal Wolfe—this certainly required a degree of magnanimity beyond the ordinary reach, and the exertion of the highest abilities of every kind.

The command and conduct of an army were but small parts of this undertaking. The Indians were to be treated with, restrained, and kept in temper. The Canadians were likewise to be managed, protected, and supported: and even his own army in some degree to be formed, disciplined, animated, accustomed to marches, incampments, dangers, fatigues, and the frequent want of necessaries.

Camps, of all worldly scenes, often exhibit the greatest pictures of distress. The sick and the wounded, the dying and the dead, as well as the wants and sufferings of the living—all these call forth the most tender feelings, and require of a general that, to the courage of a soldier, he should unite the utmost benevolence of a man.

Our general possessed these united qualities in the highest lustre; of which there are numerous testimonies not only from his own army, but from the prisoners, English as well as Canadians, now among us.

When his men laboured under fatigue, wanted bread and other necessaries, had their beds to make in snow or deep morasses, they were ashamed to complain, finding that he was willing to share in the execution of whatever he commanded; and the example, which he set to others, did more to inspire patience, obedience, love of order and discipline, than the most rigid exercise of power could have done. The influence of his example was still stronger, as it did not appear to be the effect of constraint or political necessity, but the amiable expression of a sympathizing soul, leading him to condescend to all capacities, exact in his own duties, and great even in common things. His letters, confidential as well as official, are a full proof of this.

"Our incampment is so swampy, I feel, says he, exceedingly for the troops; and provisions so scarce, it will require not only dispatch, but good fortune, to keep us from distress. Should things not go well, I tremble for the fate of the poor Canadians, who have ventured so much. What shall I do with them, should I be obliged to evacuate this country! I have assured them, that the united colonies will as soon give up Massachusetts to resentment as them."

These sentiments were worthy of an heroic soul, and of the faith he had pledged to those people. Nor is he less to be venerated for his tender regard towards his own army; instead of making a merit of his difficulties (which were indeed more than ought to be mentioned in this place) he often seeks to conceal them; ascribing any little faults or tardiness, in his young troops, to their want of experience in forming, to their hard duty, to constant succession of bad weather, and the like—still encouraging them to nobler efforts in future. And if any impatience of discipline appeared, he nobly attributes it to "that spirit of freedom which men, accustomed to think for themselves, will even bring into camps with them."

His own superior military knowledge he has been known to sacrifice to the general voice, rather than interrupt that union on which success depended; and when a measure was once resolved upon by the majority, however much contrary to his own advice and judgment, he magnanimously supported it with his utmost vigour; disclaiming that work of low ambition, which will strive to defeat in the execution what it could not direct in planning.

His perseverance and conduct in gaining possession of St. John's and Montreal have already been the theme of every tongue, and need not be mentioned in this place. His abilities in negotiation, the precision with which the various articles of treaties and capitulations are expressed, the generous applause he gives, not only to every worthy effort of his own officers, but to the commanding officer and garrison of St. John's, his noble declaration to the inhabitants of Montreal, "that the continental armies despise every act of oppression and violence, being come for the express purpose of giving liberty and security"—all these, I say, did honour to himself, and to that delegated body under whose authority he acted.

Having approached those plains, which the blood of Wolfe hath consecrated to deathless fame, our hero seemed emulous of his glory, and animated with a kindred spirit. The situation of his army pressed dispatch; snows and frosts only quickened his motions. He hoped by one successful stroke, before the arrival of succours to the garrisons, to compleat his plan, and save the future effusion of much blood. He further flattered himself, that his success, if speedy, might have some influence upon parliament in hastening a reconciliation. He understood that maxim of Polard—"no obstacle should break our resolution, when there is but a moment between a bad situation and a worse"—this sentiment he expresses in his last letter with a spirit of modesty and a sense of duty, as well as the danger attending it, which ought to be for ever recorded to his glory—"I shall be sorry to be reduced to this mode of attack; because I know the melancholy consequences. But the approaching severity of the season, the weakness of the garrison, together with the nature of the works, point it out too strong to be passed by. Fortune often baffles the most sanguine expectations of poor mortals. I am not intoxicated with the favours I have received at her hands; but I think there is a fair prospect of success."

Poor mortals indeed! if nothing was to remain of them after death; for while he was courting this success, and gloriously leading on his troops in the front of danger, he received the fatal stroke, which in an instant released his great spirit to follow and join the immortal spirit of Wolfe!

O thou swift winged messenger of destruction, how didst thou triumph in that moment! the stroke that severed Montgomery from his army deprived them of more than a member. It reached the vitals, and struck the whole body with a temporary death. As when the forked lightning, darting through the forest, amid the black tempests of night, rends some towering oak, and lays its honours in the dust, the inferior trees, which it had long sheltered from the storm, stand mournful around—so stood the astonished bands over their fallen chieftain!—nor over him alone, but over others, in their prime of glory, prostrate by his side.

Such examples of magnanimity filled even adversaries with veneration and esteem. Forgetting the foes in the heroes, they gathered up their breathless remains, and committed them to kindred dust, with pious hands, “and funeral honours meet”—so may your own remains, and particularly thine, O Carleton, be honoured, should it ever be your fate to fall in hostile fields! or if, amid the various chances of war, your lot should be among the prisoners and the wounded, may you be distinguished with an ample return of that benevolence which you have shewn to others! such offices of humanity, softening the savage scenes of war, will entitle you to an honour which all the pride of conquest cannot bestow, much less a conquest over fellow subjects, contending for the common rights of freemen.

Part of the Bishop of Clogher's remarkable Speech, made in the House of Lords, in Ireland, for omitting the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds out of the Liturgy, February 2, 1756.

AS to the Athanasian creed, as that is a superstructure built upon the foundation of the Nicene creed, it is not only liable to all the objections which can be made against that, but has also many blemishes of its own to answer for, since it has not so much as the authority of a council to support it, but is now a known forgery detected by the criticisms of the learned Vossius, and cannot be traced within two hundred years of the time of Athanasius.

“But then, it may probably be asked, how comes it to bear the name of Athanasius? The answer to which is, because it agrees perfectly with the Athanasian doctrine; and had the name of Athanasius affixed to it by the church of Rome, because he was a person much esteemed by that church, and whose principles, as well political as religious, the members of that church have long laboured to propagate among mankind. But, as the true character of this Athanasius is not commonly known, and therefore some of your lordships may be unacquainted with it, I will beg leave to inform you who and what he was.

“Athanasius was a young, forward, petulant deacon in the church of Alexandria, of an ambitious spirit, with a talent fitted for disputation. And as he could have no hopes of getting into that bishoprick, unless he could drive Arius out of Alexandria, who was the principal presbyter in that church next to the bishop; this he effected by fomenting this dispute about the Trinity between Arius and the bishop, on which account, having got Arius excommunicated, he had him then banished out of Alexandria: which, when done, no sooner was the old bishop Alexander dead, but Athanasius, though then only a young man of about twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age, by the assistance of a set of murdering Ascetics, forced himself at once into that archbishoprick, without even passing through any of the intermediate degrees. And, having gotten himself illegally consecrated, contrary to all the rules and canons of the church, he prevailed on the emperor Constantine to confirm him therein, by the power of bribes, that were given to one of the emperor's favourites; and no sooner was he thoroughly established in it, but he immediately slew in the emperor's face. And when the emperor, Constantine the great was dead, treated his son and successor, Constantius, with more contempt and insolence than could have been borne from an equal. And when he was dispossessed of his bishoprick for other irregularities, by a numerous council of bishops, regularly summoned and assembled, he forced his way into that see again, more than once or twice, over the murdered corpses of his antagonists, and waded into his cathedral through seas of blood.

“But it may, perhaps, be further asked, Why should this recommend him to the see of Rome? The reason of which is, because this was all done by the connivance, and with the concurrence of that see: Athanasius, while he treated the rest of mankind, and even his own royal master, with the utmost insolence, having paid a servile court to the papal chair, inasmuch, that in the books of the canon-law, the first precedent that is, or can be produced, in favour of the popish supremacy, is this instance of the servile submission that was paid by Athanasius to pope Julius; and therefore I should apprehend that all protestants, who have renounced the supremacy of the pope, and the independency of the church upon the state, ought to be for obliterating the name of Athanasius out of their liturgy, into which it was probably inserted, only with a view of recommending his political principles, under the shelter and influence of his religious doctrines.

"My lords, I desire you will be so good as to observe, that I have not taken upon me to say that the doctrine contained in the Athanasian creed is false; I only say, it is not plainly and clearly revealed. Nor do I presume to condemn those who think they have evidence sufficient to justify their being peremptory and positive in the support of it. I judge no man: and only say, it contains a doctrine of so nice, so disputable, and so metaphysical a nature, as is hardly fit to be treated on in the schools; but is, I am certain, by no means sufficiently revealed to be made the subject of a creed, which is commanded by public authority to be read by the minister, and repeated by the people in the public service of the church, where the low as well as the high, are ordered to assemble themselves; and which should be, according to St. Paul, not to doubtful disputations, but that they may, with one mind, glorify God even the father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"But, my lords, let us now, on the contrary, only for argument's sake, suppose that the doctrine contained in the Athanasian creed is wrong; and unless the author of it was infallible, there is a possibility that it may be so; and then let us consider what would be the consequence—I dread to name it, as it would be no less than blasphemy—for if the Father and the son, have not from all eternity been consubstantial, and coequal, the assertion of that proposition must be blasphemy.

"My lords, I will own freely to your lordships, that it is the dread and terror of a wrong determination, in a point of so delicate a nature, that makes me solicitous for having this creed removed out of our liturgy. In a matter of such great consequence, and where the honour of God the Father is so nearly concerned, I own that I am fearful how I put any other being, or person, upon a level with him."

THERE was no attempt to settle New England till the reign of king James I. who, by letters patent dated the 10th of April, 1606, erected two companies, empowering them to send colonies to Virginia, as all the north-east coast of America was then called. One of those companies was called the Plymouth company, who for some time traded only with the natives of North America, or New Virginia, for furs, and fished upon the coast. About the year 1619, some dissenters of the independent persuasion who were uneasy at being required to conform to the church of England, having purchased the Plymouth patent, and obtained another from King James to send colonies to North Virginia, now New England, embarked an hundred and fifty men on board a ship, which sailed from Plymouth the 6th of September, 1620, and arrived at Cape Cod, in New England, on the 9th of November following, where they built a town by the name of New Plymouth. The Indians were too much engaged in war among themselves to give these strangers any disturbance; and, luckily for them, Massasoit, prince of the Massachusetts nation, entered into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the English, by whose assistance he hoped to make a conquest of the Narraganset nation, with which he was then at war. He also consented to acknowledge the king of England for his sovereign, and made a cession of part of his country to the new planters: several other princes followed his example. Ships arriving every day with planters and provisions, the colony soon became well established, when differences arising upon account of religion, had like to have been of very bad consequence. The independents, who were the most numerous, not allowing a toleration to any other sect or persuasion, several of the adventurers removed to other parts of the country, and others returned home, whereby the colony was so weakened, that if the Indians had not been engaged in a civil war, the English would infallibly have been driven out of the country. In the mean time, another set of adventurers purchased, in 1627, a grant of the Plymouth company of all that part of New England which lies between the rivers Merrimac and Charles, and to strengthen their title, procured a grant of it from king Charles in 1628. This new company fitted out six ships, with three hundred planters, furnished with live cattle and all manner of stores and provisions. In 1630 they built Boston on the Massachusetts Bay. The same year king Charles granted part of the county of Connecticut to the earl of Warwick, which was afterwards purchased of that earl by William lord viscount Say and Sele, Robert lord Brook, Sir Nathaniel Rich, Charles Fiennes, John Pym, and John Hampden, Esquires, gentlemen at that time disaffected to the government, who designed that plantation as a place of refuge, in case they had not succeeded in their opposition to king Charles ; and they were once upon the point of transporting themselves thither with the chief of their party, being in doubt whether they should carry their point in the senate : even Cromwell, it is said, was once on board, in order to have transported himself to New England ; and there appears to have been a proclamation published in 1627, prohibiting people to transport themselves without licence, whereby Cromwell, Sir Arthur Haselrig, Mr. Hampden, and several more, were prevented going ; but prevailing afterwards against the crown, they sold their interest in those plantations to others. Another set of adventurers planted New Hampshire, and others Providence and Rhode Island ; the last being chiefly composed of quakers, driven out of the Massachusetts colony by the independents, who had long persecuted them, and even hanged some of them, for not conforming to their sect. Thus all the provinces of New England were planted and well peopled within the space of twenty years, reckoning from the arrival of the first colony at New Plymouth, during which time they were very little interrupted by the Indians ; but the English colony of Connecticut beginning to erect fortresses, and extend their settlements to the westward, without leave of the natives, the Indians were alarmed, apprehending they should in time be dispossessed of their country, and enslaved by these foreigners. The sachem Metacomet, therefore, to whom the English gave the name of Philip, the son of Massasoit, who first entered into alliance with the English, observing the danger his country was in, and that the English now no longer acted as allies, but tyrannized over his people, and had in a manner deprived him of his authority, dispatched messengers privately through all the tribes of the Indians, inviting them to take up arms in defence of their country, which they did, and succeeded in several engagements at first ; but their prince, Philip, being killed by a musket-shot, the English at length prevailed. Great numbers of the Indians were massacred, and others were driven out of their country, and joined the French in Canada, who promising them protection, and frequently assisting them in their inroads upon the British settlements, it is not to be wondered at, that they continued so much attached to the French, while they had any footing in North-America.

New-York and the Jerseys.

New-York is bounded on the south and south-west by Hudson's and Delaware rivers, which divide it from the East and West Jerseys, and Pennsylvania ; on the east and north-east by New-England ; and on the north-west by Canada. Its extent from north to south, that is, from Sandy-Hook, in latitude 40 deg. 30 min. to the supposed Canada line, in the parallel of 45 deg. is three hundred and thirteen English miles ; but its extent from east to west is various, being in some places eighty-eight, in others one hundred, and in others stretching as far as Lake Erie, and from thence along Lake Erie, and the communicating great run of water from Lake Erie to the Lake Ontario, Oswego, or Cataragui, and along that lake to the aforesaid Canada's supposed line. Oswego Fort, or trading place, situated upon the Lake Ontario, Cataragui, or Oswego, in lat. 43 deg. lies two hundred miles from Albany to the north-west ; and Montreal lies north-by-east of Albany above two hundred and twenty miles.

The Jerseys have Delaware river on the south and west ; the Bay on the south-east ; the Atlantic Ocean on the east ; and New-York on the north ; extending in length, along the sea-coast and Hudson's river, from south to north, one hundred and forty miles ; and about eighty where broadest. The south part of New-York and the Jerseys are low flat countries, and exceeding fertile ; but ascending twenty or thirty miles up Hudson's river to the north, the country is rocky and mountainous, and covered with wood, where it has not been cleared by the planters. The air and seasons in these colonies are much the same as in New England.

The chief rivers, besides those of Hudson and Delaware, are Mohawk river, Onandago, Raritan, and Maurice rivers. The extensive lakes of Champlain, Ontario, and Erie, lie on the frontiers of the province of New-York to the north-west. The capes are those of Cape Mary, on the east entrance of Delaware river ; Sandy Point, near the entrance of Raritan river ; and Mountang Point, at the east end of Long Island. That island, and another called Staten Island, belonging to the province of New-York. The first, which which the Dutch call Nassau, is about one hundred and twenty miles long, from east to west; but no more than ten, at a medium, in breadth. The eastern part of it was settled from New-England; but two-thirds of it is a barren and sandy soil. Staten Island is but twelve miles in length, and six in breadth, and is inhabited by Dutch and French, as well as English. Tautucket or Nantucket, Martha's Vineyard, and Elizabeth's Islands, formerly belonged to New-York; but were by the new charter of Massachusetts Bay, granted at the Revolution, annexed to that colony.

As to the produce and commodities of New-York and the Jerseys, they consist of horses, pipe staves; pork, beef, and fish, salted and barrelled up; oil of whales and sea-calves, skins, and furs, iron and copper; all sorts of grain, as wheat, rye, pease, beans, oats, barley, buck-wheat, Indian corn, Indian pease, and beans; tobacco, pot-ashes, and wax, which they export to the West-Indian islands, not excepting the French and Dutch, and to England, Old Spain, Africa, and Portugal; importing, in return, rum, sugar, molasses, negroes, salt, and wine; and from Great Britain, in particular, household goods, cloathing of all kinds, hardware, tools, and toys. They traffic also with the logwood-cutters in the Bay of Honduras, and with the Spanish settlements, exchanging the manufactures of Europe for treasure, which they send to England as merchandize. Their dried and salted fish are sent chiefly to Spain, Portugal, Italy, and other countries of Europe, whither they also send great quantities of timber. Their trade with the Indians consists but in a few articles: they receive of the natives chiefly skins and furs of their wild beasts, for which they give them cloathing, arms, ammunition, rum, and other spirits, in return. The facility of the voyage from New-York to England, and the West-Indies, has been of infinite service; for by the lowness of the freight, they purchase furs at a very cheap rate for strouds (a woollen manufacture established at Stroud in England) and other woollen goods, all which are sure of a ready vent with the Indians. Bristol is the chief place in England which the colonists of New-York trade with; and they generally perform two voyages in a year with so much safety, that the insurance upon shipping, in time of peace, is no more than two per cent. Near twenty years ago, it was computed that the imports of this colony from England, amounted annually to about an hundred and fifty thousand pounds. All kinds of black cattle are more numerous here than in any European country; and they have a breed of excellent horses. The Jerseys, both East and West, are also in a very flourishing condition. Their paper currency, which several years ago amounted to upwards of sixty thousand pounds, has more credit than that of either Pensylvania or New-York; for the Pensylvania bills are not received at New-York, nor those of New-York at Pensylvania, but the New-Jersey bills circulate through both these provinces. Before the peace of Utrecht, the inhabitants of the Jerseys were computed at sixteen thousand; but at present they amount to near seventy thousand. They are excellent corn countries; and it is said, produce more wheat than any of the other colonies, of which, and other grain, they dispose of considerable quantities to New-York and Pensylvania. By employing negroes, as their neighbours do, in cultivating the lands, they have of late more than doubled their value; and they now work a copper mine, and manufacture iron ore into pigs and bars. They likewise raise some flax and hemp.

New-York and the Jerseys, as we observed already, are royal governments. That of New-York is administered by a governor, who has his commission under the broad seal of England. The legislative power and authority is lodged in the governor and the council, who are twelve in number, appointed by the king, but are filled up by the governor, and twenty-seven representatives elected by the people. The administration of the government is in the governor and council, of whom five are a quorum; and upon the death or absence of the governor, the first in nomination of the council is to preside. The people chuse their representatives, the numbers of whom are fixed by the crown, and these representatives have much the same privileges as the members of the British parliament.

In the civil government of New Jersey we find there are three negatives. 1st, That of the governor, who is likewise vice-admiral and chancellor of the province. 2d, That of the council, which, with the governor, forms a court of error and chancery. 3d, Of the house of representatives, twenty of whom serve for counties, and the remaining maining four for the two towns of Perth-Amboy and Burlington. This house, though no court of judicature, has the privilege of enquiring into the mal-administration of the courts of justice.

New-York, including Long-Island and Staten-Island, is divided into ten counties, namely, Richmond, Suffolk, Queen's County, New-York County, Chester, King's County, Orange, Dutchess, Ulster, and Albany; which last five counties are said to be all inhabited by Dutch, or such as are of Dutch extraction.

The principal towns in these are, New-York, Kingston, and Albany, on the continent; and Jamaica, Bedford, Southampton, Richmond, and Jersey, in Long-Island, which contains the counties of Richmond, Suffolk, and Queen's County.

New-York, antiently called Amsterdam, stands in Manahattan island, which is twelve miles long, and two or three broad, lying at the mouth of Hudson's or the Iroquois River. It is not very large, but few cities in Europe can vie with it in regularity and neatness. The trade of the inhabitants is carried on by water carriage, and ships of five hundred tons may come up to the wharfs of the city, and be always afloat. Hudson's river, where it runs by New-York, is above three miles broad, and proves a noble conveyance for the goods of the counties of Albany, Ulster, Dutchess, Orange, and King's, to that city. It contains six markets, said to be better supplied with all kinds of provisions than any in Europe. The town and harbour are defended by forts and batteries. Twelve years ago the horses kept here were computed at five thousand. The principal edifices are the Town-house, the council-house, where they hold their general assemblies and courts of justice, the English church, the meeting-houses of all forts, the free-school, and public library. Here is also a printing-office. The town is governed by a mayor and aldermen, and such other officers as our corporations.

Kingston is a pretty, populous, well-built town, ninety miles up the river, where the Æsopus from New-Jersey falls into it.

Albany is one hundred and forty-three miles up the river, and but five below the place where it is parted into two branches. It consists of between three and four hundred families, who are mostly of Dutch extraction, and has a strong fort and garrison for its defence, as being situated on the frontier of the province. It is not, however, the most distant settlement, for there is a place called Schenectady, sixteen miles above, on a river that runs into Hudson's.

New-Jersey is divided into East and West Jersey. East Jersey is again divided into four counties, viz. those of Monmouth, Middlesex, Essex, and Bergen; and its principal towns are Elizabeth-town, Perth-Amboy, Shrewsbury, Newark, Middleton, and Brunswick.

Elizabeth-town lies in the county of Essex, opposite to the west side of Staten-Island. The greatest part of the trade of the province is carried on here.

Perth-Amboy lies in the county of Middlesex, near the mouth of Delaware river, as it runs into Sandy-Hook bay, which is never frozen, and capacious enough to contain five hundred sail.

Shrewsbury is a considerable town, and the most southern of the province. About thirty thousand out-plantation acres are annexed to it.

Newark stands in Essex county, and has about fifty thousand acres annexed to it; but a part of them remains still to be cultivated.

Middleton lies twenty-six miles south of Piscataqua. Between it and Shrewsbury is an iron work.

A college was established at Brunswick October 22, 1746, by governor Belcher. The trustees of this college are generally presbyterians, and it is governed by a president.

As to West Jersey, it has never yet, as far as we know, been divided into counties. Burlington, which lies in an island in the middle of the Delaware river, opposite to Philadelphia, is the capital of the province, the courts and assemblies of the province being held there. The town being commodiously situated for trade, is well built, and has a town-house, with two bridges over the river.

West Jersey has an easy communication by the river Æsopus with New-York, and with Maryland by another river, which comes within four miles of Chesapeake Bay.

The church of England is established here, and in all the royal governments in British America; but all modes of Christianity, not detrimental to society, are tolerated, the Roman Catholic excepted.

Account

Account of the Masquerade and Sailing Match.

THE masquerade ball given at Ranelagh by the clubs at the Savoir Vivre, Almac's, Boodle's, Saunderſon's, and the Thatched house (June 14), was quite out of the common road. There were preſent the duke of Cumberland and the dutcheſs; the duke and duchefs of Devonſhire; the duke and duchefs of Manchester; the duke and duchefs of Gordon; lord and lady Pembroke; lord and lady Carlifle, with the counteſs of Barrymore; lord and lady Beauchamp; lord and lady Villars; lord and lady Peterborough; lord Lyttleton; lord and lady Groſvenor; lord George Cavendiſh; lord George Gordon; lord Kelly; lord Clermont; lord Clifford; lord Cranley; lady Hertford; lady Sefton; lady Harriet Foley; lady Anna-Maria Stanhope; and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, mixed with about 1600 masks.

The ſame gentlemen managed this masquerade as were the marſhals of the regatta laſt ſummer, and as there were many objections to the entertainment of that evening, they had evidently taken infinite pains to afford perfect ſatisfaction on Friday. As ſoon as the company entered they were conducted through the garden to a covered colonnade, extending from the beginning of the canal to the extremity of it; the pillars of which were transparent, and the enclorſed ſide ornamented with looking glaſſes. This erection coſt the managers one thouſand pounds, and they were doubtleſs led to imagine it would expreſs grandeur, while it afforded accommodation for thoſe who choſe either to walk or dance. Their imagination however much deceived them; the erection, for want of an oppoſite of equal ſize, on the other ſide of the canal, was awkward and ungraceful in point of external effect; from its narrowneſs it was inconvenient, as there was little or no room for dancing, and from the dimneſs of the light ſhot through the transparent columns, it reſembled a long lane of darkneſs viſible.

After the various masks had played at Will o' the Wiſp in this comfortleſs colonnade for two hours, the doors of the rotunda were thrown upon; the company were all aſſembled in about twenty minutes, and when the tables were filled, the whole from the upper boxes exhibited one of the grandeſt ſpectacles that can poſſibly be imagined. The organ-loft reſembled a beautiful green-houſe, emitting the moſt fragrant odours from a numerous collection of myrtles, orange-trees, and other exotics. The ſides of the rotunda were handſomely illuminated, and the orchestra was filled with an excellent band of muſic, who played different tunes during ſupper; in one of the balconies alſo was placed a band of kettle-drums and trumpets, with ſome men playing upon Turkiſh cymbals, instruments reſembling a brace of braſs ſaucepan covers, and which made a moſt harſh and diſagreeable noiſe. On the ground floor ſtood a triple circular range of tables, very elegantly and plentifully covered with almoſt every eatable now in ſeaſon, and various ſorts of confectionary, all of them exceeding good, except the jellies, which taſted as if they had been made in an untinned ſtewpan. There were fruits of different kinds, and in order to have good wine, there lay upon each table ſeveral engraved cards, intimating what liquors were to be had, and that Mr. David Grant, of Hatton-ſtreet, ſerved the Madeira, Port, Liſbon, claret, Burgundy, and Champaign; and monſieur de la Tour, the old hock.

It muſt be acknowledged, even upon this occaſion, that the evening exhibited a ſcene of ſplendid dulneſs, rather than brilliant wit or genuine humour. There were very few characters, and thoſe not extraordinarily well ſupported. The moſt remarkable was, Sir Moſes Sampſon, a Jew broker, in a ribbon and ſtar, who wore a large oilſkin bag, on which his money-lending profeſſion was inſcribed in letters of gold: this mask delivered the following card:

SINCE, Sir Moſes aſſum'd the blue ribbon and garter,
He ſcorns, like a cit, to unworthily barter
His beard, or his honour, his gold, or his word, [Ketch's cord.
For Jack Wilkes's chain, or for Jack
His caſh he'll expend for the good of the nation; [ſtation;
Or to purchaſe the int'reſt of Jews in high
For, like all titled Hebrews, his utmoſt effort
Is to ſit in the houſe, and to riſe at the court

The following lines were alſo handed about by a gardener:

A Gardener I come to this gay masquerade, [minding my trade.
Nor like you waſte my time, but am
I fancy

I fancy my garden is now in my view—
 Painted ladies in plenty, and coxcombs not few ;
 Each tint with which nature bedecks my gay bed : [white and red ;
 But here art takes the lead, and bestows
 Yet, for aiming at more than is fairly her due, [but rue.
 Her admirers from me shall have nothing
 My lilies, my roses, dare hither repair,
 The rose keeps its crimson, the lily still fair ;
 But let beauty not paint, dropeach mask,
 lift each veil, [pale:
 Then blush will my lilies, my roses turn
 So take them, ye belles ! and believe, for I know, [beau.
 A gardener can please you as well as a My laurels I cropt to bring hither to you, [due ;
 For to conquest the laurel has ever been But I'm sure you'll forgive when you know where they're flown—
 To Quebec are they failed--to brave Carleton are gone.
 But return will my laurel, as fresh as it fled, [man's head ;
 For it thrives always most on an English-
 There plac'd, we all know, in each climate it grows :
 Then success to Old England, and death to its foes !

The other characters were a fat butcher, in a tallow chandler's frock ; a German officer ; a countryman, with two geese ; a Zummerzetshire tike, with his big-bellied Cecily ; this mask had at least the merit of shewing that he was not dumb, as he had something to say, either sense or nonsense, to every person present ; three witches ; an Irish frier ; a Scotch bagpiper ; a Billy Button ; a Westminster scholar : a French hair dresser ; a female Tiddy-doll ; a French flower girl ; a chimney sweeper ; a macaroni harlequin ; a Dutch boy ; a Mungo ; a quaker ; a milkmaid ; several haymakers ; and a great number of flower and fruit girls, but not one sailor.

About half after one several persons got admittance by stealth, and came in different shapes, some disguised in dirty shirts, and others totally undisguised, till they disguised themselves in liquor, a disguise which they very soon put on.

The ticket was a whole length figure of Venus rising out of the sea, ornamented with two Cupids archly looking at each other, through a couple of grotesque masks.—The drawing was by Cipriani, the engraving Bartolozzi's.

The music of the evening consisted
 July, 1776.

of the following number of musicians :

The central band of music about 150 ;
 three other military bands, viz.

One of trumpets and kettle-drums.

One of fifes, side-drums, and cymbals.

And the third of 20 hautboys ; clarinets, horns, and bassoons, were stationed in different parts of the garden, to entertain the company before the doors of the Rotunda were opened.

A band of 20 country-dance players, in masquerade, were placed in the transparent temple.

Having given you this account of the masquerade, I shall add some information concerning the sailing match on the 17th of June. At one o'clock the sailing boats started from Black-Friars bridge for the cup given by his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, value 20l. when after going through an arch of Fulham-bridge, they returned, and the King's-Fisher, (the property of Messrs. Taylor, Prince, and White) being the first thro' the center arch of Black-Friars bridge, was adjudged the winner, upon which his royal highness took the cup (filled with claret) and wished him joy. Ten boats were entered, and the first five came all in within a minute alike. The Sea-horse was the second. Commodore Smith, the proprietor of the several boats, and the other members of the Cumberland sailing club, afterwards dined together at Smith's tea gardens, where the duke's health was drank out of the prize cup by all present. Great numbers of people dined at the same place, expecting that the duke and duchess would come, as they had been poked dinner. Their royal highnesses were, however, under a necessity of dining with some foreign princes at Cumberland-house ; from whence they went to Ranelagh, and about eleven came to sup at Vauxhall, which was very crowded. They walked round the gardens, bowed to the company, and retired to their box, in the recess between that room in which the late prince of Wales used to sup and the coach door. A band of music played the whole time. At one o'clock their royal highnesses retired, leaving numbers behind them.

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

Containing the Lives of the most eminent Natives of Great-Britain and Ireland, in an Alphabetical Series. With a succinct Account of their Writings.

The Life of Pope Adrian IV.

ADRIAN IV. was the only Englishman that ever sat in St. Peter's chair. His original name was Nicholas Breakspere, or Breakspeare. He was born at Abbot's Langley, near St. Alban's. His father having left his family, and taken the habit of the monastery of St. Alban's, Nicholas was obliged to submit to the lowest offices in that house for daily support. After some time, he desired to take the habit in that monastery, but was rejected by the abbot Richard. "He was examined (says Matthew Paris) and being found insufficient, the abbot civilly enough said to him, "Wait, my son, and go to school a little longer, till you are better qualified. He was a handsome and comely youth, of a sharp wit and ready utterance, circumspect in all his words and actions, polite in his behaviour, neat and elegant, full of zeal for the glory of God, and that according to some degree of knowledge; so possessed of all the most valuable endowments of mind and body, that in him the gifts of heaven exceeded nature; his piety exceeded his education, and the ripeness of his judgment and his other qualifications exceeded his age." Having met with this repulse, he went to Paris, where, though in very poor circumstances, he applied himself to his studies with great assiduity, and made a wonderful proficiency. But having still a strong inclination to a religious life, he left Paris, and removed to Provence, where he became a regular clerk in the monastery of St. Rufus. Here he distinguished himself so much by his learning, that, upon the death of the abbot, he was chosen superior of that house. He did not long enjoy this abbacy; for pope Eugenius III. thinking he might be serviceable to the church in a higher station, created him cardinal-bishop of Alba, in 1146.

In 1148, Eugenius sent him as his legate to Denmark and Norway, where he converted those barbarous nations to the Christian faith; and erected the church of Upsal into an archiepiscopal see. At his return to Rome, he was received by the pope and cardinals with great marks of honours: and pope Anastasius IV. who succeeded Eugenius, happening to die at this time, Breakspeare was unanimously raised to the holy see in November, 1154, and he took the name of Adrian.

Adrian, in the beginning of his pontificate, boldly withstood the attempts of the Roman people to recover their ancient liberty under the consuls, and obliged those magistrates to abdicate their authority, and leave the government of the city to the pope. In 1155, he drove the heretic Arnold of Breffe, and his followers, out of Rome. The same year he excommunicated William, king of Sicily, who ravaged the territories of the church, and absolved that prince's subjects from their allegiance.

About the same time Frederic, king of the Romans, having entered Italy with a powerful army, Adrian met him near Sutrium, and concluded a peace with him. At this interview Frederic condescended to hold the pope's stirrup whilst he mounted on horseback. After which, his holiness conducted that prince to Rome, and in St. Peter's church placed the imperial crown on his head.

The next year a reconciliation was effected between the pope and the Sicilian king; that prince taking an oath to do nothing further to the prejudice of the church, and Adrian granting him the title of king of the two Sicilies.

This pope built and fortified several castles, and left the papal dominions in a more flourishing condition than he found them. He died September 1, 1159, in the fifth year of his pontificate, and was buried in St. Peter's church, near the tomb of his predecessor Eugenius. There are extant several letters, and some homilies, written by pope Adrian IV.

The Life of Arthur Agard.

Agard, (Arthur) a learned and industrious antiquarian, was born at Toston, in Derbyshire, in the year 1540. He was bred to the law, and, in 1570, was appointed deputy chamberlain of the Exchequer, which post he enjoyed forty-five years.

Mr. Agard made the Doomsday-book his peculiar study: he composed a large and learned work to explain it, under the title of Tractatus de usu et obscurioribus verbis libri de Doomsday, i. e. A Treatise of the Use and true Meaning of the obscure Words in the Doomsday-book, which was preserved in the Cotton library. All the rest of his valuable collections, containing at least twenty volumes, he bequeathed to his friend Sir Robert Cotton. He died on the 22d of August, 1615, aged seventy-five years, and was interred in Westminster-abbey.

The Life of Aidan.

Aidan, bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy-island, was originally a monk of the monastery of Hii, or Jona, one of the islands called Hebrides. Oswald, king of Northumberland, being a prince zealously attached to the Christian religion, was desirous to redeem his subjects from their paganism and idolatry; he therefore sent to Scotland (where he himself, in his exile, had imbibed the doctrines of Christianity) for some person to instruct his subjects. The Scottish clergy immediately dispatched a missionary; but this ecclesiastic being of a rigid and severe temper, was very disagreeable to the English, so that finding himself unsuccessful in his mission, he returned to Scotland, and reported in the synod, that the English were a barbarous untractable people, bigoted to paganism, and that it was impossible to render them any service. Aidan, who was present, turning to the priest, told him, he had not taken a proper method; that he had been too rigid in his behaviour to the English, and had not sufficiently conformed himself to their weakness and prejudices; that he had not followed the apostolical rule of “feeding them with the milk of the mildest doctrine,” till they might be strengthened and enabled to relish the more perfect and sublime precepts of the Gospel. This speech was highly applauded by the assembly, and it was unanimously resolved that Aidan deserved the honour of the episcopal character, and was the best qualified to convert the English; whereupon he was immediately consecrated, and sent upon that employment. On his arrival at Oswald’s court, he prevailed upon the king to remove the episcopal see from York to Lindisfarne, or Holy-island. He was very successful in his preaching, and in this was greatly assisted by the king, who, during his residence in Scotland, having acquired a sufficient knowledge in the Scotch language, he himself became Aidan’s interpreter, and explained his discourses to the nobility and the rest of his court. Several of Aidan’s countrymen came also to his assistance, and preached with great zeal over all Oswald’s dominions. By these means Christianity made a considerable progress, and churches were built in several places; lands were granted by the king for the support of monasteries, and many of the English put themselves under the discipline of those religious societies.

After the death of Oswald, who was slain in battle, Aidan continued to govern the church of Northumberland under Oswin and Oswy, who reigned jointly. He died in August, 651, and was buried in his church of Lindisfarne.

The Life of Ailmer.

Ailmer, or Æthelmer, earl of Cornwall and Devonshire, founded the abbey of Cerne in Dorsetshire, that of Eynesham in Oxfordshire, and the priory of Bruton in Somersetshire: but when Sweyn, king of Denmark, in the year 1013, over-ran the greatest part of England, he meanly left king Ethelred, submitted himself to the Danish monarch, and gave him hostages. When Canute, the son of Sweyn, invaded England, and was bravely opposed by Edmund Ironside, the son of Ethelred, this earl, with several others, joined the Danes against their natural prince, and by this means principally occasioned the ruin of the Saxons. He died, however, soon after; and his son Ethelward, earl of Cornwall, following his father’s example, Canute, who had reaped the benefit of their treasons, finding him no longer useful, caused him to be put to death.

The Life of Henry Ainsworth.

Ainsworth (Henry) an eminent English nonconformist divine, who flourished in the latter end of the sixteenth, and beginning of the seventeenth century. In the year 1590 he joined the Brownists, and by his adherence to that sect he shared in their persecutions. He was well versed in the Hebrew language, and wrote many excellent Commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, which gained him great reputation. They were printed in 1627, and reprinted in 1639. The title runs thus: “Annotations upon the five Books of Moses, the Book of Psalms, and the Song of Songs, or Canticles, wherein the Hebrew Words and Sentences are compared with, and explained by, the ancient Greek and Chaldee Versions, and other Records and Monuments of the Hebrews; but chiefly by Conference with the Holy Scriptures, Moses his Words, Laws, and Ordinances, and other legal Ceremonies heretofore commanded by God to the Church of Israel, are explained; with an Advertisement touching some Objections made againſt the Sincerity of the Hebrew Text, and Allegation of the Rabbis in theſe Annotations; as alſo Tables, directing unto ſuch principal Things as are obſerved in the Annotations upon each ſeveral Book.”

His learned productions were eſteemed even by his adverſaries, who, while they refuted his extravagant tenets, paid a proper deference to his abilities, particularly Dr. Hall, biſhop of Exeter, who wrote with great force of argument againſt the Browniſts: but nothing could have any effect upon him, or make him return home, he therefore died in exile. His death was ſudden, and not without ſuſpicion of violence; for it is reported, that having found a diamond of great value, he advertiſed it: and when the owner, who was a Jew, came to demand it, he offered him any gratuity he would deſire; but Ainfworth, though poor, requeſted only of the Jew, that he would procure him a conference with ſome of his rabbis, upon the prophecies of the Old Teſtament relating to the Meſſiah, which the Jew promiſed: but not having intereſt to obtain ſuch a conference, it was thought he contrived to get Ainfworth poiſoned. He was certainly a man of profound learning, and deeply read in the works of the rabbis. He had a ſtrong underſtanding, quick penetration, and wonderful diligence. He publiſhed occaſionally ſeveral treatiſes, many of which made a conſiderable noiſe in the world.

The Life of Henry Airay.

Airay (Henry) proviſt of Queen's-college, in Oxford, and vice-chancellor of that univerſity, flouriſhed at the end of the ſixteenth, and the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He was born in Weſtmoreland, and educated by the care, and under the patronage of Bernard Gilpin, well known by the appellation of The Northern Apoſtle. He was a conſtant and zealous preacher at Oxford, eſpecially at St. Peter's in the Eaſt. His principal work is a Courſe of Lectures on St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians. Chriſtopher Potter, his couſin-german, was the editor of his works. He died in October, 1616, aged fifty-seven years.

The Life of William Alabaſter.

Alabaſter (William) an Engliſh divine, was born at Hadley, in the county of Suffolk. He received his education in the univerſity of Cambridge; and was one of the beſt Latin poets of his age. He was alſo particularly eminent for his ſkill in the Greek and Oriental languages. He attended the earl of Eſſex as his chaplain in the expedition to Cadiz. When he was abroad, he began to entertain ſome thoughts of changing his religion. But after he had joined the Romiſh communion, he found nothing to answer his expectations. He was ſoon diſgusted, nor could he reconcile himſelf to the diſcipline of a church, which made no account of the degrees he had before taken; he therefore returned to England, and reſumed his former religion. He obtained a prebend in the cathedral of St. Paul, and was ſoon after made rector of Therfield, in Hertfordſhire. He was well ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue, and ſtrangely infatuated with the Cabala. As a poet, however, he was in much greater eſteem: he wrote a Latin tragedy, intitled Roxana, which, when acted at Trinity-college, in Cambridge, was attended with a very remarkable accident, for a lady was ſo terrified at the laſt words, ſequar! ſequar! which were pronounced in the moſt frantic and horrid tone, that, it is ſaid, ſhe loſt her ſenſes, and never recovered them again. Dr. Alabaſter died in April, 1640.

The moſt conſiderable of his works is his Lexicon Pentaglotton, in which he was employed many years. His piece intitled Motives of Conversion, was publiſhed upon his embracing the catholic religion. His Apparatus in Revelationem Jeſu Chriſti, was printed at Antwerp, in 1607.

The Life of William Alan.

Alan, Allen, or Allyn, (William) cardinal-prieſt of the Romiſh church, and a celebrated writer in its defence, was born at Roſſal, in Lancaſhire, in the year 1532. In 1547, he was entered at Oriel-college, Oxford, where he had for his tutor Philip Morgan, a very famous man, and a zealous paſtiſt, under whom he ſtudied philoſophy with ſuch ſucceſs, that he was univerſally elected fellow of his college in 1550. The ſame year he alſo took the degree of bachelor of arts. In 1556 he was choſen principal of St. Mary's-hall, and one of the proctors of the univerſity; and in 1558 was made canon of York. But on queen Elizabeth's acceſſion to the throne he loſt all hopes of preferment, and therefore retired to Louvain, in the Spaniſh Netherlands, where an English college was erected, of which he became the chief support. Here he began to write in defence of the catholic religion, and his first production was on the subject of Purgatory and Prayers for the Dead. The constant application he gave to his studies soon brought him into a bad state of health, and the physicians were of opinion that nothing would recover him but his native air. On this account only, though his going to England was attended with great danger, he embarked for that kingdom in 1565. He went first, as the doctors had advised him, into Lancashire, and there, without paying any regard to his safety, laboured to the utmost of his power to propagate the catholic religion. For this purpose he wrote and dispersed several little pieces; but so strict a search was made after him, that he was forced to retire out of that country into the neighbourhood of Oxford, where he wrote an apology for his party, under the title of Brief Reasons concerning the Catholic Faith. He was obliged to fly from hence to London, and, not long after, with some difficulty made his escape to Flanders, in 1568. He went to Mechlin, in the duchy of Brabant, where he read lectures on divinity with great applause; thence he removed to Douay, where he was made doctor of divinity: he had also the canonry of Cambray bestowed upon him, as a reward for his zeal in the service of the catholic church. Some time after, he was appointed canon of Rheims, whither he removed the seminary which had been settled at Douay; for Don Lewis de Requerens, governor of the Netherlands, had obliged the English fugitives to withdraw out of his government.
Engliſh

Dr. Alan having wrote various treatises in defence of the doctrines and practices of the Romish church, was now esteemed the champion of his party. In his own country, however, he was regarded as a most dangerous enemy of the state; all correspondence with him was deemed treason, and Thomas Alfild was executed for bringing certain books of his into England. It was thought to be owing to the instigation of Dr. Alan, and some fugitive English noblemen, that Philip II. undertook to invade and conquer England. In order to facilitate this, pope Sixtus V. was prevailed upon to renew the excommunication thundered against queen Elizabeth by Pius V. About this time too Sir William Stanley basely betrayed the town of Daventer to the Spaniards, and went, with his whole regiment of twelve hundred men, into their service. Rowland York, who had been entrusted with a strong fort in the same country, acted in the like infamous manner. Dr. Alan, however, wrote a treatise in defence of this, scandalous proceeding: it was printed in English, in the form of a letter, and afterwards in Latin, with the following title, Epistola de Daventrie proditiōe. For this, and other services, he was created cardinal on the 28th of July, 1587, by the title of St. Martin in Montibus; and soon after the king of Spain gave him an abbey of great value in the kingdom of Naples.

In April, 1588, Alan published the work which rendered him so infamous in his own country. It consisted of two parts, the first explaining the pope's bull for the excommunication and deprivation of queen Elizabeth; the second, exhorting the nobility and people of England to desert her, and take up arms in favour of the Spaniards. Many thousand copies of it were printed at Antwerp, to be put on board the Armada, that they might be dispersed all over England; but on the failing of this enterprize, all these books were destroyed. One of them, as soon as printed, having been transmitted by some of the lord treasurer's spies to the English council, queen Elizabeth sent Dr. Dale into the Low Countries, to complain thereof to the prince of Parma. After the destruction of the Armada, Philip Howard, earl of Arundel, who had been three years in prison, under a charge of high treason, was brought to his trial; and it being proved that he held a correspondence with Cardinal Alan, he was found guilty by his peers, but was afterwards pardoned.

In 1589, the king of Spain promoted Alan to the archbishopric of Mechlin. He spent the remainder of his life at Rome.

He died October 6, 1524, in the sixty-third year of his age, and was buried in the English college at Rome, where a monument is erected to his memory, with an inscription.

The Life of St. Alban.

Alban (St.) was born at Verulam, now St. Alban's, and flourished towards the end of the third century. He is famous for being the first Christian who suffered martyrdom in Britain, and is therefore usually stiled the protomartyr of this island. In his youth he took a journey journey to Rome, in company with Amphibalus, a monk of Caer-Leon, and served seven years as a soldier under the emperor Dioclesian. At his return home he settled in Verulam, and thro' the example and instructions of Amphibalus, renounced the errors of paganism, in which he had been educated, and became a convert to the Christian religion. He was beheaded during the tenth and last general persecution, A. D. 303.

Between four and five hundred years after St. Alban's death, Offa, king of the Mercians, built a very large and stately monastery to his memory; and the town of St. Alban's in Hertfordshire, takes its name from our protomartyr.

The Life of John Alcock.

Alcock (John) doctor of laws, and bishop of Ely, in the reign of king Henry VII. was born at Beverly, in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge. He was first advanced to the deanery of Westminster, and afterwards to the office of master of the rolls. In 1471 he was consecrated bishop of Rochester; in 1476 translated to the see of Worcester; and, in 1486, to that of Ely, in the room of Dr. John Morton, preferred to the see of Canterbury. This prelate was so highly esteemed by king Henry, that he appointed him lord president of Wales, and afterwards lord high chancellor of England. He founded a school at Kingston upon Hull, and a chapel on the south-side of the church, in which his parents were buried. He built the beautiful and spacious hall belonging to the episcopal palace at Ely, and made considerable improvements in all his other palaces. He also founded Jesus college in Cambridge, for a master, six fellows, and as many scholars. The house was formerly a nunnery, dedicated to St. Radigund; and, as Godwin tells us, the building being greatly decayed, and the revenues reduced almost to nothing, the nuns had all forsaken it, except two, whereupon bishop Alcock procured a grant from the crown, and converted it into a college.

Bishop Alcock was a prelate of singular learning and piety, and wrote several pieces, among which are the following: 1. Mons Perfectionis: i. e. The Mount of Perfection. 2. In Psalmos penitentiales: i. e. On the penitential Psalms. 3. Homilie vulgares: i. e. Vulgar Homilies. 4. Meditationes pie: i. e. Pious Meditations. He died October 1, 1500, and was buried in the chapel he had built at Kingston upon Hull.

The Life of Flaccus Alcuinus, or Albinus.

Alcuinus, or Albinus, (Flaccus) abbot of Canterbury, was one of the most learned men of the eighth century. He was born in Yorkshire, or, as others say, not far from the city of London. He had his education first under the venerable Bede, and was afterwards under the tuition of Egbert, archbishop of York, who appointed him keeper of the library which he founded in that city. Alcuinus flourished about the year 780, was deacon of the church of York, and at last abbot of the monastery of Canterbury. In 793 he went to France, being invited thither by Charlemagne, to confute the heresy of Felix, bishop of Urgel. He was highly esteemed by that prince, who not only honoured him with his friendship and confidence, but became his pupil, and was instructed by him in rhetoric, logic, mathematics, and divinity. The year following he attended Charlemagne to the council of Frankfort, and upon his recommendation was admitted a member of that body. This prince gave him likewise the abbies of Ferrara, St. Jodocus, and St. Lupus. In 796 he desired leave to retire from secular affairs, but his request was not complied with. In 798 he wrote against the bishop of Urgel, and confuted his errors in seven books. In 799 he was invited by Charlemagne to accompany him in his journey to Rome; but excused himself on account of old age and infirmities.

In the year 801, Charlemagne being returned from Italy, and newly declared emperor, Alcuinus attended him to congratulate him upon this occasion, and importuned him so earnestly for leave to retire from court, that he at length obtained his request, and accordingly went to the abbey of St. Martin at Tours, which the emperor had lately given him. Here he passed the remainder of his life in study and devotion, and in instructing the youth in the school which he had founded in that city, though the emperor in vain endeavoured to recall him to court by repeated letters.

He died at Tours, on Whitsunday, in the year 804, and was buried in the church of St. Martin, where a Latin epitaph, of his own composition, was inscribed upon his tomb. He was a priest of extensive learning, and the most amiable character; understood the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages extremely well; was an excellent orator, philosopher, philosopher, mathematician, and, according to William of Malmſbury, the beſt Engliſh divine after Bede and Aldelm.

He wrote a great number of books, ſeveral of which are extant. His ſtile is elegant and ſprightly, and his language very pure, conſidering the age in which he lived. His works were collected together, and publiſhed in one folio volume, by Andrew du Cheſne, at Paris, in 1617. They are divided into three parts: the firſt contains his Tracts upon Scripture; the ſecond thoſe upon Doctrines, Diſcipline, and Morality; and the third, his hiſtorical Treatiſes, Letters, and Poems.

The Life of Aldhelm, or Adelm.

Aldhelm, or Adelm, biſhop of Sherborn, in the time of the Saxon heptarchy, is generally allowed to have been the ſon of Keared, or Kenter, brother of Ina, king, of the Weſt-Saxons. He was born at Caer-Bladon, now Malmſbury, in Wiltſhire. He received part of his education abroad in France and Italy, and part at home under Maildolphus, an Iriſh Scot, who had built a ſmall monaſtery where Malmſbury now ſtands. After the death of Maildolphus, Aldhelm, by the help of Eleutherius, biſhop of Wincheſter, erected a ſtately monaſtery there, and was himſelf the firſt abbot of it. When Hedda, biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, died, the kingdom was divided into two dioceses, viz. Wincheſter and Sherborn; and king Ina promoted Aldhelm to the latter, comprehending Dorſetſhire, Wiltſhire, Devonſhire, and Cornwall. He was conſecrated at Rome by pope Sergius I. and we are told by Godwin, that he had the courage to reprove his holineſs for having a baſtard. Aldhelm, by the directions of a dioceſan ſynod, wrote a book againſt the miſtake of the Britons concerning the celebration of Eaſter, a performance which brought over many of them to the catholic uſage in that point. He likewiſe wrote a piece, partly in proſe, and partly in hexameter verſe, in praiſe of virginity, dedicated to Ethelburga, abbeſs of Barking, and publiſhed among Bede's Opuscula; beſides ſeveral other treatiſes, which are mentioned by Bale and William of Malmſbury.

William of Malmſbury informs us, that the people in Aldhelm's time were half barbarians, and little attentive to religious diſcourſes, in conſequence of which the holy man, placing himſelf upon a bridge, would frequently ſtop them, and ſing ballads of his own compoſition; by which means he gained the favour and attention of the populace, and inſenſibly mixing grave and religious things with thoſe of a jocular kind, he ſucceeded better than he could have done by aſterity alone. It is ſaid that he preferred muſic to all other earthly delights, and that he performed on all ſorts of inſtruments. Aldhelm lived in great eſteem till his death, which happened on the 25th of May, 709.

The Life of Aldred.

Aldred, archbiſhop of York in the reigns of Edward the Confeſſor, Harold, and William the Conqueror, was a monk of Wincheſter, afterwards abbot of Taſtock, and in 1046, was promoted to the ſee of Worceſter. He travelled to Jeruſalem, and after his return was ſent on an embaſſy to the emperor Henry I. In 1061, he was tranſlated to the ſee of York; after which, he built a common-hall to ſerve as a dining-room for the canons, finiſhed Beverley-hall, begun by his predeceſſor, and rebuilt the cathedral at Glouceſter, which had been deſtroyed by the Danes. Immediately after the deceaſe of his patron king Edward, he aſſiſted Harold to obtain the crown; and when William the Norman had ſucceeded in his invaſion, and Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had reſuſed to crown him, Aldred fell in with the ſtream, and performed the ceremony. His behaviour to that monarch, on the following occaſion, ſhewed him capable not only of properly vindicating his own rights, but of the higheſt degree of prieſtly arrogance.

As the archbiſhop's ſervants were one day bringing a large quantity of proviſions to his palace at York, they were ſtopped on the road by the high-ſheriff of the county, who demanded to whom they belonged; and being informed they were the archbiſhop's ſervants, who were conveying thoſe proviſions for his uſe, he, deſpiſing the prelate, ordered his officers to ſeize the carriages and proviſions, and convey them to the king's granary in York caſtle. The archbiſhop receiving intelligence of this, ſent ſeveral of his clergy and citizens to the high-ſheriff to demand reſtitution, and threaten him with excommunication upon his reſuſal: but he diſregarding his threats, the archbiſhop haſtened to London, and, attended by a train of bishops and other ecclesiastics, repaired to Westminster, where the king was then in council. The monarch no sooner cast his eyes upon the prelate, than he rose up, as usual, to salute him, which the latter put by with his crozier, and without taking any notice of the king's standing, or of his crowd of courtiers, cried, "Hear me, William: when thou wert an alien, and God had permitted thee, for our sins, and through much blood, to reign over us, I anointed thee king, and placed the crown upon thy head with a blessing; but now, because thou deservest it not, I will change that blessing into a curse against thee, as a persecutor of God and his ministers, and a breaker and contemner of those oaths and promises which thou madest to me before the altar of St. Peter." William, astonished at these menaces, threw himself at the archbishop's feet, and humbly entreated to know by what offence he had deserved so severe a sentence. The noblemen present were greatly irritated at his suffering the king to lie prostrate without raising him; but the archbishop turning to them, cried, "Let him alone, gentlemen, let him lie; he does not lie at my feet, but at St. Peter's." After some time, however, he thought fit to raise the king, and acquainted him with his errand. The Conqueror was too much terrified to deny his request; he gave him valuable presents, and dispatched an express to the high-sheriff for the restitution of his goods, which were punctually restored. Archbishop Aldred died on the tenth of September, 1069.

The Life of Edward Aleyn.

Aleyn, Allen, or Alleyn, (Edward) a celebrated English comedian in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James I. and founder of the college at Dulwich, in the county of Surry. He was born at London, on the 1st of September, 1566; a youth of an excellent capacity, a chearful temper, a tenacious memory, and a sweet diction, and in his person of a stately port and aspect. By several authorities we find, he must have been on the stage some time before the year 1592, for at this period he was in high favour with the town, and greatly applauded by the best judges, particularly by Ben Jonson.

It may appear somewhat surprising, how one of Mr. Alleyn's profession should be enabled to erect such an edifice as Dulwich college, and to endow it so liberally for the maintenance of so many persons. In answer to this, it must be observed, that he had some paternal fortune, which, though small, might lay a foundation for his future affluence; and it is to be presumed, that the profits he received from acting, to one of his provident and managing disposition, and one who, by his excellence in playing, drew after him such crowds of spectators, must have considerably improved his fortune: besides, he was master of a play-house built at his own expence, by which he is said to have amassed considerable wealth. He was also keeper of the king's wild beasts, or master of the royal bear-garden, which was frequented by vast crowds of spectators, and the profits arising from these sports are said to have amounted to five hundred pounds per annum. He was thrice married, and the portions of his two first wives (they leaving him no issue to inherit) might probably contribute to this benefaction.

Mr. Alleyn began the foundation of this college in the year 1614, under the direction of the celebrated Inigo Jones; and the buildings, gardens, &c. were finished in 1617, in which he is said to have expended about ten thousand pounds. After the college was built, he proposed to endow it with eight hundred pounds per annum, for the maintenance of one master, one warden, and four fellows, three of whom were to be clergymen, and the fourth a skilful organist; also six poor men, and as many women, besides twelve poor boys, to be educated till the age of fourteen, or sixteen, and then apprenticed to some trade or calling.

Mr. Alleyn himself was the first master of his college, so that to make use of the words of Mr. Haywood, one of his contemporaries, "He was so mingled with humility and charity, that he became his own pensioner, humbly submitting himself to that proportion of diet and cloaths which he had bestowed on others." His wife died in 1623; and about two years afterwards he married Constance Kinchtoe, who survived him, and received remarkable proofs of his affection, at least it would appear so by his will, wherein he left her considerably. He died on the 25th of November, 1626, in the sixty-first year of his age, and was buried in the chapel of his new college, where there is a tomb-stone over his grave, with an inscription.

BY the Gazette Extraordinary we have the following authentic intelligence.

My Lord, Quebec, May 14, 1776.

AFTER this town had been closely invested by the rebels for five months, and had defeated all their attempts, the Surprise frigate, Isis, and sloop Martin, came into the Basin the 6th instant.

As soon as that part of the 29th they had on board, with their marines, in all about 200, were landed, they, with the greatest part of the garrison, by this time much improved, and in high spirits, marched out of the ports of St. Louis and St. John's, to see what those mighty boasters were about; they were found very busy in their preparations for a retreat; a few shots being exchanged, the line marched forward, and the plains were soon cleared of those plunderers; all their artillery, military stores, scaling-ladders, petards, &c. were abandoned. The Surprise, Martin, and a Province armed vessel, went up the river; when they also quitted the Gaspé, and the armed schooner Mary. The rear of the rebels have halted at Dechambault, and the Surprise, with the other two vessels, are a little upon this side of the falls of Richlieu.

This ended our siege and blockade; during which the mixed garrison of soldiers, sailors, British and Canadian militia, with the artificers from Halifax and Newfoundland, shewed great zeal and patience, under very severe duty and uncommon vigilance, indispensable in a place liable to be stormed, besides great labour necessary to render such attempts less practicable.

Notwithstanding the inclement season, they preserved good health, and their spirits increased every day. A copy of my letter to General Howe will inform your Lordship of our situation to the defeat of the rebels upon the 31st of December.

For three months after they confined their operations to the preventing all supplies from coming to town, and in burning our suburbs and shipping; the latter have almost escaped, but the greatest part of the suburbs of St. Roque and St. John have been burnt; the remainder was brought into town for fuel, which was much wanted.

The beginning of February the rebels again attempted to enter into a correspondence by a flag of truce, encouraged to it, I suppose, by a permission granted for the prisoners baggage to enter the town; but as they were told immediately to withdraw, unless they came to implore the King's mercy, they have not since returned.

March the 25th, the advanced guard of a party raised by Mr. Beaujean to relieve the town, was defeated; the rest dispersed. The 31st it was discovered that the rebel prisoners had formed a plot to escape, to July, 1776.

seize the guard of St. John's gate, and let in Mr. Arnold; which was effectually disappointed.

The 4th of April, the rebels opened a battery of four guns and one howitzer from the opposite side of the river St. Lawrence; and the 22d, another of two guns and one howitzer from the opposite side of the river St. Charles: these were also intended to burn the town and shipping. From both they fired red hot balls. The 23d, they attempted throwing some shells into town from a battery on the heights opposite Port St. Louis. All these batteries were much damaged by our artillery.

May the 3d, about ten at night, a fire ship attempted to run into the Cul-de-Sac, where the greatest part of our shipping were laid up; but this also proved abortive, and she burned to the water's edge, without doing us the least injury. It is supposed they intended a general assault, had they succeeded in setting fire to the ships and Lower Town.

I cannot conclude this letter without doing justice to Lieut. Col. Maclean, who has been indefatigably zealous in the King's service, and to his regiment, wherein he has collected a number of experienced good officers, who have been very useful. Colonel Hamilton*, who commanded the battalion of seamen, his officers, and men, discharged their duty with great alacrity and spirit. The same thing must be acknowledged of the masters, inferior officers, and seamen, belonging to his Majesty's transports and merchantmen detained here last fall. Only one seaman deserted the whole time.

The militia, British and Canadian, behaved with a steadiness and resolution that could hardly have been expected from men unused to arms. Judges, and other officers of government, as well as merchants, cheerfully submitted to every inconvenience to preserve the town; the whole, indeed, upon the occasion, shewed a spirit and perseverance that do them great honour.

The 47th, from Halifax, and the greatest part of the 29th, are since arrived.

Major Caldwell, who commanded the British militia all winter, as Lieut. Colonel Commandant, and is bearer of these dispatches to your lordship, has proved himself a faithful subject of his majesty, and an active diligent officer. He, and indeed almost every loyal subject, are very considerable sufferers by the present hostile invasion.

I am, &c.

GUY CARLETON.

Letter from General Carleton to General Howe.

S I R,

Quebec, Jan. 12, 1776.

The 5th of December M. Montgomery took post at St. Coix, within less than two miles of Quebec, with some field artillery; his heavy cannon were landed at Caprouge; at the same time Arnold's party took possession of the other avenues leading to the town, and prevented all communication with the country. The 7th a woman stole into the town with letters addressed to the principal merchants, advising them to an immediate submission, and promising great indulgence in case of their compliance. Inclosed was a letter to me, in very extraordinary language, and a summons to deliver up the town; the messenger was sent to prison for a few days, and drummed out.

To give more efficacy to these letters, five small mortars were brought to St. Rock's, and a battery of five cannon and one howitzer raised upon heights within about 700 yards of the walls. Soon after Arnold appeared with a white flag, said he had a letter for me, but was refused admittance, and ordered to carry back his letter.

After every preparatory stratagem had been used to intimidate our wretched garrison, as Montgomery was pleased to call it, an assault was given the 31st of December, between four and five in the morning, during a snow-storm from the north-east. The alarm was general: from the side of the river St. Lawrence, along the fortified front, round to the bastion, every part seemed equally threatened. Two real attacks took place upon the Lower Town: one under Cape Diamond, led by Mr. Montgomery; the other by Mr. Arnold, upon the part called the Saut au Malotôt.

This at first met with some success, but in the end was stopped. A sally from the Upper Town, under Capt. Laws, attacked their rear, and sent in many prisoners; Captain McDougal afterwards reinforced this party, and followed the rebels into the post they had taken. Thus Mr. Arnold's corps, himself, and a few others excepted, who were wounded and carried off early, were completely ruined. They were caught as in a trap; we brought in their five mortars and one cannon. The other attack was soon repulsed with slaughter. Mr. Montgomery was left among the dead.

The rebels had on this assault between six and seven hundred men, and between forty and fifty officers, killed, wounded, and taken prisoners.

We had only one Lieutenant of the navy, doing duty as a Captain in the garrison, and four rank and file killed, and thirteen rank and file wounded. Two of the latter are since dead.

You will be pleased to transmit a copy of my letter to the Secretary of State, by the first opportunity, for his Majesty's information, &c.

G. C.

Since raising the siege of Quebec it appears, that the King's troops have not been inactive. By a letter from Gen. Carleton to Lord George Germaine, dated on board the Maria, opposite St. Anne's, May 25, the General acquaints his Lordship, that he has just received an account from Capt. Forster, that he, with a detachment of the 8th regiment, some Canadians, and a number of Indians, had taken a fort at the Cedars, two pieces of cannon, and 390 rebels prisoners at discretion. And that Messrs Lorimer and Montigny had attacked and defeated likewise a party of 120 rebels in passing from the island of Montreal to Kinchin. He adds, that the rebels are still numerous in the province, and talk of large reinforcements.

Lieut. Fooks, who failed from Quebec on the 26th of May, gives an account that before his departure some Indians had arrived from the Cedars, about eight leagues from Montreal, who informed them that the Indians of the western confederacy were in motion to join the King's troops, and that a very large body of them were within three days march of the Cedars. He adds that the same night he left Quebec he met the transports with the British regiments from Ireland, and had no doubt of their arriving at Quebec the next morning; and that on his arrival at the isle of Coudre the 28th, he found the transports with the Brunswick troops at anchor, waiting the return of the tide, in order to proceed to Quebec, the wind being then unfavourable. He supposes that General Burgoyne landed at Quebec in the evening of the 26th of May.

Commodore Hotham, with the first division of Hessian troops, was well on the 5th inst. in lat. 44, 57. N. and long. 30: 12° W. from the Lizard, with all his convoy, except the Malaga Brig which had parted company in a gale of wind the 26th of May.

From these authentic advices, the public has reason to expect news of the greatest importance in a few weeks. General Carleton in proceeding up the river St. Lawrence has, no doubt, the retaking of Montreal for his object, which probably will be abandoned before his approach. The rapid progress the Provincials made in taking St. John's, Chamblee, and Montreal, will yield them but small grounds of triumph, as they must now be all as rapidly deserted. Crown-point and Ticonderoga they will certainly endeavour to maintain.

To the southward no action of moment is to be expected to take place till the Commissioners for conciliation have opened their Commission. Every friend to his country will join with us in wishing that the terms may be such as not only to put a period to the present troubles, but to remove all jealousy, and to restore mutual confidence and mutual harmony for the future.

In the mean time captures increase in almost every quarter. More than 70 American ships have been made prizes of in the West-Indies, and a much larger number on the coast of America.

To balance these losses, they boast of the capture of the Isle of Providence, and a battle gained over a body of insurgents on the back settlements of North Carolina. But neither of these are of much consequence; the powder and warlike stores were removed from the former, and by the latter they only reduced a body a body of their own people, supported by no one company of regular troops.

The account they give of the engagement is, that the Tory army, as they are pleased to call the loyalists, with Capt. McCleod at their head, made their attack on Col. Catwell and Col. Lillington, at Moore's Creek-bridge, and finding a small entrenchment on our side of the water empty, concluded that our people had abandoned their posts, and in the most furious manner advanced within thirty paces of our breast work, where Capt. McCleod and Capt. Campbell fell in leading on the attack; the former of whom received near twenty balls through his body, and in a very few minutes the whole army was put to flight, and most shamefully abandoned their General, who was the next day taken prisoner. In this furious onset about 30 of the Tory army were killed and wounded, and only two wounded on the part of the conquerors, one of whom is since dead.

The Tory army, as it is called, appears to have been a company of Highlanders, hastily drawn together by two Scotch officers, Mess. McDonald and McCleod, who having passed through Newburne the latter end of last year, were suspected of some sinister designs, and questioned by the Provincials concerning their business, who pretended they were officers wounded at Bunker's-Hill, and had left the army with a design to settle among their friends. But being privately supplied with a quantity of arms and ammunition, they were readily joined by their countrymen who imagined they could easily reduce the whole province to the King's obedience; but one of these officers being killed, and the other taken prisoner, finding themselves without a leader, they as suddenly quitted the field as they had hastily been led into it. The conquerors boast to have taken on this occasion, 350 guns and shot bags, 150 swords and dirks, 1500 rifles, and two medicine chests, fresh from England, a box of half Johanneses and guineas, valued at about 15,000*l.* and thirteen waggons with complete sets of horses. Add to these 800 prisoners, whom they disarmed and discharged, having first secured their officers and confined them in Halifax gaol.

Head-Quarters, New-York, April 8. The General informs the inhabitants, that it is become absolutely necessary that all communication between the ministerial fleet and shore should immediately be stopped—for that purpose has given positive orders the ships should no longer be furnished with provisions. Any inhabitant, or others, who shall be taken, that have been on board (after the publishing of this order) or near any of the ships, or going on board, will be considered as enemies, and treated accordingly.

All boats are to sail from Beckman's Slip; Capt. James Alner is appointed Inspector, and will give permits for oystermen: It is expected and ordered, that none attempt going without a pass.

THEIR zealous and firm adherence to their principles, crown them with honour; that they have not been successful; that they were borne down by the superior force of their opponents, that they are left to share in the common distress and common punishments of their unfortunate countrymen, beams no lustre, however; on the characters of those by whom they were neglected, betrayed, and sacrificed.

By this impolicy (to call it by no harsher name) the command and management of the key and main spring of America, has been lost to this country; a speedy and effectual security of which, might have saved us from the present gloomy prospect of intestine carnage and accumulating misery. Surely, the representative body of the nation are bound in duty to their constituents, to examine the reasons of such neglect and misconduct; and they in particular, who are the asserters of Parliamentary supremacy, are concerned to enquire why so effectual a method of weakening the opposition in America, and supporting their own adherents, has been totally omitted.

But there is no necessity of dwelling on this circumstance, to prove the obligations this country is under to ministers; disappointment and dilgrace have marked all their measures, and, as if miracles had been wrought to strike conviction on this House, they have not once even blundered into success. It may therefore, reasonably be hoped, that before we blindly follow any further, we may not only contemplate our present situation, and the ground we have already passed, but pay particular attention to that which lies before us.

Admitting (for the present) however, Sir, that a force sufficient to subdue them can be sent out; admitting that this country will patiently bear the enormous weight of accumulated taxes, which so distant and unequal a war will require; admitting that foreign powers (the natural enemies of Britain) will with composure and self-denial neglect so favourable an opportunity of distressing their rivals; admitting that your fleets, unopposed, level with the ground those cities which rose by your protection, were the pillars of your commerce, and your nation's boast; admitting that foreign mercenaries spread desolation, that thousands fall before them, and that, humbled under the combined woes of poverty, anarchy, want and defeat, the exhausted colonies fall suppliant at the feet of our conquerors; admitting all this will be the case, (which cannot well be expected from the past) here necessarily follows a most momentous question: what are the solid advantages which Great-Britain is to receive in exchange for the blessings of peace and a lucrative commerce? for the affections, for the prosperity, for the lives of so many of its useful subjects sacrificed?

Will the bare acknowledgment of a right in Parliament to tax them, compensate for the millions expended, the dangers incurred, the miseries entailed, the destruction of human happiness and life that must ensue from a war with our colonies, united as they are in one common cause, and fired to desperate enthusiasm by apprehensions of impending slavery? Or can we be so absurd as to imagine concessions extorted in a time of danger and urgent misery, will form a band of lasting union? Impoverished and undone by their exertions and the calamities of war, instead of being able to repay the expences of this country, or supply a revenue, they will stand in need of your earliest assistance to revive depressed and almost extinguished commerce, as well as to renew and uphold their necessary civil establishments.

I am well aware, that it is said we must maintain the dignity of Parliament. Let me ask, what dignity is that which will not descend to make millions happy, which will sacrifice the treasures and best blood of the nation to extort submissions, fruitless submissions, that will be disavowed and disregarded the moment the procuring oppressive force is removed? What dignity is that which, to enforce a disputed mode of obtaining a revenue, will destroy commerce, spread poverty and desolation, and dry up every channel, every source from which revenue or any real substantial benefit can be expected?

Is it not high time then, to examine the full extent of our danger, to pause and mark the paths which have deceived us, and the wretched, bewildered guides, who have led us into our present difficulties? Let us find the destroying angel and stop his course, while we have yet any thing valuable to preserve. The breach is not yet irreparable; and permit me, with all deference to say, I have not a doubt but that at liberal and explicit terms of reconciliation, with a full and firm security against an oppressive exercise of Parliamentary taxation, if held out to the colonies before the war takes a wider and more destructive course, will lead instantly to a settlement, and recall the former years of peace, when the affections and interests of Great-Britain and America were one.

But, if, on the contrary, we are to plunge deeper in this scene of blood; if we are to sacrifice the means and materials of revenue for idle distinctions about modes of raising it; if the laurels we can gain, and the dignity of Parliament we are to establish, can be purchased only by the miseries of fellow-subjects, whose losses are our own; if the event is precarious, the cause alien to the spirit and humanity of Englishmen; if the injury is certain, and the object of success unsubstantial and insecure, how little soever the influence my poor opinion may have on this House, I shall free my conscience, by having explicitly condemned all such unprofitable, inadequate, injudicious measures, and by giving my hearty concurrence to the motion.

Mr. Burke shewed from the records of Parliament, and from history, that nothing was more frequent than enquiries of the kind now proposed; and observed, at no time within the course of his reading, did he ever recollect a period at which such a proceeding was more absolutely necessary than the present.

Mr. Graves wished to wait for the event of another campaign before the House should offer to go into an enquiry; and as for what had already passed, justice required that the parties should be in a situation to answer for themselves.

Mr. Solicitor General undertook to defend administration throughout, not only relating to what they had already done, but every action of theirs, and every consequence arising from their conduct. He insisted that the war was just, proper, and expedient, that the ministers abounded in wisdom, and the army and navy in military prowess.

Colonel Barre was extremely severe on several of the positions laid down by the last honourable gentleman; he compared him to the Abbe Polignac, whom he described as a pert, affected, little political prater; with some personal allusions to the talents, manner, and dispositions of the man, which created some mirth. But in a serious manner he seemed to charge the gentlemen opposite to him [Messrs. Elliot, Ellis, Wedderburne, &c.] with the loss of America. With an emphasis he said, Give us back our colonies! You have lost America! It's your ignorance, blunders, cowardice, which have lost America. He had heard the noble Lord [Lord George Germaine] called the Pitt of the day. He saw no great sense in the words. They conveyed to him that there had been a Mr. Pitt, a great man, but he did not see how the noble Lord was like him. He said, that the troops, from an aversion to the service, misbehaved on Bunker's-Hill on the 17th of June. He condemned administration in the strongest terms. He told them, that their shiftings and evasions would not protect them, though they should be changed every day, and made to shift places at the pleasure, and sometimes too for the sport of their secret directors. He observed, that the late appointment of a new secretary of state, was a proof that some weak, and perhaps foul proceedings had happened, which made such an arrangement necessary; but though changes might happen every day, he was well convinced measures never would, till the whole fabric of despotism fell at once, and buried in its ruins the architects, with all those employed under them. He reminded the House how often, in the course of the two last years, he had foretold almost every matter that has happened. He begged once more to assure them, that America would never submit to be taxed, though half Germany were to be transported beyond the Atlantic, to effect it.

General

General Burgoyne rose with warmth, and contradicted the last honourable member in the flattest manner. He allowed that the troops gave way a little at one time, because they were flanked by the fire out of the houses, &c. at Charles-Town; but they soon rallied and advanced; and no men on earth ever behaved with more spirit, firmness, and perseverance, till they forced the enemy out of their entrenchments.

Colonel Barre observed that the honourable gentleman had contradicted him in a very extraordinary and unbecoming manner, and maintained his first assertion, that the troops misbehaved.

General Burgoyne apologized, confessed he had spoke in harsher terms than he would have done had he not been off his guard. He admitted that the troops gave way a little; but that they were rallied, and returned to the charge with great spirit. He was an eye-witness of the whole affair.

Lord Howe said it was impossible to go into the proposed enquiry with propriety, though the House were ever so well inclined. He defended the conduct of the commanding officers, and said that the whole of what had happened last year, proceeded from our not being acquainted with the designs of the provincials.

Lord North rose at half after one, declared he had no objection to an enquiry at a proper season; but agreed with his right honourable friend [Sir Gilbert Elliot] that this was not the time. As America had changed, so had Britain, in consequence of that change. The question was now, he contended, totally altered, and what in one situation would have been acting a wise part, would now be supineness, negligence, or something worse. It was therefore a very unfair way of arguing, in his opinion, to state objections against the conduct of administration in the early stages of this business, which were only applicable to a state of hostility and open rebellion; the ground was changed, so would the measures of course. He appealed to the candour and recollection of the House, if any thing had been done in a corner, but openly, and according to their repeated judgment. As to the measures which had been taken before he came into office, he said, he was not answerable for them, but was ready now, if the House thought proper, or at any time, to stand the most rigid enquiry and examination into his own conduct. If miscarriages had happened, it was no more than what was common. It was impossible to foresee all the consequences, or to provide against every accident which might arise. He protested he did not seek for his office, and was at any time ready and willing to resign it, whenever a person more capable or fonder of power, was found to succeed him. He observed that an honourable gentleman, early in the debate, had charged administration with wickedness, ignorance, and neglect. He was certain he was mistaken in the first, and the two others yet remained to be proved.

Mr. Fox replied to the arguments urged against his motion.

At half an hour past two o'clock, the previous question was put, and the House divided, ayes, 104: noes, 240.

Wednesday, Feb. 28.] Sir George Saville presented petitions from Thomas Rumbold and Francis Sykes, Esqrs. praying to rescind the resolution on the Shaftesbury election. After debate the petitions were received, but the House divided on the motion to rescind; for it 143; against it 169.

It was then moved to appoint a committee to take the matter into consideration. The House divided again; for the motion 137; against it 142.

Thursday, Feb. 29.] Lord North moved, that the treaties entered into between his Majesty, the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, the Duke of Brunswick, and the Hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel, be referred to the committee of supply. He urged the necessity of the measure, and the great effects he expected from it. He said, no question could arise from it but three, all which were too plain to require much elucidation. Whether the troops proposed to be hired were wanted? Whether the terms on which they were procured, were advantageous? and Whether the force was such as might be deemed fully adequate to effect the operations for which it was intended? As to the first point, he said, that reducing America to a proper constitutional state of obedience, being the great object of Parliament, the best and most speedy means of effecting so desirable a purpose, was the motive which induced administration to adopt the measure, because men could be readier had, and upon much cheaper terms in this way than we could possibly recruit them at home. On the second, he observed, that not only in the view of comparative cheapness with home levies, but as referring to former times, the present troops would cost us less than (taking all the circumstances together) we could have expected. And lastly, that the force which this measure would enable us to send to America, would be such, as in all human probability, must compel that country to agree to terms of submission, perhaps without any further effusion of blood.

Lord John Cavendish reprobated the measure in all its parts. He observed, that the present was the first alarming consequence of the American war. Britain was to be disgraced in the eyes of all Europe; she was to be impoverished; nay, what was, if possible, worse, she was compelled to apply to two petty German States in the most mortifying and humiliating manner, and submit to indignities never before prescribed to a crowned head, presiding over a powerful and opulent kingdom. First, the troops were to enter into pay before they began to march—a thing never known before.—Secondly, levy-money was to be paid at the rate of near 7l. 10s. a man. Thirdly, not satisfied with this, those petty Princes were to be subsidized. Fourthly, they have had the modesty to insist on a double subsidy. Fifthly, the subsidy is to be continued for two years in one instance, and one year in the other, after the troops have returned to their respective countries. And lastly, a body of 12000 foreigners are to be introduced into the dominions of the British crown, under no controul of either King or Parliament, for the express words of the treaty are "that this body of troops (Hessians) shall remain under the command of their General, to whom his most Serene Highness has entrusted the command."

Mr. Cornwall assured the House, that he had a better opportunity of knowing the means of treating with German Princes, and procuring troops than any man in it. That his situation for many years (as clerk in the German pay-office last war) gave him this opportunity; and that he was astonished to hear any gentleman, conversant with German connections, call the present terms disadvantageous. He contended, that the two months previous pay allowed to the Duke of Brunswick, was no more than a douceur; and insisted they were all had on lower terms than was ever known before, especially if the business should be effected within the year, of which he had no reason to doubt.

Lord Ingham. I am to ask your pardon for appearing so solicitous to give you my sentiments, just at this period of time, but it is to answer the honourable gentleman of the treasury bench, who is, I know, a perfect master of the German affairs, and to submit to him, in this stage of the business, my doubts as to the competency of the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Duke of Brunswick, to make such treaties as are now under our consideration.

That gentleman knows, that before the peace of Westphalia, the feudatories of the empire had no confirmed legal right to engage, without leave of the Emperor, in offensive and defensive alliances with foreign Princes, which might require sending troops out of the empire. But the weakness of the House of Austria, and the dread of the Swedish arms, obtained after a long discussion, that extraordinary privilege, on the pretence of the interest of religion, and the inability of the head of the empire, from being often engaged in war with the Turks, to defend the frontiers, which made such a concession beneficial to the empire; always presuming, that the troops of those Princes so contracting, should, in case of the empire being attacked, return to its defence, as the allegiance of those Princes to the Emperor and empire of Germany, by the nature of their feudal tenure, especially required. Now, Sir, if this is the true state of the privileges those Princes now enjoy, can it be fairly inferred from thence, that they can merely, for lucre and pecuniary considerations, transport their vassals to the East or West Indies, nine parts in ten of whom will hardly ever return; and thus by depopulating their territories, deprive their

Lord Paramount of the succour which he has a right to expect from them, and of the advantage which an inhabited and settled territory affords, in comparison of one strip of all the men able to bear arms; to support a cause in no shape whatever connected with the Empire, and which must render it vile and dishonourable in the eyes of all Europe, as a nursery of men reserved for the purposes of supporting arbitrary power, whenever grasped at by those who have more money, though not more justice and virtue, than the others whom they can pay for oppressing.—I shall say little to the feelings of those Princes who can sell their subjects for such purposes. We have read of the humdrum Sancho's wish; that if he were a Prince, all his subjects should be Black-a-moors, as he could by the sale of them easily turn them into ready money; but that wish however it might appear ridiculous, and unbecoming a sovereign, is much more innocent than a Prince availing himself of his vassals for the purpose of sacrificing them in such destructive wars; where he has the additional crime of making them destroy much better and nobler beings than themselves.

As to the defensive part of the treaty, which is looked upon as of no consequence, on supposition that we shall never be called upon to fulfil it; I beg leave to insist on the contrary to the position: for the Emperor may not only shew his resentment of this proceeding of his vassals, by a military execution in their territories, but may thereby give them a right to call upon us for that indemnification in money, which is the only means in our power for making them amends, and to which we are by these treaties bound. Besides, the King of Prussia, who is at their door, will infallibly seize this opportunity of making us pay the six hundred thousand pounds, which he pretends we wronged him of at the close of the last war. It will therefore be very proper for administration, and much more for the House, to consider that it would be a great addition to the expence, which, from the complexion of the House I am afraid we are going to incur, by approving of those treaties now under consideration, which treaties I look upon as highly inexpedient, and dishonourable to the nation; and to which therefore, as a member of this House, I shall give every opposition in my power.

Mr. Seymour compared the present treaties with the former treaties with German and other Princes, whom we had formerly subsidized, desired the honourable gentleman [Mr. Cornwall] to produce a single instance, in which the same number of men, within the same time, had cost the nation so much money.

Mr. D. Hartley. In the course of our debates upon American measures, I frequently hear the terms of rebellion and rebels made use of, which I shall never adopt; not only because I would avoid every term of acrimony which might increase the ill blood between us and our fellow subjects in America, but likewise thinking as I do, that the ministry of this country country have been in every stage the aggressors; I never will, as a Whig of revolution principles, confound terms so fundamentally the reverse to each other, as defensive resistance in the support of constitutional rights, with unprovoked and active treason. The colonies have been condemned unheard. If you would have condescended but to have heard their petition, you would have found that all they requested has been to be restored to the happy state of harmony, tranquility, and constitutional dependance existing in 1763. Those ministers who have so madly driven them on to unavoidable resistance, must be answerable to their country for all future consequences. I wish to enter my protest once for all, that I shall always think that our American fellow subjects have been driven to resistance in their own defence, and in support of those very claims which we ourselves have successfully taken up arms in former times, to rescue us from the violence and tyrannical pretensions of the House of Stuart. These rights are the giving and granting freely our own property, and the security of charters. Let us do to them as we have done for ourselves, and it is all that they ask. I am convinced that the nation will some day or other see the justice of their cause, when the anger of the present unfortunate disputes is a little abated, and when many misrepresentations, which are studiously circulated by ministry, are cleared away. Therefore, Sir, for the present I will suspend this part of the argument, and confine my objections to this measure of the foreign troops; to the impolicy and impracticability of the measure; being always understood that I have entered my protest against their injustice. Sir, the public have been artfully and imperceptibly led into these measures. We were told, at first, that the discontents were only adopted by a few factious persons in America, that the body of the people were totally averse to these measures of resistance, and, that a very little exertion from this country, and a very inconsiderable expence, would restore the public tranquility. Many of us on this side the House, have, from time to time, endeavoured to uncover these fallacies, having too truly foreseen and foretold the endless ill consequences of the ministerial plans in America. I myself told you, Sir, in this very place, not many months ago, from very certain information, that America would not only not recede upon the articles of arbitrary taxation and surrender of charters, but that they would turn out, before last Midsummer, a body of 50,000 men in arms. This prediction was at that time treated by the House with laughter, yet it has proved too true. What confidence can we have for the future, in ministers who are so grossly ignorant and deceived, or, who conceal the true state of things from this House and the public, perhaps with no better view than to trapan them insidiously, and by gradual steps, into the support of their own desperate and sanguinary designs? The public revenue being a subject, upon which I have at times bestowed some pains, and upon which I sometimes troubled you, I am sure that this House will do me the justice to recollect, that I have incessantly remonstrated to them of the enormity of the expence which those measures would entail upon the public, even to the hazard of public bankruptcy, if foreign war should overtake us upon the heels of this civil contest. The ministry, in whom a majority of this House seem to put unbounded confidence, have, for a time, smothered these mischiefs; they have kept all matters of expence out of sight, and have endeavoured to lull the public to inattention, by conveying to them that very little matters would do. No such words as taxing and funding have even been whispered; but taxing and funding must come, and that soon too. You cannot do this very year without. I have again and again stated to this House, and to the noble Lord, that the debts and expences incurred, and such as will be incurred in this very year's campaign, cannot come to a less sum than ten millions. The army extraordinaries, and navy debt incurred in the last year, must be enormous; those which will farther be incurred in the present year, must be immense and boundless; I might almost say incomputable. Let the noble Lord deal ingenuously with the public, and, by the assistance of all his lights, let him inform the House what expences he is providing for them. Does he intend to lay any new tax this year? Does he pay off any of the navy debt? Does he intend to propose the payment of the civil list with an augmentation to the establishment of it? What will the noble Lord state as the probable expence of the intended campaign? Let the country gentlemen know what endless expences they are to encounter, and to mortgage their estates for. There are some gentlemen who have professed, that they enter into war to obtain a revenue from America, but still not at all price. Gold may be bought too dear, if they are to pay a hundred years purchase for the possibility of a revenue from America. Who would give that price even for a certainty? But it is contended that all this armament is only a mode of making peace with dignity; that the Americans will be awed into submission, and that Commissioners are to grant pardons and to make peace. This is the insidious pretext of the present year; for what powers are given to the Commissioners? None but to grant pardons, if the Americans will lay down their arms upon unconditional submission. This is an insult both upon them and upon us. Did they take up arms to obtain pardon, or to obtain redress of grievances? You have condemned them unheard, you have subverted all their civil rights, you pensioned their judges, you garbled their injuries, you control the free debates of their assemblies, you confiscate their charters, you take their property by violence from them; and, when they petition or complain, you tell them that these are pretended grievances; yet these are the grievances which they seek redress of under arms.—Give them redress, and they will lay lay down their arms, and gladly receive pardon and general oblivion. If Parliament had enabled the Commissioners to offer redress of grievances, I should not have called the appointment of them a mere pretext; but you have expressly tied their hands. Neither can the Americans put any trust in any supposed intentions of the Ministry for peace. General Burgoyne says, in his letter to General Lee, that after what passed, the Americans may rest in full confidence that this country would never think of taxing them again; and indeed that inference would seem reasonable, if we did not hear the contrary asserted and supported almost in every day's debate in this House, and particularly by the noble Lord who has lately been advanced to the head of the American department. The noble Lord at the head of the treasury seldom holds the same language and opinion long together. Sometimes he is ready to dispense with taxation, and wishes to God, that all things were restored to the state of 1763. If he has personally any dispositions to moderation and lenient measures more than his colleagues, he is at least overruled. But the noble Lord of the American department, has uniformly and invariably declared upon principle, that a total and unconditional submission, an entire surrender of their property and charters, are with him, the indispensable preliminaries of any treaty of peace. I have myself, troubled the House this very session with some propositions of pacification, offering security to the colonies upon the articles of taxation and charters, which have been refused upon principles, expressly argued in the debate on the part of the ministry, that they would not, in the least degree, recede from their terms of unconditional submission to be enforced by the sword. Then away these pretexts! it is clear enough that they mean nothing but destruction and bloodshed, and to act over again the mockery of what was last year called the conciliatory proposition. You sent orders to dip the sword in American blood before that proposition, insidious as it was, could be offered to any assembly upon the continent. This year again your pretext is a pretended commission to offer peace, at the same time tying up the hands of the Commissioners from making any offer but of unconditional submission, with an army of foreign mercenaries sent close upon their heels, to lay waste the whole country with fire and sword. Sir, my opposition to this unjust American war, is so total and absolute against every part of it, that I hardly know in what terms to express my aversion to any one part more than to every other; yet I think, Sir, if there could remain any measure exceeding every preceding one in disgrace and barbarity, it is this of introducing foreign troops. The first shedding of civil blood was wantonly precipitated by ministerial orders last year, even before the pretended plan of conciliation could be proposed to any assembly on the continent; therefore the first blood lies at your door. Notwithstanding this provocation of bloodshed, the Americans tell you in their declaration, as a proof of the sincerity of their desire for peace, that they have not called in the rivals of your grandeur, justly claiming the merit of forbearance under such provocation and distress. Mark the reward which we give them for their forbearance: their petition is rejected unheard, and the minister tells the Parliament, in the King's speech, that it is with satisfaction that his Majesty has received friendly offers of foreign assistance; to which this House has given for answer, that they would cheerfully enable his Majesty to avail himself of the offer. An American Congress have held such a measure in abhorrence; a British Parliament have adopted it with cheerfulness. You have now set them the example, and perhaps by the very act, made it unavoidably necessary for them to adopt the same fatal measure in their own defence. I call it a fatal measure; because when foreign powers are once introduced in this dispute, all possibility of reconciliation and return to our former connection is totally cut off. You have given a justification to the Americans by your example, if they call in the assistance of foreign powers. Let the minister who has advised this measure to his Majesty, consider well of the consequences. His head as well as his hand, is answerable for the treaties. I mean not merely for the effect of those foreign troops in the American dispute, but from all other consequences, upon the general security of our situation with respect to all foreign powers. We know well, with how jealous an eye this country is watched; and more particularly envied, on account of the universal and uncontrolled empire of the British flag. One such treaty should not stand alone. If any foreign power should attack us, we shall expect of the minister, who has advised these treaties for foreign forces, to be prepared with such a system of treaties and alliances as shall secure this country from the natural consequences to be expected from such interference of foreigners. When you have set the example, you not only justify America in applying for foreign aid, but every power whatever will think themselves at liberty to take such part as may best suit their own convenience. Upon the whole of this measure, I think it the most disgraceful, the most unjust and unnatural, and big with the most fatal consequences, of any measure that has been, or could possibly be adopted. therefore I shall give my most hearty negative to it.

Hon. Frederick Stuart, (third son of the Earl of Bute) was for sanguinary measures. He rested the strength of the nation chiefly on paper-credit, with which he united the navy and commerce. Paper-credit, he said, effected wonders; it was not only a substitute for money, but it was better. While our credit remained inviolate, we should never want either soldiers or sailors. He insisted America had no prospect of deriving support from any foreign power, because she was not able to pay them; neither France nor Spain would assist them, unless well paid. America had nothing but paper-money and that would never pass current; nothing but good sterling money would answer their purpose, and that the would not be able to procure, so long as her trade and commerce were prevented or destroyed by our navy.

List of new Books, with Remarks, (as published in London and Dublin.)

ARTICLE I.

Obedience the best Charter, or Law the only Sanction of Liberty, in a Letter to Dr. Price. 1s. 6d. Richardson.

THIS author adopts the exploded notions of despotism and passive obedience—retails the common topics on the dispute with America—and deals plentifully in vague surmises, uncharitable censures, and opprobrious names.

II. Familiar Dialogues between Americus and Britannicus; in which the exploded Doctrines of Infallibility, Passive Obedience, and Non-Resistance, with the leading Sentiments of Dr. Price on Civil Liberty, are particularly considered. By John Martin. 1s. Wilkie.

This writer hath mistaken his talents. But as it was popular to write against Dr. Price, he must be in the fashion.

III. Massachusettsensis; or a Series of Letters, containing a faithful State of many important and striking Facts, which laid the Foundation of the present Troubles in the Provinces of the Massachusetts Bay. By a Person of Honour upon the Spot. 2s. Bew.

In the preceding article, we had a Martin attempting to peck at an Eagle—here we have “a person of honour” condescending to teach taylor, chimney-sweepers, and handicrafts of all kinds, the cause of the dispute with America. The honourable person is said to have belonged to the Admiralty court at Bolton, and whose chief support arose from condemning the American ships as prizes. Some allowances must therefore be made, and this faithful State is evidently much tinged with disappointment, prejudice, and resentment.

IV. A Matter of Moment. Dedicated to the Lord High Chancellor of Great-Britain. 6d. Corral.

This matter is worthy the Chancellor's attention—pointing out several necessary alterations in the Chancery proceedings.

V. Six English Country Dances for the present Year, the Music with a Thorough-Bass for the Harpsicord, the Figures entirely new, explained and demonstrated by Cards. With an additional instructive Plate, shewing the five Positions, the Figure of a Minuet, the Right and Left, &c. By Matthew Welch. 5s. Welch.

The chief design of this publication is to lessen the intricacy of this kind of dancing, and to render it so very plain at the first view as to be understood by the meanest capacity, in which he hath happily succeeded. There are also some good observations on the punctilios which ought to be observed in all genteel company.

VI. A Scriptural Poem on the Blessed Trinity, of infinite Importance to the Christian World: And a Prelude to the Conversion of the Jews; intitled, Priesthood Detected. By Nathaniel Walker. 4d. Bladon.

Very few persons will embrace the author's opinion of the excellence and importance of his Poem.

VII. An Enquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, by Adam Smith, LL. D. &c. 3 vols. 19s. 6d. Walker.

This work is replete with political and commercial knowledge. In a few particulars, we think the author's reasonings are rather superficial, and some may be pronounced sophistical; but as a performance it displays great abilities, and promises to be useful to merchants and statesmen. The author censures the bounty on the exportation of corn, as highly impolitic, and injurious to the nation: his arguments on this subject we shall lay before our readers.

“It enables foreigners, the Dutch in particular, not only to eat our corn cheaper than they otherwise could do, but sometimes to eat it cheaper than even our own people can do upon the same occasions; as we are assured by an excellent authority, that of Sir Matthew Decker. It hinders our own workmen from furnishing their goods for so small a quantity of silver as they otherwise might do; and enables the Dutch to furnish their's for a smaller. It tends to render our manufactures somewhat dearer in every market, and their's somewhat cheaper than they otherwise would be, and consequently to give their industry a double advantage over our own.

“The bounty, as it raises in the home-market, not the real, but only the nominal price of our corn, as it augments, not the quantity of labour which a certain quantity of corn can maintain and employ, but only the quantity of silver which it will exchange for it, it discourages our manufactures without rendering the smallest real service either to our farmers or country gentlemen. It puts, indeed, a little more money into the pockets of both, and it will perhaps be somewhat difficult to persuade the greater part of them that is not rendering them a very real service. But if this money sinks in its value, in the quantity of labour, provisions, and commodities of all different kinds which it is capable of purchasing, as much as it rises in its quantity, the service will be merely nominal and imaginary.

“There is, perhaps, but one set of men in the whole commonwealth to whom the bounty either was or could be really serviceable. These were the corn-merchants, the exporters and importers of corn. In years of plenty the bounty necessarily occasioned a greater exportation than would otherwise have taken place; and by hindering the plenty of one year from relieving the scarcity of another, it occasioned in years of scarcity a greater importation than would otherwise have been necessary. It increased the business of the corn-merchant in both, and in years of scarcity it not only enabled him to import a greater quantity, but to sell it for a better price, and consequently with a greater profit than he could otherwise have made, if the plenty of one year had not been more or less hindered from relieving the scarcity of another. It is in this set of men accordingly, that I have observed the greatest zeal for the continuance or renewal of the bounty."

Our author is an advocate for the representation of the Americans in the British House of Commons. He argues, that "tho' the Roman constitution was necessarily ruined by the union of Rome with the allied states of Italy, there is not the least probability that the British constitution would be hurt by the union of Great Britain with her colonies. That constitution, on the contrary, would be compleated by it, and seems to be imperfect without it. The assembly which deliberates and decides concerning the affairs of every part of the empire in order to be properly informed, ought certainly to have representatives from every part of it. That this union, however, could be easily effectuated, or that difficulties and great difficulties might not occur in the execution, I do not pretend. I have yet heard of none, however, which appear insurmountable. The principal perhaps arise, not from the nature of things, but from the prejudices and opinions of the people both on this and the other side of the Atlantic.

"We on this side the water are afraid lest the multitude of American representatives should overturn the balance of the constitution, and increase too much either the influence of the Crown on the one hand, or the force of the democracy on the other. But if the number of American representatives was to be in proportion to the produce of American taxation, the number of people to be managed would encrease exactly in proportion to the means of managing them; and the means of managing, to the number of people to be managed. The monarchical and democratical parts of the constitution would, after the union, stand exactly in the same degree of relative force with regard to one another as they had done before.

"The people on the other side of the water are afraid lest their distance from the seat of government might expose them to many oppressions. But their representatives in parliament, of which the number ought from the first to be considerable, would easily be able to protect them from all oppression. The distance could not much weaken the dependency of the representative upon the constituent, and the former would still feel that he owed his seat in Parliament and all the consequence which he derived from it to the good will of the latter. It would be the interest of the former, therefore to cultivate that good-will by complaining with all the authority of a member of the legislature of every outrage which any civil or military officer might be guilty of in those remote parts of the empire. The distance of America from the seat of government, besides, the nations of that country might flatter themselves, with some appearance of reason too, would not be of very long continuance. Such has hitherto been the rapid progress of that country in wealth, population and improvement, that in the course of little more than a century, perhaps, the produce of America might exceed that of British taxation. The seat of the empire would then naturally remove itself to that part of the empire which contributed most to the general defence and support of the whole."

VIII. Reflections on the growth of Heathenism among modern Christians; in a Letter to a Friend at Oxford. 1s. Rivington.

Very pertinent reflexions. The author's complaint is too well founded, of more respect being paid by the noble and polite, to pagan temples and deities, than to places of Christian worship, or to God himself—and that even Heathen divinities, or idols, are introduced into the churches. He might have animadverted also on the growth of Popery, and high churchism, its near relation, for the old Laudean custom of the minister and other church officers, making three reverential bows as they approach the altar, is reviving and already introduced in some churches.

IX. Observations on the Night Thoughts of Dr. Young, with occasional Remarks on the Beauties of poetical Composition. By Courtney Melmoth. 4s. Richardson.

These observations prove the author not very unequal to the critical task he set himself to perform, especially as they were written some years ago. But still before he published, doubtless he pursued Dean Swift's advice,

"Blot out, correct, insert, refine,

"Enlarge, diminish, interline."

He hath pointed out many great defects as well as striking beauties in his critique. To use his own words, "Young is a great, but very unequal writer; sometimes he soars into sublimity, and sometimes he sinks into dulness. We are now astonished by the vigorous pindaric flight of his genius, and now surprized to see him sink below puerility." Dulness and puerility, we think, are epithets rather too severe.

X. Subscription, or historical Extracts, humbly inscribed to the Right Rev. the Bishops, and to the Petitioners; shewing the Impropriety of their Petition. 2s. 6d. Hay.

A sensible and dispassionate performance. The author hath justly described the pernicious effects of subscription, and the following is his account of the origin of human impositions in religion.

"The first learned teachers of Christianity, whose previous education had been formed in the schools of human wisdom, were too much influenced by the sublime and baseless visions of Pagan Philosophy, Pagan Theology, and and Pagan Metaphysics; more particularly the Theology and Metaphysics of Plato. From him they learned the doctrine of a Triad, or Trinity, in the divine essence, and the natural immortality of man. By the first they contradicted the essential doctrine of the Scriptures both in the Old and New Testament, the absolute unity of God: by the second they subverted the fundamental doctrine of a resurrection from death, and a future judgment; thereby superseding the necessity of the Christian dispensation. And indeed not this alone, but many other bad consequences followed the introduction of the Pagan principles. Such as the doctrine of an imputed stain of original depravity; a doctrine not only absurd, unjust, and impious, but absolutely impossible; the doctrine of purgatory, limbus patrum, infantum, masses for the dead, saint and image worship, and all the nonsense of an intermediate state of existence between death and the resurrection. These things were the consequences of explaining the doctrines of Christianity upon the principles of Pagan philosophy.

"I charge not the persons who first did this, with any bad design; and only lament in men undoubtedly of great merit, such cogent examples of human frailty. Because this their frailty in process of time gave opportunity to others to carry the worst designs into execution. The religion of Christ however made a rapid progress, and great numbers were converted even to their representation of the Christian faith. Here began the misfortune and great corruption of the Church; not in the numbers converted to Christianity, but in the numbers perverted after their conversation, to these vain doctrines of fallible men. For these learned and philosophic Christians now made themselves the heads of parties; no better in truth than leaders of so many separate factions; and taught peculiar notions, and doctrines of their own. Then human pride took the alarm. Each separate teacher, like the ancient sectarian philosophers, though he raised his own reputation the more, as he could make himself the more distinguished. The peculiarities of his own doctrines served as a characteristic creed, or confession of faith, which was the mark of his disciples, was the admission into the particular society, and in time effected the exclusion of those who were of a different opinion.

"At this era, I place the origin of subscription. For though these leaders perhaps did not actually require in writing an assent to their peculiarities; yet whoever would be esteemed a disciple, must by some outward form profess the opinions of his master; which in my apprehension comes to the same thing. In this manner did human erudition and Pagan Philosophy new mould the plain and important doctrines of Christianity; and by imposing the false opinions of men as necessary articles of faith, throw such a burthen upon conscience as is now become too grievous to be borne."

XI. A Plea for the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, in a Pastoral Letter, addressed to the Congregation of Protestant Dissenters at Cambridge. 1s. 6d. Keith.

The writer is sensible and candid, and many of his remarks are very judicious. But after all, we are at a loss whether to class him with the Trinitarians, or Sabellians. They who plead for, or against, the divinity of Christ, should be explicit.

XII. The New Gazetteer, or Geographical Companion. By R. Johnson. 2s. Baldwin.

The contents of this volume are fully explained by, and on examination, justly correspond with the title. By printing the whole in a small but legible type, the editor hath been enabled, he says, "to give the names of about 1000 places more than are to be met with in geographical gazetteers sold for near double the price." Great attention also appears to have been paid to the most useful particulars of the places described.

XIII. Ode to Mr. Pinchbeck upon his newly invented Patent: Candle Snuffers, by Malcom M'Gregor, Esq. 6d. Almon.

A severe satyr on the person to whom 'tis addressed, and on the heads of administration — as a poem it hath merit.

XIV. The South Wiltshire Petitioners, a Mock Heroic Poem, attempted after the Manner of Hudibras 1s. Snagg.

A satyr on a West country knight, stiled in the poem, Sir Bluster, for interesting himself in procuring a petition to Parliament, for conciliatory measures with America. The performance hath humour, and the story is well told; but we think the writer might with equal propriety (if not more) have prefixed the word smuggled to the addressee, as well as the petitions.

XV. An Address to the Genius of America. By the Rev. Christopher Wells. 1s. Dodsley.

Our author's genius is very unequal to the task he had assumed.

XVI. A letter to a Baptist Minister, containing some strictures on his late Conduct in the Baptization of certain Adults at Shrewsbury, &c. 1s. 6d. Robinson.

Many fires have been kindled by the question about water baptism, and those who use the most water and have been dipped all over, it is remarkable, are the most sly and contentious. This letter writer indeed is warm, although an advocate for sprinkling: the arguments are conclusive, and which have often before been urged in the controversy, but he has wandered also into politics and things too deep for him.

XVII. Reflections on Government with respect to America. 1s. Lewis.

For the Colonies, but nothing new.

XVIII. Remarks on a Pamphlet lately published by Dr. Price. 1s. Cadell.

XIX. The plain Question upon the present Disputes with our American Colonies. 2s. Wilkie.

These two pamphlets have the appearance of Ministerial extraction—they aver boldly and decide with temerity. The question is nothing the plainer, however for all their pages, but is still the most critical, as well as important one that ever engrossed the public attention.

June, 1776.

Premiums offered by the Dublin Society, for the Encouragement of Agriculture, Planting, and other Articles in Husbandry.

Wheat on Clover lay.

TO such persons as shall before the first day of November, in 1777, 1778, and 1779, sow wheat upon fresh clover lay of one year's growth only, that has been mowed, and never grazed, a premium of 20 shillings for each acre so sown.

No person is to be entitled to the foregoing premium who shall not prove to the satisfaction of the society, that he has punctually observed the following particulars, viz.

That he has sown the clover lay as he plowed it.

Then harrowed in the seed, or trenched it with shovels.

Carefully picked out the roots of docks, and other weeds.

Cleared up all the furrows, and thoroughly water-cut the whole ground, if subject to wet, all before the fifteenth day of November.

N. B. The claimant may either sow all the seed with the plough, or with the harrow; or half with one, and half with the other, as he chuses.

For this premium the sum of 800l. will be given annually for the aforesaid three years, after the rate of 200l. in each province. 800l.

The claims must be sent in before the first day of February after sowing, and will be adjudged the third Thursday in November following; at which time the claimant is to make a return of the produce of his crop, by calculation, or otherwise.

Turnips after wheat.

To such persons as shall pull up by the roots the stubble for manure, and sow with turnips, wheat-stubble, before the first day of October after the reaping of the wheat: a premium of ten shillings for each acre so sown.

For this premium the sum of 400l. will be given annually for the years 1777, 1778, and 1779, after the rate of 100l. to each province. 400l.

The claims are to be sent in before the first day of March after sowing, and will be adjudged on the first Thursday in December following.

In case more persons shall be entitled to any premium, than the money appointed thereto will answer to pay, a preference will be given in the manner following, viz.

In the premium for wheat after clover.

To such claimants as shall have used bullocks instead of horses, in the entire tillage thereof, and shall have earliest sown and finished the ground.

In the premium for turnips after wheat.

To such as shall have used bullocks in like manner from the said time; shall have sown the turnip seed after the wheat, for which the first of the foregoing premiums was given or adjudged to have been deserved; and as shall have most effectually manured the ground before sowing.

N. B. Where any of two or more things are to give a preference, the use of bullocks will be chiefly attended to.

All claims must set forth the performance of the several matters required; and also how far such articles as are to give a preference have been observed; and also whether the claimant is seized of a real estate of the yearly value of 300l. or possessed of a personal or real estate together of the value of 3000l. And no claim by any person who is not so seized or possessed will be received, unless two members of the Dublin Society, or of any of the corresponding Country Societies shall certify under their hands at foot thereof, that they have viewed the works, operation, lands, &c. for which such claim is made, and that they verily believe, as far as they can judge, every matter set forth in the said claim to be true, and that the claimant is justly entitled to the premium he demands—Provided however, that no certificate from any member who owes more than a year's subscription at the time that the claim is sent in, shall be deemed sufficient.

Rape or Turnips on boggy ground.

A premium of twenty Shillings an acre will be given for rape or turnips sown upon boggy, or boggy mountain, plowed and burnt, or limed with not less than 140 barrels of lime to an acre for that purpose, and sown before the 20th day of July in the years 1777, 1778, and 1779, 50l. will be disposed of for the said premium in each of the provinces; and in case there should be claimants for more than 50 acres in each province, then the sum of 50l. to be rateably divided among the claimants: the claims to be considered, and premiums for them adjudged on the first Thursday in February following. 200l.

Hoops.

To the person who shall between the first day of February, and the first day of April, in the years 1777, 1778, and 1779, plant any quantity, not less than four acres, with timber fallow, chefnut fallow, Norfolk willow, Gorgomel fallow, (by some called Gogmagog or Huntingdonshire willow) lombardy or pine poplar, sweet chefnut, hazel, or ash, after the rate of 9000 plants at least to the acre, for hoops, in each province; a premium after the rate of 40 shillings for each acre so planted will be given, but not in any one province to exceed in the whole the sum of 30l. 120l.

In case more claims shall be made than the said sum will be sufficient to pay, a preference will be given in proportion to the amount and goodness of the security each claimant shall give, that the plants shall be kept well fenced, and none of them cut for any purpose but hoops, hoops, or hop poles, for five years from the adjudication of the premium, and until they shall have out-grown the size fit for these purposes.

The claims must be sent in before the first day of August after planting, and will be adjudged the first meeting in January after; but before adjudication sufficient security in treble the amount of the premium must be given for the purpose aforesaid.

The society recommend, that the ground intended for this plantation be first thoroughly drained, and then well trenched three spades deep before the first of January preceding the planting; that it be then marked into lines 18 inches asunder, and the plants set 18 inches distant in those lines, leaving however every fourth line unplanted; and that whenever the plants shall be cut down, the ground so left between every three lines shall be thrown up over those three lines for the nourishment of the roots growing in them.

The common method practised of planting fallows in raised beds like potatoes, is very injurious, not only rendering the soil too dry, but also in not leaving good mould for covering the plants when cut; which is the time that covering will be of most benefit by increasing the number of stems from each, and nourishing afresh the roots.

Every claimant must, before adjudication, shew that his ground for which he claims, is well fenced from cattle.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

Geneva.

TO the person who shall make the greatest quantity of geneva, and of the best quality, in imitation of geneva imported from Holland, for not less than 1000 gallons, a premium of ——— 50l.

To the person who shall make the next greatest quantity, and of the best quality, for not less than 600 gallons, a premium of 30l. ——— 80l.

Brandy.

To the person who shall make the greatest quantity of brandy and of the best quality, in imitation of French brandy imported from France, for not less than 1000 gallons, a premium of ——— 50l.

To the person who shall make the next greatest quantity, and of the best quality, for not less than 600 gallons, a premium of 30l. ——— 80l.

Exporting Home-made Spirits.

To the person who shall export the greatest quantity of home made spirits, and of the best quality, for not less than 3000 gallons, a premium of ——— 50l.

To the person who shall export the second greatest quantity and of the best quality, for not less than 1500 gallons, a premium of 25l.

To the person who shall export the third greatest quantity and of the best quality, for not less than 750 gallons, a premium of 12l. 10s. ——— 87l. 10s.

None of the aforesaid premiums for making and exporting spirits will be given, but for such spirits only as have been distilled from malt made of bere or barley of the growth of Ireland.

The surveyor, or guager of the walk, where any spirits shall be made, for which a premium is intended to be claimed, is required to seal up a bottle of such spirits taken by him from the still; which sample must be produced on the day of adjudication, and sufficient evidence must be given that the quantity declared to be made by such distiller was equal in quality and goodness to the sample produced.

These premiums for the encouragement of making and exporting spirits will be continued for the years 1777, 1778, and 1779; to be adjudged for each year respectively on the third Thursday in February, in the years 1778, 1779, and 1780.

N. B. The savings arising from any of the aforesaid premiums will be applied to induce landlords to encourage their tenants to reclaim bogs, or boggy, heathy, mountain land; such inducements to be premiums equal to such sums as the said landlords shall pay or allow to their tenants for that purpose, so far as the said savings shall amount to.

No member of the society, or person seized of any real estate of the yearly value of 300l. or who in personal estate, or real and personal estate together, is worth the sum of 3000l. shall receive any of the foregoing pecuniary rewards in agriculture or planting, nor by his claim prevent the same from being given to persons who are not possessed of such property, their whole amount being intended to be distributed among such persons only; but as a testimony of his merit, and for more usefully dispersing proper instruments of husbandry throughout the kingdom, the society will give him such implements of husbandry, with their arms stamped or painted thereon as he shall choose, to the value of 5l. in lieu of every premium of 10l. and under 20l. and to the value of 8l. in lieu of every premium of 20l. or more, to which he would have been intitled, if he had not been a member of the society, or seized or possessed of the value aforesaid.

And every other person, to whom any premium of 30l. or more shall be adjudged, shall receive five sixths thereof in money, and the remaining sixth part in such instruments of husbandry as he shall choose, to the amount of the value of such sixth part.

The society, in order to procure instruments, and implements of husbandry of the best materials, manufacture, and construction, declare they are ready to contract upon proper terms, for a regular, annual supply, with such workmen as shall produce of their own manufacture the best pattern of all the common implements, viz. ploughs, carts, cars, harrows, rollers, harness, &c. &c. for the reception of which, they intend to fit up a store in some convenient place, where all models, &c. may be deposited; and to which every person shall at all times have free access, and liberty to examine and take patterns.

As it would be very beneficial, and tend to the promoting of agriculture, and manufactures; the society intend likewise to purchase all valuable books of trade, agriculture, arts, manufactures, &c. which are not already in their possession. Also regularly to procure the proceedings and publications of the several societies instituted throughout Europe; particularly those in countries of equally cold or colder climates than our own.

For these purposes of purchasing implements of husbandry and books, the society will give a sum not exceeding 232l. 10s. annually, for the years 1777, 1778, and 1779. 232l. 10s.

MANUFACTURES.

Silken Manufacture.

Silks sold in the Ware-house

THE sum of 500l. will be given in premiums of 5l. per cent. on the value of Irish silken goods, which shall be sold in the Irish silk ware-house, by retail, according to the present rules of the said house, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1777.

500l.

To be adjudged as the goods are sold.

The like premiums will be given for silks which shall be sold as aforesaid, in the Irish silk ware-house, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778.

A sum not exceeding 600l. will be given to defray all expences whatever of the said ware-house, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1777.

600l.

The like sum of 600l. will be given to defray the expences of the said ware-house, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778.

Silks sold by Wholesale.

Premiums of 3l. per cent. will be given to the wholesale buyers of silks, for the purpose of selling again, on the value of such goods, provided the same shall not exceed 20,000l. and if it should, then the sum of 600l. will be given in proportion to the value of silken goods so bought, respectively, by each claimant, from the 1st of June 1775, inclusive, to the 1st of June 1776 — 600l.

Additional Encouragement for ditto.

The sum of 200l. will also be given as an additional encouragement to the above premiums of 3l. per cent. rateably, and proportionably to the value of Irish silks which shall be bought by wholesale, for the purpose of selling again, by each claimant respectively, from the 1st day of June 1775, inclusive, to the 1st day of June 1776; provided the silks for which the said additional encouragement is offered, be of the value of five shillings and sixpence per yard, or upwards 200l.

To be adjudged the 21st of November 1776.

Premiums of 3l. per cent. will be given to the wholesale buyers of silks, of the value of four shillings, per yard, and upwards, for the purpose of selling again, on the value of such goods, provided the same shall not exceed 21,666l. 13s. 4d. and if it should, then the sum of 650l. will be given in proportion to the value of silken goods so bought respectively by each claimant, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1777. — 650l.

N. B. No person to be considered as a wholesale buyer, who shall not have purchased goods within the year to the value of 100l.

Black alamode, though not of the value of four shillings, is equally entitled to the premium.

To be adjudged in November 1777.

Premiums to the same amount, and on the same conditions, will be given to the wholesale buyers of silks, from the 1st of June 1777, to the 1st of June 1778.

Clouding of Silks.

To the person or persons who shall follow the business of clouding of silks, for the manufacturers at large, to be certified by the corporation of weavers, 15l. per cent. will be given on the value of said labour, provided the same shall not exceed 200l. the work done to be certified by the oath of the clouder, and the certificate of the manufacturer. 30l.

The above premiums will be given yearly, for two years, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1778.

To be adjudged in December 1777, and 1778.

Steel Reeds.

To the person who shall make cast steel reeds for weavers, of bright wire, 10l. per cent. will be given on the value of said reeds, provided the same shall not exceed the sum of 158l. 6s. 8d. — 15l. 16s. 8d.

The foregoing Premium will be given yearly, for two years, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1778.

To be adjudged in December 1777, and 1778.

Woollen Manufacture.

A Sum not exceeding 500l. per annum will be given yearly, to defray all expences whatever of the Irish Woollen-Ware-house for the years 1777, and 1778.

Broad Cloths manufactured and finished not nearer than 20 miles to Dublin.

The sum of 200l. will be paid in premiums of 6l. per cent. on the value of broad cloths and broad rugs, which shall be sold or exposed to sale in any city, town corporate, or market town of this kingdom, to be entirely manufactured, and completely finished at a distance of not less than 20 miles from the city of Dublin, and not within the city or liberties of the city of Cork, from the 24th of June 1775, inclusive, to the 24th of June 1776, by persons who have twice already obtained premiums for such goods manufactured at or above the distance aforesaid from the city of Dublin and the city of Cork.

And if it would appear that such goods to more than the value of 3333l. 6s. 8d. shall be so manufactured by such persons within the said time, then the sum of 200l. shall be divided in proportion to the value of the goods respectively manufactured by each claimant — 200l.

To be adjudged the 28th of November 1776.

The sum of 200l. will be paid in premiums

not exceeding 8 1-4th per cent. on the value of broad cloths and broad rugs which shall be sold or exposed to sale in any city, town corporate, or market town of this kingdom, to be entirely manufactured, and completely finished at a distance of not less than 20 miles from the city of Dublin, and not within the city or the liberties of the city of Cork, from the 24th of June 1775, inclusive, to the 24th of June 1776, by persons who have already once obtained premiums for such goods, manufactured at or above the distance aforesaid, from the city of Dublin, and the city of Cork.

And if it should appear that such goods to more than the value of 2400l. shall be so manufactured by such persons within the said time, then the Sum of 200l. shall be divided in proportion to the value of the goods respectively manufactured by each claimant

To be adjudged the 28th of November, 1776.

The sum of 200l. will be paid in Premiums not exceeding 10l. per cent. on the value of broad cloths, and broad rugs which shall be sold, or exposed to sale, in any city, town corporate or market town of this kingdom, to be entirely manufactured and completely finished at a distance of not less than 20 miles from the city of Dublin, and not within the city or liberties of the city of Cork, from the 24th of June 1775, inclusive, to the 24th of June 1776, by persons who have never obtained premiums for such goods, manufactured at or above the distance above-mentioned from the city of Dublin, and the city of Cork.

And if it should appear that such goods to more than the value of 2000l. shall be so manufactured by such persons within the said time, then the sum of 200l. shall be divided in proportion to the value of goods respectively manufactured by each claimant

To be adjudged the 28th of November, 1776.

Provided that to ascertain the value and quantity of such goods, they shall be deposited in a hall or room in any city, town corporate, or market town of this kingdom, which shall be provided for that purpose; that every piece be there viewed and examined by an inspector, to be approved of by the society, who is to certify upon oath before the chief magistrate of such city or town corporate, that the said broad cloths and broad rugs have been well and sufficiently manufactured, and completely finished, and that the prices at which they shall be rated by the manufacturers are reasonable.

The said inspectors shall be allowed for their trouble in so doing three pence per piece, to be paid proportionably by such claimants as may obtain premiums.

Every claimant must prove to the society's satisfaction that the place where his said goods had been manufactured, had been also his place of residence.

Superfine Warp or Woof Yarn.

To the undertaker scribblers who shall cause to be scribbled and spun for warp or woof, superfine yarn fit for superfine broad cloths, from the 1st of June 1775, to the 1st of June 1776, the sum of — — 240l.

Provided the said undertaker scribblers shall have paid weekly to the spinners of the said yarn one farthing per skain more than they have hitherto done, according to the quantity so spun, and shall prove that they have so done, to the satisfaction of the society

To be adjudged the 28th of November 1776.

Country Yarn.

For warp yarn fit for broad cloths, which shall be scribbled and spun, at the distance of at least 10 miles from the city of Dublin, from the 1st of June 1774, inclusive, to the 1st of June 1775, a premium will be given of one penny per skain, provided the number of skains of such yarn shall not exceed 25000l. and if it should, then the sum of 104l. 3s 4d. shall be divided among the claimants proportionably to the quantity which each shall have scribbled and spun 104l. 3s. 4d.

To be adjudged the 7th of November 1776.

Callimancoes, Ruffs, and Broad Stuffs.

For making and selling, from the 24th of June, 1774, to the 24th of June, 1775, at the distance of at least 30 miles from the city of Dublin, and 20 miles from the city of Cork, callimancoes of single worsted, and full fifteen inches wide, ruffs and broad stuffs, all of single worsted, and equal in quality to such as are imported. A premium of 5l. per cent. will be given on the value of such goods, or of any one of the said sorts, provided the value of what shall have been so made and sold by all the claimants together, shall not exceed the sum of 2000l. and if it should, then the sum of 100l. will be divided among the claimants proportionably to the value of such goods by them respectively manufactured: The above premium to be given to such claimants only as have never received a premium from the society, to the amount of 100l. for the said purpose

200l.

To be adjudged the 12th of December, 1776.

The foregoing premiums for the encouragement of the woollen manufacture of this kingdom, will be continued in like manner from the 24th of June 1776, to the 24th June 1778.

MANUFACTURE OF MIXED GOODS.

Crapes.

FOR the manufacturing of crapes, commonly called Norwich crapes, of 1s. 4d. and upwards, per yard, from the 10th of March, 1776, inclusive, to the 10th of March, 1777, 5l. per cent. shall be given on the value of such crapes, provided the same shall not exceed 800l. and if it should, then the sum of 40l. shall be divided proportionably to the value of crapes manufactured by each claimant

40l.

To be adjudged the 15th of March, 1777.

Bomla-

Bombazines.

For the manufacturing of bombazines of 2s. and upwards, per yard, from the 10th of March, 1776, inclusive, to the 10th of March, 1777, of the same kinds and qualities with those usually imported, 10l. per cent. will be given on the value of such bombazines, provided the same shall not exceed 250l. and if it should, then the sum of 25l. shall be divided proportionably to the value of bombazines manufactured by each claimant — — — 25l.

To be adjudged the 15th of March, 1777.

Lutherines.

For the manufacturing of lutherines, from the 1st of August 1774, inclusive, to the 1st of August, 1775, 10l. per cent. will be given on the value of such lutherines, provided the same shall not exceed 150l. and if it should, then the sum of 15l. will be divided proportionably to the value of lutherines manufactured by each claimant — — — 15l.

To be adjudged the 7th of November 1776.

And for ascertaining the quantity and value of each of these articles of mixed goods, the inspector for that time being of the goods sent into the Irish silk ware-house, shall examine the same, and certify to the society the quantity and goodness of each article, with the name of the manufacturer; for which he shall be allowed two-pence, per piece, out of the premiums, for the goods he shall so examine.

Cotton carded.

A premium of 3l. will be given on every hundred weight of cotton carded by an instrument similar to that invented by James Barlow, master of the Royal Charter School on the Strand, or by the said instrument, provided the same does not exceed the sum of 45l. and if more than 1500 weight should be claimed for, then the said sum of 45l. to be rateably divided among the claimants 45l.

To be adjudged in November, 1777.

The foregoing premiums offered for the encouragement of manufacturing mixed goods, will be given by the society yearly, for two years, from the 1st of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1778.

FULLERS EARTH.Fullers Earth.

TO the person or persons who shall find out a pit or pits of fullers earth, equal in goodness to that imported, a premium of 35l. will be given; it appearing to the satisfaction of the Society, that the person or persons have raised and sold to the value of 300l. and if there should be more than one claimant, then the said sum of 35l. to be rateably divided — — — 35l.

To be adjudged in December 1777.

F I S H E R I E S.

A premium of 20l. per cent. will be given upon all money which shall be hereafter laid out in building houses of lime and stone, or brick, for curing fish, or smoke-houses for smoking of fish, upon the North West Coast of this kingdom; provided the same shall not exceed the sum of 300l. and if claims to a greater amount should be approved of by the society, the sum of 300l. to be rateably divided among the claimants: who must lay before the society plans of the said buildings, with a particular account of the materials of which they shall be constructed: the said premium to be paid only for new buildings which shall be begun subsequent to the last day of the month of June, 1776, and completely finished before the first day of June, 1777.

To be adjudged the 14th of June, 1777.

A premium of 20l. per cent. will be given upon any sum or sums of money which shall be hereafter expended in erecting proper work-houses, and ware-houses of lime and stone, or brick, for coopers, on that part of the coast of Donegal, called the Rosses, or at Killybegs, or at any place between the same; upon security given, that the said buildings shall not be turned to any other use for seven years after receiving the said premium, or any part thereof; and provided the same shall not exceed the sum of 200l. if it should, the sum of 200l. to be rateably divided among the claimants, who must lay before the society plans of the said buildings, with a particular account of the materials of which they shall be constructed: the said premium to be paid only for new buildings which shall be begun subsequent to the last day of the month of June, 1776, and completely finished before the first day of June, 1777.

To be adjudged the 14th of June, 1777.

A premium of ten shillings a ton will be given upon all home-made salt which shall be consumed in curing of fish upon the North West coast; and fifteen shillings a ton upon all imported salt consumed in like manner, from the 30th of June, 1776, to the 1st of June, 1777; provided the several sums to be adjudged shall not exceed the sum of 200l. otherwise to be rateably divided among the claimants.

To be adjudged the 14th of June, 1777.

A premium of one shilling a barrel will be given upon every barrel, containing thirty-two gallons of well-cured fish, exported to, and actually sold in foreign parts, from the 30th of June 1776, to the 1st of June 1777; provided the claims which shall be allowed, exceed not the sum of 400l. if they should, the said sum of 400l. to be rateably divided among the claimants.

To be adjudged the 14th of June, 1777.

 ALL matters for which the society offer premiums, must be begun after the publication of such premiums, unless there be a particular exception in the publication.

The society reserve to themselves a power of giving in all cases such part only of any premium as the performance shall be judged to deserve; or in case of want of merit, no part.

A candidate for a premium, or a person applying for a bounty, being detected in any dissingenuous methods to impose upon the society, shall forfeit all such premium or bounty, and be incapable of obtaining any for the future;

ture; and if any person shall be detected in offering any forged instrument in evidence to the society, or in committing wilful perjury in proof of any claim, a prosecution will be carried on against such offender with the utmost rigour of the law.

The society being desirous of avoiding as much as possible the multiplication of oaths in the disposal of their premiums, request that the nobility, magistrates, gentry, and clergy in their several districts, will give their attention when applied to for certificates of the merit of any candidate for a premium, to examine the pretensions of such person, that the society may not be under the necessity of tendering an affidavit to him; which they apprehend has sometimes occasioned a misapplication of their fund, and the guilt of perjury.

No person will be admitted a candidate for any premium offered by the society, who has obtained a patent for the exclusive right of making or performing any thing for which such premium is offered, or for which premium there might not have been a fair competition.

Any manufacturers detected in entering into any illegal combination of raising the price of their goods or labour, are for ever excluded from receiving any premium or bounty from the society.

All claimants of premiums are to send in their claims at least fourteen days before such premiums are to be adjudged, directed to the Rev. Mr. Thomas Lytster, at the society's house in Grafton-street.

All premiums offered by the Dublin Society are designed for Ireland only, unless in any article mention be made to the contrary.

††† The Dublin Society being desirous of promoting such enquiries as may tend to the information and service of the public; and also diffusing as generally as possible, the knowledge of such useful discoveries as may be communicated, as well as those which are locally known and practised, request the assistance and communication of the ingenious and experienced.

By order of the Society,
THOMAS LYSTER, Assistt. Secretary.

The ADDRESS to the Town, spoken by Mr. Garrick, on the Night of Performance for the Benefit of the Theatrical Fund.

I Who am now a veteran of the stage,
And counsel for infirmity and age,
Must for the vet'ran's cause some pity find,
A fellow-feeling makes us wond'rous kind!
Might we but hope—your zeal wou'd not be less,

Your gen'rous aid, to patronize distress:
That hope obtain'd, the wish'd for end secures,
To soothe their cares,—who oft have lightened yours.

Shou'd the great heroes of celestial line,
Who here have drank their Greek and Roman wine,

Great Cæsar, Brutus, Agamemnon, Hector,
Nay Jove himself!—who here hath quaff'd his nectar,

Shall they who govern'd Fortune, cringe and court her,

Thirst in their age, and call in vain for porter?
Like Belisarius, tax the pitying street
With “date obolum” to all they meet?

Shan't I—who here have murder'd many a score, [more;

Stabb'd many—poisoned some—beheaded
Who numbers flew on this embattled plain?

Shan't I?—the slayer—help to feed the slain?
Brother to all, with pitying eye I view

The men who slew me, and the men I slew!
I must—I will—the gen'rous project seize,

That those too old to die, may live with ease.
Suppose the babes I murder'd in the Tower,

By chance or fate shou'd lose their acting power,

Shall they, once princes, and by flatterers
serv'd,

In childhood murder'd, and when murder'd starv'd?

July, 1776.

Matrons half-ravish'd, for your recreation,
In age shou'd never want—some consolation.
Can I, young Hamlet once, to nature lost,
Behold—O horrible!—my father's ghost,
With grizzled beard, pale looks, stalk up and down,

And he, the royal Dane, want half a crown!
Forbid it, ladies!—Gentlemen, forbid it!
Give joy to age and let them say—you did it.
To you, ye gods, * I make my last appeal,
You have a right to judge as well as feel,
Will your high wisdoms to our suit incline,
That kings and heroes, gods and ghosts shou'd dine?

Olympus shakes! that omen all secures,
May every joy you give be tentoid yours.

The Bachelor's Prayer.

I F I am fated Hymen's hands to wear,
Ye Gods propitious list to this my pray'r;
Grant that the Maid whom I unite for life,
May all possess that form the virtuous Wife.
Let her be pious;—and, in great degree,
Possess that Heav'n-born virtue—Charity.
Enrich her with a sympathetic mind;
A heart exalted, and a soul refin'd.
Let her have beauty, and not seem to know it:
Let her have sense, and wit enough to shew it.
Good nature, that best kindest gift of Heav'n,
Endow her largely with, and temper even;
From each mistrustful doubt let her be free;
A foe to pride, parade, and coquetry.
Nor in her bosom harbour joy or care
That she in confidence with me won't share.
And lastly, let her words, looks, actions, prove
That I am bless'd, univall'd, with her love.
Such give, ye Gods, if e'er I'm doom'd to wed,
Elic, let me ever press the single bed.

Lagan

Lagan upon the Mountain.

HARD by those plains where Lagan gently flows,
And scenes of wealth in his smooth bosom shews,

As lately walking, by the dawn of day,
To court the Zephyr, or perhaps to pray ;
I saw the waves a sudden lustre spread,
I saw old Lagan leave his oozy bed,
And lightly skimming up the verdant hills,
Touch the glad founts, and wake the warbling rills ;

Then full on Collan's peaky summit rest,
And gaze around and shake his reedy crest.

Rejoice, he cries, you independent train,
Who sacred truth and liberty maintain,
Bold let the gallant sons of Antrim rise,
Extol their hero to the bending skies :
Let Antrim's self attend the joyful call,
And ride triumphant from his mossy hall,
Bear the loud pæns to each secret cell,
Along the moor, or down the dusky dell,
Whirl up the mountain, on the valley strain,
Follow the brook, and sweep the breezy plain,
Bid all his people mutually proclaim,
That Liberty and Wilson are the same.

Fair flow such merit to the latest song,
And catch new incense as it rolls along :
Well, meek Irne ! well it were for thee,
Were all thy people so completely free ;
Did all freeholders, spite of lawless sway,
The genial impulse of the mind obey ;
Not, as they do, for some vile futile fee,
Stoop to the yoke, and bend the supple knee.
Well wot I then how goodly would appear,
The rural labour and the sylvan cheer :
How would I then my own dear seats survey,
My seats for ever pleasant, ever gay ;
Where lads go lightsome, splendid villas rise,
And hills of linen whiten to the skies ;
Where love the heart while honour guides the soul,

And femalesweetness dignifies the whole.

This said ; down shoots the river God, to gain

The shady coverts of sweet Ballydrain.

Verses wrote extempore on viewing Lord Charlemont's Demesne at Marino, near Dublin.

I Came, with pleasure I admir'd,
And with poetic ardour fir'd,
Survey'd these meads, and shady groves,
Where dwell the graces and the loves ;
Where silver streams soft murmur flow,
And verdant banks where violets blow ;

The stately swans in snowy pride,
That gently o'er the surface glide
Of yonder pleasant crystal pond,
Which fronts the bow'r of Rosamond :
The spacious dome that dares the skies,*
Whose sculptur'd beauties glad the eyes ;
The wood-embosom'd, lonely cell,†
“ Where I could always wish to dwell ;”
Scenes where the mules are combin'd
To bring to birth the lab'ring mind —
Receive, my lord, our grateful praise,
Heav'n crown with bliss your future days !
Whose sense and taste at once unite,
To yield to all extreme delight.

To Miss ———

KIND and good-natur'd, affable, and free, Love, peace, good-humour's center'd
all in thee ;

Ten thousand charms thy countenance adorn,
As bright and open as the blushing morn.—
Oh ! could my muse dictate my strain to move

In words expressive of my ardent love—
Words are defective, sighs but faintly tell,
What rending tortures in my bosom dwell.—
Oh ! come, celestial fair, and yield thy charms,
And let me clasp thee in my longing arms ;
We'll steal together to some shady grove,
And taste the precious joys of mutual love ;
Or on some gay, enamel'd hillock's side,
Where at our feet the murmur'ing waters glide,
There lull'd to sweet repose, by fanning gales,
Whilst birds in concert tell their vocal tales,
Content and love shall ev'ry care annoy,
And all our days roll on in peace and joy ;
Each future moment of my life shall be Employ'd in pleasing and admiring thee.

Acrostic.

Matchless fair as summer skies,
All who sees adore her eyes ;
Rich the perfume of the rose,
Yet her breast more sweets disclose.

Bring my pipe, I'll hail my love,
Rural songs shall fill the grove ;
O the charming, blooming fair !
Winning smiles, majestic air ;
None so lovely, debonaire. }

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

Extract of a Letter from Bar le Duc, in Lorraine, April 30.

ON the 25th last, at two in the afternoon, there fell into our environs such a prodigious quantity of rain and hail, that in less than half an hour, ninety-nine houses, composing the lower and principal street of the village of Tremont, were entirely laid under water, and filled with mud and hail. Seventeen of these houses were overturned by the torrents, and buried under the ruins ; the like number of persons, some of whose bodies were carried two leagues off. The rest of the buildings were so greatly damaged, that they have been all obliged to be propped up. The inhabitants, sufficiently happy in escaping the danger, abandoned all their effects, and fled across the fields. Their neighbours have exerted themselves in giving them assistance, particularly the abbots of Trois Fontaines, Jandeaures, and St. Hoil, the Superiors of which have given the most lively proofs proofs of their charity : and the priests, copying their example, have divided their clothes with the unfortunates, to the number of five hundred, who are daily maintained by them. All their poultry, with five hundred and thirty-five head of cattle, which formed the riches of the village, are destroyed, and the territory around laid waste."

Extract of a Letter from Barcelona, May 27.

"As the taking a French frigate by two Spanish ships of war has made so much noise, I have hereunder sent you a particular account of that affair :

"Don Jacques de Quevedo was ordered on a secret expedition with two ships under his command ; the packet he received on sailing, he was not to open till he got clear of the coast of Spain : on opening it, he found an order to intercept some vessels which were to sail from Constantinople for Algiers, with soldiers and ammunition. On the 15th of April, on the North side of the island of Sardinia, he saw a French vessel, which he chased, and coming up with, found to be one of those he was sent to take. She is called the Septemains, Capt. Louis Cerin, of 20 guns, eight and four pounders, having on board Hasslein Milkaiton, (a Turk) Ambassador from Algiers to Constantinople, in order to solicit 4000 troops, and also to purchase naval stores. There were on board also five other Turks and several Moors.

"The loading consists of several pieces of cotton, some thousands of iron bars, eighty-two pieces of iron ordnance, nineteen coppers for the arsenal, cloathing for 4000 Turks, a quantity of pieces of sail-cloth and other goods, with 25,000 piasters, being part of the money which the Ambassador carried with him from Algiers : the above, with his own effects, may amount to about 600,000 piasters, (about three shillings each) but without reckoning other goods, which have not yet been examined. The papers, passports, letters, &c. have all been sent up to court ; and we find that the 4000 Turks from Constantinople were landed near Tunis, and were to march by land to Algiers. Both the King's ships and prize are under quarantine, and wait the further orders of the court."

Extract of a Letter from Captain Hannel, Commander of an armed brig, fitted out at Jamaica, in the service of government, dated from Nantucket.

"I have to inform you, that I unfortunately fell in with, off Cape Nichola Mole, the Ranger privateer, of twenty guns, belonging to the Americans, commanded by one Miles Hudson ; she had under her protection three sloops, and one sloop, laden with fire-arms and ammunition, the latter of which we bore down upon with an intent to take ; but the Ranger, perceiving our design, hauled her wind, run under our stern, fired her broadside, and raked us fore and aft, killed eight, and wounded five of our men ; we engaged her near two hours, when they boarded us sword in hand : and, finding ourselves overpowered, we were obliged to strike our colours. I am suffered to walk about, being on a parole of honour, but the inferior officers, and the crew, are confined in a house about three miles from this place."

June 3d.

THE following is as true as it is uncommon.—On Wednesday the 8th instant, an ox of an extraordinary magnitude, (which had been fed by Henry Lutwidge, Esq; at Cooper's Hill) was killed at Wigan in Lancashire. It measured, when living, 16 hands in height, and was 9 feet 2 inches in girth over the part called the saddle ;—and weighed at the turnpike machine 196 stone.—After it was slaughtered, there was taken from it 9 score and 6lb of tallow, the surloin which weighed 67lb. cut nine inches deep of fat ; and the rump weighed 77lb. both of them cut as scant as possible.

June 5. The following paragraph, which was received yesterday, we shall insert verbatim et literatim.

To Mr. Printer.—you may antecatey the following paragraphy as a rial fact, wec are asured that a triable plague raiges with great violence amongst the poor in the parish house of St. Botlock Alegate Lower Presintcent, Nightiga Lane, and without some means is ufed to stopp this contagin it well communicat it self all ouver the parish to the great derre me it of the house keepers thaeer of.

The following curious advertisement appeared in the Salisbury Journal.—"If any person or persons know any thing against me, CHRONICLE.

Simon Pain, of Rollstone, in the county of Wilts, that will injure my character, let them give information thereof to any Justice of the Peace, and on giving me proper time, I will make due satisfaction. But if any one bribe Elizabeth Axford, of Winterbourn Stoke, to charge me with being concerned with her in any clandestine manner, without bringing any clear proof of the same, they shall be dealt with according to law. Or if any person bribe my wife Jane Pain to declare that I have lain with any other woman, they shall be dealt with according to law.—

"SIMON PAIN."

Monday a young grazier who came out of the high parts of Suffolk, being the first time he had ever been in town, was taken in by a couple of sharpers for 100 guineas in the following manner: They agreed for as many head of cattle as came to 95^l. gave what they called a bank post bill of 200^l. and desired the remainder of the money, which he readily consented to ; but when he went in the afternoon to get cash for it, it was discovered to be a forged one ; happily for him they had not got the cattle away, nor did they send for them as they said they would. They were both well dressed men.

June 8. The following letter was received at Lloyd's coffee-house, dated Bristol, June the 5th.

"I hereby certify, that I failed from Jamaica the 19th of April, in the ship called the Mars, and on the 4th of May, in lat. 29. 40. and lon. 67. 30. I fell in with a letter of Marque sloop, bound from Rhode Island to Cape Francois, with a cargo of provisions, to purchase gunpowder, mounted with four carriage and twelve swivel guns, and fourteen men. She hoisted provincial colours, and ordered me to come on board in my boat, and bring my ship's papers and letters with me, or they would sink me. This I complied with, and then he sent a prize-master on board to take the command of my ship, and ordered him to keep her company. The next day my mate proposed to the ship's company not to work the ship, which they agreed to; the captain made use of threats and promises, which had no effect on them; after many altercations, the captain of the armed sloop, not having men capable of working or navigating my ship, he on the second day ordered me to go on board my ship, and permitted me to proceed on my voyage, and this morning I arrived in the port of Bristol.

Signed, MAGS. MILLER."

June 10. On Saturday the 8th, General Smith and Thomas Brand Hollis, Esqrs. were brought from the King's-Bench prison to the court of King's-Bench in Westminster-Hall, to receive sentence on a conviction of bribery and other corrupt practices, at an election for the borough of Hindon. Being severally brought into court, Lord Mansfield enlarged on the heinous nature of the offence in so able, so judicious, so forcible, so convincing a manner, that the indignation of the auditors was roused against the culprits. His Lordship animadverted on every species of political corruption with the wisdom and the severity of a Solon: he demonstrated the utter impossibility of the existence of the constitution, if the fountain of legislation was tainted by the waters of corruption. His Lordship took a review of the crime, for the commission of which the parties had been convicted; he stated the immediate and the remote tendency of such offences: they were productive of so multiform a variety of evils, that liberty could not subsist an instant, unless they met with an effectual check. That check his Lordship determined they should experience in the instance before the court: it was not the quality of the offenders which should gloss over the nature of the offence. When culprits of high rank slooped to the commission of crimes, they levelled themselves with, and were not distinguishable from, the dregs of the people.

Lord Mansfield having thus explicitly delivered sentiments which did him infinite honour, Mr. Justice Aston pronounced the following sentence of the court. A fine of 1000 marks (866l. 13s. 4d.) each; six months imprisonment, for both parties; General Smith to find security for his good behaviour for three years, himself in 1000l. and two securities in 500l. each.

June 12. A common wild duck now sits upon nine eggs, in an oak tree (25 feet from the ground) standing near Mr. Newington's, at Etchingham, in Suffex. Upon a person's getting up to the eggs, which are supported by some small twigs laid cross-wise, the old duck left them; but soon after returned with the mallard, both of which kept hovering about the tree till the man had quitted it, when the duck immediately dropped on her eggs, and has continued to sit very close ever since.

June 13. Tuesday morning a young lady of fashion, in the neighbourhood of St. James's park, made an elopement with her father's butler. It is said she has 20,000l. at her own disposal. We hear they are gone for France. The young man is an Hibernian, and lately engaged in the family.

A letter from Beaumaris, dated May 17, says, "Last Monday was brought to bed at the Four Crosses, Denbighshire, Ellin Ellis, who is 72 years of age, and has been married 46 years. She has had twelve children by the same father, the oldest is 45, and the youngest before the last, 25 years of age. The last was still-born, owing, as it is imagined, to the mother's being frightened by a brute of a fellow telling her a fortnight ago, if she was with child it must be by the devil. This is so remarkable an event, that you may be sure her pregnancy was much called in question. Both she and her husband look very infirm. All this is fact, not a hearsay story."

June 15. The last letters from Barbadoes mention, that from December to April, they were very scarce of provisions, and that what little they had was sold at very high prices; but when those accounts came away, two ships from London were going in, which would relieve them very much, and as the merchants on this side have sent eight or ten sail, they will, about this time, be very plentifully supplied.

Yesterday one thousand tons of porter were shipped on board some transports in the river, for the use of the soldiers in America.

Three privateers are fitting out, and taking on board eight months provisions, at Deptford, and will be ready to sail for America in a few days. They are to mount from 32 to 40 guns, and are to cruize about the coast of America, to stop any trade being carried on by the Americans with any foreign powers.

Two men of war from Lima are arrived at Cadiz, with two millions and a half of dollars.

June 17. The following is part of a letter received from Brest: "The Vigilant and Modeste, two French East India ships, are arrived in this port in a distressed condition; one night in their passage, they fell in with two American privateers, which the latter thinking were English East Indiamen, immediately ran along side of them, and fired their broad-broad-sides; upon which a regular engagement ensued, which lasted a considerable time; when, at length, after the loss of a number of men, and the greatest part of their rigging being shot away, the Indiamen were obliged to cease firing.—The Captains of the privateers, when they found their mistake, gave the Indiamen all the assistance that was in their power."

June 20. From Jamaica we have advice, that a vessel which Admiral Gayton had granted a commission to, that she might be fitted out by some planters at Kingston, as a privateer to cruise off the French and Spanish islands for the American vessels trading thither, had been seized by a numerous mob at Kingston, who destroyed her masts and rigging, after which they threw her guns overboard and skuttled the vessel.

The following is extracted from a letter received by a gentleman in the city, within these few days, from a planter on the south-side of Jamaica; a privateer, fitted out by the merchants at Kingston, which is called the Defiance, met with, off Port au Prince, an American privateer of the same force as herself, when a severe engagement ensued, which continued a considerable time, when at length the former, after sustaining great loss, was obliged to yield to the provincial flag, and was carried into port."

By some fresh intelligence received from New York, we are informed the Americans have purchased nine ships of the line from foreign powers, which are arrived at their different sea-ports, and are sitting out as fast as possible.

June 21. The vessels fitted out from America as merchantmen, are all the property of the congress; so that if they are taken, the loss falls upon the community at large, and not upon any private person.

The expences attending the king's removal to Windsor from Saturdays to Mondays, are computed at 500*l.* per week, owing to the extraordinary baggage of all sorts which follow kings. It was this that occasioned the reply of the late king to the duke of Cumberland, when importuned by his royal highness to pay him a visit at Windsor:—"No, no, William, (says he) come and live with me, and welcome; but my going to live with you for a month will cost the nation ten thousand pounds."

A calculation and type of the great and total eclipse of the moon in July 1776.

On Tuesday the 30th of July, near twelve at night, will happen the greatest eclipse of the moon there has been for 26 years past, and a greater than will happen for many years to come; visible to all Europe, Africa, the island of Madagascar, all the lesser isles of the Indian sea, the Atlantic ocean, in Iceland, Greenland, Newfoundland, the island of Cape Breton, the Caribbee Islands, Terra Firma, and through South America.

The first principles of astronomy and geography are now so well known, it seems unnecessary to give a particular description of a lunar eclipse, it being caused by the moon's passing thro' the earth's shadow (cast by the sun, and extending beyond the moon's orbit) and being in the continuation of a right line joining the centres of the sun and earth, and nearly in the plane of their motions, and is visible wherever the moon is above the horizon at the time of the eclipse.

The following singular circumstance is certainly true.—A few days ago a calf belonging to a gentleman at Hawkhead, in Lancashire, was heard to make an uncommon noise by the side of the river, where it had been drinking; on going up to it, there was a large pike seen hanging to its nostrils, which, it is supposed, had seized the calf while it was drinking, and which the calf had dragged about 50 yards from the river. One of the people disengaged them by striking the pike with a stone which killed it. There were found in the belly of this voracious fish, a large Norway rat, and a perch entire, besides parts of several other fishes.—The pike weighed 45 pounds.

Clonmell, July 9.

AT night a dreadful fire broke out in the out-offices of Mrs. Catherine Burnett, in Clougheen, in which many valuable effects were entirely consumed; the flames communicated themselves to the dwelling-house of Mrs. Burnett, owing to its vicinity to the offices, which would have inevitably shared the same fate, were it not prevented by the timely assistance of the inhabitants of that town.

By a gentleman from Clonemall in the county of Carlow, we are informed, that at that place, on Saturday last (between the hours of one and two in the afternoon, and till near six in the evening) there was the greatest thunder shower and lightning ever remembered, attended with an amazing fall of flakes of ice; and also, at Menart in the county of Wexford, the same shower of ice, which covered the ground to the height of one foot and upwards.

Anecdote of General Lee.

The now famous American General Lee, when in the British service, had taken a mortal hatred to the Scots, in so much, that he could not help running down them and their country in every company he was in; and once in particular, being at supper with some gentlemen, among whom he knew there were Scotsmen, before sitting down, he begged leave to tell the company, that he had a vile custom (when fuddled) of passing jokes on different persons and nations, particularly the Scots; and hoped, none of the company would take it seriously, as it was merely the effects of liquor.—Upon which, capt. Turnbull, a Scotsman, imitating Mr. Lee's manner, begged the company would also indulge him, in a peculiar failing he was subject to, when fuddled; and that was, that when he heard himself or his country insulted and laughed at, he was sure instantly to knock down the offender; and hoped nobody present would attribute his violence to any thing but the fumes of the liquor.—The consequence of this well-timed speech, by a man of captain Turnbull's apparent bulk and strength, was, that Mr. Lee behaved with great civility, and never mentioned Scotland the whole evening.

By a letter from Liverpoole we are informed, that the fleet which plundered the island of New Providence consisted of seven sail, commodore Hopkins, commander, viz. two ships of 30 guns each; two brigantines of 14 guns; one sloop of 12 guns, and one of 6 guns; and one schooner of 8 guns.—They took governor Brown and secretary Babbedge prisoners, and a Mr. Irvine belonging to Charlestown, all of whom were in the fleet when they engaged the Glasgow man of war.—The colours of the American fleet were striped under the union with 13 strokes, called the Thirteen United Colonies, and their standard a Rattle-snake.—Motto, "Don't tread upon me."

A letter from Bristol mentions, that the Juno, captain Marson, in company with four other homeward bound Jamaica-men, were attacked by the Provincial privateers, who carried off four out of five, and that the other was released because the Provincials had not men sufficient to man them all, and she is since arrived at Bristol.

Two women were whipped from Newgate to College-green, pursuant to their sentence for stealing a quantity of linen out of the shop of Mr. Sweetman of Nicholas-street.

At night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, two gentlemen were stopped near the Bason-lane, in James's-street, by three footpads armed with swords and pistols, who robbed them of what cash they had about them and a watch; one of them snapped a pistol at the gentleman, which happily did not go off.

Carlow,

Carlow, July 10.] Last week as some carmen from Arlas, in the Queen's-county, were going to Dublin, one of their cars accidentally overset at the moat of Ardcul, near Athy, at which time a man (whose name we do not know) was walking in the road a little way before them, to whom they called for assistance, but the man being deaf, and not seeing them, continued his pace. When they raised the car, they pursued him, and when they came to where he was, one of them knocked him down with the flat of a car, and when down beat him unmercifully, he was taken to the infirmary at Kildare, where, we hear, he died of the contusions he received. The villains immediately absconded, leaving their horses, cars, and loading behind them.

Monday July 11, Inst. was fixed for a battle at Chinkford Hatch (England), between William Wood, a horse-hair weaver, and a noted Irish bruiser. Large sums were laid on the issue of the battle, which indeed was more fatal than could have been apprehended. The combatants took the ring at two o'clock, and fought with the utmost fury for about three minutes, when Wood gave his antagonist a violent blow, which brought him to the ground, and appeared as if it would have decided the contest; but at this instant about 150 Irishmen, armed with sticks and bludgeons, which they had secreted under their coats, broke into the ring, laid about them at a horrid rate, drove off the Englishmen, put an end to the battle, and revived the History of Balf and M'Quirk at Brentford. One James Parrot, a distinguished bruiser, was beaten so dreadfully, that he was laid on a dunghill as dead; but afterwards recovered so as to be carried to London in a cart. Happy would it have been if the matter had ended here; but the battle was afterwards renewed on the spot, and on the road to London, till in the end ten persons were killed, seven English and three Irish, whose bodies were conveyed to Stratford to be owned. More than 700l. it is thought depended on this battle, which is to be fought again on a future day.

Thomas Connor, alias James Smith, who stands indicted for the murder of John Howell, whose body was concealed in a sack, said Connor was carrying through Stonybattery, late one night last winter, and stopped by a revenue officer seizing it as runned goods, which Connor threw down and ran off, and for the apprehending of which murderer, government advertised a reward of fifty pounds, sterl. was, on Friday the 12th of July, tried at Old Bailey (London) and capitally convicted for stealing a quantity of silk, value 100l. in the dwelling-house of Mr. Edward Mason, in Raven-row, Spital-fields, in said city.

6.] Richard Phare, a taylor, passing thro' Wincetavern street, about twelve o'clock at night, was rabbed in the side by a villain unknown, and dangerously wounded.

At the commission of oyer and terminer in his majesty's court of King's Bench, the following persons were tried and convicted, Patrick Murphy and John Lyndon, for street robbery, to be executed on Wednesday the 31st inst. John Allen for robbing Mr. Perin of his watch, to be executed on Wednesday the 7th of August next; and Henry Mallaky and Elinor Murphy for robbing Thomas Clarke, to be executed on the 9th of November next.

Patrick Donnelly for stealing clothes to be whipped from Newgate to College-green, on Saturday the 3d and Saturday the 10th of August next; and Martha Minchin, for petty felony, to be confined six months and give security for her future good behaviour. The court adjourned to the 12th of October next.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For AUGUST, 1776.

Memoirs of Commodore Hopkins.

MR. Robert Esq Hopkins was born the latter end of the year 1718, at Portsmouth, a town on the river Piscataqua, in New England. His father, who commanded a mast ship, which traded from that port to London, having a predilection for a sea life, brought his son Robert to England, when he was but ten years old, and put him to an academy in Tower-street, London, to learn mathematics and navigation. The boy's progress answered fully the father's expectation, and as old Mr. Hopkins was an excellent seaman, and a complete artist, he was able, every time he came to London, to examine into his son's improvement, which gave him the highest satisfaction.

When Robert had attained his fifteenth year, his father thought it was proper to add practice to theory; he therefore took him from the academy, and carrying him with him to New England, bound him apprentice to Mr. Joseph Wainwright, commander of the Joseph and Anne, a vessel of two hundred and fifty tons burthen, which traded also in masts between New and Old England. It is probable Mr. Hopkins did not bind his son to himself, that he might not presume so much on his fatherly affection, as to August, 1776.

neglect his duty; and beside, as he grew old, and had acquired a decent competency, he did not fail above three years longer, but letting his mate go master, stayed entirely at home, promising his son, that if he behaved well, and proved himself sufficiently capable, he would, at the expiration of his apprenticeship, put him in as master of his ship, of which he was two thirds owner.

Animated by these promises, and by his love for the sea, young Hopkins omitted no opportunity of making himself thorough master of every branch of sea duty, and when he had served three years, captain Wainwright made him his chief mate, in which station he behaved with equal satisfaction to his captain and crew, who all loved him affectionately.

In this manner he passed his life till his time was out, and then he claimed his father's promise; but, alas! the old man's mind was changed. After having been a widower twelve years, he married the widow of a captain of a ship, who had a son two years older than Robert, and she wrought so much on the old gentleman, as to get the command of his ship for her son. Indeed one circumstance seemed to give some colour of equity to this this step. Young Robert had cast an eye of liking on a maid servant of his father's, who did not prove cruel; the amour was carried on for some time, till its effects became too visible to be any longer hid. When she was questioned about the author of her disgrace, she very readily named Robert, who had been too much accustomed to truth to deny any thing with which he had been charged; he confessed his fault; but amongst the rigid dissenters of New England, it was a fault not to be overlooked. After this éclaircissement, had Robert continued in the country, he would have been obliged to marry her, as the girl, though poor, and in a servile state, was of a decent family, and no crime could be laid to her charge, but that of listening to Robert's addresses. His father thought proper that he should engage in some other employ, till they could find some means to provide for the damsel; but Robert took that care off their hands. A young fellow, who had been his fellow, though senior apprentice, having just obtained the command of a vessel from North Carolina, he took Robert as mate, and gave his consent to his carrying Susan with him to London, where they safely arrived the beginning of the year 1741.

As young Hopkins was, contrary to the temper of most sea men, of a saving disposition, and had good success in his little ventures during the latter part of his apprenticeship, he was in pretty good circumstances; he took a lodging in Wapping for Susan, where she was brought to bed, but whether from the agitation of her spirits, or the fatigues of a tempestuous voyage, the child was born dead.

This circumstance was not unpleasing to young Hopkins; he began to consider the consequences of this connexion, and knowing he had a powerful rival in his step-mother's son, he thought his best way would be to recover the good graces of his father, who had it in his power so materially to benefit or injure his future fortune. He therefore told Susan, as he had been the unhappy cause of her misfortunes, and her leaving her native country, he thought he was bound in honour to provide for her, till she should be in a situation to provide for herself. He should, he said, allow her a decent maintenance, and as Providence had thought proper the child should not live, every farther connexion, except that of friendship must be at an end, as it would be most prudent not to repeat a fault, which must be productive of bad consequences. After a few tears and entreaties, Susan acquiesced, and Robert leaving her twenty guineas for her support till his return, took his leave and sailed for North Carolina, sending to his father a candid account of what he had done.

The war with Spain now raging with great violence, men were greatly wanted for the navy. Press-gangs and sloop upon the impress service swarmed every where, and the usual protections were of no avail. This circumstance became of consequence to Robert on the following occasion.

Looking one night, during the voyage, over the captain's journal, he was astonished to find between the leaves of it a letter in Susan's hand, the contents of which too plainly shewed that the captain had shared her favours. Although Robert had determined to have no farther connexion with her, yet he was enraged, that whilst he had been balancing in his mind about her, she should have betrayed him; and also that his captain should have been so treacherous. He went instantly into the cabin, with the letter in his hand, and waking him, reproached him in the bitterest terms for his behaviour, telling him if he was not his commander, he would have instant satisfaction, but that as soon as they came on shore, he would insist upon it, and if he would not give it him, he would use him like a scoundrel.

The captain knew Robert's resolute spirit, and that he would most assuredly keep his word; and as he was rather timid, and loved to sleep in whole bones, he began to project some stratagem to secure him from the fury of his injured mate. He prevaricated, hesitated and strove to appease him, but finding all in vain, he promised he would give him satisfaction as soon as they came to port. Satisfied with this, Robert continued to do his duty in a sullen manner, and refused from that moment any longer to mess with his commander.

The third day after this dispute, the ship came off cape Hatteras, on the coast of North Carolina, when it was met with by a man of war, who having brought the vessel to, sent a boat on board to press some of the hands. Young Hopkins was amongst the number picked out by the lieutenant, when he pleaded he was entitled to protection, as being chief mate of the ship. It was at that moment the captain had an opportunity of ridding himself of his fears, and completing his treachery. He told the lieutenant lieutenant it was true Hopkins had been his mate, but he had broke him for mutinous behaviour; he therefore desired the lieutenant to take him especially, and to keep a strict eye upon him, as a very desperate fellow. Hopkins was thunderstruck at this baseness, but it was in vain to remonstrate, he was secured and put on board the man of war, whilst his menaces to his treacherous commander, only served to confirm what had been said about him.

When Mr. Hopkins came on board the man of war, he endeavoured to stifle his resentment, and conform himself to his new station. It was soon perceived he was an expert seaman and an able navigator. He told the officers who he was, and how he had been served, desiring only an opportunity to write to his father for proper recommendations; but it was some time before he could do it. The ship he was in failed to join admiral Vernon's fleet, and there Hopkins was put on board the Burford, the flag-ship. The attack on Portobello, which followed presently after, gave Hopkins an opportunity of signaling himself, and a petty officer on board recollecting him, assured the admiral he was of a good family, who thereupon ordered him to walk the quarter deck.

Some time after this he had an opportunity, by a victualler, of acquainting his father of his situation, who lost no time in procuring letters of recommendation, and sending him proper supplies. At the return of the admiral to England, as Mr. Hopkins had contracted a liking for the navy, he got to be rated as master's mate, on board his majesty's store-ship, Princess Royal, captain Edward Barber, and in the year 1747, having passed his examination at the Trinity-house, he was appointed master of the Weazel sloop, in which station he continued till the peace.

In the year 1749 he returned home, just time enough to close his father's eyes, who divided his fortune equally between him and his step-brother, Mr. Whipple, who had proved a very worthy, deserving man. Mr. Hopkins then made America his chief residence, and bought a vessel, in which he traded to London, till the war broke out again in the year 1755, when he again, pursuing the calls of honour, returned to the navy, and was master of several ships till the peace of 1763.

It had been regulated at that peace, that all commission and warrant officers should be employed for the space of three years, in rotation; Mr. Hopkins waited with patience the first three years, and came to London in 1766, expecting to be employed in his turn, although by his fortune he was under no necessity of wishing for a naval employment, but as his right. However he was disappointed, others were preferred to him who did not inherit his abilities or qualifications; but they had the friendship of some great men, whom Hopkins would never condescend to solicit; after being put off with promises for nine months, he returned to America, throwing up his half-pay, and resolving to attach himself to his native country for the rest of his days.

When the American troubles made it necessary for the congress to form a marine, Mr. Hopkins from his experience, courage and abilities, was thought a proper person to be at the head of it; he accepted the commission with cheerfulness, and how he has acted since, the public news-papers give sufficient testimony.

As our readers may be curious to know what became of Susan and the treacherous captain; we can inform them that the first was married to a publican in Rotherhithe, and the latter was cast away and drowned many years ago off the cape of Virginia. As for Mr. Hopkins we do not hear that he has been married.

The Life of Dr. Henry Aldrich.

Aldrich (Henry) an eminent philosopher and divine, flourished towards the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century. He was born at Westminster in the year 1647, and educated under the famous Dr. Busby. In autumn, 1662, he was admitted at Christ-church college, in Oxford. He took the degree of bachelor of arts, May 31, 1666, and that of master, April 3, 1669. Soon after he entered into holy-orders, and on the 15th of February, 1671, was installed canon of Christ-church, and the March following took the degrees of bachelor and doctor in divinity. He had a great share in the controversy with the papists, during the reign of king James II. and bishop Burnet ranks him amongst those eminent clergyman, "who examined all the points of popery with a solidity of judgment, a clearness of arguing, a depth of learning, and a vivacity of writing, far beyond any thing that had before that time appeared in our language."

Dr. Aldrich had rendered himself so conspicuous, that at the revolution, when J. Masséy, the popish dean of Christ-church, fled beyond sea, his deanery was conferred upon him, and he was installed the 17th of June, 1689. In this station he behaved in the most exemplary manner; he zealously promoted learning, religion, and virtue, in the college where he presided; and it owes much of its beauty to his ingenuity, for he was the designer of the beautiful square called Peckwater-quadrangle, which is esteemed an excellent piece of architecture. In imitation of his predecessor bishop Fell, he annually published a piece of some antient Greek author, as a present to the students of his house. He wrote likewise a system of logic, and some other pieces. The revising of lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion was committed to his care, jointly with Dr. Sprat.

Besides the preferments already mentioned, Dr. Aldrich was rector of Wem, in Shropshire, and chosen prolocutor of the convocation in 1702. This worthy divine died on the 14th of December, 1710, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

Having never been married, he appropriated most of his income to works of hospitality and beneficence.

The Life of William Alexander, Earl of Sterling.

Alexander (William) earl of Sterling, an eminent statesman and poet of Scotland, was born in 1580, and lived in the reigns of king James I. and king Charles I. He gave early specimens of a rising genius. After having received a liberal education, he travelled with the duke of Argyle as his tutor or companion. Upon his return from foreign parts, he repaired to Scotland, where he passed some time in a rural retirement, and finished his Aurora, a poetical complaint on the unsuccessful address he had made to his mistress; for before he went abroad, when he was but fifteen years of age, he had seen some beauty, by whom he had been so captivated, that neither the amusement of travelling, nor the sight of so many fair foreigners, as he calls the river Loir to witness he had there met with, could remove his affection. At his return, he renewed his courtship, and wrote above an hundred love-sonnets; till matrimony disposing of his mistress to another person, he also married, as a remedy for his passion.

He now removed to the court of king James VI. where he applied himself to the more solid and useful species of poetry. He endeavoured to form himself upon the plan of the ancient Greek and Roman tragedies, and accordingly we find a tragedy of his published upon the story of Darius, at Edinburgh, in 1603; also, two poems, the one congratulating his majesty upon his entry into England, and the other upon the inundation of Doven, where the king used to recreate himself with the diversion of hawking. The same year his Aurora was printed at London, dedicated to Agnes Douglas, countess of Argyle: and his Parænesis, to prince Henry. In this last piece he gives many excellent instructions, and shews that the happiness of a prince depends on making choice of truly worthy, disinterested, and public-spirited counsellors; he sets forth how the lives of eminent men may be read to the greatest advantage; he develops the characters of vicious kings, displays the glory of martial achievements: and hopes, if the prince should ever make an expedition into Spain, that he might attend him, and be be his Homer to sing his exploits there.

In the year 1607, his dramatic performances, intitled, The Monarchie Tragedies, were published, containing, besides Darius above-mentioned, Cræsus, the Alexandræan Tragedy, and Julius Cæsar. They are dedicated to king James, in a poem of thirteen stanzas; and his majesty is said to have been pleased with them, and to have called him his philosophical poet. John Davis of Hereford, in his book of epigrams published in the year 1611, has one to our author, in praise of his tragedies: in this he says, that Alexander the Great had not gained more glory with his sword than this Alexander acquired by his pen. Michael Drayton speaks of him too with great affection and esteem.

In 1613, Alexander wrote a poem called Doomsday, or the great Day of Judgment, which is divided into twelve books. The same year he was sworn in one of the gentlemen-ushers of the presence to prince Charles; and the king appointed him master of the Requests, and conferred upon him the honour of knighthood; so that he now appeared more in the character of a statesman than a poet. He projected the settlement of a colony at Nova-Scotia, to be carried on at his own expence, and of such adventurers as would be engaged in the undertaking. His majesty gave him a grant of that country in 1621, and intended to have created an order of baronets, for encouraging and supporting so noble a work, but he died before this was carried into execution. His son Charles I. was so fond of the scheme, that, soon after his accession to the throne, he appointed Sir William Alexander lieutenant of Nova Scotia, and founded the order of knights-baronet in Scotland.

In the year 1626, the king appointed Sir William secretary of state for Scotland; and in September, 1630, created him a peer of that kingdom, by the title of viscount Sterling; and in less than three years after, he created him earl of Sterling, by letters patent, dated June 14, 1633. His lordship discharged the office of secretary with the most unblemished reputation, for near fifteen years, even to his death, which happened on the 12th of February, 1640. "His poetry, says Mr. Granger, for purity and elegance is far beyond the generality of the productions of the age in which he lived.

The Life of Alfred.

Alfred the Great, king of England, was the youngest son of Ethelwolf, and was born at Wantage, in Berkshire, in 849. He distinguished himself, during the reign of his brother Ethelred, in several engagements with the Danes, and upon his death succeeded to the crown, in the year 871, and the twenty-second of his age. The Danes had already penetrated into the heart of the kingdom, and all the sea-ports were filled with their fleets. Before Alfred had been a month upon the throne, he was obliged to take the field against these formidable enemies, and a desperate battle was fought at Wilton, to the disadvantage of the English. But it was not in the power of misfortune to abate the king's diligence; he took such measures for repairing the damage he had sustained, that he was in a little time enabled to hazard another engagement; and the Danes, who had been roughly handled in the last battle, dreading his courage and activity, proposed terms of peace, which he did not think proper to refuse. They, by this treaty, agreed to relinquish the kingdom; but, instead of complying with their engagement, they only removed from one place to another, burning and destroying wherever they came.

Alfred, thus opposed to an enemy whom no stationary force could resist, no treaty could bind, found himself unable to repel the efforts of these ravagers, who were constantly reinforced, under every loss, by fresh shoals of their adventurous countrymen. Some of his subjects, therefore, left their country, and retired into Wales; while others submitted to the conquerors, and purchased their lives at the expence of their freedom. In this universal defection, Alfred vainly attempted to remind them of the duty they owed their country and their king; but finding his remonstrances ineffectual, he was obliged to submit to the wretched necessity of the times. Accordingly he assumed a disguise the most likely to conceal him, not resigning either his hopes or courage; but waiting for a fit opportunity to recover his throne, and restore liberty to his oppressed subjects. After having properly disposed of his family, and settled a method of communication with some trusty friends, he engaged himself in the service of his own cowherd. The wife of the herdsman was ignorant ignorant of the rank of her royal guest, and seeing him one day busy by the fire side, in trimming his bow and arrows, she desired him to take care of some cakes that were baking at the fire, while she was employed in other domestic affairs; but Alfred, whose thoughts were otherwise engaged, forgot the cakes, and the woman, on her return, finding them burnt, chid the king very severely, telling him, that he was always willing enough to eat her hot cakes, though he was so negligent in turning them. The patient prince entreated her pardon, and promised to be more careful for the future.

He soon, however, left his station, and, with his wife, and some valuable friends, found a safe retreat in the isle of Athelney, in Somersetshire, which was secured by vast morasses around it, and accessible only by one, and that an obscure passage.

In this retreat Alfred lay concealed for a considerable time, when the news of a prosperous event called him thence. Ubba, the chief of the Danish commanders, had ravaged the country of Wales without opposition, and, in his return, invested the castle of Kenwith, into which Odun, earl of Devonshire, had retired with a small body of troops, at the approach of the Danes. This gallant nobleman, finding himself unable to sustain a siege, and knowing there was no safety in surrendering to such a cruel, perfidious enemy, represented to his followers, that they had nothing to depend upon but their valour, and proposed that they should cut their way through the besiegers with their swords. The proposal being embraced, they sallied out upon the Danes, and not only routed them with great slaughter, and slew Ubba, but also took their famous magic standard, exhibiting the picture of a raven, which was wrought by Ubba's sisters, and revered as an hallowed ensign. These three sisters, as the tradition went, wrought the ensign on purpose for this expedition, in revenge of their father Lodebroc's murder; it was made almost in an instant, being begun and finished in a noontide, and was believed by the Danes to carry great fatality with it. The influence of superstition is prodigious, and it may easily be conceived, that the loss of this standard had no inconsiderable effects on both sides.

This victory re-animated the drooping spirits of the English, and Alfred took the advantage of their favourable disposition, as well as the security of the enemy, who no longer kept within their entrenchments, but dispersed themselves in a careless manner over the whole face of the country. That he might be perfectly informed of the enemy's posture, he entered their camp in person, in the habit of a harper, and remained with them three whole days, during which he strolled about, and reconnoitred every particular of their œconomy and situation. He found them lulled in the most supine security, spending their time in riots and feasting, without even appointing the common guards of a camp. Having made his observations, he returned to his retreat, and detached proper emissaries among his subjects, whom he appointed to meet him in arms at Brexton, in the forest of Selwood, where they assembled with great alacrity, under a prince whom they adored. From thence he began his march, in the week preceding Whitsuntide, towards the Danes, who lay encamped at Yattendun, on the skirts of Hampshire; and, in the morning of the third day, was in sight of the enemy, before they knew he had taken the field. Without giving them time to recover themselves from their surprise, or range their troops in order of battle, he attacked them with such impetuosity, that they were immediately routed with great slaughter; and though the remains of them, amounting to a great number, fled for refuge into a fortified camp in the neighbourhood, they were unprovided for a siege, and in less than a fortnight obliged to surrender at discretion. The victor, having taken hostages for the performance of articles, proposed that they should either quit the country, after promising, upon oath, that they would never return; or embrace the Christian religion, and be contented with such lands as he should assign them. In short, he settled a firm and lasting peace; and having delivered the kingdom from its late miserable bondage, he applied himself, as a wise monarch, not only to secure the crown, but to cultivate his people, and establish the most wholesome laws.

London had been almost destroyed by the Danes: Alfred restored it to more than its ancient glory, appointed it the place where the states should assemble twice every year, and declared it the metropolis of England. He also repaired and built several other cities and considerable towns: and wisely considering ing, that it was not only much more easy, but of much greater consequence to prevent the landing of his enemies, than to drive them back when landed, he applied with the utmost assiduity to the improvement of his navy. He was sensible of the natural advantages of his island; and he improved those advantages. The destruction of several Danish fleets sufficiently evinced his wisdom. He also repaired all the castles on the sea-coasts, and built a number of new fortifications.

No man could be a more absolute monarch than Alfred: for, besides that he was the legal inheritor of the crown, he had won it by his sword, and enlarged his dominions beyond what any of his ancestors possessed. But though thus absolute, he soon convinced his people, that he desired not to establish a tyranny among them, or to infringe their liberties; for the welfare of whom he proved himself eminently concerned, by the laudable measures which he took to promote it. That he might form the best body of laws possible, he consulted all the ancient laws, and from them composed a digest of such as seemed most equitable and proper for his people. To him we owe many of those advantages, which render our constitution dear to us; for instance, trials by juries. If we rely on Sir John Spelman's conjecture, his institutions were the foundation of what is called the common-law; so styled either on account of its being the common-law of all the Saxons, or because it was common both to the Saxons and Danes. It is very observable, throughout his laws, how much a spirit of mercy discovers itself; and how great a regard is paid to the lives of his people: recourse is not had to blood-shedding for every minute offence; a particular well worthy notice and imitation. It is also plain from his laws, that he looked upon himself as supreme head of the church in his own dominions, since he imposed such fines and punishments upon the clergy, as are inconsistent with a submission to the papal tyranny. But the kingdom was in a state of such confusion that much more was necessary than the mere institution of laws; prosecution and discovery of offenders were almost impossible. To remedy this, he divided the kingdom into shires, hundreds, and tythings; by which means the behaviour of every individual was known, and every offender easily brought to justice. The order of under-sheriffs was appointed by him, as also the use of writs, for the means of just and ready prosecution of right.

So strange and sudden a change did these institutions produce in the kingdom, that whereas before there was no travelling without arms, there was soon not only safe passage, but all places became so secure (as well they might, when the householders in every tything, or society of ten men, stood pledges to the king for the good appearance of themselves, and of all the head-boroughs in their tything) that when the king, for experience sake, caused golden bracelets to be hung up in the cross-ways, they seemed to deride the passenger, for no man durst lay his hands on them. Virgins might safely travel any where alone. Nay, (saith Ingulfus) if one left his money all night in the high-ways, he might come the next morning and be sure to find it all, whole and untouched. A marvellous effect of a notable ordinance, and such perhaps as one would hardly believe either so suddenly to have ensued, or so far to have prevailed. But who can imagine, that so exact a distribution of people, under so strict a subordination of government, should produce less than an extraordinary effect?

In consequence of this division of his kingdom, he framed a book, called the Book of Winchester, which contained a survey of the kingdom, and of which the Doomday book, still preserved in the Exchequer, is no more than a second edition.

Notwithstanding the provision of good laws, and the division of the kingdom, by which the administration of justice was rendered easy, men were wanting, capable of administering justice; and there was a great scarcity of such men, to the great chagrin and discontent of the king. Amidst the late devastations and destructive war, little regard had been paid to the cultivation of the mind; the high and low were almost equally illiterate. Hence great part of the justice of the kingdom came, as it were by appeal, to be administered by the king himself; a burden which he bore with incredible patience and zeal, till by all due application, proper men were found to serve in the high offices of justice; into which he never would admit any man, who was not reasonably qualified for them, nor gave hopes of future improvement. The consequence was happy: a harvest of able and worthy men sprung up, to the great honour of the king, and the happiness of the subject.

But the noble mind of Alfred was not satisfied with endeavours for the external welfare of his people: he perceived their manners were greatly corrupt, and well knowing, that the reformation is weak, which depends solely upon outward compulsion, he determined to apply all his efforts towards enlightening their ignorance, and cultivating their minds. He very well knew, that this was to be done principally by instruments appointed for that purpose, teachers of God's word, who by instruction, exhortation, and admonition, might bring about a perfect reformation. But religion, and religious knowledge, was in no better condition than the teachers of it; this was almost lost, these were almost universally ignorant. To apply therefore as early and as effectual a remedy as the circumstances would admit, he himself commenced teacher, in a manner which always has been of great utility, among an uncultivated people. He composed as well as collected parables, fables, proverbs, moral and sacred songs. He was a poet of the first class for those times; and, as the monk of Malmesbury assures us, no less elegant in his compositions than in his delivery of them. The effect of his wise and pious care was eminent; his instructions were received with high satisfaction, and conveyed so pleasingly, that they made great impressions.

But while the king was thus providing for the instruction of his people, he did not omit all other methods to promote learning, and encourage pious men. His liberality was great to such; he invited them into his kingdom from all parts; and though, upon his accession to the throne, there was scarce a man in the kingdom who could translate a Latin epistle, or understood the Latin service, yet in a few years he furnished all his bishoprics with men of learning, and, in general, competently instructed and qualified for so great a charge. For the promotion of good knowledge, as well as preservation of it, he caused many parts of the Scriptures, and several other useful books, to be translated into the vulgar tongue: nay he himself, who was the most learned man in his kingdom, translated several pieces, and among the rest Gregory's Pastoral, concerning the duties of Bishops and Priests, a copy of which he sent to every bishop's son, and in a preface to the bishop of

The wisdom and piety of the king looked still further. He was desirous of a supply of good and able men to discharge the duties of church and state: and therefore he instituted schools in various parts of the kingdom, and founded an University at Oxford, for the perfecting his scholars in sound learning. Three halls were founded there, for the different branches of grammar, philosophy, and theology, and a certain stipend settled for the maintenance of a professor and twenty-six scholars in each, to be restricted under proper regulations, respecting their study and religious duties; regulations which have constantly prevailed, and have always rendered our English universities superior to those of different countries, where such pious decency and strict regularity is not observed.

But not attentive only to matters of religion or literature, he was no less careful to encourage industry. Artificers and manufacturers were invited from abroad by the greatest encouragements: and his country was stored with men of abilities, in every trade and profession; by which means the felicity, wealth, and good order of his people were remarkably advanced. His military discipline was no less admirable: we do not dwell upon it; but we must not omit to mention the militia, which he formed under such wise regulations, that every single man of his dominions understood the use of arms: and by means of beacons placed at proper distances, and lighted upon any alarm, a body of well-trained forces was ready to take up their arms, and assemble at the place of rendezvous, under the command of the lieutenant of the county, where the immediate service was required. His successes are a sufficient proof of his abilities in war. There have been few greater soldiers than Alfred; he fought sixty-six set battles by sea and land, and of these eight in one year. He was, however, so far from being of a cruel or ambitious temper, that he never willingly made war on any, or refused to grant peace whenever it was desired. Nor was he less attentive to his naval than his military force. He was the first English king who seemed to assert the dominion of the sea, and to be sensible of the happy situation of our island. As to the form of his ships, we are not absolutely certain tain. It is however true, that he had vessels for traffic, as well as war. He traded to the East Indies; and we are credibly informed, by authentic records, that this enterprising monarch even employed one Oðher, a Dane, to discover the north-east passage. Some account of his voyage remains to this day.

In the management of affairs of state, he made use of the great council of the kingdom, consisting of bishops, earls, the king's aldermen, and his chief thanes or barons. These, in the first part of his reign, he convoked as occasion served: but when things were better settled, he made a law, that twice in the year at least, an assembly should be held at London. As to extraordinary affairs, and such as would not admit of calling great councils, the king acted therein by the advice of those bishops, earls, and officers of the army, who happened to be about his person.

Thus great in war, and great in peace, he established himself on the throne, and dispensed the most important blessings to his people. "Occupied as he was, says an historian, in this great work of laying the foundation of the English constitution, his attention stooped even to the minutest circumstance of his people's conveniency. He introduced the art of brick-making, and built his own houses of those materials, which being much more durable, lightly, and secure from accidents, than timber, his example was followed, first by his nobles, and afterwards by the subjects in general, who vied with each other in expressing their reverence and affection for this illustrious monarch. He was, doubtless, an object of the most perfect esteem and admiration; for exclusive of the qualities which distinguished him as a warrior and legislator, his personal character was amiable in every respect."

Alfred discovered, from his youth, the most serious as well as studious disposition; and his piety, throughout his life, was exemplary. As soon as he was established on the throne, he not only repaired all the religious houses in his kingdom, but erected and endowed new ones, where he deemed them wanted.

The reader must consider the state of religion in those times, and the excellent design of these houses in their first institution, not the abuse of them in future ages, to form a just notion of Alfred's regard to works of piety. He devoted to God one half of his annual revenue, to be employed in works of piety. To this end, he caused his officers yearly to divide into two equal parts by weight, the whole of his income; and, this done, to subdivide one of these halves into four equal parts; the first of which he assigned to the relief of the poor in general; the second to the support of the monasteries he had built himself; the third to the maintenance of the schools, &c. which he had founded; and the fourth to the general relief of all religious houses at home and abroad, as we have already mentioned. The other half of his revenue was also divided into three parts, for three distinct uses; for officers fees and wages; for workmen and labourers wages; and for entertainment and reward of strangers. He formed three different households, each under a separate lord chamberlain; these waited in their turns, a month every quarter, so that in the year, each of the king's menial servants was four months at court, and eight at home.

As he honoured God with his substance, so did he honour him no less with his personal service. Dividing the twenty four hours into three parts, he devoted the first eight hours to God, the second to the affairs of his kingdom, and the third to natural rest and refreshment. The method he took for dividing his time was singular. As there were then no such things as clocks, or hour-glasses in use, he caused six wax-candles to be made, each twelve inches long, and of as many ounces weight; on these candles he caused the inches to be regularly marked, and having found that one of them burnt just four hours, he committed them to the care of the keepers of his chapel, who from time to time gave him notice how the hours went. But as in windy weather the candles were wasted by the impression of the air on the flame, to remedy this inconvenience, he invented lanthorns, there being then no glass to be met with in his dominions. As to the public affairs of his kingdom, he assisted regularly at councils, and performed every thing that was incumbent upon him. At his leisure hours he conferred with men of learning, and such strangers as resorted to his court, of whom there were always not a few; or he went to view his buildings; or as the season of the year directed, to partake of those innocent diversions, which were fit to recreate the mind of a man, and were at the same time not unworthy a prince, such as hunting, hawking, and music, in all which he was well skilled, and took much delight.

Tho' bred a man of war from his youth, the natural tenderness of his heart was never hardened against his enemies; he ever fought to shew mercy to them, amidst their greatest provocations; and was never so well pleased, as when he could bring the conclusion of the war to such terms, as to make an exchange of his own temporal victory for an eternal conquest of them to his Saviour. No wrong was so violent, no advantage against them of such consequence, but that all might be remitted, if once they offered to embrace Christianity.

He died, universally lamented, after a glorious reign of upwards of twenty-eight years, on the 28th of October, 900, aged fifty-two years. He was first buried in the new abbey at Winchester, but afterwards his body was taken from thence, and buried in the abbey of Hyde, without the gates of Winchester*. He married Ælswith, daughter of earl Æthelred, by whom he had two sons and three daughters. Edward, his eldest, succeeded him on the throne; and for the rest he carefully provided by his will. His male descendants for ten successions wore the crown after him. In every translation of the crown, it hath fallen into families that have lineally descended, by the female side, from this first imperial founder of English monarchy.

The following is an account of his works. 1. Breviarium quoddam, &c. a Breviary collected out of the laws of

This was the last work he attempted, and he died before it was finished. Many other works are mentioned, and among the rest his translation of the Sacred Scriptures.

The Life of Thomas Allen.

Allen (Thomas) a famous philosopher, mathematician, and antiquary, was born at Utoxeter, in Staffordshire, on the 21st of December, 1542. He was admitted scholar of Trinity-college, Oxford, the 4th of June, 1561; and, in 1567, took his degree of master of arts. In 1570, he quitted his college and fellowship, and retired to Gloucester-hall, where he pursued his studies with unremitted ardour. His great skill in the mathematics made the ignorant vulgar look upon him as a magician: the author of a book, entitled Leicester's Commonwealth, has accordingly accused him with using the art of figuring, to procure the earl of Leicester's unlawful designs, and endeavouring, by the black-art, to bring about a match between him and queen Elizabeth. But without attempting to point out the absurdity of the charge, it is certain that the earl placed such confidence in Allen, that nothing material in the state was transacted without his knowledge; and the earl had constant information from Mr. Allen, by letter, of what passed in the university.

Mr.

Mr. Allen was very curious and indefatigable in collecting scattered manuscripts relative to history, antiquity, astronomy, philosophy, and mathematics: these collections have been quoted by several learned authors, and mentioned to have been in the Bibliotheca Alleniana. He published in Latin the second and third books of Claudius Ptolemy, concerning the Judgment of the Stars, or, as it is usually called, of the quadripartite construction, with an exposition. He also wrote notes on many of Lilly's books, and some on John Bale's work De Scriptoribus Maj. Britanniae.

He died at Gloucester hall, the 30th of September, 1632, aged ninety, and was buried with a solemnity suitable to the greatness of his character.

The Life of Richard Allestry, or Allestree.

Allestry, or Allestree (Richard) an eminent English divine, born at Uppington, in Shropshire, in March 1619. He was first educated at a free-school in that neighbourhood, and afterwards removed to one at Coventry, under Dr. Philemon Holland, the translator. In 1636 he was entered a commoner of Christ church, Oxford, under the tuition of Mr. Richard Busby, afterwards master of Westminster school. Six months after his settlement in the university, Dr. Fell, dean of Christ-church, being no stranger to the parts and industry of young Allestry, made him a student of that college, where he applied himself to his studies with great assiduity and success. When he had taken the degree of bachelor of arts, he was chosen moderator in philosophy, in which office he continued till the disturbances of the kingdom interrupted the studies and repose of the university.

In 1641, Mr. Allestry, with others of the Oxford students, took up arms for the king, under Sir John Byron, and continued in a military character, till that gentleman withdrew from Oxford, when he returned to his studies. Soon after, a party of the parliament forces having entered Oxford, and plundered the colleges, Mr. Allestry narrowly escaped being severely handled by them. In October, 1642, he again took up arms, and was present at the battle between king Charles I. and the parliament's forces in Kinton-field, in Warwickshire; after which being informed, that the king intended immediately to march to Oxford, and take up his residence at the deanery of Christchurch, he hastened thither to make preparations for his majesty's reception: but in his way he was taken prisoner by a party of horse from Broughton-house, which was garrisoned by lord Say for the parliament: his confinement, however, was but short, for the garrison surrendered to the king. Mr. Allestry now settled again to his studies, and in the spring following took the degree of master of arts. The same year he was in extreme danger of his life, by a pestilential distemper which raged in the garrison at Oxford. As soon as he recovered, he entered again into his majesty's service, and carried a musquet in a regiment formed of the Oxford scholars. Nor did he in the mean time neglect his studies, but was frequently seen with his musquet in one hand, and his book in the other. In this service he continued till the end of the war: he then entered into holy orders, and was chosen censor of his college. He had a considerable share in that test of loyalty which the university of Oxford gave in their decree and judgment against the solemn league and covenant. In 1648, the parliament sent visitors to Oxford, to demand the submission of that body to their authority; those who refused to comply were immediately proscribed: this was done by writing their names on a paper, and affixing it on the door of St. Mary's church, signifying that such persons were, by the authority of the visitors, banished the university, and required to depart its precincts within three days, upon pain of being taken for spies of war, and proceeded against as such. Mr. Allestry, with many others, was accordingly expelled the university, after which he retired into Shropshire, and was entertained as chaplain to the honourable Francis Newport, Esq; and upon the death of Richard, lord Newport, that gentleman's father, who died in France, whither he had fled to avoid the violence of the prevailing party, Mr. Allestry was sent over to that kingdom, to take care of that nobleman's effects. Having successfully dispatched this affair, he returned to his employment, in which he continued till the defeat of king Charles II. at Worcester. At this time the royalists wanting an intelligent and faithful person to send over to his majesty, Mr. Allestry was solicited to undertake the journey, which he accordingly did; and having attended the king at Roan, and received his dispatches, returned to England. In 1659 he attended his ma-jeſty in Flanders; but upon his return was ſeized at Dover by a party of ſoldiers: he had had the addreſs, however, to ſecure his letters, by conveying them to a faithful hand. The ſoldiers guarded him to London, where he was examined by a committee of the council of ſafety, and ſent priſoner to Lambeth-houſe, where he contracted a dangerous illneſs. After a confinement of fix or eight weeks, he was ſet at liberty.

Soon after the reſtoration, Mr. Alleſtry was appointed a canon of Chriſt-church: at the ſame time he undertook one of the lecturerships of the city of Oxford. In October 1660, he took the degree of doctor of divinity, and was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king, and, ſoon after, regius profeſſor of divinity. In 1665, he was made provoſt of Eton-college. In 1679, finding his health and ſight much impaired, he reſigned his profeſſorſhip of divinity to Dr. Jane. The decay of his conſtitution terminating in a dropſy, he removed to London, to have the advice of phyſicians; but medicines proving ineffectual, he died on the 27th of January, 1680-1, and was buried in Eton chapel, where a marble monument was erected to his memory, with a Latin inſcription, to the following purpoſe: "Here lies Richard Alleſtree, regius profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Oxford, canon of Chriſt-church, and provoſt of this college of Eton; in the ſeparate diſcharge of which offices he ſhewed himſelf ſuperior to the execution of them all together. In diſputations invincible, pathetic in his ſermons, ſkilful in the management of affairs, a man of integrity and ſanctity. He declined the epiſcopal character as induſtriouſly as others purſue it, thinking it a more noble employ to defend, inſtruct, and adorn the church, than to govern it. Worn out at length with continual labour and ſtudy, this worthy man was carried off by an untimely death, on the 27th of January, 1680, in the ſixtieth year of his age. In his life-time he erected to himſelf a noble monument, in building from the ground, at his own expence, the weſt ſide of the adjacent quadrangle. His heirs erected this ſmall monument to his memory."

The Life of Charles Alleyn, or Aleyn.

Alleyn, or Aleyn, (Charles) an Engliſh poet, in the reign of king Charles I. He received his education at Sidney-college, Cambridge; and when he repaired to London, became aſſiſtant to Thomas Farnaby, the famous grammarian, at his great ſchool in Goldſmith's-rents, in the pariſh of St. Giles's, Cripple-gate. In the year 1631, he publiſhed two poems on the famous victories of Creſci and Poictiers, obtained by king Edward III. and his warlike ſon the Black Prince.

When our author left Mr. Farnaby, he went into the family of Edward Sherburne, Eſq; to be tutor to his ſon, who ſucceeded his father as clerk of the ordnance, and was alſo commiſſary-general of the artillery to king Charles I. at the battle of Keinton, or Edgehill.

The next production of Mr. Alleyn was a poem in honour of king Henry VII. and that important battle which gained him the crown of England: it was publiſhed in the year 1638. In 1639 he publiſhed a tranſlation, from the Latin, of the Hiſtory of Euryalus and Lucretia. He is ſaid to have died in 1640, and to have been buried in the pariſh of St. Andrew's, Holborn.

The Life of Ambrosius Aurelianus, or Aurelius Ambroſius.

Ambrosius Aurelianus, or Aurelius Ambroſius, a famous general of the ancient Britons, and afterwards king, was of Roman extraction. He was educated at the court of Aldroen, king of Armorica, who, at the requeſt of the Britons, ſent him over with ten thouſand men, to aſſiſt them againſt the Saxons, whom Vortigern had invited into Britain. Ambroſius had ſuch ſucceſs againſt the Saxons, that the Britons choſe him for their king, and compelled Vortigern to give up to him all the weſtern parts of the kingdom, divided by the Roman highway called Watling-ſtreet. Some time after, the Britons being diſcontented with Vortigern, and having withdrawn their allegiance from him, he retired to a caſtle in Wales, where he was beſieged by Ambroſius; during the ſiege the caſtle was ſet on fire, and the unhappy prince periſhed in the flames, leaving his rival ſole monarch of Britain, who now aſſumed the imperial purple, after the manner of the Roman emperors.

After the Britons had defeated the Saxons, and obliged them to retire northward, Ambroſius, who was a found politician, as well as a conſummate warrior, is ſaid to have convened a general aſſembly of the princes and nobles at York, where he gave orders for repairing the churches deſtroyed by the the Saxons, and restoring the exercise of religion to its former lustre. He was a man of such courage and intrepidity, that, when he was in Gaul, no one durst enter the lists with him, for he was sure to unhorse his antagonist, or to break his spear into shivers. Geoffrey of Monmouth, says he was poisoned at Winchester, by one Eopa, a Saxon, disguised as a physician, and hired for that purpose by Pascentius, one of the sons of Vortigern: but the general opinion is, that he was killed in a battle against Cerdic, one of the Saxon generals, in 508.

The Life of Nicholas Amhurst.

Amhurst (Nicholas) an English poet, was born at Marden in Kent. His grandfather was a clergyman, under whose protection and care he received his education at Merchant-Taylors school. He was afterwards removed to St. John's college, Oxford; from which, on account of the libertinism of his principles, and the irregularity of his behaviour, he was expelled. He retained strong resentment against the University on this account, and abused its learning and discipline, and some of the most respectable characters in it, in a poem published in 1724, called Oculus Britanniae, and in a book under the title of Terræ Filius, in two volumes. He published a miscellany of poems, sacred and profane, original and translated; which begins with a beautiful paraphrase on the Mosaic account of the Creation, and ends in a very humorous tale upon the discovery of that useful utensil, a Bottle-screw. He also published the Convocation, a poem, in five cantos; a kind of satire against all the writers who were opposers of the bishop of Bangor. He translated some of Mr. Addison's Latin pieces. But he was best known to the world from the share he had in the political paper called the Craftsman. The plan of this was laid at that time when the Whig ministry under George I. split amongst themselves, and the patrons of it pitched upon Amhurst to be its standing author. The work had great success, upwards of twelve thousand copies were sold in a week; and it contributed greatly to reduce the all-engrossing power of an avowedly corrupt ministry. But poor Amhurst, after having been the drudge of his party for almost twenty years, was as much forgot in the famous compromise of 1742, as if he had never existed: and when he died, of what is called a broken heart, which happened within a few months afterwards, became indebted to the very charity of his bookseller for a grave. A grave not to be traced now, because then no otherwise to be distinguished than by the freshness of the turf, borrowed from the next common to cover it.

The Life of Sir Edmund Anderson.

Anderson (Sir Edmund) lord chief justice of the common pleas in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born at Broughton, in Lincolnshire. He received the first part of his education in the country, and went afterwards to Lincoln college, in Oxford; from thence he was removed to the Inner-Temple, where he applied to the study of the law with great assiduity, and in due time was called to the bar: in the nineteenth year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, he was appointed one of the queen's serjeants at law. Some time after, he was promoted to the bench. In 1582, he was appointed lord chief justice of the common pleas. The year following he received the honour of knighthood. In 1586, he was chosen one of the commissioners for trying Mary queen of Scots; on the 12th of October, in the same year, he sat in judgment upon her; and on the 25th of the same month, he sat again in the Star chamber, when sentence was pronounced against that unfortunate queen. In 1587, he presided at the trial of secretary Davison, who was charged with issuing the warrant for the execution of the queen of Scots, contrary to queen Elizabeth's command, and without her knowledge.

He was a very strict lawyer, who governed himself entirely by statutes: this he shewed on many occasions, particularly at the trial of Henry Cuff, secretary to the earl of Essex, when the attorney general charging the prisoner syllogistically, and Cuff answering him in the same style, lord chief justice Anderson said, "I sit here to judge of law, and not of logic;" and directed the attorney general to press the statute of Edward III. on which Mr. Cuff was indicted. His steadiness was so great, that he would not be driven from his purpose by any authority whatever. On the accession of king James I. he was continued in his office, which he held upwards of twenty three years, to the time of his death, which happened at London, on the first of August, 1605: his body was interred the fifteenth of September following, at Eyworth, in Bedfordshire, his printed works are,

1st. reports of many principal cases argued and adjudged in the time of queen Elizabeth, in the Common pleas. 2. Resolutions and judgments on the cases and matters agitated in all the courts of Westminster, in the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The Life of Lancelot Andrews.

Andrews (Lancelot) bishop of Winchester in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. was born at London, in the year 1555. He received the rudiments of his education in the Coopers free-school at Radcliffe, and was afterwards removed to Merchant-tailors school, where he made a great proficiency in the learned languages; and went from thence to Pembroke-hall, in Cambridge. Having taken the degree of bachelor of arts, he was chosen fellow of the college: soon after, having taken the degree of master of arts, he applied himself to the study of divinity; and being appointed catechist in the college, he read a lecture on the Ten Commandments every Saturday and Sunday, to which great numbers resorted as to a divinity lecture. His reputation increasing daily, he began to be taken notice of by Sir Francis Walsingham, secretary of state to queen Elizabeth, who being unwilling so great a genius should be buried in the country, procured him the vicarage of St. Giles's Cripplegate, and caused him afterwards to be chosen a prebendary and residentiary of St. Paul's, and also prebendary of the collegiate church of Southwell. Upon the death of Dr. Fulke, he was chosen master of Pembroke-hall, to which college he became a considerable benefactor. He was also appointed chaplain in ordinary to queen Elizabeth, who greatly delighted in his preaching. He was in no less esteem with her successor, king James I. who gave him the preference to all other divines as a preacher, and made choice of him to vindicate his sovereignty. His majesty having, in his defence of the rights of kings, asserted the authority of christian princes over causes and persons ecclesiastical, cardinal Bellarmine, under the name of Matthew Tortus, attacked him with great vehemence and bitterness. The king employed Andrews to answer the cardinal, which he did with great spirit and judgment, in a piece intitled Tortura Torti. His majesty, on this account, promoted him to the bishopric of Chichester, to which he was consecrated November 3, 1605; and at the same time made him his almoner, in which office Dr. Andrews behaved with great honour and fidelity. Upon the vacancy of the bishopric of Ely, he was translated to that see, and consecrated September 22, 1609. He was also nominated one of the king's privy counsellors of England, and afterwards of Scotland, when he attended his majesty to that kingdom. After he had been nine years in the see of Ely, he was advanced to the bishopric of Winchester, and deanery of the king's chapel.

A pleasant story is related of him, while he was bishop of Winchester, in the life of Waller the poet. Waller going to see the king at dinner, over-heard the following extraordinary conversation between his majesty, the bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Neile, bishop of Durham. These two prelates standing behind the king's chair, his majesty asked them the following question; "My lords, cannot I take my subjects money when I want it, without all this formality in parliament?" Dr. Neile readily answered "God forbid, Sir, but you should; you are the breath of our nostrils." Whereupon the king turned, and said to the bishop of Winchester, "Well, my lord, what say you?" "Sir (replied the bishop) I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases." The king then said, "no put off, my lord, answer me presently." The bishop very smartly replied, "Then, I think, your majesty may lawfully take my brother Neile's money, for he offers it."

This excellent prelate died at Winchester house, in Southwark, September 17, 1626, in the seventy-first year of his age, and was buried in the parish church of St. Saviour, where his executors erected to him a very handsome monument of marble and alabaster, on which is an elegant Latin inscription.

Besides the Tortura Torti, already mentioned, bishop Andrews wrote a manual of private devotions and meditations for every day in the week; and a manual of directions for the visitation of the sick; there were likewise several sermons and tracts of his in English and Latin, published after his death. He had a share in the translation of the Pentateuch, and the historical books from Joshua to the first book of Chronicles exclusively. He is supposed supposed to have had a considerable hand in the book of Chronology, published by the famous Isaacson, who was his amanuensis. Charles I. a little before his death, recommended the sermons of bishop Andrews to the perusal of his children.

The Life of Anne Boleyn.

Anne Boleyn, second wife of king Henry VIII. was born in the year 1507. She was daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, afterwards earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, by Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk. When she was but seven years of age, she was carried over to France with the king's sister, Mary, who was married to Lewis XII. and though, upon the death of the French king, the queen dowager returned to England, yet Anne Boleyn was so highly esteemed at the court of France, that Claude, the wife of Francis I. retained her in her service for some years; and after her death, which happened in 1524, the duchess of Alençon, the king's sister, kept her in her court during her stay in that kingdom. It is probable, that she returned from thence with her father, from his embassy in the year 1527; and was soon appointed maid of honour to the queen. She continued without the least imputation upon her character, till her unfortunate fall gave occasion to some malicious writers to defame her. Upon her coming to the English court, the lord Percy, eldest son of the earl of Northumberland, being then a domestic of cardinal Wolsey, made his addresses to her, and proceeded so far, as to engage himself to marry her; and her consent shews, that she had then no expectation of being advanced to the royal dignity. But the cardinal, for some private reasons, using threats and other methods, with great difficulty occasioned that nobleman to lay aside his design. It was probable about the year 1528, that the king began to shew some favour to her, which caused many to believe, that the whole process with regard to his divorce from queen Catharine was moved by the unseen springs of that secret passion. But it is not reasonable to imagine, that the engagement of the king's affection to any other person gave rise to that affair; for so sagacious a courtier as Wolsey would have infallibly discovered it, and not have projected a marriage with the French king's sister, as he did not long before, if he had seen his master prepossessed. The supposition is much more reasonable, that his majesty, conceiving himself in a manner discharged of his former marriage, gave a full liberty to his affections, which began to settle upon Anne Boleyn; who, in September 1532, was created marchioness of Pembroke, in order that she might be gradually raised to the height for which she was designed; and on the 25th of January following was married to the king, the ceremony being performed by Rowland Lee, afterwards bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, with great privacy, though in the presence of her uncle the duke of Norfolk, her father, mother, and brother. On the first of June, 1533, she was crowned queen of England with such pomp and solemnity, as was answerable to the magnificence of his majesty's temper; and every one admired her conduct, who had so long managed the spirit of a king so violent, as neither to disgust him with too much freedom, nor to provoke him with too much reserve. Her being so soon with child gave a prospect of a numerous issue; and those who loved the reformation entertained the greatest hopes from her protection, as they knew she favoured them. On the 13th or 14th of September following, she brought forth a daughter, christened Elizabeth, afterwards the renowned queen of England, Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury being her god-father.

But the year 1536 proved fatal to her majesty; and her ruin was in all probability occasioned by those, who began to be distinguished by the name of the Romish party; for the king now proceeding both at home and abroad in the point of reformation, they found, that the interest which the queen had in him, was the grand support of that cause. She had risen, not only in his esteem, but likewise in that of the nation in general; for in the last nine months of her life, she gave above fourteen thousand pounds to the poor, and was engaged in several noble and public designs. But these virtues could not secure her against the artifices of a bigoted party, which received an additional force from several other circumstances, that contributed to her destruction. Soon after queen Catharine's death, in January 1535-6, she was delivered of a dead son, which was believed to have made some ill impression on the king's mind; and as he had concluded from the death of his sons by his former queen, that the marriage was displeasing to God, so it is probable that he might upon this misfortune fortune begin to form the same judgment of his marriage with Anne Boleyn. It was also considered by some courtiers, that now queen Catharine was dead, his majesty might marry another wife, and be fully reconciled with the Pope and the Emperor, and the issue by any other marriage would never be questioned; whereas, while queen Anne lived, the ground of the controversy still remained, and her marriage being accounted null from the beginning, would never be allowed by the court of Rome, or any of that party. With these reasons of state the king's own passions too much concurred; for he now entertained a secret affection for the lady Jane Seymour, who had all the charms of youth and beauty, and a disposition tempered between the gravity of queen Catharine, and the gaiety of queen Anne. Her majesty therefore perceiving the alienation of the king's heart, used all possible arts to recover that affection, of the decay of which she was but too sensible: but he saw her no more with those eyes, which she had formerly captivated; but gave way to jealousy, and ascribed her caresses to some other criminal passion, of which he began to suspect her. Her enemies, in particular the duke of Norfolk, and all those who had adhered to the old religion, took advantage of this disposition, to inflame the king's jealousy; the principal fomentor of which was the lady Rochford, sister-in-law to queen Anne, a woman of infamous character, who hated her mistress with the most envenomed rancour. She hinted to the king that his wife carried on a criminal correspondence with her own brother the lord Rochford; and Henry's mind being prepared for this poison, by his disgust for Anne, and his new passion for Jane Seymour, it operated with great violence. The insinuations of the lady Rochford was confirmed by the duke of Norfolk, who enjoyed a great share of the king's confidence, and was devoted to the popish religion, which could not flourish while queen Anne lived to countenance the reformation. The partisans of the pope therefore conspired her ruin. She was not only accused of incest with her brother the lord Rochford, but likewise of living in carnal commerce with Henry Norris, groom of the stole, William Brereton, and Sir Francis Weston, gentlemen of the king's privy chamber, and Mark Smeton, musician. There was no other evidence than a hearsay declaration of the lady Wingfield, who confessed some particulars on her death-bed; but this was sufficient to ruffle such a mind as that of Henry, who is said to have observed Anne, at a tournament at Greenwich, drop her handkerchief to one of her minions, that he might wipe his face, after having over-heated himself in the exercise. Be that as it may, the king returned abruptly to Whitehall; Anne was confined to her chamber: and the suspected delinquents being apprehended at the same time, were committed to the Tower. Anne smiled at first, thinking the king was in jest; but, when she found it was a very serious affair, she received the sacrament in her closet, and prepared for death. This reverse of fortune affected her in such a manner, that she was seized with hysteric fits, during which she laughed and wept by turns; and uttered many inconsistencies, according to the nature of that disease. The next day she was conveyed to the tower, where she fell upon her knees, and appealed to God for the knowledge of her innocence. She in vain begged to be admitted into the presence of the king. The lady Boleyn, her uncle's wife, who had always hated her, was ordered to be in the chamber with her; and she made a report of all the incoherent ravings of the afflicted prisoner. She was visited by the duke of Norfolk, and some of the king's council, who endeavoured to draw her into a confession, by saying she was accused by Norris and Smeton: but she still persisted in denying the charge; and told the lieutenant of the Tower, she was not more guilty with any man upon earth, than with himself. She confessed indeed, that she had, in the gaiety of her heart, made use of some indiscreet expressions to Smeton and Weston; and the familiarity of her behaviour had encouraged them to hint a passion for her, which, in all probability, afforded her matter of laughter and amusement; and perhaps, the knowledge of those frivolous circumstances increased the king's jealousy and indignation.

Every person at court abandoned the unhappy queen in her distress, except Cranmer, who, though forbid to come into the king's presence, wrote a letter to him in behalf of Anne Boleyn; but his intercession had no effect. On the 12th of May, Norris, Brereton, Weston, and Smeton, were tried in Westminster-hall, when Smeton confessed he had carnally known the queen three times; but he was supposed to have been inveigled into this confession with a promise of pardon. The other three pleaded not guilty; but, all four were convicted, and condemned to die the death of traitors. On the 15th of May, the queen, and her brother the lord Rochford, were brought to their trial, before the duke of Norfolk, as lord high steward for the occasion, the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, the earl of Arundel, and twenty-five other peers. The queen appearing at the bar, was charged with criminal conversation with her brother, and the other four; as also with having conspired the king's death. She pleaded not guilty, and answered distinctly all the evidence that was produced against her. As she was not confronted by Smeton, in all probability he had borne false witness; for all the others denied the charge. Nevertheless, she was declared guilty, and her sentence ran, that she should be burned or beheaded, at the king's pleasure. Her brother likewise was convicted, and sentenced to be beheaded and quartered. The king, not satisfied with this vengeance, was desirous of seeing her daughter Elizabeth declared illegitimate. He remembered a report of a previous contract between lord Percy, now earl of Northumberland, and Anne Boleyn. The earl being questioned on this subject, solemnly swore, that no such contract had ever subsisted. Nevertheless, Anne was tampered with in such a manner, either by promise of life, or threats of executing the sentence in all its rigour, that she confessed such a pre-contract, at Lambeth, before the archbishop of Canterbury, and some other persons of distinction; and her marriage with the king was declared null and insufficient. This sentence, however, palpably contradicted the other which had been pronounced against her; for, if her marriage with Henry was null from the beginning, she could not justly be attainted for adultery. In two days after this declaration, she was ordered to be executed on the green within the Tower; and behaved with great piety, resignation, and good humour.

On the morning of her execution, she sent for the lieutenant of the tower, that he might be present at her receiving the sacrament, and declaring her own innocence. She said, she was sorry to hear her execution was delayed till the afternoon, because, before that time, she had expected to be out of pain. Then she enquired about the dexterity of the executioner; fixed her hands about her neck, observing, that she had a very little neck, and laughed heartily. When August, 1776.

she was brought to the scaffold, in presence of the dukes of Suffolk and Richmond, the lord chancellor, the secretary Cromwell, with the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, she said she was come to die, as she had been judged by the law. She prayed God would preserve the king, who had been always to her a most merciful, good, and gentle sovereign; and took leave of all the spectators, desiring they would pray for her. After she had spent some time in devotion, her head was severed from her body, on the 19th of May, by the executioner of Calais, who was brought over for his dexterity in performing that operation. Her body was thrown into a common chest, and buried in the Tower chapel without any ceremony. Her brother, with the other convicts, were beheaded, except Smeton, who was hanged. Norris, who had been much in the king's favour, was offered a pardon, if he would confess his guilt, and accuse the queen; but he rejected the proposal with disdain, saying, "That in his conscience he thought her innocent of the crimes laid to her charge; and whether she was or not, he could not accuse her of any thing, and would rather die a thousand deaths, than accuse an innocent person."

Such was the unfortunate catastrophe of Anne Boleyn, who seems to have been a lady of unaffected piety, and a very charitable disposition. Her features were regular, mild, and attractive, her stature elegant, though below the middle size, while her wit and vivacity exceeded even her other allurements. She was naturally volatile, and in some cases childishly indiscreet: so that, in all probability, her heart was better than her understanding. She encouraged learning and genius; and died a sacrifice to the jealousy and intemperance of Henry, inflamed by the malicious suggestions of those who were enemies to the reformation, which she in a particular manner patronized. Nothing justified Anne Boleyn so much as the conduct of the king, who, on the very day that succeeded her execution, married Jane Seymour.

LETTER X.

Dijon in Burgundy.

LAST night I was a spectator at an execution in this town, when a strong young man, of about 22 years of age, was (as it is called) broke alive upon the wheel, and his body afterwards burnt to ashes in a fire prepared for that purpose, on the side of the scaffold on which he suffered. "This horrid execution was performed by torch light, about eight o'clock at night, in the presence of an infinite number of female, as well as male spectators. About seven o'clock the prisoner came to the place of execution, accompanied by his confessor on one side, and a man to hold him on the other, guarded by a party of the Marechaussee on horseback. As soon as he came to the scaffold he desired to retire to a little chapel hard by, prepared for condemned criminals, where he might have continued any time before midnight commenced; however after an hour spent in prayer he came forth and ascended the scaffold, on which were placed two substantial pieces of wood in the form of a Roman X; and on the side of the scaffold a wheel like that of a common cart was horizontally fixed on a post fastened in the ground. The prisoner, the confessor, the executioner, and the executioner's mother, were the only persons who ascended upon the scaffold, and the two latter, after stripping the man's body almost naked, lashed his hands, arms and legs in different parts to the cross, on which without any seeming reluctance, he laid himself on his back. While this alarming preparation for the execution was making, the confessor, with great zeal as well as address, engaged the attention of the criminal, by reminding him of the short time he had to live, and exhorting him to call upon Christ, who suffered as ignominious a death upon the cross, to intercede with God to pardon his great offences, and continually giving him a little crucifix he held in his hand to kiss, thereby engrossed all his attention to his future life, and spared his reflections on the misery he was to endure in this. After the limbs were well corded to the cross, a rope was put about his neck, and brought thro' a hole in the scaffold beneath: This circumstance induced the spectators for a while to hope that the Coup de Grace was to be given, by strangling, before the limbs were broken; but in that we were mistaken: for the executioner, with a piece of iron, made much in the form of a very large butcher's cleaver, but with a rounding edge, like the back of a book, began to break the bones of the arms, legs, and thighs: which he did by eight mighty blows, at each of which the criminal exclaimed O God! O God! &c. without uttering either shriek or groan.—When the limbs were thus mangled, they were untied, and the executioner, turning the body with the back upwards, gave three other blows, more terrible to behold than the former eight, on the small of the back; and yet, strange to believe, and horrid to perceive, the criminal was not only alive, but able to converse with his confessor, and frequently kissed the crucifix, which he held to his mouth. In about five minutes after, the cord about his neck was tightened beneath the scaffold, and the agitated minds of some thousands of silent spectators, as well as my own, were in some measure composed. As soon as the convulsive motion of the body was quite over, (which the confessor seemed to attend minutely to) the executioner, and his adamantine-hearted mother, brought the body from the scaffold, (for no one would give them the least assistance) and threw it into a fire of faggot and straw, where it was soon consumed.

The only consolation I can offer the reader of these particulars, is, that which I was obliged frequently to call to my own aid, during the execution, that the sufferer was a villain of the first magnitude, having confessed that he had at different times, murdered seven or eight persons; and the crime for which he suffered was the murdering a father and his son, in their own house, and burning their bodies.

In a few days, a man is to be burnt alive, in the same place, for stealing some of the sacred utensils from the church.—Great as his crime may be, his punishment I hope will not be inflicted while I am within the province where such a fire is kindled.

I cannot conclude this letter without expressing my surprise that the magistrates of this or any town, who are, or ought to be, men of sense, and polished manners, should permit a woman to be aiding at such an horrid execution. Perhaps I should rather have expressed my surprise, that a woman could be found capable of such an office; but the conversation, manners, and education of the common women of France are such, that they have have nothing of feminality or softness in their composition.

LETTER XI.

Chalons, in Burgundy.

AFTER a residence of fourteen days at Dijon, I left it the day before yesterday, and proceeded on my way to Lyons. I found both sides of the road from Dijon to Chalons almost one continued plantation of vines. The day was so excessive hot, and the vines so laden with fruit, that I not only feasted my family from their bounty, but my steady as well as sturdy horse, which, without a start, stumble, or fault, has dragged me from Calais hither.

At Baunes, where I slept, I found upon my entering the town, many thousand men, women and children in the streets, and really believed it was a rising of the people again about the price of bread; but I soon found they were peaceable peasants from different villages, all brought to one point to hire themselves to different masters to gather the grapes, in the same manner as the hop-pickers in England.

As soon as each wine-farmer had collected his new enlisted troop, they march off under his banner, to his barn, where as many grapes, and as much bread as they could eat, were provided for them, by way of prelude to the next morning, when the vintage began. We all know how the grocer's boy is glutted at first with plumbs, and I suspect the hospitality of the night which precedes the vintage, arises from the same motive; for half-starved peasants (and such they seem to be) certainly must exceed the bounds of prudence, when set down to a repast, than which nothing can be more delicious. The vintage has opened unfortunately, for it has rained ever since; and if it continues, as it seems likely to do, the finest crop the earth has produced for some years will be greatly injured.— At this town I had the pleasure of seeing the beautiful Soane gliding between its fertile banks, and the lessening barks stealing down even to the Mediterranean sea.

As Burgundy wine of a good year, and proper age, is certainly the finest wine the world produces, perhaps such as can afford, or wish to afford to drink it, may be benefited by the following account of the price, and manner of procuring it: Such I have obtained, with some difficulty, and much certainty.

Burgundy wine is always spoken of, and sold by the Queue. A queue is two pieces; each of which is supposed to contain 240 bottles; the queue then contains 480 bottles. A feuillette is a quarter of a queue, or 120 bottles. Wine in cask may be bought either by feuillette, piece, or queue; but they always speak of their wine by the queue, and generally bargain as for the whole queue, though they take only a piece, or feuillette. Now as the number of sols in a Louis d'or is the same as the number of bottles in a queue, viz. 480, it follows, that each bottle will cost just as many sols as the whole queue cost louis d'ors. Thus wine of 600 livres costs 25 sols per bottle, because 600 livres are exactly 25 louis d'ors.

To have good Burgundy, that is, wine de la premiere tete, as they term it, you must buy it at from 400 to 700 livres. There are wines still dearer, up to 1000 or 1200 livres; but it is allowed, that beyond 700 livres, the quality is not in proportion to the price; and that it is in great measure a matter of fancy.

The carriage of a queue of wine from Dijon to Dunkirk, or to any frontier town near England, costs an hundred livres, something more than four sols a bottle; but if sent in the bottle, the carriage will be just double. The price of the bottles, hampers, package, &c. will again increase the expence to six sols a bottle more; so that wine which at first costs 600 livres, or 25 sols a bottle, will, when delivered at Dunkirk, be worth 29 sols a bottle, if brought in cask; if in bottle, 39 sols. Now add to this the freight, duties, &c. to London; and as many pounds sterling as all these expences amount to upon a queue of wine, just so many French sols must be charged to the price of every bottle. The reduction of French sols to English sterling money is very plain, and of course the price of the best burgundy delivered in London, easily calculated.

N. B. If the wine be sent in cask, it is advisable to choose rather a stronger wine, because it will mellow, and form itself in the carriage. It should be double casked, to prevent as much as possible, the frauds of the carriers. This operation will cost six or eight livres per piece; but the great and principal object is, whom to trust to buy the best, and to convey it safely. I doubt, it must not pass through the hands of Monf. C— if he deals in wine, as he does in drapery, and bills of exchange.

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed; or, Memoirs of Sir Matthew Mite and Mrs. A—B—d.

WE imagine our readers would think us remiss if in these monthly memoirs we were to overlook so very conspicuous a character as Sir Matthew Mite, who has attained the summit of Asiatic wealth and honours, and who is at this juncture the subject of general conversation. As we propose in this sketch of his life to stick as closely to truth as our information will permit, we shall neither be biased by popular clamour, nor influenced by a personal acquaintance with him.

Our hero drew his first breath not far distant from St. James's market, in the house of a reputable cheese-monger, who was his father. He received a decent education at a neighbouring grammar school, where, however, he did not shine for the quickness or brilliancy of his parts; and his master was frequently obliged to make use of birchen reasoning to inculcate the first rudiments of Lilly's grammar. After some years application to scholastic studies, he retired from the academy, and was upon the point of being bound apprentice, much against his inclination, to his father, in order to vend, secundum artem, cheese and bacon. Luckily for our hero, a distant relation had a military appointment in India, and he had interest sufficient to obtain for him a subaltern commission.

Sir Matthew, who was of an aspiring disposition, despised trade, and had an utter aversion to the very odour of his father's shop, received with inexpressible joy the news of his commission. He prophetically said that he should be a great man, and entered upon the service with an ardour which did him honour, and bespoke a military career that would raise him far above his present station. When arrived in India, he immediately entered upon service, and signalized himself in many actions. His merit was soon distinguished, and he rapidly attained a chief command.

Although our hero had no genius for trade in the line his father moved, he had a sufficient idea of it in more extensive branches, and turned his situation to so much advantage (without the aid, as we may readily suppose, of either plunder or rapine) that in a short time he became possessed of a princely fortune. He now thought the climate of Asia too warm for him, and he resolved to return to Europe; not before he had properly disposed of his wealth, and carefully remitted it to England.

The first object of his attention upon his arrival here was to provide for his father in such a manner that he might no longer be a disgrace to him. This blot in his escutcheon being, as he thought, removed, he soon displayed his importance in Leadenhall-street, where he was persuaded by his sycophants and dependents, that he shone as an orator of the first magnitude. Being of the same opinion, he thought such abilities would appear with greater eclat in a more august assembly, and resolved upon the first occasion to get into p——t. He accordingly employed several agents to canvass for him at different vacant boroughs, and in his opinion he judged the most rotten were the best, as they were to be obtained with least trouble, though some expence. No sooner was Sh—m vacated by the death of its late representative, than he had his eye upon it: proposals were made to the Christian Club, which they listened to; but a brother Nabob making his personal appearance there, and bidding a higher price, he prevailed, and had the honour of being the cause of disfranchising that borough.

Disappointed in this pursuit, he continued haranguing in Leadenhall-street, to keep his oratory in proper order for a more favourable occasion. In the mean while he had the good fortune to be proposed a member of the different chocolate-houses about St. James's, and not to be black-balled at either of them. Here he passed his vigils; so alluring was play, that he never could retire from it till day break. But having an excellent constitution, which had been tried in various climates, and the bottle not circulating with any degree of intemperance upon these occasions, his health did not appear in any respect impaired by these nocturnal devotions.

In may naturally be supposed that as Sir Matthew had just returned from India, with cash in abundance, he could be no great adept at play, and that of course he must fall a prey to the connoisseurs who had made it their constant study from their infancy. This certainly for a time was the case; but one of the fraternity having had a very ill run of luck at Newmarket, and being quite broke down, after ruminating upon many projects for raising cash, was at his wit's end, when he thought of Sir Matthew. He accordingly repaired to his his house, and having gained an audience, acquainted our hero that he had often been chagrined at seeing him the bubble of a set of men who had for a considerable time lived upon him. Sir Matthew expressed his astonishment in asking "if they were not all gentlemen?" "Yes, the visitor replied, they will pay a debt of honour when they lose it; but as they generally take care to have such pulls as secure them against these casualties, they are seldom under any embarrassment to pay their debts of honour." This information began to open Sir Matthew's eyes, and in less than half an hour a negotiation was entered into, that Mr. S—— should shew him all the operations upon the cards and dice, for a stipulated sum, on condition of the strictest secrecy.

Sir Matthew having obtained a thorough insight into the manœuvres of the connoisseurs, he was now upon the square with them, and in a short time won back the greatest part of his former losses, to the great surprise and astonishment of his adversaries, many of whom were soon reduced to the same state of insolvency with Mr. S——, and which alone had induced him to let Sir Matthew into the secret.

Notwithstanding our hero's attachment to play, he did not forget the great object of his ambition, displaying his oratorical powers in the senate. A general election afforded him an ample field, and he was resolved to secure a seat. A certain borough in Wiltshire had ever been famous, or rather infamous, for its venality, and he accordingly fixed upon it for his purpose. Many stratagems were practised to evade the laws against bribery and corruption: the place was carried by dint of a golden assault, and he thought the field his own; when oh! dire reverse, upon a very rigid scrutiny in a certain house, the election was not only declared void, but a prosecution commenced against our hero and his associate, when bribery being proved in the clearest manner, a day was appointed for them to receive sentence. On this very day the candidates had appointed to meet their friends in Leadenhall-street, in order to support them in a very interesting debate, when they acquainted those gentlemen, that they would be with them speedily, but that they must first step down to Westminster-hall about a trifling affair that would not take them up half an hour. The event proved very different, as, much against their inclination, they were obliged to visit

Surry, where they will probably remain some months, to the great loss of their Asiatic friends, whom they promised to support with their interest and eloquence.

Previous to this adventure our hero had made acquaintance with that celebrated Thais, Mrs. A—st—d, who for some time has been the reigning toast in that line upon the haut ton. There is a fashion in intrigue, as well as other pursuits; and though it must be acknowledged Mrs. A—st—d is a most elegant and beautiful woman, yet if she had not been so highly rated for her charms among the Macaronies of this period, she might probably have escaped unnoticed by Sir Matthew. But as a man of taste, to establish his reputation, must have a mistress as well as a man-cook, the degree of his gusto is determined by the happiness of his choice. Who then so proper to establish a man's virtu in amours as Mrs. A—st—d, who can claim the conquest of two dual coronets, a marquis, four earls, and a viscount?

We cannot trace this lady's lineage to any high pedigree, for some positively assert that she came upwards into the world, or, in the vulgar phrase, was born in a cellar: that her father, though no statesman, had borne very heavy burthens, in these critical times; and that her mother, for her amusement, addicted herself to the culling and vending of similes. Be this as it may, she was soon distinguished for a very pretty girl, by a frisour of some eminence. He found means to ingratiate himself into her favour, by persuading her the dressing of her hair would be a great ornament to her, and that she would certainly make her fortune, if she displayed herself to advantage. The vanity of a girl of sixteen is apt to be excited by such compliments, and Mr. R—— undertook the decoration of her head gratis, when the very gratefully returned the obligation, by yielding to his amorous intreaties. In the course of this acquaintance, Mr. R—— not only furnished the exterior part of her head with all the embellishments of his art, but at the same time he infused into it such useful ideas, as brought her forth into polite life. After some months enjoyment the ardour of his passion subsided, and he was desirous to get rid of our heroine; he accordingly equipped her very genteelly, and took a lodging for Mrs. A—st—d in the polite part of the town, where, he said, she could not fail of succeeding.

In this situation she soon attracted the attention of a Levite, who was very lavish in his presents, and she now figured with great éclat at all public places, where, as a new face, she shone a meteor. We have already enumerated several of her conquests, and the viscount was the last of her admirers, before she fell to the lot of Sir Matthew, who makes her a very handsome allowance; but if fame can be believed, she avails herself of her situation to increase the splendour of her conquests; this at least may be judged from the number of her attendants and admirers at Ranelagh, and other public places. But as our hero is not of a jealous disposition, and as he has the reputation of a connexion with one of the finest women in England, were he to make any discovery with regard to her infidelity, it would give him very little uneasiness, whilst the Savoir Vivre club honour him with their visits, and amuse him with throwing a main for a few cool hundreds.

THIS colony, which had its name from the famous quaker William Penn, son of Sir William, commander of the English fleet in Oliver Cromwell's time, and in the beginning of Charles the Second's reign, who obtained the grant of it in the year 1679, is bounded on the east by Delaware bay and river, and the Atlantic ocean; on the north by the country of the Iroquois, or five nations; and on the south and west by Maryland. Its extent, from north to south, is about two hundred miles; but its breadth varies greatly, from fifteen, and even less, to near two hundred.

The air in Pensylvania is sweet and clear. The fall, or autumn, begins about the 20th of October, and lasts till the beginning of December, when the winter sets in, which continues till March, and is sometimes extremely cold and severe; but the air is then generally dry and healthy. The river Delaware, though very broad, is often frozen over. From March to June, that is, in the spring, the weather is more inconstant than in the other seasons. In the months of July, August, and September, the heats would be almost intolerable, if they were not mitigated by frequent cool breezes. The wind, during the summer, is generally south-west; but in the winter blows for the most part from the north-west, over the snowy frozen mountains and lakes of Canada, which occasions the excessive cold during that season.

As to the face of this country, towards the coast, like the adjacent colonies, it is flat, but rises gradually to the Apalachian mountains on the west.

The chief rivers are three, Delaware, Sasquahanna, and Schuylkill. The Delaware rising in the country of the Iroquois, takes its course southward, and after dividing this province from that of New-Jersey, falls into the Atlantic ocean between the promontories, or Capes May and Henlopen, forming at its mouth a large bay, called from the river, Delaware Bay. This river is navigable above two hundred miles. The Sasquahanna rises also in the country of the Iroquois, and, running south through the middle of the province, falls into the bay of Chesapeake, being navigable a great way for large ships. The Schuylkill has its source in the same country as the other two, and also runs south, almost parallel to them; till at length turning to the eastward, it falls into the Delaware at the city of Philadelphia. It is navigable for boats above one hundred miles. These rivers, with the numerous creeks and harbours in Delaware Bay, capable of containing the largest fleets, are extremely favourable to the trade of this province.

As to the soil, produce, and traffic of Pensylvania, we refer the reader to what we have said on these heads under New-York and the Jerseys, which is equally applicable to this province: and, if there is any difference, it is on the side of this province. They have some rice here, but no great quantities; and some tobacco, but it is not equal to that of Virginia. From the premiums offered by the society of arts in London, it appears, that the soil and climate of this province are looked upon as proper for the cultivation of some species of vines. The trade carried on from hence and the other colonies to the French and Dutch islands and Surinam, is not at all to the advantage of Old England, and very destructive to the sugar colonies; for they take molasses, rum, and other spirits, with a great many European goods, from those foreigners: carrying them horses, provisions, and lumber in return, without which the French could not carry on their sugar manufacture to that advantage they do.

New-York, the Jerseys, and Pensylvania, were discovered, with the rest of the continent of North America, in the reign of Henry the Seventh, by Sebastian tian Cabot, for the crown of England ; but Sir Walter Raleigh was the first adventurer that attempted to plant colonies on these shores, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and, in honour of that princess, gave all the eastern coast of North America the name of Virginia. Mr. Hudson, an Englishman, sailing to that part of the coast which lies between Virginia and New-England, in the beginning of the reign of James the First, and being about to make a settlement at the mouth of Hudson's river, the Dutch gave him a sum of money to dispose of his interest in this country to them : in the year 1608 they began to plant it, and, by virtue of this purchase, laid claim to all those countries which are now denominated New-York, New-Jersey, and Pennsylvania ; but there remaining some part of this coast which was not planted by the Hollanders, the Swedes sent a fleet of ships thither, and took possession of it for that crown ; but the Dutch having a superior force in the neighbourhood, compelled the Swedes to submit to their dominion, allowing them, however, to enjoy the plantations they had settled. The English not admitting, that either the Dutch or Swedes had any right to countries first discovered and planted by a subject of England, and part of them at that time possessed by the subjects of Great Britain, under charter from queen Elizabeth and king James the First, king Charles the Second, during the first Dutch war, in 1664, granted the countries of New-York, the Jerseys, and Pennsylvania, of which the Dutch had usurped the possession, to his brother James, duke of York ; and Sir Robert Carr being sent over with a squadron of men of war, and land-forces, and summoning the Dutch governor of the city of New Amsterdam, now New-York, to surrender, he thought fit to obey the summons, and yield that capital to the English ; the rest of the places in the possession of the Dutch and Swedes followed his example, and these countries were confirmed to the English by the Dutch at the next treaty of peace between the two nations. The duke of York afterwards parcelled them out to under proprietors ; selling, in particular, to William Penn, the elder, in 1683, the town of Newcastle, alias Delaware, and a district of twelve miles round the same ; to whom, his heirs and assigns, by another deed of the same date, he made over all that tract of land from twelve miles south of Newcastle to the Whore-hills, otherwise called Cape Henlopen, now divided into the two counties of Kent and Suffex, which, with Newcastle district, are commonly known by the name of the Three Lower Counties upon Delaware River. All the rest of the under proprietors, some time after, surrendered their charters to the Crown, whereby New-York and the Jerseys became royal governments ; but Penn retained that part of the country which had been sold him by the duke of York, together with what had been granted to him before in 1680-1, which now constitutes the province of Pennsylvania. As soon as Penn had got his patent, he began to plant the country. Those who went over from England were generally dissenters and quakers, whose religion is established by law here, but with a toleration of all other protestant sects. The Dutch and Swedes, who were settled here before Mr. Penn became proprietor, chusing still to reside in this country, as they did in New York and the Jerseys, obtained the same privileges as the rest of his majesty's subjects ; and their descendants are now, in a manner, the same people with the English, speaking their language. Mr. Penn however, not satisfied with the title granted him by king Charles II. and his brother, bought the land also of the Indians for a valuable consideration, or what they esteemed as such (tho' twenty miles were purchased, at first, for less than an acre about Philadelphia, would cost now), paying them in cloths, tools, and utensils, to their entire satisfaction ; for they had not hands to cultivate the hundredth part of their lands, and if they could have raised a product, there was nobody to buy : the purchase, therefore was all clear gain to them ; and, by the coming of the English, their peltry trade became so profitable, that they soon found their condition much altered for the better, being as well clothed and fed as the European peasantry in many places.

Pennsylvania, at present, is one of the most flourishing colonies in North America, having never had any quarrel with the natives. Whenever they desire to extend their settlements, they purchase new lands of the sachems, never taking any by force ; but the Indians have since set a very high price upon their lands, in comparison of what they did at first. In an estimate of the proprietary estate of the province, published some years ago, we find, that the proprietaries, who alone can purchase lands here from the natives, had bought seven millions of acres for no more than seven hundred and fifty pounds sterling, which the proprietaries afterwards wards sold at the rate of fifteen pounds for every hundred acres. The Indian council at Onandago, however, disapproved of their deputies parting with so much land; and, in the year 1755, obliged the proprietaries to re-convey great part of the same to the Indians.

A dispute subsisted a long time between the proprietaries of this province and lord Baltimore, proprietary of Maryland, about the right to certain lands, which was at last amicably adjusted, though greatly in favour of the Penns. There were also, some years since, violent disputes between the proprietaries and the assembly, the former alledging, that their private estate ought to be exempted from all taxes; but whether the matter is yet settled or not we cannot pretend to say.

About the year 1704, there happened some alteration in the constitution of the province. It has now a governor, council, and assembly, each with much the same power and privileges as in the neighbouring colony of New York. The lieutenant-governor and council are appointed by the proprietors, the Penns; but if the laws enacted here are not repealed within six months after they have been presented to the king for his approbation or disallowance, they are not repealable by the crown after that time.

Pensylvania is divided into seven counties, four of which are called the upper, and three the lower. Of the upper, viz. Buckingham, Philadelphia, Chester, and Lancaster, the three first are the lands included in king Charles the Second's grant, and designed Pensylvania; the lower, viz. those of Newcastle, Kent and Suffex, were called Nova Belgia, before the duke of York sold them, as we observed before, to Mr. Penn. The upper counties end at Marcus Hook, four miles below Chester town, where the lower begin, and run along the coast near one hundred miles. Each of these counties has a sheriff, with a quarterly and monthly session, and assizes twice a year. The colony is said to have contained, many years ago, upwards of one hundred thousand souls.

Philadelphia, the capital of the colony, situated in 40 deg. 30 min north latitude, is one of the most beautiful and regular cities in the world, being an oblong of two miles, extending from the river Delaware to the Schuylkill, with the east end fronting the river Delaware, the west the river Schuylkill, and each front a mile in length. The river Delaware, as we observed already, is navigable from the sea for large vessels about two hundred miles, and that of Schuylkill as far as Philadelphia. Every man in possession of one thousand acres, has his house either in one of the fronts, facing the rivers, or in the high-street, running from the middle of one front to the middle of the other. Every owner of five thousand acres, besides the above-mentioned privilege, is entitled to have an acre of ground in the front of his house, and all others may have half an acre, for gardens and court-yards. Every quarter of the city forms a square of eight acres, and almost in the centre of it, is a square of ten acres, surrounded by the town-house, and other public buildings. The high-street is one hundred feet wide, and runs the whole length of the town; parallel to it run eight other streets, which are crossed by twenty more at right angles, all of them thirty feet wide, and communicating with canals from the two rivers, which add not only to the beauty, but the wholesomeness of the city. Ships of four or five hundred tons may come up to the key, which is two hundred feet square, and furnished with all the conveniences for ship-building, as well as for loading and unloading goods. The town-house is so stately and regular, that it would make a figure in any capital of Europe. The other public buildings are, the court-house, two quakers meeting houses, one church of England, one baptist meeting, one Dutch Lutheran church, one Dutch Calvinist church, one Moravian church, one mafs-house, the quakers school-house, the city alms-house, the quakers alms-house, the hospital, prison, and work-house.

The noblest institution, however, in the province of Pensylvania, is the academy established in this city, which, by the public encouragement, it has already, and may hereafter receive, bids fair, in time, to rival the brightest seminaries of learning in the mother country. Dr. Smith, who was at the head of this academy, raised a very considerable sum for it both in England and Scotland, having obtained a brief for that purpose in regard to England, and recommendation of a collection all over Scotland, by the general assembly of the church thereof.

Among the several sects in Philadelphia, that of the Moravians is none of the least considerable. The wildness and extravagance of this sect are well known all over Europe; but though they have a chapel here, with a small organ, their principal settlement is about fifty or sixty miles from hence. The similarity of practice between them and the quakers, in some some points, makes them fond of residing in Pennsylvania; like the quakers, they decline carrying arms in their own persons, yet contribute cheerfully to the military establishment for the defence of their settlements and country. Their zeal for the conversion of the Indians is incredible, exceeding, if possible, that for which the Jesuits were formerly so noted; and they have persuaded not a few of those savages to come and live with them, and conform to them. About the year 1741, they sent to Greenland or Davis's Streights, at their own expence, a ship, with a wooden church, ready framed, for the use of the inhabitants of that country, which produces no timber, and when the ship returned to Philadelphia, it brought two men and a young woman, natives of Greenland, who had been converted there by the Moravian missionaries. The same Moravians had then also a mission at Berbice and Surinam, from whence two converts likewise came to Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Moravians have almost the same indulgence shewn them by the legislature of Great Britain, excepting in criminal cases, as the quakers have; and their abstemious manner of living enables them to carry on the handicrafts they profess at a cheap rate; nor are they without some men of learning and academical education among them. Their chief settlement is called Bethlehem.

In the county to which Philadelphia gives name are several other towns, of which the most considerable are, German Town, so called, because most of the inhabitants are of that nation, or descending from such as were, Frankfort, Abington, Dublin, Radnor, Amerstrand, &c.

Of the other towns in the province the most considerable are, Bristol, Falls Town, and Pennsbury, in the county of Buckingham; Chester Town, Chichester, and Marcus Hook, in the county of Chester; Newcastle Town, Haverford-west, Merioneth, and St. George, in the county of Newcastle; Dover, Cranebrook, Marden, Mespeliven Plantations, in the county of Kent; Lewes, in the county of Sussex; Lancaster, in the county to which it gives name; and fourteen miles from Lancaster, on the frontier part of the county, is a small town, called Ephrata, lying between two small hills, in the most delightful situation that can well be imagined, as if nature had created it for the indulgence of contemplation. This town is inhabited by a sect called Dimplers, or Dunkards, and one, perhaps, of the most harmless and extraordinary that has appeared since the institution of Christianity. A German hermit, who settled on the spot where Ephrata is now built, was the founder of this extraordinary sect. The fame of his solitude inspired some of his countrymen with curiosity, and the simplicity of his life, with the piety of his conversation, induced them to join, and imitate him. A people who leave their native country to enjoy liberty of conscience, can bear all subsequent mortifications. The Germans of both sexes, who joined the hermit, soon accustomed themselves to his way of thinking, and consequently to his manner of living; industry became part of their duty, and divided their time with devotion. Their gains are thrown into one common stock, which supplies all their exigencies, private as well as public; their females are cloistered up by themselves in a separate part of the town, the situation of which is delightful, and screens them from the north wind. It is triangular, and fenced round with thick rows of apple, beech, and cherry trees, besides having an orchard in the middle. The houses, which are of wood, are mostly three stories high; and every person has a separate apartment, that he may not be disturbed in his devotions. The women never see the men but at public worship, or when it is necessary to consult upon matters of public œconomy; and the number of both may be about three hundred. Their garb is the most simple that can be well imagined, being a long white woollen gown in winter, and linen in the summer, with a cape; which serves them for a hat, like that of a capuchin behind, and fastened round the waist with a belt. Under the gown, they wear a waistcoat of the same materials, a coarse shirt, trowsers, and shoes. The dress of the women is the same, only instead of trowsers, they wear petticoats, and when they leave their nunnery (for such it is) they muffle up their faces in their capuchins.

The diet of the Dunkards consists of vegetables; but it is no principle with them to abstain from animal food, only they think that such abstinence is most agreeable to a christian life. This temperance emaciates their bodies, and, as the men indulge their beards to grow to their full length, gives them a hollow ghastly appearance. Their beds are no better than benches: a little wooden block serves them for a pillow; and they celebrate public worship twice every day, and as often every night. But though such modes of life appear absurd and impracticable, the Dunkards are far from being extravagant. Their chapel is very decent; and they have, upon a fine stream, a grist-mill, a paper-mill, an oil-mill, and a mill for pearl-barley, all of them most ingeniously constructed by themselves: they have even a printing-press; and they are, especially the nuns, extremely ingenious in working, and in embellishments, which they perform with a variety of beautiful colours, with gilding, in imitation of the initials in antient manuscripts; and they stick them up, by way of ornament, in their churches and cells. By those different manufactures, the public stock of this affective people is well supplied, as no denomination of Christians can be their enemies, their religious tenets being mingled with the absurdities of all.

Notwithstanding the two sexes live separate from one another in their town, yet the Dunkards are far from being averse to matrimony. In that case, the parties must indeed leave the town; but they are supplied out of the public fund with whatever is necessary for their settling elsewhere. This they generally do as near as they can to Ephrata, to which they send their children for education. The Dunkards administer baptism by dipping or plunging, but to adult persons only: they hold free-will, and think that the doctrine of original sin, as to its effect upon Adam's posterity, is absurd and impious; they disclaim violence, even in cases of self-defence; and suffer themselves to be defrauded or wronged, rather than go to law; they are superstitious to the last degree in observing their sabbath: and all their prayers and preachings, during their worship, are extempore: humility, chastity, temperance, and other Christian virtue, are commonly the subjects of their discourses; and they imagine, that the souls of dead Christians are employed in converting those of the dead who had no opportunity of knowing the gospel: they deny the eternity of hell's torments; but believe in certain temporary ones, that will be inflicted on infidels, and obstinate persons, who deny Christ to be their only Saviour; but they think, that at a certain period all will be admitted to the endless fruition of the Deity. A people whose principles are so harmless, and whose practice is so simple and virtuous, cannot be otherwise than happy upon earth. Among themselves they know nothing but harmony and mutual affection; every one cheerfully performs the task of industry assigned to him, and their hospitality to strangers is unbounded: but their principles lead them to take nothing in recompence.

Chinese Anecdote.

IT has long been a practice in China to honour persons eminent for virtue, by feasting them annually at the emperor's expence. A late emperor made an improvement: He ordered reports to be sent him annually of men and women who when alive had been remarkable for public spirit or private virtue, in order that monuments might be erected to their memory. The following report is one of many that were sent to the emperor: 'According to the order of your Majesty, for erecting monuments to the honour of women, who, have been celebrated for continence, for filial piety, or for purity of manners, the Viceroy of Canton reports, that in the town of Sinhoei a beautiful young woman named Leang, sacrificed her life to save her chastity. In the fifteenth year of our Emperor Canghi, she was dragged by pirates into their ship; and, having no other way to escape their brutal lust, she threw herself headlong into the sea. Being of opinion, that to prefer honour before life is an example worthy of imitation, we purpose, according to your majesty's order, to erect a triumphal arch for that young woman, and to engrave her story upon a large stone, that it may be preserved in perpetual remembrance.'

At the foot of the report is written, 'The Emperor approves.' Pity it is, that such regulations should ever prove abortive, for their purpose is excellent. But they would need angels to put them into execution. Every deviation from a just selection enervates them; and frequent deviations render them a subject of ridicule. But how are deviations to be prevented, when men are the judges? Those who distribute the rewards will prefer their friends, and overlook those of greater merit. Like the censorian power in Rome, such regulations, after many abuses, will sink into contempt.

The Force of Filial Affection: A Moral Tale.

MONSIEUR DURAND, a very considerable Merchant in France, not only lived up to the utmost extent of his income, by gratifying his own taste for all kinds of expensive amusements, but also indulged a very amiable wife, and two sons brought up to his own business, in the enjoyment of almost every species of luxury which money could procure. Having occasion to send his eldest eldest son Pierre to a correspondent of his, within a few leagues of Paris, to execute a commission of importance, the young man appeared there (elegantly formed, and finely accomplished) upon a footing, in point of magnificence, with men of the first distinction. Adorned by Nature with every charm to please, and assisted by all the advantages which Fortune could bestow, he was received by the best families, and earnestly solicited to make one in all their parties of pleasure. These invitations gave him many opportunities to render himself particularly agreeable to a young lady called Lucilia (who was upon a visit to an aunt), no less amiable for a woman than Pierre was for a man. To this lady he, at his departure from her, promised to come back as soon as he had informed his parents of his passion, and gained their consent to make proper proposals.—But how was he shocked and distressed, on his return home, to find his father at the point of death, and his affairs in the greatest confusion! Immediately upon his decease, his creditors seized upon every thing, and left Madame Durand and her two sons in so straitened a situation, that they had scarce a sufficiency to procure the common necessities of life. The amiable and disconsolate widow, having been long accustomed to affluent circumstances, suffered more from the reduction of her income than many would have done who had lived in a more frugal manner; and her sons, both of them very fond of her, felt her distresses much more acutely than their own.—In vain were their joint endeavours to prevail on their father's creditors to behave with less severity, on their mother's account: they heard all their intreaties, strengthened by their prayers, with unaltered looks and unrelenting hearts. Equally immovable also were those who, while their father lived in prosperity, had called themselves his friends, and hastened his rapid progress to ruin, by encouraging his extravagant disposition for their own private views. Animated by their encouragements, he squandered away his fortune in a manner which could not but be attended with consequences truly to be deplored. These friends were the first persons who shut their doors against his unhappy widow and her children, at the time when they stood most in need of their countenance and assistance.

Sincere were the lamentations of Lewis and Pierre, occasioned by the distresses of a mother whom they loved, honoured, esteemed, and revered: sincerely too did they wish, but they wished in vain, to be capable of procuring for her a bare subsistence. The latter had still more reason than the former to feel the misery of his condition, as he was prevented by it from enjoying the felicity he had fondly expected by an union with so amiable a girl as Lucilia. To acquaint her with the blow which had excluded a possibility of his keeping his promise to apply to her father for a permission to marry her—he dreaded the thoughts of giving her this information; as he believed—and very rationally believed—that it would make her extremely wretched. She was indeed, at that very moment in a state truly to be pitied; she was pining away her life with anxiety on his account; for not having heard a syllable of him since his removal, she feared that he was become inconstant, or that he had met with some unfortunate accident.

One evening, as a nobleman was returning from his country-seat to Paris, he was assassinated; and a very large reward was immediately offered by a near relation who attended him, to the person who should discover the murderer, that he might be brought to justice.

Pierre happening to be in the street when this reward was published, determined to avail himself of it, in order to furnish his mother with a sum sufficient to put her into some way of business which might afford her a decent maintenance. Fired with the generous, the tender idea of providing for an affectionate parent, tho' by the sacrifice of his own life, he instantly hurried to the Lieutenant of the Police to surrender himself.

While he was hastening along, overwhelmed with a thousand torturing reflections, he passed two ladies, without casting a single look at them: hearing his name, however, articulated by one of them, he raised his eyes, and saw his beloved Lucilia, accompanied by a very particular friend, a Mademoiselle D'Aubine, who had been educated at the same Convent.—He started on hearing the well-known voice—it was music to his ear—but he wished just at that time for several reasons that he had not heard it. The voice, the sight of his Lucilia recalled that love of life so strongly implanted in the breast of every human being, and he found it difficult beyond expression to divest himself of it.—The sudden appearance of Lucilia made him painfully think of the happy hours which he might have enjoyed in an honourable connection with her, had his father lived—had he died in prosperity: instantly, however, considering that the intended sacrifice out of the question, his indigence effectually prevented him from thinking of an union with the mistress of his heart, he only lamented their having met, even for a moment. He could not bring himself to explain the reason for the breach of his promise; still less was he able to discover the design he had formed, by the forfeiture of his own life, to secure a provision for his mother; imagining that, in consequence of her passion for him, she would naturally oppose such a design, and by so doing, either shake his resolution, or, at least, make him too deeply regret so melancholy a separation. Yet, distressed as he was at the sight just then, he could not prevail upon himself even to endeavour to avoid her; on the contrary, he flew towards her, caught her trembling hands in his, and pressing them with tender, but alarming emotions, exclaimed, “Oh! Lucilia! my dear Lucilia! accuse me not of having been inconstant, or regardless of my vows! My heart still fondly doats on you: but the most unexpected misfortunes have hindered our meeting till this instant, and even now I must not linger—Adieu!—May you ever be happy!—This shall be the last aspiration of your Pierre.”

Here, unable to contain himself any longer, he broke from her, and hastening to carry his first design into execution, surrendered himself to the Chief Magistrate; who, after having asked him the necessary questions upon similar occasions, ordered him to be taken into custody; tho’ he, at the same time, felt an unusual something which pleaded in his behalf: in pity, therefore, to his youth and amiable appearance, he also ordered, that while he was strictly guarded, he should be treated with all the indulgence which a prison would admit of. When he returned to the apartment in which he had left his family, he spoke of his young prisoner in terms that not only discovered his own compassion, but strongly excited theirs.—Lucilia, who happened to be his daughter, was particularly affected by her father’s description. “Oh, Sir, (exclaimed she eagerly) I know him—I know him—He is my Pierre—Indeed,—indeed he is not guilty!”

magistrate (not having known till that moment that she was tenderly prepossessed in favour of any man) desired her to inform him of all she knew relating to the criminal; and from her account of him, as well as from his own observations, he most sincerely wished that he might be exculpated; lamenting, at the same time, the trying situation of a magistrate, who, not being able to read the hearts of men, might run the risque of condemning the innocent instead of the guilty. However, to give Lucilia all the consolation in his power, and also to give relief to his own benevolent mind, he added, that if no witnesses appeared, his criminality could not be properly ascertained.

Pierre, who in his eagerness to provide for his mother had not thought of producing such necessary proofs of his guilt, as soon as he heard that they were requisite became very restless how to procure them, as he was shut up from the sight of all men.

At this juncture his brother Lewis, hearing of his being in prison, made the earliest application to see him; and his request was granted. While he was expressing his concern and sorrow at his having been capable of committing so atrocious an action, Pierre interrupted him by intreating his appearance against him.

“How! (replied Lewis) would you render me not only guilty of uttering the grossest falsehoods, but of being instrumental, by those falsehoods, to the destruction of a brother with whom I have ever lived in the strictest friendship? Surely, you must have lost your reason!”

Lewis then talking calmly to his brother more at large upon this very interesting subject, Pierre confessed at last, that he had declared himself an assassin with no other view than to procure the reward offered, for his mother, whose distresses pierced him to the quick.

Lewis, astonished at this confession, could not help admiring his motive, while he disapproved his uncommon heroism; and in consequence of this disapprobation, he absolutely refused to be an evidence against him. Pierre, however, at length almost talked him into an acquiescence with every thing that might tend to the relief of their mother under the heavy pressure of her poverty.

Lewis now leaving Pierre, went to his mother: who seeing him appear unusually dejected, conjectured that something very disagreeable had happened, and questioned him closely about the absence of her eldest son.

very

Before he could give her a satisfactory answer, he was summoned to attend the trial of his brother. Pierre, having earnestly intreated him to be firm, and to speak boldly against him, soon received his sentence; a sentence which the chief magistrate and the counsellors assembled neither wished for, nor expected.

Madame Durand, beginning to harbour some suspicions, from the excessive affliction into which her youngest son was plunged, upon his return home from the trial forced a discovery from him, flew to the magistrate frantic with grief, placed herself between him and her son, fondly expatiated upon his disinterested filial affection, and in the most moving language besought his judge not to suffer a man to be executed for a crime of which he was perfectly innocent; a man who possessed a mind sufficiently noble to make him sacrifice his life for his mother's subsistence!

The judge and the counsellors were exceedingly affected by all they saw, and all they heard; yet they could not tell which way to determine.

Lucilia at this moment pressing through the crowd, almost out of breath, and calling to some people to follow her, begged her father to hear them, assuring him that Pierre was not guilty; adding, that the real assassin was found, that he had confessed the murder, and that fearing they should come too late, she had hurried into court with them. Her blushes and the extreme agitation of her whole frame moved all the father in the judge: he waited, however, to hear the information which was brought with regard to the actual murderer; and on being satisfied that his intelligence was authentic, that the actual murderer stood before him, ordered the guards to unbind Pierre.

Madame Durand then clasping her released son to her affectionate bosom, held him there for some moments in an agony of joy, weeping over him, and pouring out her fervent acknowledgments to the Supreme Judge, for the preservation of a son, whose filial affection she could not help extolling, at the same time, in the strongest terms. Pierre tenderly returned his mother's affectionate embraces, and then, turning to Lucilia, thanked her for so kindly interesting herself upon his account.

The magistrate, who had at first been struck with his person and behaviour, expressed his surprise at and admiration of such an uncommon proof of filial affection, and at the same time thanked Heaven for not permitting him to be the cause, through an error in judgment, of his unmerited death. He then asked his daughter, how they became acquainted. She immediately related all that had passed between them at her aunt's—adding, “I hope, Sir, you will not condemn me for the choice of a man, in whose favour you owned yourself prejudiced, even when you believed him guilty of the blackest of crimes.”

Instead of returning an answer to this speech, he addressed himself to Madame Durand; and after having congratulated her on being the mother of such a son, thus proceeded: “In order to make you some amends, Madam, for the distresses of various kinds in which you have been unfortunately involved, I must desire you to look upon my daughter, for the future as your own. My fortune shall be settled on her and your son, if you approve of their union.”

It is not easy to describe either the mother's gratitude or the son's exultation on the conclusion of this address. Lewis and Mademoiselle D'Aubine were sent for to be partakers of their joy: the worthy magistrate then said to Pierre, “Be but as good a husband as you have been a son, and it will be my daughter's own fault, if she is not the happiest of wives.”

Sketches of the most distinguished Political Characters of the present Times.

Lord North,

Considered in every public point of view, is perhaps as great and able a Minister, as ever presided at the head of the Treasury.—Whoever reflects on the situation of public affairs, when his royal Master thought it expedient to call him to the helm, threatening at that time no less than a general shipwreck of the dearest interests of this country, must look with admiration on the man, who, regardless of surrounding perils, braved every danger with perseverance, supported only by a consciousness of his own rectitude, and the countenance of his sovereign.—Such is the grand, though simple, outline of this extraordinary character:—Examined more attentively, we discover the clear and able financier; a talent of the utmost consequence in a commercial empire, and without which a Minister, however able in other points, will acquit himself but awkwardly. His parliamentary abilities are greater than strike the superficial observer:—It is true, his Lordship has not ‘sacrificed to the Graces,’ nor made the flourishes of eloquence his chief study; but, in the essentials of oratory, few speakers rank before him.—In the opening of a Budget, his schemes in general are clearly arranged, and the necessary objects pointed out by him, on which to lay any increase of the revenues, discover a perfect knowledge of the strength and sinews of this country. —But his principal forte lies in reply; he has that coolness, which, never suffering him to follow the eccentric brawlings of opposition, confines him to the subject in debate, which he supports with a stile of reasoning and candour that the gentlemen of the minority are unable to counteract.—With respect to the American war, notwithstanding what may be said to the contrary, by those who intimate that he is averse to the present hostile measures, and only acts in compliment to an invisible Ruler behind the curtain, rather than lose his place, —it is certain that his Lordship’s sentiments are in direct opposition to those of the Americans; and, though he wished to win them over by lenient methods, he discovered the utmost abhorrence at the first daring insult offered to the mother-country:—Nay, he has professed his principles pretty publicly on this head, declaring he would live and die with them.

Lord George Germaine.

THIS gentleman entered life with every advantage that could promise an illustrious career,—and by his talents he has made a progress, if not illustrious, at least remarkable. He rose to the highest military command on actual service that the Crown could bestow, and, if he had united heartily with the foreign commander in chief, he would certainly have attained the post of Generalissimo of the army of Britain. The history of the remarkable transaction which put a stop to that rise, and involved both the man and the character in ignominy and disgrace,—perhaps an undeserved disgrace, is well known: The politics of the court of George the Third were too much in opposition to that of his predecessor, to allow Lord George to remain under disgrace. He was immediately caressed, and made a privy-counsellor. His advancement to the post of secretary of state did not take off a Minority man, for he had generally been with the court. His promotion was determined so early as September last, from which time he had constant access to all the papers in Lord Dartmouth’s office, and his opinion was the law in the whole American department. He entered the office with the superiority of a minister, and controuled, with an high hand, both the admiralty and the army, in whatever concerned America. The present campaign is his entirely, for no measure has been decided contrary to his opinion. He is not however upon a very secure footing in his office, for he is thwarted by Lord Gower and Mr. Rigby; and Lord Sandwich took an opportunity to exonerate himself from having any thing to do with Sir Peter Parker’s expedition, in terms that shewed he valued Lord George’s reputation as nought. His abilities are certainly greater than the appearances of this campaign display: Probably therefore he is over-ruled, if not by office, at least behind the private curtain.

Lord Mansfield.

THIS noble lawyer has been so long the great oracle of law and politics in this country, that we might naturally suppose, from mere length of time, that the season of retirement was come. But he has no idea of changing his present scene. While the Tories hold their present pre-eminence in power, his influence will be powerful; but, if America is lost, the Tories must inevitably lose their places, and with them their consequence. Lord Mansfield will then feel himself in so disagreeable a situation, so threatened with responsibility, that he will be glad to take that retirement by force to which at present he might voluntarily have recourse with dignity. I mention this, because even his best friends have thought, for some time, that his abilities have greatly declined. For many years, his opinions were always right, and his reputation, for a superiority of understanding, so great, that a higher character was scarcely known in the kingdom. But of late his law opinions have been contradicted, refuted, and overturned; and there has been scarcely one great debate in the house of lords, in which he has not suffered a loss of reputation. In respect of interest in the cabinet, he has of late assured the house, that he desired the king to excuse his attendance as an efficient cabinet counsellor; but, long since that time he mentioned, tioned, he has been known to dictate in many affairs of the highest consequence; and it has been evident, from the frequent private conferences with the king, that he is listened to perpetually behind the curtain. The present minority know this too well to allow him that subterfuge, in case the American affairs bring them into power. There is no doubt of this lord, and the whole Scotch junto, in that case, being driven from power with every mark of indignation and resentment which can be shewn to men, to whom confessedly the loss of all America is owing. But the politics of St. James's will be exerted to ward off a blow so injurious to all the deep-laid plans of fifteen years continuance. The leaders of the minority, who have for this last session of parliament lost not one member, but raised themselves continually in the estimation of the public, will find dissension tried to be scattered among them—which they must repel, or be ruined.

Lord Clare.

WHILE Mr. Nugent, he went through a great variety of life, but generally managed from an early age to be rising in credit, wealth, and office when in it. He was first known to the world from his connection with Frederick, Prince of Wales, by whose death he left not only many of his political hopes, but above 10,000*l.* which was lent on his life; the Prince of Wales however recommended him to his dowager, and since his death he has been continually rising in office and title, till he found himself in a very secure harbour, the Vice Treasurership of Ireland, which is above 3000*l.* with offices and reversions to above 1000*l.* more. At present he is the grand channel of intercourse between Lord Bute and the queen's house, and consequently stands high in the list of those private counsellors who have had so great a share in all the transactions of this reign; it is indeed a desirable post, though not the post of honour. His lordship has always had the reputation of being a man of wit, and certainly possesses a great command of repartee and liveliness, and has many times greatly entertained the house of commons in his speeches, with original humour. He is a man of knowledge, and has strong parts—and upon various occasions has been one of the most useful friends the ministry has in that house, either by his understanding the question better than others, or by throwing it in a light more favourable to their views. A strong instance of this was lately seen, in his suddenly comparing Lord Harcourt's message to the Irish Commons to the treaties of subsidy the king enters into with foreign powers, in both of which cases the parliament is answered for, without their consent.

Mr. Rigby.

THE fortune of this gentleman, if considered by itself, must be thought very extraordinary—but, if the late Duke of Bedford's prejudices are considered, and those of his Dukes not forgotten, it will no longer appear so. As to family, arms, and descent, I have a notion heraldry drops a veil over them. The right hon. gentleman has parts—and those parts have done his business—indeed they have done it admirably. He has managed to keep in office, if not very high in it, at least very lucratively, for above thirty years. He has been long sole paymaster; a post which the present prime minister was once content to share with another;—and he has shewn every mark that he has not been backward to himself to make those private pecuniary advantages, which accumulated so immense a fortune in the person of the late Lord Holland, and which his successors are taking such industrious pains to shew that the old proverb shall still prove true—such marks as building a great house, that will cost threecore thousand pounds, and purchasing estates to the amount of several hundred thousand pounds value. That Mr. Rigby has abilities, every one must allow, who has attended parliament—he is very able in the house, and has that sort of wit, which, when a debate is taking an ugly turn, will shift it upon new grounds,—will make at other times a good horse-laugh in the house, and obliterate the effects of solid reason and argument. In principles, I can only say that he has ever been for the court, let what would be the subject, business, men, or measures. He and his friends support every man that will support him in office; and no doctrine carries the rights or power of the crown too high for Mr. Rigby's digestion.

Mr. Jenkinson,

FROM an origin not splendid, he has raised himself to be foremost in the confidence of his sovereign's favourites, —and

—and high in that of his Sovereign himself, with a revenue of 4000*l.* a year, and three reversions. When Lord Bute was the ruling power in the Household of the late Princess Dowager of Wales, he wanted an Agent for some private intrigues of State, and, applying to the Dukes of Portland, Mr. Jenkinson was recommended; he soon distinguished himself for several qualities of great value in the department which his Patron had placed him in. A suppleness of understanding, which could equally bend to every employ, without raising jealousy in any,—united with scruples not exceeding troublesome, and a fertility in the invention of expedients, made him highly useful: He soon became known to the Princess, who preferred him in her Household. That attention was a sure recommendation to the King; who, since the death of his mother, has intrusted him with the principal private Parliamentary negotiations, which have been more numerous, and repeated this reign, than ever was known before: Upon Lord Bute's retirement from the ostensible line of public power, this Gentleman has been his private manager; invested with so much weight that he was offered the post of First Lord of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, but refused it:—thinking that the post of confidence, behind the curtain, was better than the responsible splendor of the Premier's office.

A Motion on the Part of the Right Honourable the Earl of Bristol, moved by Dr. Marriot, his Majesty's Advocate General, against the Countess of Bristol, calling herself Duchess of Kingston.

THE purport of the motion was, that the court should decree a citation to be affixed on the Royal Exchange; for the countess to appear and shew cause why the sentence pronounced against the earl, forbidding him to boast himself to be the husband of the said lady, should not be declared null and void, as his lordship is now able to prove his marriage.

Upon a former motion of the like nature, the judge had declared that the decree prayed should not issue until he should be satisfied that the lady had notice of the proceedings intended against her, that she might oppose, if she thought proper, by her counsel; and he threw out some expressions that were rather severe, as if the cause was at an end, and that some person had not used the court well, and must expect no favour from it. It was urged at this time, that the reason of applying to a court for such a sort of citation as this, which is called a citation viis et modis, or by ways and means, is, that a party cannot be personally served with notice, being in parts abroad, of which affidavits are always offered; that it seemed, therefore, absurd to order a notice, that such a notice will be prayed. However, the judge at that time was of opinion, that it was right no step should be permitted to be taken which might give any party an advantage, and quoted his own former order in the case of Tenducci.

Accordingly the earl of Bristol's proctor undertook to give notice to the lady; and persons were sent over from England to Calais for that purpose.

They brought over a verbal process, drawn up in form by two French notaries, who had been in the house at Calais where the lady was, and who was seen at the window, her curiosity having unfortunately led her to shew herself; they had left a letter of notice open upon a table before her servant; and the notarial attestation of this fact, with several other little circumstances, were now read to the court.

The judge asked if there was no person to appear for the lady, to oppose the motion? Being answered in the negative, he said he had great doubts about granting the motion. Every thing was new, and in so singular a cause, it was plain now that somebody had colluded, for the marriage with lord Bristol was proved by a verdict; that he could not see the occasion of coming here, and that there must be some farther meaning. He wanted to know what was the intent and meaning of lord Bristol in bringing the suit; and he called upon lord Bristol's counsel to tell him; and he desired to hear arguments in support of the motion.

Dr. Harris, who was counsel for the earl from the beginning of the suit, and afterwards for the prosecutor at the house of lords, replied to the following effect:

That he did not think lord Bristol could be charged with any collusion: for his lordship asserted on his part to the contrary, in the most solemn manner; and no collusion had been proved in any cause against him; that lord Bristol had determined to bring a suit of another kind against the lady, when she began first, by bringing the jactitation suit against him; that he always understood that at the time when lord Bristol

applied to Mrs. Craddock, who then lived with the lady, to give evidence of the marriage, if she knew of it, Mrs. Craddock constantly declared she knew nothing of the matter; he farther insisted that his lordship was, upon the proofs of the notification to the lady now before the court, well entitled to his motion.

Mr. Major, proctor for the earl of Bristol, assured the court, that he had delivered the night before copies of the verbal process and attestations to Mr. Bishop, proctor for her ladyship; and that if the court required an affidavit from lord Bristol, in regard to the collusion hinted at, and Mrs. Craddock's declaration and refusal, he had no doubt but lord Bristol would give the court all the satisfaction that could be desired, by affidavit or otherwise.

The judge, Dr. Bettefworth, still appearing dissatisfied, and unwilling to grant the decree, the advocate-general rose and said,

That he felt himself in a very awkward situation to be called upon by the court to argue against it, in support of a motion, which must be considered now as a matter grantable of course, the previous order being complied with; that the sentiments of the court being, as it seemed apparently now, against the motion, and against his client, it was delicate to contend with the court itself, and to prove that there was either error or prejudice in those sentiments; that speaking, without opposing advocates, was like beating the air; that if the motion had been opposed by the lady and her counsel, it would have been a fair field of argument; and he called upon the gentlemen sitting round the table, by whose advice the lady had been led through, he did not say into, all her distress, to get up and oppose, if they thought the motion was irregular, or not grantable. He said, that if counsel were called upon as Amici Curie, as indifferent friends of the court, and as a sort of honourable assessors, nobody stood there more indifferent than himself, as in the whole of the cause between the lady and the earl, and between her and the prosecutor, he had not given a line of an opinion; that he had never been applied to by any party before the present occasion; so far was it from being true, that every civilian had been consulted, that both court and counsel, and a whole profession, were most unjustly involved in the charge of collusion. He was happy that the present occasion and his own situation, now furnished him with an opportunity of publicly declaring his opinion of the uprightness of a decision which had made so much noise in the world, and from that decision he would draw an argument in favour of the present motion. As a hearer only of what passed in the cause in this court before, he was highly convinced of the rectitude of mind of the person who pronounced that sentence: that the judge who pronounced it was bound by law to do it, upon the result of the proofs existing in the cause, as all judges must do, who decide only ex apparentibus et existentibus; that if there had been any proof of collusion, or even any violent presumption of it at that time, the court would not, or could not, have pronounced the sentence in favour of the lady, who indeed is now the person proved to have done what she ought not; by the verdict of the most august tribunal finding her to have been already married to the earl of Bristol, at the time she was married to the duke of Kingston. But that verdict is not yet pleaded here: in that criminal suit the earl of Bristol was no party: and now his council are called upon to say what is his lordship's intent by coming again here? No man can properly ask what is another man's intent in bringing his suit in any court. His intent must be to have justice. Why are actions brought at common law? Why are bills, without number, brought in chancery? Fishing-bills, as they are called. No judges think of asking why? Parties have their private views when they claim public justice. One suit is to bring about a private agreement; another to make a discovery; another to establish a fact by an issue: they go from chancery to common law, and from common law to chancery; and yet the ecclesiastical courts are to be the objects of a very heavy illiberal kind of wit: but that it is proper that the party should take the present step is clear enough; and the intention of the earl of Bristol wants no explanation concerning this motion.

The house of lords have found the lady to be the wife of the earl of Bristol. This court under penalties of the law has forbid him to boast that he is her husband, and the sentence hangs yet over his lordship's head, and his mouth is closed.—Like a new-made cardinal's, his counsel pray that it may be opened, and that he may be at liberty now to say, what the verdict of the peers has said, that he is her husband. Besides this, it is not asked to set aside a definitive, a conclusive, a perpetual decree. And this motion may be well supported from the nature of the sentence itself, without going at large into all the beaten arguments lately used, well or ill, in a superior judicature, concerning the conclusiveness of ecclesiastical sentences in causes of marriage: it is enough to look at the words of the sentence. The sentence is in the usual forms: when against a marriage it is a mere interlocutory order—it is provisional, “Free from all matrimonial contracts, especially with A. B. so far as appears to us, and A. B. is to keep silence.” How long? perpetual is requested: but it is not enjoined as perpetual. Perpetual means, indeed, only continued. How long to be continued? “Till the contrary shall appear to us, and a marriage can be proved by A. B. or somebody, or any body having interest. Now all the world is a third party in causes of marriage, since every man has an interest to know whose wife a woman is, for fear of the most terrible disorders in society. Every body in arguing at the house of lords seemed to be agreed that a marriage cause is never concluded: very rightly, when against the marriage; with attention to the distinction of negative or affirmative sentences. When a sentence is for a marriage, it is for ever conclusive, not being appealed from: against a marriage never. This distinction is well founded upon principles of reasoning and law. When the sentence is for a marriage, it is then affirmative of a fact; and an affirmative is always in the nature of reasoning more capable of being established and confirmed conclusively, as a proposition, than a negative is. The repose of society, the peace, the honour, and fortunes of families, in well regulated governments, have all an interest, as well as morals and religion, and civil authority are concerned, in supporting a sentence in favour of marriage, and to prevent the bastardizing of issue: but in the case of pronouncing a negative of a fact of marriage, the negative is not only harder of proof, but it is always open in the real nature of all human things undiscovered, to be convicted of falsity. In causes of boasting, if the marriage is proved, then it is truly and directly a case of marriage, and is conclusive: but if it is not proved, the boasting then is only not justified, and the marriage, which is tried incidentally, but not principally, may in the nature of things exist notwithstanding, and may afterwards appear; just as when a suit is for administration of effects of a dead man; a will is propounded, is opposed, and set aside; the deceased is pronounced to have died intestate, and administration is granted to his nearest of kin. Although this sentence is conclusive, that is to say conclusive enough for the time being, till the contrary shall appear, it is never perfectly concluded or conclusive. Another will is found: suppose this last will is established at common law, (as in a case of lands) or in chancery, or even brought into the ecclesiastical court, the sentence of intestacy is revocable, and every day's practice proves it to be so; but enough has been subtilized upon this subject in another place. The sense is clear enough what the law is, and ought to be; and what has passed in a superior court has now put lord Bristol into a situation which enables him to prove that he has a right to have the injunction, or inhibition, or monition of this court, call it what you please, to keep silence, taken off. He has followed the steps traced out by the court itself for his conduct in the manner of giving the notice of this motion to the lady. The court, therefore, seems to have predetermined that on lord Bristol's performance of the conditional order, he should have the effect of his motion; and it is conceived that the court, by its own previous act, is now bound to grant it: that there is no opposition; and where there is no opposition all motions go of course, in all courts, in causes between man and man, when there can be no injury to a third party, knowing of what is to be done; which is the object of a very laudable caution in a court as well as very just and wise, in avoiding the least surmise from public censure. This court knew of no collusion before, it knows of none now. It sees with no eyes but those of strict and steady justice, fixed on lawful pleas and proofs.

The danger of judges determining from their own knowledge, and from proofs not before them, or presumptions that are private, would overturn every free constitution, and every true system of justice. It is unnecessary to quote examples of the delicate conduct of the greatest judges of this country from early times. But there can be no collusion to-day, in desiring this court to remove an existing order inconsistent with the decree of the house of peers. Under all these circumstances, the citation prayed by the noble lord, is a writ of right; it is not opposed by the contrary party, it is grantable to the subject, and it cannot be denied to a party against whom there is no proof of collusion or disobedience.

The judge, upon hearing the arguments of the council for the earl of Bristol, and the attestations, decreed the citation to issue as prayed, observing all due forms as in the case of a peeress.

CIVILIS.

The Methods of Treatment of Drowned Persons, in order to their Recovery, as published by a Society instituted for that Purpose in London.

I. IN removing the body to a convenient place, great care must be taken that it be not bruised, nor shaken violently, nor roughly handled, nor carried over one's shoulders with the head hanging downwards, nor rolled upon the ground, or over a barrel, nor lifted up by the heels, except with the greatest caution. For experience proves, that all these methods are injurious, and often destroy the small remains of life. The unfortunate object should be cautiously conveyed by two or more persons, or in a carriage upon straw, lying as on a bed with the head a little raised, and kept in as natural and easy a position as possible.

II. The body being well dried with a cloth, should be placed in a moderate degree of heat, but not too near a large fire. The windows or door of the room should be left open, and no more persons admitted into it than those who are absolutely necessary, as the life of the patient greatly depends upon their having the benefit of a pure air. The warmth most promising of success is that of a bed or a blanket, properly warmed. Bottles of hot water should be laid at the bottoms of the feet, in the joints of the knees, and under the arm-pits; and a warming-pan, moderately heated, or hot bricks wrapped in cloths, should be rubbed over the body, and particularly along the back. The natural and kindly warmth of a healthy person lying by the side of the body, has been found in many cases very efficacious. The shirt or cloths of an attendant, or the skin of a sheep fresh killed, may also be used with advantage. Should these accidents happen in the neighbourhood of a warm bath, brew-house, baker, glasshouse, saltern, soap-boiler, or any fabric where warm lees, ashes, embers, grains, sand, water, &c. are easily procured, it would be of the utmost service to place the body in any of these, moderated to a degree of heat, but very little exceeding that of a healthy person.

III. The subject being placed in one or other of these advantageous circumstances as speedily as possible, various stimulating methods should next be employed. The most efficacious are,—to blow with force into the lungs, by applying the mouth to that of the patient, closing his nostrils with one hand, and gently expelling the air again by pressing the chest with the other, imitating the strong breathing of a healthy person.—Whilst one assistant is constantly employed in this operation, another should throw the smoke of tobacco up by the fundament into the bowels, by means of a pipe or fumigator, such as are used in administering tobacco clysters: a pair of bellows may be used until the others can be procured. A third attendant should, in the mean time, rub the belly, chest, back and arms, with a coarse cloth or flannel dipped in brandy, rum, gin, or with dry salt, so as not to rub off the skin: spirits of hartshorn, volatile salts, or any other stimulating substance, must also be applied to the nostrils, and rubbed upon the temples very frequently. The body should at intervals be shaken also, and varied in its position.

IV. If there be any signs of returning life, such as sighing, gasping, twitching, or any convulsive motions, beating of the heart, the return of the natural colour and warmth; bleeding either in the arm or jugular vein, or temporal artery, now becomes particularly necessary. The throat should be tickled with a feather, in order to excite a propensity to vomit; and the nostrils also with a feather, snuff, or any other stimulant, so as to provoke sneezings. A tea-spoonful of warm water may be administered now and then, in order to learn whether the power of swallowing be returned: and if it be, a table-spoonful of warmed wine, or brandy and water, may be given with advantage: but not before; as the liquor might get into the lungs before the power of swallowing returns. The other methods should be continued with vigour, until the patient gradually restored.

We have been as circumstantial as possible in the above directions, that if one conveniency should be wanting, the attendants may not be at a loss for others. Where the patient has lain but a short time senseless, blowing into the lungs or bowels has been, in some cases, found sufficient: yet a speedy recovery is not to be expected in general. On the contrary, the above methods are to be continued with spirit for two hours, or upwards, although there should not be the least symptoms of returning life. The vulgar notion that a person will recover in a few minutes, or not at all; and the ignorant, foolish ridiculing, of those who are willing to persevere, as if they were attempting impossibilities, has most certainly caused the death of many who might otherwise have been saved.

Most of the above rules are happily of such a nature, that they may be begun immediately, and that by persons who are not acquainted with the medical art; yet it is always advisable to seek the assistance of some regular practitioner as soon as possible; not only as bleeding is always proper, and sometimes essentially necessary; but as it is to be presumed that such a one will be more skilful and expert, and better able to vary the methods of procedure as circumstances may require.

The society think it proper to observe, that these means of restoration are applicable to various other cases of apparent deaths; such as hanging, suffocation by damps and noxious vapours, whether proceeding from coal-mines, the confined air of wells, cisterns, caves, or the must of fermenting liquors; to those seized with apoplectic and convulsive fits, and also to the frozen. And they hope that some persons of influence in the parts where such accidents mostly happen, will form a similar institution for the recovery of the unhappy victims.

Clauses absolutely necessary in any future Statute, for proper useful Improvements in the Construction and Regulation of Goals,

1. THAT all gaols be extended rather in length and breath than height, and constructed on a fixed plan by parliament for the future, differing only in size, but not in form, which should be oblong, with at least three divisions or courts. The first for debtors, the second for delinquents, and the third for felons, with subdivisions for men and women separately. The court for debtors surrounded with plain arcades or pillars, as at St. Thomas's Hospital, that the prisoners may walk under cover in bad weather; a fountain in that court for cleanliness and refreshment of air in summer. Wide stairs of stone, being more airy, less noisy, and more secure from fire. The rooms spacious, with the dimensions specified in the act.

2. That the furniture shall be to the full value of ten pounds in every room on the master's side of the gaol for debtors, and of five pounds on the common side; the rent not above two shillings a-week for the former rooms, nor above one shilling a-week for the latter side; which would be above one hundred pounds per cent. for the use of the furniture, and interest of the expended sum for its purchase; a sufficient sum for the gaoler or any other man who undertakes or contracts to furnish the gaol. Every article of furniture should be specified in the act for each room, to prevent the evasion and chicanery of the gaolers.

3. The room or cell of every felon should have at least a mattress and rug, that they may lie as human creatures, and not worse than brutes, as at present, on dirty boards, and in more filthy places than dogs and swine, which often cause infection.

4. That no gaol shall have any wards for prisoners, being injurious to their health, morals, and manners, by their intercourse, drunkenness, or contagion.

5. That all gaols shall have single rooms, beds, and bedsteads of iron, for debtors, to prevent infection and vermin.

6. That all gaols must have a public spacious kitchen in each division, especially for the debtors, with fire from nine in the morning to nine in the evening, to dress provisions for meals.

7. That no gaoler shall remove debtors from their rooms, according to his caprice, without their consent, or the leave of the sheriff, or magistrate, after a candid examination of the case.

8. That no women or children, except prisoners, shall be allowed to lie in gaols by night, nor pass whole days there, as they only crowd those places, and cause noise, filth and quarrels, with the corruption of their morals and manners.

9. That no dogs or other animals, be suffered in gaols.

10. That all gaols must be yearly whitewashed whitewashed and painted in all parts before May, as the lime and colours, particularly green, will destroy the vermin, and prevent contagion; must also be swept, washed, cleaned, thrice a week, as the rooms, stairs, passages, windows; the chimneys monthly in winter, and quarterly in summer.

11. That all gaols shall have ventors, fire engines, buckets, clock and dial, a chaplain and apothecary.

12. That all gaolers shall reside constantly in their gaols; inspecting weekly all the parts, to see if all the rooms and places are kept clean by their servants or prisoners.

13. That no alehouse or shop shall be in any gaol.

14. That all gaolers and turnkeys shall have fixed, moderate, annual salaries, according to the size of the gaol, without any fees. No gaoler to have above two or three hundred a year.

15. That no magistrate, lawyer, soldier, sailor, bailiff, or who has been so shall be a gaoler.

16. That no gaoler shall be the owner of any gaol, nor keep a deputy, nor have any other trade, nor any concerns in two gaols, nor in the sale or profit of any provisions in the gaol, comeestibles or potables; nor lett or farm any gaol, directly or indirectly.

17. That the tables of fees, if any allowed, and of all regulations, rules of court, &c. shall be printed, and a copy given by the gaoler to every prisoner, within an hour after his imprisonment and entrance into the prison.

18. That no felon shall lodge, eat or drink, with any debtor; and that the gaoler must prevent immediately any quarrels, riots, noise, fights or disturbances in his gaol; and if any person is riotous, drunk, quarrelsome, or noisy, to lock him up in his room, upon the complaint of any two prisoners, till he is sober and quiet, with assurances of his future good behaviour.

19. That no games shall be suffered in gaols, as tennis, skittles, &c. as they tend to drunkenness, noise, quarrels, and many bad consequences.

20. That a gaoler be empowered to remove out of the gaol any insane or infected prisoner, with the advice of a physician and leave of a magistrate.

21. That all contracts shall be null between gaolers and prisoners for any purchases of lands, houses, &c. of the latter, without the written concurrence of the prisoner's attorney, and two relations or friends.

22. That the rooms of all gaols shall be numbered, and occupied by rotation; clean bed linen at least every month.

23. If any fees are allowed they shall be reduced to a moiety, and appropriated to relieve debtors.

24. That the gaoler shall shew the tables of fees and regulations, also all the parts of the gaol, to any benefactor to the prisoners above five shillings, upon his requisition to see the tables and place.

25. That the sheriffs and magistrates of counties, cities, and towns, be enjoined to inspect, at least monthly, all the parts of the gaol, or to appoint two or three proper inspectors, as physicians, clergymen, &c. for that purpose, with or without a pecuniary allowance, by the year, or rather by the time, who ought to be changed, and different men every quarter.

26. That no gaoler shall take above one shilling for a bed the first night, and sixpence every night after, except the prisoner chuses to have a room by the week, nor above sixpence for breakfast, one shilling for dinner, with a pint of beer, sixpence for supper, and sixpence for fire a day.

27. That all lock-up houses shall be licensed, registered, numbered, and limited to a certain number; spacious, clean, with large courts or yards, for air; have single rooms, beds, and bedsteads of iron, to prevent infection and vermin. The rates of rooms, beds, meals, fire, &c. as in gaols. No bailiff to be concerned, directly or indirectly, in such houses, under the penalty of 100l. with the loss of employment. The sheriff, or any two magistrates empowered to take away the licence, on any complaint and conviction of misconduct or extortion.

28. That the bed-chamber of no prisoner shall be locked on the outside, in any prison or spunging-house, being dangerous in case of fire or sickness.

The following are Extracts from Speeches in Parliament of that great Statesman and Patriot, the late Earl of Chesterfield. The Reader will draw from thence such Conclusions as he may think proper.

IF any future prince of our present royal family should overturn our constitution, and set up to govern without any parliament, or by means of a packed corrupt parliament, and a mercenary standing army, it would be the duty of every man in the kingdom to take arms against the ministers that advised, and the venal tools that supported, such measures.—(Vide his lordship's speech, in the year 1774, on the bill denouncing the penalties of high treason against those who should maintain correspondence with the sons of the Pretender.)

If needy and daring counsellors should get the government of a weak prince, they may advise him to arbitrary and oppressive measures, with a view to provoke a rebellion, that they may have a chance of enriching themselves out of the spoils of the rebels. The king, indeed, by such measures might risk or lose his crown; but, as such ministers have little to lose, and a great deal to gain, they would give themselves very little trouble about the risk their sovereign might run, if they thought they had but a tolerable chance of victory.—(Vide the same speech.)

The security of this government, and the tranquillity of this nation, depend not upon the frightening either the disaffected or dissatisfied from rising in arms, by the severity of punishment: it depends and I hope will always depend, upon the smallness of their number. Upon this our own tranquillity will always depend, and securely depend, as long as our liberties are preserved entire; and, if they should ever come to be encroached on, I am sure it is neither the business nor the duty of parliament to endeavour to frighten men from taking arms in defence of the liberties of their country.—(Vide the same speech.)

Slavery and arbitrary power are the certain consequences of keeping up a standing army; if it be kept up for any number of years. It is the machine by which the chains of slavery are rivetted upon a free people, and wants only a skilful and proper hand to set it a going: this it will certainly at last, perhaps too soon, meet with, if you do not break it in pieces before the artist takes hold of it. It is the only machine by which the chains of slavery can be rivetted upon us. They may be secretly prepared by another—by corruption, which like the dark and dirty channel through which it runs, may hiddenly and imperceptibly forge our chains—but by corruption they can be forged only: it is by a numerous standing army that they must be rivetted.

Without such an army we should break them asunder, as soon as we perceived them, and should chop off the polluted hands of those that had prepared them. It is no argument to say, we have kept up an army for many years, without being sensible of any danger. The young fiery courser is never brought at once to submit to the curb, and patiently to take the rider upon his back. If you put the bit into his mouth, without any previous preparation, or put a weak and unskilful rider upon his back, he will probably break the neck of the rider, but by degrees you may make him tamely submit to both. A free people must be treated in the same manner; by degrees they must be accustomed to be governed by an army; by degrees that army must be made strong enough to hold them in subjection. We have already for many years been accustoming our people to be governed by an army, under pretence of making use of that army only to assist the civil power; and, by degrees, we have for several years been increasing the number, and consequently the strength, of our army.—(Vide his lordship's speech, in the year 1738, against a standing army.)

Those who say they depend so much upon the honour, integrity, and impartiality of men of family and fortune, seem to think our constitution can never be dissolved, as long as we have the shadow of a parliament. My opinion is so very different, that, if ever our constitution be dissolved, if ever an absolute monarchy be established in this kingdom, which heaven avert! I am convinced it will be under that shadow. Our constitution consists in the two houses of parliament being a check upon the crown, as well as upon each other. If that check should ever be removed; if the crown should by corrupt means, by places, pensions, and bribes, get the absolute direction of our two houses of parliament, our constitution will from that moment be destroyed. There would be no occasion for the crown to proceed any further, it would be ridiculous to lay aside the forms of parliament, for, under that shadow, our king would be more absolute, and govern more arbitrarily than he could do without it.

A gentleman of family and fortune would not perhaps, for the sake of a pension, agree to lay aside the forms of parliament; because by his venal service there, there, he earns his infamous pension, and could not expect the continuance of it, if these forms were laid aside; but a gentleman of family and fortune may, for the sake of a pension, whilst he is in parliament, approve of the most blundering measures, consent to the most excessive and easeless grants, enact the most oppressive laws, pass the most villainous accounts, acquit the most heinous criminals, and condemn the most innocent persons, at the desire of that minister who pays him his pension. And, if a majority of each house of parliament consists of such men, would it not be ridiculous in us to talk of our constitution, or to say we had any liberty left? (Vide his lordship's speech, in the year 1741, to prevent pensioners to sit in parliament.)

A short Account of the public and private Diversions of the Inhabitants of Edinburgh; and Manner of educating the young Ladies.

AS the genius of any people is not more easily discovered in their serious moments, than when they give a loose to freedom and pleasure: So the Scotch nation is peculiarly characterised by the mode of their diversions. A sober sedate elegance pervades them all, blended with an ease and propriety which delights, and is sure to meet with approbation. A Scotchman does not relax himself for amusements, as if to pass away the hour: He seems, even in the height of pleasure, busy and intent, and as he would do, were he about to gain some advantage. His diversions are not calculated to seduce the unwary, or recreate the idle, but to unbend the mind, without corrupting it. He seems as if in his infancy he had been taught to make learning his diversion, and was now reversing it, and making his diversion his study. But, besides the public entertainments of this city, which are derived from company, the inhabitants have more resources of pleasure within themselves, than in many other places. The young people paint, draw, are fond of music, or employ their hours in reading, and acquiring the accomplishments of the mind. Every boarding school Miss has something of this kind to recommend her, and make her an agreeable companion: And, instead of a little smattering of French, which is the highest ambition to attain in Queen Square, you find them in Edinburgh entertaining in conversation, sentimental, and well informed. The mode of education of the young ladies is here highly to be commended, and admirably calculated to make them good wives. Besides needle-work, and those trifling arts, which are the principal of their instruction in England, the precepts of morality, virtue, and honour, are taught them from their earliest infancy, whilst they are instructed to consider themselves as beings born for society, for more than outside appearance, and transitory pleasure, and to attend to the knowledge of what is useful, rather than the æconomy of a Tambour-frame. The ladies also, who undertake this arduous task of instruction, are persons much better qualified in general than in other countries. They likewise introduce them into the politest company, and give them a taste for elegant and proper amusements; that, when they leave school, they are not only mistresses of those accomplishments necessary to command a family, but have the deportment and behaviour of experienced women of fashion. No ladies in Scotland ever murder the precious moments in what is called "work," which is neither entertainment nor profit, merely because they must have the appearance of doing something, whilst they see every one employed around them. They let no minute escape without its respective office, which may be of utility to themselves or others; and after a proper sacrifice to reading and literature, gain instruction from society and conversation. I have often thought it a principal defect in the education of the English ladies, that they are taught to pay so much attention to the practice of sewing work, and other needle operations, whilst they neglect learning of greater importance and pleasure. Since they have minds equally capable of instruction with the other sex, why should they not be enlightened with the same kind of knowledge? especially as they seem more suited to it, as well from their superior sensibility, as their greater leisure and domestic life. Why should the characteristic which distinguishes us from brutes be so strongly cultivated in the male, and have so little attention paid to it in the female species? Wisdom and science are not perfections in us, merely because we are men, but as reasonable creatures, who have the pre-eminence over the rest of the creation. It is indeed necessary for the ladies to know these things, in order to qualify them for domestic economy; but I have no idea of any woman, except her whose circumstances cannot afford the expence of paying a servant, making them her employ, or putting them in practice.

The married ladies of this city seldom entertain large sets of company, or have routs, as in London: They give the preference to the private parties, and conversaziones, where they play at cards for small sums, and never run the risk of being obliged to discharge a debt of honour at the expence of their virtue and innocence. They often frequent the theatre, and shew great taste and judgment in the choice of plays where Mr. Digges performs a principal character.

As to exercise, they seldom ride on horseback; but find much pleasure in walking, to which the soil and country is peculiarly adapted, being dry, pleasant, and abounding in prospects, and romantic scenes. It is likewise customary for them to drive in their carriages to the sands at Leith and Musselburgh, and parade backwards and forwards, after the manner of Scarborough, and other public places of sea-bathing resort. For vivacity and agility in dancing, none excel the Scotch ladies: Their execution in reels and country-dances is amazing; and the variety of steps which they introduce, and the justness of their ear, is beyond description. They are very fond also of minuets, but fall greatly short in the performance of them, as they are deficient in grace and elegance in their motions. Many of them play on the harpsicord and guitar, and some have music in their voices: Though they rather love to hear others perform than play themselves.

I do not think the Scotch ladies are great proficient in the languages. They rarely attempt any thing further than the French; which, indeed, they speak with great propriety, fluency and good accent; but they make up for it by their accurate and just knowledge of their own. They talk very grammatically; are peculiarly attentive to the conformity of their words to their ideas, and are great critics in the English tongue. They chiefly read history and plaintive poetry: But elegies and pastorals are their favourites. Novels and romances they feel and admire; and those chiefly which are tender, sympathetic, soothing, or melancholy. Their hearts are soft and full of passion, and a well-told story makes a deep impression on them. Like virgin wax, a gentle heat mollifies their minds, which reflects the finest touches of air and sentiment.—Nor are the gentlemen in Edinburgh less rational in their diversions than the ladies. There is only one, in which I can censure their conduct: They rather pay too much respect to the divinity of Bacchus, and offer too copious libations at the shrine of that jovial deity. Their wines, indeed, of all kinds, are excellent, and their climate not the most comfortable; so that some allowance ought to be made them in that respect. But, as they are, they are by no means so intemperate as the Germans; and, perhaps, their appearing to me in the least intemperate may be occasioned by my peculiar aversion to, and abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. I have neither taste to relish, nor head to bear them. I have no idea of a man extending the pleasures of drinking beyond thirst, or forcing, in imagination, an appetite artificial, and against nature.

The youths in this country are very manly in their exercises and amusements. Strength and agility seem to be most their attention. The insignificant pastimes of marbles, tops, &c. they are totally unacquainted with. The diversion which is peculiar to Scotland, and in which all ages find great pleasure, is golf. They play at it with a small leathern ball, like a fives ball, and a piece of wood, flat on one side, in the shape of a small bat, which is fastened at the end of a stick, at three or four feet long, at right angles to it. The art consists in striking the ball with this instrument, into a hole in the ground, in a smaller number of strokes than your adversary. This game has the superiority of cricket and tennis, in being less violent and dangerous; but in point of dexterity and amusement, by no means to be compared with them. However, I am informed that some skill and nicety are necessary to strike the ball to the proposed distance and no further, and that in this there is a considerable difference in players. It requires no great exertion and strength, and all ranks and ages play at it. They instruct their children in it, as soon as they can run alone; and grey hairs boast their execution. As to their other diversions, they dance, play at cards, love shooting, hunting, and the pleasures of the field; but are proficient in none of them. When they are young, indeed, they dance, in the manner of their country, try, extremely well; but afterwards (to speak in the language of the turf) they train off, and are too robust and muscular to possess either strength or agility.

I am sorry to say the hazard-table is in high fashion and estimation. There are clubs in Edinburgh who may vie with White's or Almack's. But the misfortune is, there is a deficiency of ready money, which obliges them to keep books, by which they transfer their debts to one another. This renders it both inconvenient and troublesome to strangers to engage them: For, if you lose, their necessity demands immediate payment; and, on the contrary, if you chance to be successful, they refer you to twenty different people, before you can expect your money; and you have reason to bless your stars, if ever you obtain it.—I do not know any thing so disgusting or against the grain of politeness, as being obliged to dun a gentleman for a game-debt; but here it is absolutely necessary; if you do not, you play without the least chance of being a winner.

A Review of the Theatrical Character of the English Roscius.

MR. Garrick, on his first appearance on the stage in Goodman's-fields, in the year 1741, found it in a state of declension. The successors of those excellent actors Booth, Wilks, and Ciber, were far inferior to their masters. A taste for Shakspeare had been revived, it is true, by the encouragement of the most distinguished persons of both sexes, but for want of proper support was daily wearing away. Nature was forgotten: Ranting and vociferation succeeded to feeling and passion, and awkward gesture was substituted in the place of graceful action.

The only correct speaker our playhouses could boast of was Quin; but he was utterly unfit for the great and animated characters of tragedy. He could neither express the tender or violent emotions of the heart, though it must be confessed that he gave force and dignity to sentiment, by his well-toned voice and calm demeanor: His Brutus and Cato will be remembered with pleasure, when candour would wish to forget his Lear and Richard.

Garrick saw the vast treasures which genius had created, and which had for some time lain totally hid, or had scarce ever been fully opened to the public view. Shakspeare had united in dramatic poetry all that the best judges could desire, sentiment and passion, situation and character, poetry and moral. Like a hawk, who flies directly at his prey, Garrick seized the most finished and difficult parts of our great bard, and made them his own.

Hamlet, Macbeth, Richard and Lear were revived with new lustre, and frequently acted with uncommon applause to crowded audiences; but the universality of his genius could not be confined to any one species of acting; he soon rescued Abel Druggier from grimace, and Bays from buffoonery and false spirit. In the space of one winter he represented above twenty different parts, almost all of them dissimilar, in tragedy, farce, and comedy. The coaches of the nobility filled up the space from Temple-bar to Goodman's-fields. Not to admire Garrick would have argued not only want of taste, but the grossest stupidity. Those who had seen the old actors declared that this new genius had excelled the ablest of them in the variety of his exhibitions, and equalled them in all their best acted characters. The only comedian who could claim any competition with him was Betterton, for he equally excelled in the lover and the hero, in the man of humour, the fine gentleman, and the debauchee. But, to drop the discussion of a contest which it is scarce possible at this distance of time to decide, it must be universally owned, that no actor was ever so followed, admired and courted, from his first appearance to his quitting the stage, as Garrick; and, what was equally surprising and commendable in him, this prepossession of the public in his favour did not cause him to abate one jot of his diligence, or slacken his ardour to please.

Pope, who saw him at Goodman's-fields, told lord Orrery, he was sure that he would be spoiled, for he would have no competitor.

To delineate the various excellencies of this inimitable performer is a task which must be reserved for a genius equal to his own. A few strictures, and a few loose hints, are all I can pretend to give the reader.

His great aim in all his performances was to follow Nature; he never indulged the wantonness of his fancy, in stepping beyond her modesty. Though every passion of the human mind lay before him, he chiefly excelled in the stronger and more violent transports of the soul. His love was elegantly and ardently displayed, but he had not that overflow of tenderness, that profusion of softness for which a valuable and pleasing actor had been greatly celebrated. In resentment, anger, terror, rage, horror, and madness, it is impossible to give an adequate idea of him! he was unrivalled in them all! He excelled in all mixed representations of grief and anger, fear and rage. In short, the more complicated the passions became, the happier were his feelings, and the greater was the applause of the audience. The most difficult parts in acting both in tragedy and comedy is the transition from one passion or humour to another; in this he was admirable, for Nature was equally and truly adhered to in both.

He was remarkably judicious in the choice of his characters; he knew what his figure, voice, action, were best adapted to. In comedy he seems to have avoided the mere fine gentleman, as knowing that he is not marked by any peculiar characteristic. In tragedy, parts of dignity, or such, as Mrs. Oldfield used to say, were written with a lofty disregard of Nature, he wisely shunned. Your Alexanders, OEdipus's, and Borgias had no charms for him; he was better pleased with short parts, where a single scene of genuine Nature was finely touched; such I mean as Luffigan and Henry the Fourth.

When his great merit had raised him to the rank of a Patentee and Manager of a theatre, he had a most extensive province to govern. He was at once called upon to shine as an actor, to please as a Manager, and, what is still more difficult, to adjust the several pretensions of actors and dramatic writers.

His first care was to restore Nature to her genuine rights. This end he thought would be best accomplished by reviving the long-neglected scenes of Shakespeare.

In looking over old Down the prompter's list of plays, in the reign of king Charles the Second, it is astonishing to see how few of this great poet's dramas were presented at the king's and duke's theatres; perhaps not above six or eight in a season for the space of twenty years. During the administration of the stage by Booth, Wilkes, and Cibber, I can venture to assert that scarce eight of Shakespeare's tragedies and comedies were acted in a year. Of the thirty-five genuine pieces of this author, Garrick annually gave the public seventeen or eighteen, sometimes twenty.

that he was often obliged to sacrifice his judgment to his profit. If the public will have its baubles and play-things, who can help it? Dumb shows, processions, triumphal entries, pantomimical tricks, and every degradation of Nature, will ever please the million, and of such all audiences are generally composed. The judicious few cannot stem the torrent of false taste and vulgarity.

In distributing parts to the actors he shewed a perfect knowledge of their several abilities, and often called forth latent worth to the emolument of the possessor. Among persons of such different tempers, with various competitions, jealousies often ridiculous, and claims ill founded, it was impossible for the manager to steer his conduct so smoothly as to please all. It is sufficient that on every occasion he did justice to merit; that he took pleasure in exerting every act of humanity and benevolence. Moliere was not more distinguished for his fatherly affection to his actors than Garrick; he raised their salaries, relieved their distresses, and established a perpetual fund to support the aged and infirm. The tears of the actors on his leaving the stage will be his best encomium.

In tracing his conduct respecting authors, I tread upon slippery ground. In doing justice to Garrick I should be sorry to offend any gentleman who has had any dispute with him, or has conceived a dislike to the manager from the rejection of his play or farce.

To read the dedications and prefaces of a great number of dramatic pieces, acted at Drury-lane, is to peruse a variety of encomiums on the kindness of the manager to the author. It is certain, that from his great and comprehensive knowledge of general Nature, and his perfect acquaintance with the stage, no man was ever better calculated to serve the writer of a play than himself; and the various scenes, and even whole acts, which he has written for the service of his friends, will bear evident testimony to what I assert.

That he had some disputes with authors cannot be denied, but, whether the manager or writer was in the wrong, I shall leave to the judgment of others. Sure I am, that there never was a safer manager than Garrick; when once he had espoused a play, he never forsook it, but pushed its success to the utmost, nay, he often risked the displeasure of the town, to do full justice to the author.

As a writer, the merit of Garrick is very considerable, from the several species of writing in which he excelled. Those who have had the pleasure to read his letters, must confess that, in the epistolary style, he is Correct with spirit, eloquent with ease.

His Epigrams have all the salt, satire, and spirited turns of the best Epigrammatist.

His Dramatic Pieces are distinguished for variety of characters, for humour, easy dialogue, and pointed satire. In them some folly of the times is happily pointed out and censured; some ridiculous fashion is attacked and exploded.

His Chalkstone and Ogilby are masterpieces of characters. In no species of writing has he excelled more than in Prologues and Epilogues. They are universally acknowledged to be next in merit, if not equal, to Dryden's compositions in that kind. In short, they are the abstract and brief Chronicles of the times; a kind of history of the various and predominant passions, humours, follies, foibles, and extravagancies of this good town for more than thirty years! They are an excellent companion to Hogarth's humorous prints, and Foote's comic characters.

I have now finished my sketch of this extraordinary genius, and shall conclude with the application of a line to him in his favourite author:

——— 'Take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again.'

LEONATO.

An Essay on Potatoes, in a Letter from Dr. Cook.

MR. Permentier informs us, that potatoes were first introduced into Europe about the beginning of the 17th century by the Irish, who brought them from America. At first, though used in aliment, they were cultivated only in gardens, as matter of curiosity. Their culture was soon after introduced into England, Flanders, and several other countries; and now they are planted in large fields, so as to become a principal part of the aliment of the poor.

How far this account may be true, I can't determine; but, it is said, they were first brought into Europe by the famous Sir Francis Drake, in 1486. He gave them to that great botanist Gerard, who first planted them in London; and sent them to Clusius, in Holland, who also planted them in Burgundy; and he sent them to Italy, as appears from the works of these, and several other authors.

It was from this introduction into Europe, that so many writers say they were natives of Virginia; but it is certain, they will not grow there without skilful culture. They are of Peru, whence our Jesuit's bark also came about A. D. 1650. They are called Battatas, also Battata Virginiana, Solanum Tuberosum esculentum, Papas, vel Pappus Americanum, vel Peruvianum. The common, or Virginian potatoes.

Potatoes are a species of solanum; and though with us they require a sunny exposure, yet, in the hot countries where they are natives, those that grow on the surface of the ground, or under too thin a covering of the earth, are so strong of the poisonous quality of nightshade, that the hogs will not taste them.

The light mealy ones are the best; and by proper management a wholesome nourishing bread might be made of them. Their use, as at present, particularly among the lower Irish, is both profitable and salutary. More brandy may be obtained from an acre of potatoes, than from an acre of barley: they also afford much starch.

The varieties of potatoes are numerous, and may yet be increased from the seed contained in the apples. The potatoe itself is not properly the root of the plant, but rather an underground fruit, produced upon a confined branch, somewhat like the ground-nut. The real roots do not produce potatoes, they only serve the purpose of drawing nourishment from the soil, as the leaves above extract it from the atmosphere.

The potatoe below, and the apple above, are in fact, the same; but living in different elements, they assume different appearances. The one seems to be intended for the preservation of the species, the other for the food of animals. Such is the increase of this vegetable, that from one large potatoe, which was cut into nine pieces, eight stone and eight pounds of good sizeable ones have been produced. We have of them two sorts, the red and white.

Potatoes produced from sets, after a number of years, are found to decrease in bearing; for which reason, they should be brought back every fourteen years to their original. It is after this period, that those produced from the seeds themselves, decline.

The most advantageous way of propagating this species of the tuberose rooted Solanum, called by us potatoes, is the planting them at large distances, and digging or horse-hoeing the ground several times between them.

Mr. Rull gives an example of this, in which the hoeing succeeded much better than dung, and without the expence of it. A piece of ground was planted with potatoes, the greater part in the common way; but in one part, worse than the rest; they had been set a yard distance every way. The rest of the ground was dunged; this poor part had no dung, but was ploughed deep at several times, four different ways, so that the ground was stirred and broken thoroughly every where about the potatoes. The consequence was, that though no dung was used here, and though the plants appeared much weaker than in the dunged part, yet the crop was much better than that of the other part of the field. The roots here were all large, and in other parts of the field, where the dung had been used without ploughing, they were so small, that the crop was scarce worth taking up.

This is one of the many instances of the no great use in dunging land, without properly stirring it up to divide it, to let in the sun, water, and air; and serves to prove, that the crops of corn, and every thing else, confirm upon trial, that the stirring the earth sufficiently, without any farther trouble, will answer better without any other manure, than all the manure in the world without it.

To make potatoe bread, after having boiled, peeled, and mashed them well, mix them up with double the quantity of flour; then add yeast as usual, and bake both into bread.

Mirtilus and Chloe. From Gesner.

EARLY in the morning, Mirtilus, going out of the cottage, found Chloe, his youngest sister, busy in forming garlands of flowers. The dew glittered on the flowers, and with the dew was mixed the tears of the little Chloe.

Mirt. Dear Chloe, what will you do with those garlands? Alas! you weep.

Chloe. And don't you also weep, dear Mirtilus? But, alas! who would not weep like us? Did you observe our mother, in what distress she was? Before she left us, how she pressed our hands in hers, and turned away her eyes that were filled with tears?

Mirt. I saw it as well as thee. Alas! our father! he is surely worse than he was yesterday.

Chloe. Ah! my brother, if he should die! How he loves us! What caresses he bestows upon us, when we do what he likes, and what is pleasing to the gods!

Mirt. O my sister, how every thing is sorrowful! My lamb comes in vain to caress me; I almost forget to feed him. In vain my ring-dove flutters upon my shoulders, and strives to bill my lips and chin. Nothing—no, nothing can delight me now. O my father! if you die, I will die also.

Chloe. Alas! do you remember—five days ago, how our dear father took us both on his knees, and began to weep?

Mirt. Yes, Chloe,—I do remember how he set us down, and turned pale! I can hold you no longer, my children; I am ill—very ill. At these words he crept to his bed, and from that day he has been sick.

Chloe. And from that day his illness has continually increased. I'll tell you what I design, my brother. At the break of day I came out of the cottage to gather fresh flowers, of which I have made these garlands. I am going to lay them at the feet of the statue of Pan. Does not our mother always tell us that the gods are good, and love to hear the vows of innocence? I will go, I will offer my garlands to the god Pan. And dost thou see in this cage, what is of all things most dear to me, my little bird?—Well, then, I will sacrifice him also to the god.

Mirt. O my dear sister! I will go with you;—stay, I pray you an instant. I will go fetch my basket, it is full of the finest fruit, and my ring-dove, and I will sacrifice him also to the god Pan.

He ran, and soon returned. They then went together to the foot of the statue. It was situate not far off, upon a little hill, in the midst of shady fir-trees. They knelt down, and thus invoked the god of the fields:

“O Pan! protector of our villages! hear kindly, hear our prayers, and receive our little offerings; they are all that children can offer to thee. I place these garlands at thy feet; if I could reach higher, I would with them crown thy head, and put them round thy shoulders. Save, O Pan! save our father, ther, and restore him to his poor children!

Mirt. "I bring thee these fruits; they are the fairest I could gather in our orchard. Receive them kindly. I would have sacrificed to thee the finest goat in the flock, but he was too strong for me. When I am bigger, I will sacrifice two every year to thee, for having restored our father to our prayers. Restore, gracious god, restore to health the best of fathers!"

Gblo. "I will now sacrifice to thee this bird, O gracious god! It is of all things the most dear to me. See how it flies upon my hand to seek its food; but I will, O Pan! I will sacrifice it to thee."

Mirt. "And I will offer thee this ring-dove. It plays about, and caresses me; but I will, O Pan! I will sacrifice it to thee, that thou mayest restore our father to us. Hear, O Pan! hear our prayers!"

Their little trembling hands had already seized the victims, when a voice pronounced these words:

"The gods are pleased to hear the vows of innocence. Lovely children, do not sacrifice what makes your greatest pleasure. Your father is restored to health."

Menalcas immediately recovered his health. Happy in the piety of his children, he went the same day, with all his family, to make an offering to the god; and lived, surrounded by prosperity, to see his children's children.

A new, easy, and pleasant method of forming a true idea of the vicissitudes of the Seasons; of the earth's motion round its axis every twenty-four hours; and of its motion in the ecliptic round the sun every year.

LET a small terrestrial globe, of about three inches diameter, be suspended by a long thread of twisted silk, fixed to its north pole; then, having placed a lighted candle on a table, to represent the sun, in the centre of a hoop of a large chasm, which may represent the ecliptic, the hoop making an angle of 23 and a half degrees with the plane of the table; hang the globe within the hoop near to it; and, if the table be level, the equator of the globe will be parallel to the table, and the plane of the hoop will cut the equator at an angle of 23 and a half degrees; so that one half of the equator will be above the hoop, and the other half below it; and the candle will enlighten one half of the globe, as the sun enlightens one half of the earth, whilst the other half is in the dark.

Things being thus prepared, twist the thread towards the left hand, that it may turn the globe the same way by untwisting; that is, from west, by south, to east. As the globe turns round its axis or thread, the different places of its surface will go regularly through the light and dark, and have, as it were, an alternate return of day and night in each rotation. As the globe continues to turn round, and to shew itself all around to the candle, carry it slowly round the hoop by the thread, from west by south to east; which is the way that the earth moves round the sun once a year in the ecliptic; and you will see that, whilst the globe continues in the lower part of the hoop, the candle (being then north of the equator) will constantly shine round the north pole, and all the northern places, which go through any part of the dark, will go through a less portion of it than they do of the light; and the more so the farther they are from the equator: Consequently, their days are then longer than their nights.

When the globe comes to a point in the hoop, midway between the highest and lowest points, the candle will be directly over the equator, and will enlighten the globe just from pole to pole; and then every place on the globe will go through equal portions of light and darkness, as it runs round its axis; and consequently the day and night will be of equal length at all places upon it. As the globe advances thence forward, towards the highest part of the hoop, the candle will be at the south side of the equator, shining farther and farther round the south pole, as the globe rises higher and higher in the hoop; leaving the north pole as much in darkness as the south pole is then in the light, and making long days and short nights on the south side of the equator, and the contrary on the north side, whilst the globe continues in the northern or higher side of the hoop: And when it comes to the highest point, the day will be at the longest, and the nights at the shortest, in the southern hemisphere, and the reverse in the northern.

As the globe advances and descends in the hoop, the light will gradually recede from the south pole, and approach towards the north pole; which will cause the northern days to lengthen, and the southern days shorten in the same proportion. When the globe comes.

comes to the middle point, between the highest and lowest points of the hoop, the candle will be over the equator, enlightening the globe, just from pole to pole, when every place of the earth (except the poles) will go through equal portions of light and darkness; and, consequently, the day and night will then be equal all over the globe,

And thus, at a very small expence, one may have a delightful and demonstrative view of the cause of days and night, with their gradual increase and decrease, in length, through the whole year together, with the vicissitudes of Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, in each annual course of the earth round the sun.

Some Memoirs of Richard Twiss, Esq; F. R. S. (With a curious Wooden Caricature of that contemptible Tour-writer.)

THE Tour in Ireland, published by Mr. Twiss, for its falsehood, impertinence and puerility, justly excited the scorn of all who respect this kingdom, and its inhabitants. This has given rise to many jeux d'esprit, and has excited some curiosity concerning the writer who hath presumed to insult a people long famous for bravery, candour, and hospitality. We are glad we have it in our power to gratify, in some degree, that curiosity, by the following particulars concerning him.

We are not certain of the date of this Twiss's birth, but suppose it was about the year 1746. His father, who is now living, was originally a menial servant to one Mr. Partridge, an eminent merchant at Yarmouth, in England, who conceiving a high opinion of his fidelity and knowledge, left him by his will 700*l.* with which sum Mr. Twiss bought a parcel of Indigo, which he sold in a few months afterwards for 1600*l.* and then considerably extended his dealings as a merchant, and settling at Rotterdam, in Holland, he in a few years acquired a fortune of near 70,000*l.* on the interest of which he now lives in England with elegance and splendor. Richard being his eldest son, he spared no expence in giving him as good an education as he was capable of receiving; but from his youth he always expressed some peculiarities, and a whimsicalness of behaviour, which on many occasions exposed him to ridicule.

As he advanced in years, his father (still

(still residing in Holland) consigned him to the care of messrs. Knox, bankers in London, who strove in vain to reduce his demeanour to that of a gentleman, and a man of reason; but his conduct was generally absurd, his manners gross, and his temper petulant and self-conceited. When he arrived at the state of manhood, he expressed a desire to travel, in which he was indulged, as it was hoped it would have proved a means of giving him a polish, that might render him agreeable. But he fully verified the observation,

Cœlum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt,
for he went out a booby, and returned a dogmatic coxcomb.

His allowance from his father was ample, no less than 100*l.* a month, yet he never made any figure abroad, being always penurious, and grumbling at necessary expences; and never launched out into any extravagance, except for music and painting, in both which arts he acquired a smattering; just so much knowledge as enabled him to pass himself on the ignorant as a connoisseur.

Having journeyed through Great-Britain, the Low Countries, France, Italy, Germany, and the adjacent parts, he began a tour through Spain and Portugal in December 1772. He ran through Portugal in three months and eight days; from the 17th of November to the 25th of February; and employed no more than six months and twelve days, in going through the extensive kingdom of Spain. It is evident from the little time he staid in any place, how ill qualified he must be to give a satisfactory account of it, and how little opportunity he had to have more than a very superficial knowledge of the genius, manners and customs of the people. Yet notwithstanding these manifest impediments to the writing accounts that could be either useful or entertaining, he undertook to publish his travels through Portugal and Spain, which he did in two small volumes, in the year 1774.

As those countries were less generally known by the inhabitants of Great-Britain and Ireland, than the others which he had visited, and of which many excellent accounts have been published, by able and faithful writers, it is no wonder Twiss's travels were bought up with avidity. Superficial readers killed an hour with the perusal of them, and many extravagant assertions in them passed current, as there were few who could contradict him; yet every intelligent person could easily perceive, not only an extreme poverty in the language, but a pert attempt at wit, and a strain of dogmatical petulance. The greater part of his work consisted of tedious and un-entertaining lists of pictures, with very trifling remarks on them; and although it was so very small, yet above one fourth of it was made up with quotations from other writers, which were, indeed, the most agreeable parts. In general his descriptions were unsatisfactory, and his observations were trivial.

From the 29th of September, 1773, when Twiss landed in England from his Spanish tour, to May 1775, when he unfortunately set out on a journey to Ireland, this wandering star seemed to be stationary. Perhaps that time was employed in compiling his curious work, revising the press, and pocketing the profits; for it is to be observed, that though his allowance from his father was no less than twelve hundred pounds a year, he had a prodigious love for money; and was too mean spirited to be ever surprised into a generous action.

The sale of his former book might probably be the chief inducement to his undertaking a visit to this kingdom, that it might furnish some materials for another publication, from which he expected to reap some profit. And this conclusion is the more rational, as it does not appear curiosity alone was the cause of this journey, for what curiosity could he have to see a people, who, in his opinion, as he expresses it p. 8, of his Irish Tour, were a set of hospitable, blundering drunkards?

However his resolution was taken, Ireland was to be visited at all events, and such of Twiss's countrymen, who had no opportunity of seeing this kingdom, and of knowing its natives, were to have their judgments misled, at the expence of truth and justice, merely that this wretched, miserly scribbler might vent his impertinence, and put a few pounds into his pocket. The time he allotted for this tour was but short, and we find from his book, he employed only five months and six days in visiting different parts of this kingdom, above one fifth of which time he spent in Dublin, so that having travelled 985 miles in four months, he could have but little leisure to contemplate the genius and manners of the people, or even procure from others the necessary information to enable him to give a tolerable account of either.

Twiss landed in Dublin the 6th of June, 1775; and as he was furnished with a very extensive credit on one of the first banks in this city, and honoured with letters of recommendation to several of the nobility, (however he procured them) he was received in many noble and respectable families with the distinction due to what they supposed him to be, a gentleman and a man of letters; and with that hospitality which is constantly shewn to strangers. But he soon belied every recommendation. How he might have conducted himself with the great and the learned in Britain, cannot be said; but here, it seems he thought himself free from all restraint; or looking upon the people of this country as unworthy of being treated with any degree of decorum and politeness. His behaviour was so insolent, rude, and indelicate, that he was frequently dismissed with disgrace, and never invited a second time (as he himself confesses) to any place which had been troubled once with his company. In the house of a right reverend prelate, eminent for his learning and philanthropy, and venerable by his age and virtues, he behaved with such indecency to the ladies, that the prelate was obliged to order his footman to turn him out of doors. On a visit to a noble lord, he had the impudence to draw the ladies to a window, to exhibit to them a parcel of obscene pictures; and it frequently happened, when he had been invited to dinner, his behaviour has been so impudent, that the master of the house has found it necessary, out of respect to his other guests, to desire his absence, before even the repast was set on the table.

Such being the natural stamp of this contemptible creature, to which he added proofs of the most consummate cowardice, it is not to be wondered that his account of this country should partake of his congenial impudence, impertinence, and base rascality. Such indeed we find it; and whoever hath read his Tour in Ireland must be convinced, that it is written in the meanest style which can disgrace a man pretending to literature; and is a complete tissue of fallhood, puerility, and absurdity.

To comment on every instance of these evil qualities in his book, would be a tedious task. However, to prove that this character of his publication is not a mere assertion, some few remarks are necessary.

In the 8th page he says, "I landed in Ireland with an opinion that the inhabitants were addicted to drinking, given to hospitality, and apt to blunder, or make bulls; in which I found myself mistaken. Hospitality and drinking went formerly hand in hand, but since the excesses of the table have been so judiciously abolished, hospitality is not so violently practised as heretofore, when it might have been imputed as a fault." This is a strange jumble of words and meaning. The second characteristic of the Irish, in his opinion, was their being given to hospitality, yet he says he was mistaken in his opinion. How was he mistaken? Why hospitality and drinking went, formerly, hand in hand. They do not do so now, consequently hospitality, having got rid of her disagreeable companion, can now walk alone, so that he could not have been mistaken in his second mark of the Irish, yet he says hospitality is not so violently practised as heretofore; therefore, passing over the absurdity of a violent hospitality, it is a proof drawn from his own words, that it is practised without inconvenience; and certainly he was not mistaken in thinking at first that it existed in Ireland.

When he set out with observing, page 10, that national reflections are always both illiberal and unjust, and declaring that Churchill was undoubtedly right, when he said of Ireland,

Long from a country ever hardly us'd,
At random censur'd, and by most abus'd:

Have Britons drawn their sport, with no kind view,

And judg'd the many by the rascal few,

a reasonable man might have concluded after this declaration, that Twiss would not have made national reflections, which he had censured as illiberal and unjust; and that he would not have judged the many, by the rascal few. Yet that he has done so is obvious from almost every page of his work, particularly p. 42.

"As to the natural history of the Irish species, they are only remarkable for the thickness of their legs, especially those of the plebeian females;"

and p. 163, "neither did I go into that quarter of Ireland called Connaught, which comprehends the counties of Mayo, Sligo, Leitrim, Roscommon, and Galway, as I was assured (by whom? by his own impudence) they were inhabited (especially along the coast) by a kind of savages, and that there were neither roads for carriages, nor inns."

—To this he adds the following very judicious remark,—“Undoubtedly the chief towns of those counties are more civilized.”—Undoubtedly they are, Mr. Twiss, and so well civilized, that in Galway, Carrick, Castlebar, Roscommon and Sligo, you would, with all your perfections, have been taken for one of dean Swift’s Yaboo’s; and the inhabitants would each have said to you, in the words of Swift, “I never beheld so disagreeable an animal, or one against which I naturally conceived so strong an antipathy,” and would have quitted you, full of contempt and aversion. But surely Twiss must have heard whilst he was in Ireland, that justice is administered in Connaught twice a year, at assizes held in each county; could he then suppose there were no carriage roads? Did he think our judges travelled that circuit on horseback, or walked it on foot? Did he not imagine there were continual intercourses between those towns and the capital? and could he fancy every commodity, however ponderous or bulky, was transported on men’s shoulders?

He tells his readers, p. 11, “nothing is to be expected in making the tour of Ireland, beyond the beauties of nature, a few modern antiquities, and the ignorance and poverty of the lower class of the inhabitants.” What he means by the paradoxical term modern-antiquities, he explains in p. 65, to be those of the middle ages: In the same page he places antiquities in the following series: “The most antient ruins I have yet seen, are those of the three temples at Paestum, in the kingdom of Naples; they were erected long before the foundation of the Roman empire.—Next to them in point of antiquity, are probably the Cromlechs, the druidical circles, which are seen in various parts of Europe, and piles of huge stones, such for instance as Stone-Henge.—Then follow the remains of the buildings of the antient Romans.—After those, the modern antiquities, or those of the middle ages are particularly remarkable.”

By comparing these two parts, would not any stranger be led to believe there did not exist in Ireland any remains of a more early antiquity than of the middle ages? Yet to prove his inconsistency, Twiss says, p. 63, “I visited the Cromlech, near Bryanstown. This is by some supposed to have been an altar, by others a grave of the druids; it consists of six stones placed upright, and another laid on the top of them; this last is fourteen feet long, twelve feet broad, August, 1776.

and from two to five feet thick; by the specific gravity of like solids, it is computed to weigh upwards of twenty-six tons. There are many of these Cromlechs still standing in various parts of Ireland.”—Now if he ranks Cromlechs as the second in the series of antiquities, and allows there are many Cromlechs in various parts of this kingdom; with what truth could he assert, nothing is to be expected in the tour of Ireland, but a few modern antiquities?

We shall not tire our readers with any farther remarks on this wretched production of Richard Twiss. A just indignation at his effrontery hath produced many witty animadversions upon him and his works; the foremost of which is the Heroic Epistle from Donna Teresa Pinna y Ruiz (mentioned in our last); and of late some honest Hibernians have contrived a method of testifying their scorn, by having his visage represented on the inside of the vessels designed for the reception of urine, that it may continue to be treated as Twiss himself deserves.

It is said that soon after his book was published, fearful of meeting with that chastisement he was conscious he merited, he flunk away to France, till his book and himself may be both forgotten.

To Twiss’s name the letters F. R. S. are added, which usually denote a Fellow of the Royal Society; but it is amazing such a being should ever have the honour to be aggregated to that learned and respectable body; some are apt to think he has no title to them, unless they import that he is a Forger of Romantic Slanders. But if he is indeed one of that society, it is hoped those real members who are natives of this kingdom, will represent him in his true light to the vice-president and council, that he may be expelled as a disgrace to literature.

THE gay and the ambitious, whose enjoyment is centered in making a figure in the world; who are willing to embrace a thousand miseries, if they may but appear happy; these will naturally crowd to the metropolis, as to the proper theatre of exhibition. That place answers their purpose the best which contains the largest number of eyes; and, without a spark of benevolence in their natures, would an univerfal blindness render them completely wretched. Now, it is a self-evident proposition, that those who place their happiness in the admiration of others, must remain strangers to pleasure, where there is no one to admire. The beauties of Creation can wear no charms to those whose attention is perpetually turned upon themselves. Lawns, groves, and rivers, neither compliment nor flatter; but to this class of beings all other language is insipid. With impatience, therefore, do they fly to a spot where that dialect chiefly abounds.

But the inconveniencies attending so great a conflux of the rich and gay are obvious. Their multitudes pall upon the sight, until an equipage and a dray-cart pass equally unnoticed by the satiated inhabitants. Or, should studied splendor and magnificence be sufficient to awaken the attention of the public, yet, if I may express myself learnedly upon the subject, those rays of admiration are unhappily divided and subdivided into a thousand ineebled and diverging fragments, which each fondly wishes to be collected in one focus, and centered upon himself.

With these we will associate the numbers who consider pleasure as the first business, the worthy pursuit of life. And to such London is the grand mart of pleasures, the very Paradise of Mahomet; where they may revel the whole circle of the hours, in scenes of the most refined, or of the grossest dissipation. They may wander from morning exhibitions, and idle amusements innumerable, to plays, operas, balls, concerts, drums, routs, ridottos, masks, taverns, gaming-tables, brothels, &c. until they have exhausted the largest patrimony, the most promising health, and their whole stock of credit, character, and morals.

The town affords a transient entertainment to the occasional visitor, who is amazed at a mode of living so opposite to native simplicity. The bustle of the city, the splendor of the shops, the parade of business, the variety of carriages and equipages, the immense congregations of people, strike him as a superior kind of perspective box, or magic lantern; and he cites, upon his return, the wonderful tales of what he has seen and heard to his listening and astonished family!

The metropolis is also the stage of action for a man of business, whose principal object is the accumulation of wealth; and who, sportsman like, places all his bliss in the pursuit, being destitute of either leisure or taste, for the proper enjoyment of his wealth. A man of this character cares not where he lives, nor how he lives, provided he can but engross the means of living; and let him but possess a large number of the tickets of enjoyment, he is by no means anxious whether they be ever drawn prizes or not. The whole extent of his desire is to make a figure upon the 'Change; to render the firm of his house familiar to both the Indies; to be able to influence the price of a commodity, and to affect the rise and fall of stocks. I need scarcely observe that, to one of this complexion, London is as it were the important spot, the point, the fulcrum on which he may place his commercial lever; and where, provided his lever have a sufficient purchase, he may be able to do what Archimedes wished for in vain, 'move the whole world at will.'

The city is the most encouraging mart for superior abilities in all departments. It is a place that gives an equal chance to every trade and profession; where the meanest of employments may become the sources of wealth; and where tailors, chimney-sweepers, old clothemen, hair-dressers, and empirics, sometimes acquire affluence, and often enjoy the privileges of being ranked in the class of gentlemen. But the misfortunes and inconveniencies are,—the man who brings his talents up to sale is often starved before he can find a purchaser.—The arts are generally encouraged in an inverse proportion to their utility; and those which most administer to the luxuries and vices of mankind, are the most certain of rapid success.—The forward and self-consequential wrest from the rich and powerful, that patronage which is due to modest worth alone.—The ingenious artizan and manufacturer has such temptations to indolence, extravagance, and profligacy, as greatly endanger his complete ruin.—He who is able to furnish the requisite sum to set these various hands at work, often becomes as rich as Cræsus by their ingenuity, while the promoters of their abundance suffer all the miseries of dependence, and the insults of capricious wealth.—And the unsuccessful adventurer will soon be left to bewail his ill-fortune or his rashness, in a loathsome gaol, unassisted, unheeded, and unlamented.

The busy politician, who leaves all domestic affairs in confusion, to settle those those of Europe ; who is more anxious about the national debt than about his own ; and who patiently resigns his family to indigence and beggary, provided the public commerce be in a flourishing condition :—And to the eager newsmonger, whose itching ears must be continually tickled by fresh intelligence ; who imagines that nothing can be of importance that is three days old ; and who feeds as heartily upon trials, bankruptcies, shipwrecks, conflagrations, deaths, and murders, as upon the happiest and most interesting occurrences ;—the numerous coffee-houses, and other places of colloquial intercourse, become the center of happiness !

Nor can it be denied that London is in a high degree favourable to sociability. Its inhabitants have superior opportunities of chusing their company, provided wisdom shall stand at their elbow to direct their choice.—Here persons in similar pursuits and of similar tastes, whose ideas perfectly amalgamate, may associate in a friendly club, and innocently spend their evenings in an agreeable converse.—Yet it is pity that late hours, and temptations to intoxication, should often render it prudent for a cautious man to absent himself from these associations.

To do ample justice to my subject, I must add, that the men who retain their religious principles, and whose education, or conviction, teach them to give the preference to one mode of worship rather than to another, may, in yon great city, worship their Creator according to their inclinations, or the dictates of their consciences. What Voltaire has observed of the different sects in England, is peculiarly true respecting the metropolis : ‘ In their father’s house there are many mansions :’ Or rather they may chuse which road they please in their journey to Heaven. And I doubt not but the honest and good in each road will find their way. Quakers, Anabaptists, Presbyterians, Independents, as well as Churchmen, may there worship according to their own particular modes, and associate with those of their own persuasions. While the peculiar circumstance of the place, frequent intercourses of a commercial nature, and a general inattention to every other part of a man’s character, except that of honour in his vocation, give to persons of these different persuasions the fortunate habit, rather than the Christian virtue of universal and reciprocal moderation.

London is also a place very advantageous to the Student in his pursuits of various branches of Science: Where, by attending upon different professors, conversing with men of learning, genius, and experience ; consulting libraries, visiting museums, &c. he may enjoy the means of making the most desirable progress in his studies,—if Heaven should send him a competent quantity of resolution, to escape the dangerous dissipation of the place.

The town may also be thought the proper school of manners ; where the collegiate may wear off his pedantry ; and the country gentleman his awkward address. But the town, in this connection, must doubtless signify the multitudes of strangers who occasionally assemble there, and from whom true politeness and courtesy of behaviour may sometimes be acquired. For it must be acknowledged, that the plainest rustic would not gain much by his commerce with the natives. Few, very few of those whose education has been confined to London, are examples of address and engaging deportment, worthy a journey to town. Considering Europe as the most important part of the globe ; England as the most important part of Europe ; the metropolis as the most important part of England ; and, it may be, the place of their residence as the most important part of the metropolis, these citizens of accumulated consequence treat, with an air of childish superiority and disdain, all those unfortunate objects who were not born within the sound of Bow Bells. These gentry are also very apt to mistake negligence and inattention for ease ; a dull repetition of the contents of a newspaper, for edifying conversation ; pert reflections and satirical insinuations upon a country life and manners, for wit and humour : Whilst their good ladies substitute affectation for politeness, a passion for every whimsical fashion for taste, and extravagance for grandeur.—And they both unite in the opinion, that all strangers are bound to admire every thing peculiar to the place, even to its noise, confusion, and filth. In a word, they seem to claim the privilege of behaving as they please : And, forgetting that London may not be the first mart for manners, though it be for various other articles, they with equal folly and vanity impose upon you their own coarse unwrought goods, for the very best of the kind.

The metropolis is a place worthy the temporary residence of the speculative philosopher, who thinks 'the proper knowledge of mankind is man.' By conversing with such a diversity of characters, he may acquire a considerable insight into the various modifications of the human heart. Here he will constantly behold the force of evil example, counteracting the original bent of a virtuous education!

In short, our Philosopher will discover the power of connections and example, of interest or of pleasures, to change the principles and dispositions of men. And he will remark how easily those who have no stamen of their own, no genuine unshaken rule of conduct, no settled notions of virtue, and rational fear of Heaven, how easily they yield themselves up to foreign impressions, like wax to the seal; or bear a diversity of vicious resemblances, according to the mould in which they may be accidentally cast!

After he has made general observations of this nature, for which every part of that great city will furnish ample materials, he may study the leading characteristics, the distinguishing type of each division.

In the western quarter he may contemplate the proud and fastidious courtier, uniting the extremes of haughtiness and servility! swollen with the idea of his own importance, and yet courting the admiration of every transient spectator! meanly cringing to those in power, but treating his inferiors with disdain!—lavish of his bounty to sycophants and panders to his pleasures, but deaf to the cries of the indigent, or the demands of justice!—betraying his country for gold, and hazarding that gold upon the turn of a die! supercilious to those who are dependent upon his smiles, himself a stranger to the independency of a man!—destitute of every moral excellence, but vain of his manifold titles and trappings of pre-eminence!—ridiculing the rigid restraints of virtue and religion, and torn asunder by the contest of irregular passion, or corroded with diseases generated by criminal excess!

After he has studied this portrait of modern greatness in our sex, which, with a few honourable exceptions, I fear is too close a resemblance, he may cast his eyes upon that most whimsical and insignificant thing called a fine lady; in whom, although she thinks herself the most important personage in the whole creation, he will search in vain for those characteristic excellencies of woman, winning softness, modest reserve, delicate sense, elegant œconomy, and the regular conduct of domestic affairs, filial, conjugal, and parental affection, and a heart attuned to genuine friendship, sympathy, and love. The whole business of her life he will perceive to be pleasure, and the indulgence of her capricious humours; and yet that she is a novice in her profession! He will find her a slave to fashions which disfigure the person she is so anxious to adorn, a stranger to true elegance and taste, although it be what she chiefly affects; and disgusted with the amusements which have occupied all her thoughts! He will smile to see her mistake affected airs for gentility—impertinence for familiarity—haughtiness for dignity—volubility of tongue for elegance—trite ideas and a round of hackneyed phrases for sentiment—the most absurd prostitution of strong expressions upon trivial subjects, for sublimity of thought—a troublesome pettishness of disposition, for a delicate sensibility of nerves! And he sometimes will have occasion to be shocked at her breaking through the modest, the amiably timid restraints of nature, and considering impudence as a womanly virtue—at her affecting to disbelieve the truth of religion, while she is the dupe of childish credulities; braving her Maker with more than masculine infidelity, and yet screaming and trembling at the sight of a mouse, or a spider! He will observe her strictly maintaining all the appearances of friendship, but totally lost to its reality;—making generous offers of assistance to those above the want of it, and neglecting common civilities to the needy and oppressed; classing herself amongst the warmest of your friends in your presence, and sporting with your character in the hour of absence;—estimating the worth of her associates according to the rank they hold in the polite world, and yet prostituting all the confidence of friendship to her chambermaid, and the best affections of her sophisticated nature to parrots, monkeys, and lap-dogs!

Her most serious occupations he will observe to consist either in receiving or paying irksome visits of ceremony; in which her expressions of the happiness she feels at the interview can only be equalled by the real languor and disgust the experiences:—or in answering billets of unmeaning compliments:—or in satyrising her own conceptions of friendship and politeness, by sending round an empty equipage, attended with a train of domestics, to inquire after the welfare of her most intimate associates! In the evenings, he will see her sit down at the card-table, with anxiety, impatience, avarice, anger, and a thousand evil passions in her train:—And perhaps he may detect her, under the sanction of her sex and quality, practising at the pool the dirty tricks of a sharper!

Thus, from a general review of her whole life, will our philosopher either be tempted to turn a partial Mahometan, and doubt whether some of the female sex may not be formed without a soul; or he will place the existence of such a Being among the unsearchable mysteries of Providence?

Satiated with these sights, he will not be much disposed to visit the purlieus of the Hay-market, Cockspur-street, and Piccadilly, where the dependants and appendages of greatness chiefly resort; or he might here contemplate human nature in a masquerade, if it be possible, still more fantastic! He might behold persons descended from the meanest parentage, and educated in the humblest walks of life, suddenly springing up, like gaudy and pernicious weeds in the place of nutritive grain: And in their various professions of Barbers, Tailors, Hairdressers, Milliners, Linguists, Musicians, &c. assuming the airs, and apeing the manners of their superiors!

If our Philosopher should take a walk among the new buildings of St. Mary-la-bonne, he will not fail to admire the provisions made in this commodious place for administering to vice, and preserving the appearance of virtue. Here he may chance to detect many a sedate head of a family toying with a girl of the town;—Ladies of strict honour punctual in their appointments with their gallants;—Kept-mistresses counterbalancing infidelity to their benefactors by generosity to strangers;—and females of unquestioned virtue destroying the constitutions of sober youth!

Passing by St. Giles's, he may have opportunities of contemplating man reduced to the lowest scale of villainy. He may behold Vice enthroned on a dunghill, surrounded with a retinue of imposing beggars, thieves, pickpockets, and house breakers, enjoying in common all the privileges, without the chains of marriage; and acting over again in garrets and in cellars the crimes of the abandoned rich! He may pick up this valuable truth out of the dirt,—that dissolute manners are universally odious in rags;—that Vice appears in all her ignominy, where external splendor is wanting to varnish the crime, or dazzle the eye;—and he may remark the truth of the Poet's severe adage,

Let Greatness own her, and she's mean no more.’

Let our observer visit the City, and he will behold the full power of interest, and the various modifications of that governing principle, the love of money! He will observe the virtue of industry, like Aaron's rod, swallow up almost every other virtue; or, like the most subtle leaven, insinuate itself into every action, and every motive. He will find this at the bottom of many a vice, and largely blended with many a virtue: The bond of all social connections, as well as the general cause of discord. Yes, the city is a place where almost every act of courtesy and politeness may be set down to the score of policy;—where subscriptions and donations to misery shall mostly be regulated by some latent expectations of advantage;—where the views of interest shall accompany a man to the tavern, to the play-house, to the public gardens, and authorise expensive dissipation and midnight revels!—nay, it shall even mix with his very religion, —influence his choice of a preacher, —or direct his dubious steps to a place of worship, where he may learn ‘not to love the world, nor the things of the world!’

He will find the distinguished character of the fair sex to be an eagerness to pay the most extravagant compliments to their husband's wealth; and, by various arts of dissipation, put his gains and credit to the utmost proof. In a word, he will observe such a general spirit of luxury, such an affectation of influence among our city dames, as to discountenance the very appearance of ceremony, and render them a willing prey to milliners, laundresses, and domestics! He will perceive such a rage for imitating the prevailing passions, as breaks down every distinction, and confounds every class;—so that he shall find it difficult to distinguish the mistress from her waiting maid, or decypher the daughter of a butcher, baker, tallow-chandler, or poulterer, in a public assembly, from a rich heiress, or the consort of an opulent merchant! He will frequently hear of affectionate wives, who plunder their dear partners at home, that they may support his reputation abroad; and in league with their servants, advance the price of every marketable commodity in their daily accounts, to raise a fund for these secret and laudable services. He will often meet females stepping out of paltry shops and dirty courts, like an Heroine on the stage from a cottage or a prison, in all the pomp of dress! and he may sometimes detect the notable housewife performing her common domestic offices, in silks, laces, and brocades,—either from her unconquerable attachment to finery, or because the poverty of her wardrobe will not allow her the necessary change of suits!

In the various outskirts of the town our inquisitive observer may be witness to an odd assemblage of characters and situations. He will find some few who desire to live and deserve to live, and are so fortunate to succeed; many who would live, and cannot; great numbers who might live, and will not; and no small number who do live, and do not deserve it. He will often discern silent Want and Sickness privately struggling with woe, while Imposture intercepts the plenteous streams of mercy, which would otherwise gladden their hearts! He will remark, with a mixture of pity and indignation, the cruel policy of the times, which sets open such multitudes of houses for the purposes of riot and intoxication, and thus debauches the morals of the people, in order to increase the public revenues!—To this cause will he principally attribute the frequent sight of insolence in rags;—of spirits grown ungovernable by being lost to every sense of decency of character;—of men reduced to the lowest ebb of wretchedness, even beyond the feeling of their own misery;—and terminating their worthless existence, by falling victims to the laws, through crimes of which the laws themselves have been the parents, the nurses, and the guardians!

By the water side he may contemplate the sons of Neptune. He will see an active impetuous race, equally ready for great and noble exploits, or for riot and confusion—as the most trivial circumstances shall decide! He will find them generous, because improvident and thoughtless; brutal, because they are themselves hardy; and courageous, because they are ignorant of danger! In the same persons he will be witness to instances of more than Roman virtue, mixed with the vices of a Russian!

He may often behold a city mob doing wrong, in order to rectify abuses; sallying forth to revenge real or imaginary evils, and committing still greater in the attempt;—meaning well, and actuated by right principles in the first instance, but in the next degenerating into a lawless banditti;—hissing, hallooing, pelting, or leading in triumph, a Prince or a Beggar, according to their ideas of merit or demerit; but changing these ideas with every wind that blows.

If curiosity or commiseration shall induce him to visit the numerous Prisons, he will see places, intended for schools of information, become nurseries of vice. He will observe men rendered ten-fold more daring and experienced in iniquity by their punishments;—lost to every sense of shame, except the shame of having any remaining virtues; and familiarised to ignominious deaths, until they placidly contemplate them as natural events.

Should our speculative chance to be at the same time a practical Philosopher, he will retire with due expedition from a place, where, it is true, there is so much to learn, yet so little to please. But, if fate should oblige him to take up his residence there, he will make the best of the matter; prudently enjoy all the advantages the town affords; convert his knowledge of mankind, if possible, to their use; and, judging with Horace,

‘ The Mind, and not the Scene, creates
‘ the pain,’

Book I. Epist. 14.

he will seek happiness within himself, by the practice of virtue, and the pursuit of useful science; which, fortunately for man, require no particular soil of Town or Country, but will grow and flourish equally well, wherever they are properly cultivated.

Rural Bal Masqué.

ON Tuesday evening the 16th inst. a grand Rural Bal Masqué was held at Carlisle-house. Grand and rural it might be stiled; for all that the most ingenious fancy could project, in order to inspire, elevate, and charm, was here displayed displayed with every possible magnificence of art, and every embellishment of nature. The Tea-rooms were decorated and lighted up with great taste; the Bridge-room and Pavilion were elegance itself, and the Long Gallery illuminated with coloured lamps in a stile equally new and splendid.

The entrance into the great Supper-room exhibited a most curious and rural prospect. In the middle, opposite the arched portal of the Star-room, was a parterre, or long walk, betwixt two regular green hedges, in which, at equal distances, were planted a considerable number of lofty elms, whose branches interweaving at the top, and impenetrable to the upper lights, threw a pleasing gloom through this little grove, where the Loves and Graces wanted in continual succession. On a raised floor, at both sides of this walk, the supper was laid out, consisting of hot turkeys and fowls, chicken-pyes, cold hams, with a dessert composed of such fruit as were in season. The tables were round, and each encircled with a thick hedge, interspersed with roses and honeysuckles, which spread an agreeable odour through the apartments.

Tables were also spread in the Stage-room, Chinese-room, and Bridge-room. Those apartments were also ruralized with shrubs, flowers, elms, and weeping willows, under whose romantic shades the company sat in true Arcadian simplicity.

The principal character masks were, an Officer in the Irish Brigade, who sung many humorous songs; a Highlander; two Irish Carmelites; a Butcher; a Baker; a Tallow-chandler; a Cobler; a Schoolmaster; a Country Waggoner; a French Friseur; a Harlequin; a Touchstone; a Merry Andrew; a Hay-maker; a Watchman; an Old Bawd, with her high-headed filley (the celebrated and noisy Capt. R.); an Old Man; three Sybils; a Cricketer; two Chinese; a little Chimney-sweeper, apparently not more than five years old; Sir Moses Mac Sampson, dressed in regimentals, one half scarlet and gold, like a General's uniform, the other blue and gold, like an Admiral's—(this mask bore a flag, on one side of which were the arms of England, with a figure of the Devil, and wrote under it, An Appeal to the —, pointing to the figure; on the other side a large inscription in gold letters, intimating the honourable offices filled by the character;)—and a groupe representing a Dover-street Mur- riage Broker, with his Lawyer and Parlor, dispersed the following card among the Masks:

On Marriage.

MARRIAGE is defined a compact between a man and a woman for procreation and education of children; which in every well-ordered society, ought to continue during life.

For children gradually arriving one after another, they have hardly done with the care of their education, till the parents are unfit for second marriages; and therefore it is convenient, that marriages should continue during life, that the mutual care of the parents might be employed in the provision for their children: and that the love and respect of their children might be repaid to both parents without distinction or confusion; which could not be well done if the marriage was to be disjoined, and their interest was to sever, after the concern of education was over.

The interest of marriage could not be conveniently carried on, if there were a prospect that the marriage was any other ways to be determined than by death alone. For each person would be injuriously drawing out of the common stock, to the injury of their joint concern, and the prejudice of the education of the offspring.

That the conjunction of parents should continue 'till the offspring be sufficiently provided for, seems to be the law of the whole creation. For, though in those animals who feed on grass, the conjunction between male and female lasts no longer than the very act of copulation, because the teat of the dam is sufficient to nourish the young, until it is able to feed on grass, and the male can contribute nothing to its sustenance; yet in beasts of prey, the conjunction lasts longer, because the dam not being able well to subsist herself, and nourish her offspring by her own prey alone, the assistance of the male is necessary to the maintenance of their common family, which can't subsist until they are able to prey for themselves, but by the joint care of male and female.

So in other animals, we find the cock and hen continue mates 'till the young are able to use the wing, and provide for themselves: (only in domestic fowls, the plenty of food from the house, often excuses the male from feeding and taking care of the brood) and when the young can subsist of themselves, the conjugal bond dissolves of itself, till the anniversary seasons summon them to new marriages.

But it is still stronger with respect to man, who being endowed with reason to enjoy the pleasures of friendship, and with a prospect of future necessities, as well as present necessities, the society of man and wife should be more lasting, than that of male and female among other creatures; that so their industry might be encouraged, and their interests better united, to make provision for their common issue; which uncertain mixture, or easy and frequent solutions of conjugal society, would mightily disturb.

Hon. James Luttrell.

I Rise because I think, that if I am not too young a member to have a sense of humanity, neither can I be deemed too young a member to give my voice, as well as vote against the oppressive measures of the present administration. Nor can I be awed by their abilities, or experience, when the state of affairs prove they have been so misapplied, as to lose to the crown America, to this country a most valuable part of its commerce, and which are every day exerted in framing such bills as may more justly be called death-warrants to thousands of British subjects, than a step towards regaining our lost colonies.

I flatter myself, sir, that what I shall say against this war, will not be thought inconsistent with the spirit of an officer: for if Great Britain must bleed for her injustice towards America. I know my duty, and when called upon should not shrink from the summons: but I should hope when I fell, that it was to save some better man, who might live to fight in a better cause. However, sir, I cannot reflect so calmly on the destiny and possible fate of those great and distinguished officers, who could scarcely be replaced by their equals, much less by their superiors: I therefore feel it an additional reason to blame, and to lament the rashness of administration.

I form my judgment, sir, of America, not from being a member of this House, but from having passed many years in that country, where, because I was an Englishman, I met with a friendly reception. They gave me many just causes to respect them, and to wish them well: nay, I thought it consistent with my duty so to do, even though I served in men of war! For I could not at that time foresee, we were sent to protect America from foreign powers, only that we might become the spoilers of it ourselves. I rather looked upon us as guardians to their trade, in which both countries had a fair, and a mutual advantage.

The Americans have never sought nor desired to be independent of England. They thought ministry misinformed, therefore they requested to be heard, and however artfully they may have been deprived of that privilege before this House, I do respect it as the grand judicial inquest of the nation, which must be too high and too equitable to condemn an individual without a hearing, much less three millions of subjects. Yet 'tis said the parliament declared this war against America, let who will have done it, I have seen enough of that country to think it my duty to endeavour to express how much I am averse to so iniquitous, so impolitic a persecution.

I have heard, sir, that it is necessary to destroy America, in order to obtain an honourable peace to this commercial country. If such great objects may be compared to small ones, I think it would have been as sound policy to send to Liverpoole, at the time of the August, 1776.

riot, to burn the town, and destroy all the merchant ships, because a part of their crew had proved disobedient to the laws.

But who says the Americans will not submit to be governed by the just laws? They only say so, who first broke thro' them, and have since been adding insult to injury.

The minister well knew he had offended all America; and what man is so unlikely to put an end to the dispute, as he who first insists upon being judge in his own cause?

This I do say for the Americans, because I do believe it, that had their real motives and intentions been fairly and impartially stated and laid before this house, and the parliament of Great Britain been called in as the mediators, not the persecutors of the people, all would have ended well: that good faith which had been wantonly violated towards the colonies would have been restored upon a more solid and lasting foundation, and mens' lives and properties been safe at this very hour.

Some say, who now are the Americans we can treat with? Is it every individual settler of that country? Surely it would be an endless work. Who then so proper as those in whom they place implicit faith and confidence, and whose decisions they will abide by! Such are the congress; nor can I think the minister does wish to pay the paltry compliment of a preference to the provincial councils and assemblies; unless he can forget how long they were treated with the most shameful contempt and disgrace, and that he drew this fatal sword to prove they did not represent America.

But, sir, I beg pardon for deviating so far from the business of the day as to talk of reconciliation, peace, and commerce; for I understand the noble lord does still persist, he can by force of arms recover the trade and amity of the colonies. I think they will continue to shew us, that by such methods it is impracticable to attain those ends: but even were it possible he should succeed, permit me to say (if as a seaman I may be indulged with a professional comparison) I could never approve of that pilot, who when he might have steered the vessel through a safe and pleasant channel, directs her course amongst rocks and quicksands, telling me, for my best hope, that he has ingenuity enough, to extricate her at last.

Sir, I comprehend that the ministry now apply to parliament for seventeen thousand Germans to send to America. Good God, for what end? To enslave a hundred and fifty thousand of their own countrymen, many of whom fled from tyrants to seek our protection. And, sir, I speak in moderation; for passing over Georgia and West Florida, where they have some considerable settlements, there is Pennsylvania, one of the largest and most flourishing of the colonies, situated in the finest climate; it is above one half peopled by Germans, they speak that language and scarcely any English. The German flats on the Mohawk river, which extend on the back of New-York and the Jerseys, are very highly cultivated, cultivated, and esteemed the best lands of any of the provinces. Some thousands of Germans are the settlers and improvers of that country, and these I have mentioned, are the nearest inhabitants to the five nations of Indians. They trade with them, speak their language, and it is most natural to suppose they will easily persuade them to take up the hatchet against the king's forces. The Germans have some considerable settlements on the Connecticut river, but it is true the fewest Germans are in New-England and the northern provinces. I do presume, sir, that this is the reason why the congress have not hitherto thought it necessary to call more of them to the provincial army.

I shall only add to this account of the Germans, that the encouragement for them to quit their own country and become settlers in America, was so great, so very great, that the German princes found it absolutely necessary to make it death by the laws to carry any more of them out; and the Palatine ships that used so frequently to convey them have of late years ceased to arrive at the ports of our colonies.

To conquer, and to govern by military force, these settlers, and all the inhabitants of that vast continent, with such a handful of German and British forces, I do indeed, sir, hold to be impracticable; but I think it an excellent opportunity for our hired troops to desert, because they will most likely be offered lands and protection. These warlike transports we are to fit out may then be considered as good as the Palatine ships for peopling America with Germans.

I do presume, sir, it is not good policy to hire these foreign troops; first, because they will provoke five times the number of their own countrymen in America, and a great many Indians, to join the provincial army. Secondly, because they will desert, and accept of lands, which when they have done, we have hired troops to fight against ourselves; for surely when like those who became settlers before them, they see an uncultivated wild grow fruitful and beautiful under their hands, they will readily join in protecting that property, and the just rights of America against the oppressive impositions of an enterprising ministry. Sir, foreseeing these probable events, having passed some winters and summers in America, and part of that time under hospitable roofs, I think it would be wrong in me to give a silent vote upon the present occasion. But I do not mean to intrude any longer, because there are many able and distinguished men I shall have much more pleasure and satisfaction in listening to, than in making any attempt to draw their attention towards me. I shall therefore only beg leave to add one more reason why I think it right to give my voice and vote against these measures and against the noble lord's motion, which reason is, that I want faith to believe the compliments of foreign ministers are as good a security for the safeguard of Great Britain or of Hanover, as the German and British forces, that are shamefully to be sent to massacre his majesty's injured subjects in America, whilst we are left defenceless both by sea and land.

Mr. Jeliffe said, that as matters now stood, it was impossible to retreat, that consequently troops must be had, in order to carry the proposed measure into execution. This could not be effected without a sufficient force, and the present being the most feasible means of procuring that force, for his part, he could not perceive how it was possible for any person who approved of one, to consistently object to the other.

Mr. George Granville observed, that he had scarcely been long enough in public life to fix before now his sentiments relating to America. That he had no doubt of the right of the parliament to tax America, and consequently must concur in the coercive measures. He was far from approving all the steps administration had taken, but that at present the main point rested on this alternative; shall we abandon America, or shall we recover our sovereignty over that country? The expence is to be sure heavy, and the terms now before us hard; but if we do not consent to relinquish all our pretensions at once, we had better make one effort more; and if we should miscarry, we shall, in that event, be little worse than if we henceforth desisted from all further pretensions.

Governor Johnstone insisted, that the paper-credit of America was full as good as ours, and would answer every effectual purpose that the paper-credit of Great Britain possibly would. He said, he was surprised to hear an honourable member, early in the debate, describe paper-credit as one of the great pillars of this nation; he contended, that a love of liberty was sufficient to surmount all difficulties, and instanced the case of the Dutch in the resistance they made to the oppression and tyranny of the Spaniards, who, on their recognition as a free state, by their cruel taskmasters, were indebted in no less a sum than ninety millions sterling.

Lord North expressed his surprise at hearing so much stress laid on the impropriety of carrying on a war against our fellow-subjects. For his part, he always imagined, that a civil war called most urgently for a speedy and effectual suppression. Such wars were no novelties in this country. Were not the Irish our fellow-subjects in 1690? Were not the Scotch so in 1715, and 1745? And did any person ever assign it as a reason that those rebellions should not be crushed, because the rebels were our fellow-subjects? He insisted, that the cases of America and the United Provinces were extremely different; that the latter was privately abetted, and publicly supported; and yet, if her commerce had been cut off, notwithstanding all the aids she derived from her powerful friends (as that of America shortly will) she must have been obliged to submit.

Mr. Fox observed, that his lordship was never twice in the same temper, nor of the same opinion. A few nights ago his lordship confessed he could not promise but that some foreign power might interfere; and now he reasoned as if he was certain, that America would be cut off from all public or private support of foreign powers. He wished his lordship would take one side or other of the argument, and adhere to it; for if he granted the possibility of such an inference, then his whole argument amounted to just nothing. If, on the other hand, he was certain of a strict neutrality on the part of France and Spain, he begged never again to hear a syllable of a possibility of their interfering in the present disputes.

Lord George Germaine defended the measure on the ground of necessity. He quoted a number of precedents, to shew that in every war or rebellion we had recourse to foreigners to fight our battles, and to support our government. His lordship adverted particularly to the several treaties, the number of troops employed, the terms on which they were hired, and the services on which they were employed.

Lord Barrington supported the motion, because he owned that recruits could not be procured on any terms. He confessed that the bargain was not so advantageous as he could have wished; but it was, he was certain, the best that could be made. They had prescribed the terms, and we were compelled by necessity to accept of them.

Colonel Barre was severe on the last noble lord. He reminded him of the assurance he gave on a former occasion, that no foreign troops were meant to be employed. He hoped he would not resort to his old apology, that he was not of the cabinet; or, if he should, that he would never more pass his own speculations on the house, as originating from authority, on communications received from those in the cabinet, who were supposed to instruct and authorise him to give those assurances. He turned then to the minister, and was severe on him and his colleagues in office, telling them plainly, that they were not fit to conduct the affairs of a great nation, either in peace or war. He attacked the treaties, and those who advised them, and pointed out the great danger and risque of introducing such a number of foreigners into the kingdom, alluding to the case of Francis the First of France, among many others, who experienced the inconveniencies of so hazardous an experiment.

Governor Johnstone to explain; but proceeding to debate, he was called to order, as introducing new matter. The chair being appealed to, he was interrupted, and obliged to sit down.

Lord North answered several objections made to the treaties, as well as others relative to the state of our navy at home. He said that this country would not be in danger when the armament destined for America had sailed, for we should still have the usual number of guard ships, and it was not intended to send one line of battle ship to that part of the world.

Colonel Barre to explain. He said, he was in the judgment of the house, if the noble lord at the head of the war department, did not state 25,000 men as the whole of the forces intended for America for the service of the year 1776, on the day he presented the military estimates, adding at the same time, that not a single foreigner was to be taken into British pay.

General Conway insisted that administration had most shamefully, if not basely, broke their word with America, respecting the circular letter wrote by lord Hillsborough to the several provincial assemblies, while secretary of state for that country. He observed, that administration one day professes to relinquish all idea of a revenue; the next day they insist on taxation; a third, they solely contend for supremacy and commercial controul; and again, we will not tax, but we will have a certain specific sum of money. He appealed to the candour and good sense of those who heard him, if it were possible for America to know what to do, or what she could depend on; for, supposing she were willing to consent to any one, or all of those schemes, what certainty could she have in such a fluctuation of opinions, such discordant sentiments, such unsteadiness of counsels, but, that the very next day the whole system may be abandoned, and some new claim made upon them, "perhaps the fruitful parent of a hundred more." What was the conciliatory proposition of last year, taking it in the most favourable interpretation, but the old claim of taxing, dressed in another garb? In short, he could see nothing but naked destruction present itself on every side; for, let America consent, or let her resist, he perceived, nay, he was perfectly satisfied, that the ruin of this empire was inevitable. He treated the idea of reducing America as impracticable and absurd; and if it were not, he pronounced it at once cruel, oppressive, impolitic, ruinous, and unjust.

Lord Mulgrave said, he had ever approved of Mr. Grenville's system of colony-government; that his prophecy was now literally fulfilled; for he said, if the stamp-act should be repealed, it would produce all the consequences that have since happened. That the repealing that act was the cause of all our present disputes; and that whatever was thrown out respecting his conduct, was equally untrue and ill-founded; for as he was always against the repeal, so he was now in favour of coercive measures, never considering on which side administration voted.

Lord North, in reply to general Conway, said, he was not responsible for what lord Hillsborough or any other member of administration might have done or promised before he came into office; yet if he had been one of the advisers of that measure, he thought he could fully justify himself on the conciliatory proposition which he had the honour to submit to the house last year, for that went beyond any thing contained in the circular letter said to be written by the noble lord. The proposition secured the application of the port-duties to the services of the colony where such duties should happen to arise, which plainly removed the only objection that had been previously made to them, that of drawing the produce of such duties into the British exchequer. His lordship was then extremely jocular on some of the arguments made use of by governor Johnstone, general Conway, and colonel Barre, relative to the native strength of America, and the personal prowess of its inhabitants, on the dangers of a foreign invasion, and on the probable consequences of introducing a body of foreigners into our dominions in America, and the miraculous effects of American paper credit.

Mr. Burke complimented his lordship on his talents of ridicule, his political witticisms, and ironical strictures. He observed, that his lordship one day came down to the house with a very grave serious argumentative air, and told the country gentlemen, that they should have a revenue, for it was the very point in issue. The next he changed his tone, and as gravely affirmed, that nothing was farther from his intentions; for it was the supreme legislative power of parliament that employed all his sleeping and waking thoughts; a paltry trifling revenue was beneath the dignity and wise consideration of a British parliament. Again, the dispute only related to the destruction of the tea at Boston; neither the revenue nor supremacy made any part of the controversy. At the beginning of the session not a single foreigner was intended to be employed; now nothing is to be effected without the aid of foreign mercenaries; but if necessity should compel us to employ foreigners, it was only because they could be procured upon cheaper terms. The necessity is arrived; but the pretence of cheapness is at once abandoned; for it turns out, that for every thousand foreigners we have taken into our service, we shall pay as much as for one thousand five hundred natives. If his lordship was charged with being the promoter of those measures, the fact was denied, he only co-operated with the rest of the king's servants; if they were attributed to any other set of men, he instantly put in his claim to the whole merit. If he was reproached with versatility of sentiment, or contrariety of opinion, he laughed at his opponents, and turned the whole into a mere matter of ridicule. So that, on the whole, supremacy or no supremacy, revenue or no revenue, foreigners or natives, cheapness or dearth, responsibility or no responsibility, his lordship seemed to regard very little, the whole was made to end in a joke; promises, reasons, and arguments, were made to yield to ministerial pleasantry and good humour, the house was made merry, a laugh was created, and the mere grumblers were, as they deserved, turned into ridicule and contempt.

Mr. Stanhope condemned the measures pursued by administration, as leading us into consequences of a most serious and alarming nature. He insisted, that the means proposed to carry them into execution, were not less exceptionable than the policy which gave birth to them; and if persisted in, must not only cause the entire loss of America, but must subject us to additional burthens we should never be able to bear.

Sir George Saville entered into several comparative computations, relative to the terms of the present treaties; and shewed that it was never known since the present custom of hiring mercenary troops prevailed, that so disgraceful or dear a bargain had been made, even when the total dissolution of the established form of government had been threatened, and rebellions had existed in the very bowels of the kingdom.

Mr. Rigby observed, that in the beginning of the session opposition objected, that the military estimates were too low, and not adequate to the purpose of absolute coercion, yet now that defect was attempted to be remedied, they were ready to oppose the increased expence; and seemed resolved to find fault in either event. He said he should not be surprised to hear them find fault with the war itself, but he confessed he was astonished to hear them condemn the most effectual mode of obtaining the objects for which only it was set on foot, that of compelling America to return to a state of obedience. They might indeed controvert the justice of the war, but he could not possibly conceive how they could oppose those who were already convinced of its justice, contrary to their own express sentiments, declared in parliament. Among the rest, he expressed his astonishment at what had fallen from the right honourable gentleman [colonel Barre] who had condemned the war as impolitic, ruinous, and unjust, when he recollected, that that very gentleman had both spoke and voted for the Boston port-bill, which was the great leading and fundamental basis, and cause of the present civil war.

Colonel Barre to explain. He owned the charge; but he contended, it proceeded from mistake and misinformation; for the minister had given the most explicit and fullest assurances that the merchants of Boston had desired such a bill; and that the people of the Massachusetts bay would, as soon as it was passed, immediately return to their duty. Experience, however, had taught him what degree of credit any official or ministerial information deserved; if therefore he should ever happen to offend in the same way, he must do it with his eyes open; for at present, all communications from either the minister or his colleagues in office, if they at all deserved attention, it was only to understand them in a direct contrary sense to what those communications obviously imported.

Mr. Alderman Bull. I cannot, sir, at this time, forbear to express my astonishment and concern, that early in the present session so many gentlemen should have been prevailed upon, by any considerations, to stand forth in the most serious and solemn manner to approve and sanctify those cruel and arbitrary measures which were recommended, and have been fatally tally carried into execution, by an unfeeling, an unrelenting administration, who have dared to abuse the throne by their wicked and sanguinary councils, and whose whole conduct has proved them entirely destitute of every principle of justice, humanity, and the religion of their country. Their insatiable thirst for protestant blood has been long evident; and it cries aloud to Heaven for vengeance, as well as for the just indignation of a long abused, insulted, oppressed people. To exult in the destruction of our most valuable commercial friends, and protestant fellow subjects; to pray that the same horrid scenes may be repeated; that war, desolation and bloodshed may pervade the whole continent of America, unless it shall bow its head to popery, to poverty, to the most abject and ignominious slavery, were not the fact on record, would be thought incredible! That record, sir, on a nation professing a regard to liberty, and the rights of humanity, will remain an eternal monument of reproach.

Sir, it is certain, it is probable, that the exertions of ministerial tyranny and revenge will be much longer permitted? That there will be no appeal to stop the further effusion of protestant blood? Or can it be expected that the people of this country, reducing by thousands to beggary and want, will remain idle spectators till the sword is at their breast, or dragoons at their doors? God forbid! I am not insensible how much professions of patriotism are become a subject of ridicule. To the astonishment of the world, the love of our country has been ridiculed within these walls. And yet, sir, this shall not restrain me. While I will uniformly withhold the offer of my life and fortune in support of ministerial despotism, I wish it to be understood, that whenever an occasion may call for it, I will cheerfully sacrifice both in defence of the liberties of the people.

The war that you are now waging, is an unjust one; it is founded in oppression and its end will be distress and disgrace. Let not the historian be obliged to say that the Russian and the German slave was hired to subdue the sons of Englishmen and of freedom; and that in the reign of a prince of the house of Brunswick, every infamous attempt was made to extinguish that spirit which brought his ancestors to the throne, and in spite of treachery and rebellion seated them firmly upon it.

I shall not now trouble the house any further, than to declare my abhorrence of all the measures which have been adopted against America; measures equally inimical to the principles of commerce, to the spirit of the constitution, and to the honour, to the faith and the true dignity of the British nation.

At a quarter after two, the question on Lord North's motion was put, and agreed to by a majority of 242 to 88.

Friday, March 1.] Hon. Temple Luttrell moved, that the proper officer do lay before this House the last weekly accounts received at the admiralty, from the admiral and commander in chief of his majesty's ships or vessels at the several ports of Chatham, Plymouth, and Portsmouth, together with the last weekly accounts of the state and condition of all such ships and vessels of war as are now employed upon channel service in Great-Britain or Ireland. He introduced his motion with some strictures upon the Admiralty, for the little care that had been taken in manning the men of war for the American service; by which misconduct some of the frigates had run ashore, and others been impeded in their voyage, &c. He insisted upon it, that so numerous a fleet as that, which it is said, would amount to near one hundred sail, could not possibly be fitted out without press-warrants; yet he did not condemn the withholding such expedient; for next to the compelling Americans to serve against Americans, nothing could be worse than to force Britons to fight against them. He asked if it would not be wiser to have fifty men of war on that service properly manned, than one hundred in so wretched a condition? The fleet in America, including store-ships, victuallers, and small craft, must require upwards of 20,000 men, which would be more than could be spared at so remote a distance consistent with the safety of these islands, when your resources of men for land and sea service were so reduced, and the French and Spaniards actually fitting out large naval armaments, and increasing their military establishments. Some ministerial gentlemen had asserted, the evening before, that we had twenty sail of line of battle ships fit to encounter any enemy whatever at a few days notice. This was absolutely a false state of facts. He would engage to prove, by indisputable evidence at the bar, that when the rest of the ships destined for America shall have sailed, there will not be seamen sufficient, in all the ports put together, to complete the complements of fourteen sail of the line. The Spaniards will in less than six weeks have a greater force than that within two days sail of Gibraltar, and we have only one ship of the line in the Mediterranean. The French are now superior to us in all parts of the world, excepting North-America. We have not a single line of battle ship either in the East or West-Indies. France has a squadron at Hispaniola, and 10,000 land forces. Are we then henceforward to hold our very existence as a nation by no better tenure than the impolitic faith or commiseration of the house of Bourbon?

Right honourable T. Townshend seconded the motion.

Sir Hugh Palliser replied, that the navy was in a most flourishing state at home; and said that the American ships were manned in a most satisfactory manner. The guardships had supernumerary hands, and seamen came in faster than was requisite.

Lord Mulgrave supported these assertions, and declared as a professional man, that we could have a fleet of forty sail of the line in a few weeks, and sixty in a month's time, if necessary.

Governor Johnstone replied, and shewed that there there was but too much reason to apprehend we were going to our lowest ebb as a maritime power as well as a commercial one.

Mr. W. H. Hartley expressed his concern that country gentlemen should encourage minority in the unconstitutional practice of withholding information, from the representatives of the people.

The question being put, the House divided; for it 44; against it 93.

Adjourned to March 4.

(To be continued in our next.)

Account of the Proceedings of the American Congress, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. (Continued from p. 483.)

SINCE the flight of the Provincials from before Quebec, they have been driven from Canada; but no action of moment has yet happened between the main armies, of which government can have received any authentic account.

General Carleton on receiving the reinforcements that were intended to enable him to recover Canada, pursued the invaders to their own settlements.

General Howe embarked about the 13th of June, on a grand expedition; in which he has since been seconded by Lord Howe, with the Hessian troops.

From the known activity of these generals, the public may rely that no time will be lost in the execution of their respective measures.

Quebec was no sooner relieved than General Carleton issued the following proclamation:

"Whereas I found it necessary, by a proclamation, dated the 22d of November, 1775, to order and enjoin all and every person whatsoever, liable to serve in the militia, and residing at Quebec, who had refused or declined to enroll their names in the militia lists, and to take up arms in conjunction with his Majesty's good subjects of the said city, as well as those, who having once taken up arms, had afterwards laid them down, and refused to take them up again, to quit the town in four days from the date thereof, together with their wives and children: I do now hereby order, that no person or persons of the above description, who quitted the city of Quebec in consequence of the said proclamation; nor any person or persons who either before or after the proclamation deserted or withdrew from any corps to which they once belonged, shall presume to enter the said city again without a permission in writing, under my hand, or under the hand of the Lieutenant-Governor of this province.

"Given under my hand and seal of arms, at the castle of St. Lewis, in the city of Quebec, this 12th day of May, 1776, in the 16th year of the reign of our sovereign Lord, George the Third, &c.

GUY CARLETON."

Private advices intimate that a considerable body of New-England troops have by forced marches advanced to the support of their army on the confines of Canada, where they are to make a stand, to oppose the King's forces on that side.

It is also given out, that the main army of the United Colonies has changed its situation; and that the head-quarters are now at New-York, where Gen. Washington has already taken up his residence, and where it was expected the army under Gen. Howe intended to land. People are divided in opinion as to their reception.

Were the members of the Congress unanimous in their Resolutions, no doubt could remain but that every means, offensive and defensive, would be tried to annoy them; but so great is the dissension that reigns in their councils, that the Secretary could not be prevailed upon to sign the following Declaration, though called upon so to do; and John Hancock, Esq; the President, was under the necessity of signing it himself.

"In Congress, May 15, 1776.

"WHEREAS his Britannick Majesty, in conjunction with the Lords and Commons of Great-Britain, has, by a late act of parliament, excluded the inhabitants of these United Colonies from the protection of his crown. And whereas no answer whatever to the humble Petition of the Colonies, for redress of grievances and reconciliation with Great-Britain, has been, or is likely to be, given; but the whole force of that kingdom, aided by foreign mercenaries, is to be exerted for the destruction of the good people of these Colonies. And whereas it appears absolutely irreconcilable to reason and good conscience, for the people of these Colonies to take the oaths and affirmations necessary for the support of any government under the crown of Great-Britain; and it is necessary that the exercise of every kind of authority under the said crown shall be totally suppressed, and all the powers of government exerted under the authority of the people of these Colonies, for the preservation of internal peace, virtue, and good order, as well for the defence of ourselves, liberties, and properties, against the hostile invasions and cruel depredations of our enemies:

"Therefore, Resolved, That it be recommended to the respective Assemblies and Conventions of the United Colonies, where no government sufficient to the exigencies of their affairs has been hitherto established, to adopt such government as shall, in the opinion of the Representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their Constituents in particular, and America in general.

"By order of the Congress,

"JOHN HANCOCK, President."

Nothing can be clearer than that the above Declaration and Resolution are founded on the Instructions received from Boston.

"We have seen (say the people of that town to their constituents) the humble Petitions of these Colonies to the King of Great-Britain

Britain repeatedly rejected with disdain. For the prayer of peace, the sword is tendered; for liberty, chains; and for safety, death. The instruments of hostile oppressions are licensed to rob us of our property, to burn our houses, and to spill our blood. Every barbarous nation, who could be influenced, has been invited to assist in prosecuting these purposes.

"We have seen the people of Great-Britain so lost to every sense of virtue and honour, as to pass over the most pathetic and earnest appeals to their justice with an unfeeling indifference. The hopes we placed on their exertions have long since failed. In short, we are convinced, that it is the fixed and settled determination of the Ministry and Parliament of that island to conquer and subvert the Colonies, and that the people there have no disposition to oppose them. A reconciliation with them appears to us to be as dangerous as it is absurd: A spirit of resentment once raised, it is not easy to appease: The recollection of past injuries will perpetually keep alive the flame of jealousy, which will stimulate to new impositions on the one side, and consequently resistance on the other; and the whole body politic will be continually subject to civil commotions.

"We therefore think it absolutely impracticable for these Colonies to be ever again subject to, or dependant upon, Great-Britain, without endangering the very existence of the state: placing, however, unbounded confidence in the supreme councils of the Congress, we are determined to wait, most patiently to wait, till their wisdom shall dictate the necessity of making a declaration of independance. Nor should we have ventured to express our sentiments upon the subject, but from the presumption, that the Congress would chuse to feel themselves supported by the people of each colony before they adopt a resolution so interesting to the whole. The inhabitants of this town, therefore, unanimously instruct and direct you, that at the approaching session of the General Assembly you use your endeavours that the Delegates of this colony, at the Congress, be advised, that in case the Congress shall think it necessary, for the safety of the United Colonies, to declare them independent of Great-Britain, the inhabitants of this colony, with their lives, and the remnant of their fortunes, will most cheerfully support them in their measures."

We forbear to make any other comment on these instructions, than just to mark the influence they have had in procuring a small majority of Delegates in their favour; but there is no reasonable ground to conclude from thence, that it is either the wish or intention of the moderate and sensible part of the Americans to withdraw their obedience from the parent-state. On the contrary, all America, by which we would be understood to mean a large majority of the industrious inhabitants of that continent, think it their greatest happiness to be considered as the free subjects of a Sovereign of the Brunswick line, by whom alone they can hope to be confirmed in their civil and religious rights, to have their complaints candidly considered, and their grievances redressed; among which they look upon that of rejecting their humble Prayer to the Throne as none of the least. Why, then, should not we hope that the King's troops will be received as friends, and that, instead of the destroying sword, the generals do carry with them the olive-branch, and that the first news we receive may announce the preliminaries of peace?

The Gazette takes notice, that an ordnance store-ship, named the Hope, has fallen into the hands of the Provincials; and the New-England Chronicle gives us the following account of her lading, viz. 1500 barrels of gun-powder, all copper-hooped, 1000 carbines with bayonets, scabbards, and steel rammers, 1000 carbine cartouch boxes and rings, with sundry travelling carriages for heavy cannon, &c. a vast variety of tools, implements, and necessaries of iron ware for the army and artillery. —She is estimated to be worth near 50,000l. sterling. She had six carriage guns and 20 men, and was taken by Capt. Muggford. The people on board the men of war, being vexed to see her taken, armed several boats, and in the night boarding Capt. Muggford's vessel, he in his defence was killed.

In New-England, those who refuse to deliver up their arms, or to join in an association for the defence of the United Colonies, are seized and committed to prison.

Several coiners of Congress paper-money have been discovered and apprehended with their press and other implements in Long-Island.

In Providence colony, and the dominion of Rhode-Island, the act of allegiance is repealed by the General Assembly.

In South-Carolina, and no doubt in all the other United Colonies, the General Assembly have resolved to enter into no treaty with the Commissioners from Great-Britain but through the medium of the Continental Congress. It is, however, highly probable that on the landing of the King's troops they will change their mind.

By an act made at a General Assembly begun and holden at Charles-Town, in South-Carolina, March 26, 1776, John Rutledge, Esq; President, and Commander in Chief, it is deemed felony without benefit of clergy, 1. to take arms, or attempt to persuade any person to take arms, or to commit any hostile act whatever, against the government of the colony. 2. to hold any correspondence whatever with any persons in arms, either by sea or land, against the colony. 3. to supply any persons in arms against the Colonies with provisions or necessaries of any kind. 4. to persuade any white person or any slave to take up arms against the colony. 5. to assemble in any riotous manner to disturb the peace of the colony. And it is further enacted, enacted, That the lands and tenements, goods and chattels of offenders shall be confiscated.

Lord W——th, it is said, has just received a copy of a treaty between America, France, and Spain, of which the following are the leading articles:

The Americans propose ceding Canada and Nova-Scotia to France.

West Florida and the Illinois to Spain.

Granada to be reserved, and Porto Rico to be given to the Americans.

Jamaica to be delivered up to Spain.

The Americans are to build annually for France twelve sail of the line, at a reasonable price.

The ports of Philadelphia and New York, to be free ports to all the world, except Great-Britain and Ireland, unless the latter becomes an independent state.—It is not improbable, but that such a treaty may have been suggested by the American congress.

On the 15th of May, 112 persons met in convention at Williamsburgh, in Virginia, and came to the following resolutions:

“Resolved unanimously, That the delegates appointed to represent this colony in general congress be instructed to propose to that respectable body to declare the united colonies free and independent states; and that they give the assent of this colony to such declaration, and to whatever measures may be thought proper and necessary by the congress for forming foreign alliances, and a confederation of the colonies, at such a time, and in the manner as to them shall seem best: provided, that the power of forming government for, and the regulation of, the internal concerns of each colony, be left to the respective colonial legislatures.

“Resolved unanimously, That a committee be appointed to prepare a declaration of rights, and such a plan of government as will be most likely to maintain peace and order in this colony, and secure substantial and equal liberty to the people.”

From the LONDON GAZETTE.

Whitehall, July 20, 1776.

The following letter from general Sir Guy Carleton to lord George Germaine, was this day received by captain Le Maitre, who arrived exprels from Montreal.

“Montreal, June 20, 1776.

“My Lord,

“IN a former letter I informed your lordship that the troops were ordered to assemble at Three Rivers; they all pushed forward with great expedition. The 8th instant the rebels attempted a very bold enterprize indeed; they crossed over from Sorel in 50 boats, better than 2000 men, landed at the Point du Lai before day-light, and marched to attack the troops at Three Rivers, disregarding the sloop Martin, some armed vessels, and transports full of troops, that were at anchor three miles above the town, otherwise than to keep out of reach of their cannon. They made some attempt to force the

“I know not the number of killed and wounded of the rebels; about 200 surrendered or were taken prisoners, amongst those was their chief, Mr. Thompson, whom I think they call a major general, and a Mr. Irwin, who was the second on this expedition, and some others. The killed and wounded of the king's troops amounted to twelve or thirteen soldiers only.

“The next day the troops were ordered to their former stations; all who had transports up reimbarked. The wind springing up fair, the fleet sailed, and arrived off Sorel the evening of the 14th instant; the last of the rebels had retreated from thence some hours before: the grenadiers and light infantry of the troops in this division immediately landed, supported by brigadier Nesbit and part of his brigade. The next morning more troops were sent on shore, and the command of this column given to lieutenant general Burgoyne. As soon as the regulations for the different transports could be made out, the remainder of the fleet sailed for Longueil, four leagues from Chamblé, (Chamblé is 15 leagues from Sorel, by the river of that name) and had not the wind failed, this column might have arrived at Longueil the same night, and about the same time with Mr. Arnold, and the remainder of the rebels, retiring from Montreal. The next day the troops landed and marched by La Prairie towards St. John's. The advance guard arrived the morning of the 19th instant near to St. John's, when they learned, that the head of lieutenant-general Burgoyne's column had taken possession of the redoubts the night before; they found all the buildings in flames; all the craft and large boats the rebels could not drag up the rapids of Chamblé, with some provisions, were also burned. I hear 22 pieces of cannon are left behind, hid in the woods. Several other marks appeared of great precipitation and fright; on this occasion I think they had no small cause. All his majesty's national and foreign troops shewed a great zeal and eagerness to overtake the rebels; and I doubt not but they would have given every proof of their fidelity and valour, had the enemy delayed their retreat a little longer. The corps of artillery shewed great diligence likewise on the occasion; there were were brigades which marched with both columns. Brigadier Frazer's corps crossed from the north, and fell into the rear of the two columns on the south side; they were also joined by numbers of Canadians, and that on the right by many Indians.

"Capt. Le Maître will have the honour to present to your lordship these dispatches; he is an intelligent officer, and well qualified to give any further information of the transactions in this province. I shall take the liberty to recommend him to your lordship as an officer of merit. I am, &c.

GUY CARLETON."

An Evening Walk:

TO these lov'd shades, where peaceful silence reigns;
And Contemplation holds her blest abode,
May I (by their soft influence led) resort;
With tranquil mind pervade their lonely haunts,

And from my breast spurn all the cares of day,
Then sip the sweets that such retreats produce.

Beneath the awful umbrage will I tread,
Delighted—and admire the scene around;
And here attempt with critic eye to view
The intellectual world;—important task!
New prune the passions, regulate the heart,
Attune the soul, and hold my converse with High Heav'n, anticipating bliss divine.

Slowly descending to the western verge,
Array'd in gold, the sun sails flaming on;
An universal calm prevails o'er all.
The pendent honours of the Sylvan race Confess no breeze. The wide expanse of Heaven,

Scarce fully'd with a cloud appears, save where
Some snowy fleeces spread their gentle waves, Streaming in soft gradation just, until
They mingle with the clear ethereal blue;
Or else adown the mighty cope some hang,
Teaching the margin of the azure vault,
Where they inhale the parting solar ray,
And blush with living red.

The fragrant meads and trees all harmony,
These shrubs in glowing plumage richly dress'd,
With all the fair assemblage smiling round,
Fail not of pleasing the most vacant mind,
But wake the attentive soul to rapture,
And call each sense to praise that Pow'r divine,

Who thus with pure delight regales them all.
But hark! what soften'd notes now steal upon

My ravish'd ear?—it is the Gallian horn,
That, modulated low, enchants the grove,
And plays upon yon silver lake, which sleeps
All calm beneath the vary'd mountain's brow,
With wood and rock sublime. Now bolder strains [is lost;

Fill high th' expanding breast.—The muse
For now the swelling blast bears all away,
Mounting the soul above the very stars!
And there outstretch'd, she rapidly does roam
Ideal worlds among; but only sits
(Of pinion yet too weak) beneath the floor
Of Heav'n: Where yet she hopes to reascend,
By grace divine, on faith's eternal wing.

'Tis here we form the generous design,
The heart-endearing wish, the noble thought,
While all the soul expands in social love,
And glows to walk once more in active life,
And there apply such fair inspir'd resolves,

August, 1776.

As blest mankind, and raise this mortal state
To little less than what e'en angels taste.

County Cavan, July 1776: C. O'H.

The Insolence of Office. By the Rev. Mr. Graves.

HAVE you not seen a dog call'd Pug,
Perch'd on a cushion or a rug,
Or mounted in an easy chair,
With nose erect and saucy air?
Go when you will, this little snarler
Reigns the curst tyrant of the parlour:
No overtures of peace can please him;
Your forc'd civilities but tease him.
Present your hand, he bites your knuckles;
Put forth your foot, he snaps your buckles:
His yelping wounds your tortur'd ears;
His snarling tricks alarm your fears.
Whether the Lady's friend or lover,
You long to have the coffee over;
And, with this testy cur offended,
Rejoice to find your visit ended.

So have I seen a little man,
In stature not above a span;
In shape much like a China jug:
Whom, from his face so smooth and snug,
You might expect to find more civil:
Yet try him—he's a very devil.

The fellow understands accounts,
By which he into office mounts:
And, trusted with some small affairs,
Gives himself these gigantic airs.
Perch'd in his desk, with wig so neat,
Nor * Hoare nor Child are half so great.

Behold him swell and snap and snort,
And with rude answers cut folks short;
With insolence affront his betters,
Tho' men of rank, of birth, or letters!
Thus arrogant without once blushing,
Like Pug upon his velvet cushion.

But do your business as you can;
Laugh at the proud, important man;
Let him count o'er his borrow'd pelf;
And leave the Puppy to himself.

Prologue to the Contract, intended to have been spoken by Mr. Foote.

THE Contract is it call'd?—I cannot say
I much admire the title of his play:
Contracts, they tell me, have been fraught with evil,
Since Faustus signed his contract with—the Devil.

Yet, spite of Satan, all men love to make 'em,
Tho' nineteen out of twenty wish to break 'em.

• Eminent bankers.

Butchers and meal-men, brewers, agents, Pimps, poets, placemen, managers, and actors,
 Bawds, bankrupts, bookellers, are all contractors.

All lie, and swear, and cheat, t' increase their store,

Then die, and go—where Fauslus went before.
 Whilst thus o'er all we see th' infection spread,
 No wonder it shou'd taint the Marriage bed;
 Each wife forgets, each husband breaks his vow;

For what are Contracts? What is Wedlock now?

Garrick, who long was marry'd—to the Town,

At length, a fashionable husband grown,
 Forsakes his spouse, base man! for, truth to tell,

She lov'd her own dear Davy wond'rous well;
 Tho' now he slights her, breaks from her by force,

And nought will serve him but a full divorce.

But be the fault in women or in men

Thanks to our laws! they all may—wed again;
 Her faithless fav'rite gone, the lady's free
 To choose another, and may smile—on me;

To the Lame Lover may resign her charms,
 And, tho' a cripple, take me to her arms:

I'll promise to be constant, kind, polite,
 And pay my duty—every other night:

My dear lov'd rib I never will abandon,
 But stand by her whilst I've one leg to stand on;

I'll make a solemn Contract, play or pay,
 And hope we shall not part this many a day.

Our Brother Scribbler too, I greatly fear,
 Has made a foolish kind of Contract here;

He promises, and ten to one you're bit,
 To furnish fable, sentiment, and wit:

I've seen his piece, the man appeal'd to me,
 And I, as Chancellor, issued my decree;

"T has pass'd the Seals, they're going to rehearse it—

But you're the House of Peers—and may reverse it.

A Pastoral.

YE nymphs, and ye shepherds, whose days
 Are happily numbered by joy,
 Who sleep on the soft lap of ease,
 May time ne'er your pleasures destroy;
 A youth whom the Muses have taught
 T'embellish the pastoral lay,
 His bosom with sorrows is fraught,
 Who whilom was cheerfully gay.
 His pipe that stole heedless the hour,
 In cadence so sweet and so clear,
 Is broken;—neglected the bow'r,
 Whose blossomy pride was his care.
 He never is heard but to sigh,
 Nor seen, but reclined on his crook;
 Suffus'd with a tear is each eye,
 Successively dimpling the brook.
 My friends, I have reason to weep,
 Aminta's forsaken the plains;
 Ah! fold your sad Corydon's sheep,
 And take his pet lamb for your pains.
 Where yon hilly pastures extend,
 I haste to enquire of my maid;
 My hopes, tears, and wishes attend,
 Alas! 'twas a hope that betrayed.
 Ye warblers, who visit my grove,
 Cease, cease ye your throats to attune;
 Has rudeness explored the alcove
 Aminta repos'd in at noon?
 Ah, no! the umbrageous recess,
 No foot, if unhallowed, dare tread;
 The Graces deny all access
 To those from whom virtue hath fled.
 Ye zephyrs, who breathed on her face,
 And played o'er her bosom so fair,
 Soft whispering tell me, what place
 Ye left whom my heart holds so dear?
 So balmy the sweets ye disperse,
 More fragrant than May's bloomy reign,
 They tell me, if Truth's in my verse,
 Ye kiss'd not Aminta in vain.
 Perhaps with the Goddess of Smiles,
 At S—n she's chosen to dwell;
 Gentle villagers, heed not her wiles,
 Ah me! I have known them too well;
 If there I my fugitive find,
 And she my fond ardor approve,
 Hymeneus the Charmer shall bind,
 And yield her a victim to Love.

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

Madrid, June 7.

ALTHOUGH the approaching marriage of the infant Don Louis is no longer mentioned at court, as soon as the king leaves Aranjuez to return to Madrid, his royal highnesses will espouse Donna Maria Teresa Valla-briga, daughter of Don Vallabriga, captain in the regiment of volunteers of Aragon; immediately after the celebration of his marriage at Aranjuez, that prince will set out with his lady, for Talavera, where he will fix his residence, under the title of count of Chinchon, he and his heirs being deprived for ever, by virtue of his pragmatick sanction respecting marriage, of all dignities, honours and estates belonging to the crown, for having contracted a marriage with a person of unequal birth.

Rome, June 13. One Marie-Anne Paolucci has lately been sentenced to prison, for imposing on the credulity of the people, assuming the character of a saint, and the power of performing miracles. She led many of the vulgar astray, in various places. Her sentence is five years imprisonment. She is to renounce all pretences to saintship, and the performance of miracles, or she is to undergo the severest punishment. This judgment reflects singular honour on the pope and the cardinals.

Paris, June 17. The king has given orders to augment the pay of all the officers who were reduced in 1774, and to fill up the vacancies that may happen in the standing regiments with such of them as are found fit for immediate service.

Leghorn,

Leghorn, June 20. The emperor has laid a plan for establishing the East-India company here, and taking possession of a factory on the coast of Coromandel, which was in the hands of Austria during the reign of the emperor Charles the VIth, of glorious memory, and for carrying the above into execution, a ship has been purchased at London, which, after touching at Lisbon and Cadiz, arrived here the 24th, under Austrian colours. She is called the Joseph and Teresa, is about 900 tons burthen, carries sixty hands, and thirty-two guns, though she could mount seventy; she is commanded by Capt. William Bots.

This is the first ship to be sent out by the German East-India company; she is to carry a great quantity of arms and ordnance stores, which have been sent here from Trieste, to be shipped on board her; she is to sail in company with the Tuscan frigate of war, and the Etrurie.

Vienna, June 27. It is very glorious for the house of Austria, that the custom to put criminals to the torture has been of late entirely abolished in the hereditary dominions. At present this court is engaged in a business which does equal honour to humanity; for the farms in the imperial demesnes in Bohemia are actually dividing, and are granted upon leases to the subjects, who are at the same time freed of the state of villainage to which they hitherto were subject: nay, they are even exempted from a trifling acknowledgment of the task labour which they were obliged to by servitude. Mr. de Raab, counsellor of court, who laid the plan of this useful and excellent scheme, is actually employed in executing the same; and it is hoped, that many of the Bohemian nobility will soon come in to the same scheme, in their respective estates, as they must be convinced of its practicability, usefulness, and humanity.

Warsaw, June 29. A project is on foot here, which, though difficult to be put in execution, would be very advantageous to the public. It is to lower the price of the necessaries of life, so that all ranks of people may partake of them at a moderate price. The prince marshal of the crown, assisted by several persons in the administration, of known abilities, wanted to fix a certain rate, by which all the necessaries were to be sold; to this the country folks were to agree. The new proposal meets with many objections, which we are, however, in hopes will soon be removed, and that when it is once established, the pay of the tradesmen and workmen may be regulated, and even the rent of the houses, and wages of servants, may be in some measure settled, which will prevent many abuses.

Madrid, June 31. It now is no longer a secret that the Spanish Squadron, commanded by admiral Galton, is to act against the Moors; he is to be joined by a French Squadron; they are to act in conjunction, with a view of giving the Infidels a fatal blow.

Hamburgh, July 10. Letters from Hanover advise, that the king of Great-Britain has given orders to remount the artillery, not only at Hanover, but also at Stade, Harnelen, Hardeburge, Nienburgh, and other strong places in the electorate; to make new baggage waggons, carts, and copper for pontoons; and moreover, to take throughout the electorate an exact list of all the young men able to bear arms.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

Shepton Mallet, July 10.

IN the evening a riotous mob of weavers, shearmen, &c. collected from the towns of Warminster, Frome, &c. assembled together, and proceeded to the town of Shepton Mallet, with intent to destroy, under cover of the night, a machine lately erected by the clothiers, for the advancement and benefit of the manufactory, and to pull down the houses, and take away the lives of those persons who encouraged and promoted the use of it.

The clothiers, having notice of their intentions, applied to three neighbouring magistrates, who, for the conservation of the peace, assembled at a public inn, and after waiting there till two o'clock on Thursday morning without any alarm, two of the three returned to their respective homes, and the other remained, lest assistance might be wanted. The justices who left the town were scarcely out of it, when the mob, who had remained at a little distance from the town, restrained by fear of their power, apprehending there was no magistrate left to command the military, assembled, made an attack on the poor-house, where the machines were worked, and before the soldiery could be had out to oppose them, broke into the same, and not only destroyed the particular objects of their resentment (the machines,) but continued other injuries, to a very considerable amount. They had scarcely effected their purpose, when the military, preceded by the remaining magistrate, advanced, and secured five of the ringleaders; but in conveying them to the prison, they were attacked by the whole body with an intention to effect a rescue.

The proclamation was read by John Strode, Esq; who very humanely advanced to the mob, accompanied by a principal clothier, and endeavoured, by all the arguments prudence suggested, to convince them of the impropriety of their conduct, and persuade them to disperse; but they, with the utmost effrontery, declared they would not leave the town, till their companions were discharged. To save the effusion of blood, even this demand was on the point of being granted to them, on condition they would promise never to molest or disturb the town again, had not some of the most daring, at the instigation of the women, began most cruelly to stone the soldiers, who bore the attack with uncommon fortitude and moderation, and discharged two rounds over their heads, to deter them, if possible, from proceeding to extremities.

This lenity had not the desired effect, for they continued the attack with redoubled vigour, and very much wounded seven of the soldiers. Driven to this extremity, no alternative was left. The command to level their pieces was given, and one man fell, and six were wounded. This intimidated them, and they retired with the utmost precipitation. The magistrate immediately ordered the men to cease firing, and no farther mischief ensued. The coroner sat on the body on Thursday night, and brought in a verdict, Accidental Death by the military, under the command of the civil power.

London, June 27.

The baron de Linling was, as usual, telling a story of the marvellous on Thursday evening last about ten o'clock, in the St. James's coffee-house, when M. Ranfonet, a foreign officer, accidentally smiling, the baron turning about immediately, said, the man that dared smile was a Jean foutre; the officer, however, took no notice of this general assertion; but the baron walking up to him, told him, with his particular hauteur, "that he meant him, and he was a Jean foutre;" in consequence of which the officer immediately bade him follow him out, which the other did accordingly, and they went instantly to Hyde Park, where, dark as it was, they fought with their swords for some time, till the baron at last run the officer through the body, and then, supposing he had killed him, posted away with great speed for his lodgings in Suffolk-street. The officer being carried home, Mr. Tomkins, the surgeon, was sent for, who, after dressing him, thought the wound so dangerous, that he sent notice of the affair to Bow-street, when Justice Addington, with some attendants, immediately went in pursuit of the baron:—after searching the house for some time, at last they found him naked, concealed in a closet; from whence being taken, he was committed to Tothill-fields Bridewell, when he remained till M. Ranfonet was pronounced out of all danger.—The baron is a German by birth, accounted the best swordsman in Europe, said to have killed two or three antagonists in different duels, and was obliged to give bail some months ago at the Public Office in Bow-street for his good behaviour, in consequence of having sent a challenge to some foreign gentleman.

4.] The sheriffs, the aldermen Bull, Wilkes, and Plomer, with the city officers, &c. ascended the hustings at Guildhall; after the proper officer opened the business of the adjourned hall, the common serjeant declared that the election had fallen on Benjamin Hopkins, Esq; the numbers on the close of the poll having been for Mr. Hopkins 2869

Majority, 1196

Mr. Wilkes then came forward, and after a good deal of interruption delivered the following speech:

Gentlemen of the Livery,

My first sentiments on this occasion are those of a lively gratitude to the steady, consistent, and spirited friends among you, who in the most generous manner have honoured me with their suffrages and support at the present election of Chamberlain of this city. With men of such tried and approved public virtue, I shall always be ready, on every call of liberty, to encounter any danger or difficulty in defence of our rights, and that independency which formerly distinguished the Livery of London, while it remained free and uncorrupted. Our ancestors deemed it their highest glory, and scorned to sacrifice it at the altar of power, or of private interest. They despised equally the proud menaces and the corrupt offers of a minister. In this selfish, degenerated age we have seen, in the present election of Chamberlain, the same iniquitous and corrupt arts practised as at the last, the same venality and unconstitutional power of every court officer and dependent spread their baneful influence over a considerable part of the Livery of London. The court nominated, the Livery tamely acquiesced. The object was a gentleman distinguished by no services to you, or to the state, enjoying no reputation acquired by superior abilities or the honourable discharge of any important public office, yet of merit, of great court merit. He was marked among the herd of their dependents by a peculiarly mean, crouching servility, and an absolute passive obedience, even when one of the representatives of the people in parliament. By the late transactions the moment seems at length arrived, so ardently wished by every arbitrary administration, when a majority of the livery appear to have sold and surrendered the capital to a profligate ministry. By the creation of so many unnecessary lucrative offices, the division and subdivision of contracts, the threats of the opulent and insolent to the necessitous and dependent tradesmen, and all the captious promises of power, the greater number of the livery seem at present either lulled into supineness and a fatal security, or enrolled among the mercenaries of corruption and despotism. No longer worthy the name of freemen, they are sunk into tame, mean vassals, ignominiously courting, and bowing their necks to the ministerial yoke. Such, gentlemen, it gives me pain to think, is the faithful, but melancholy picture of this once free and independent city. All public spirit in the capital is visibly decaying, and that stern, manly virtue of our fathers, which drove from this land of freedom the last Stuart tyrant, is held in contempt by their abandoned offspring. A dissolution of the empire, ruin, and slavery, are I fear advancing with giant strides upon us. We are ripe for destruction. If we are saved, it will be almost solely by the courage and noble spirit of our American brethren, whom neither the luxuries of an unprincipled court, nor the sordid lust of avarice in a rapacious and venal metropolis, have hitherto corrupted. Yet with some chosen friends, however few, I will, while I live, dare to oppose the alarming and fatal progress of this deluge of corruption and court influence, and to protract at least the impending ruin, by continuing firm and intrepid in the cause of public virtue and the independency of the capital.

Gentlemen,

The sheriffs have through the course of this election given us so frequent proofs of their zeal for the preservation of the public tranquillity, and shewn that particular attention to the free admission of every liveryman to the poll, that I am happy in this opportunity of publicly acknowledging their real services to this corporation, and of doing justice to that spirit of candour and impartiality, of which so fair an example has been held out by them to every returning officer in the kingdom.

Mr. Hopkins now attempted to speak, but the advocates on the other side being very vociferous he bowed and retired.

The sheriffs then returned to the council chamber, and about half an hour afterwards the lord mayor, the sheriffs, and Aldermen came to the hustings, when the common serjeant confirmed the prior declaration.

After this Mr. Hopkins again came forward, but was for some time prevented speaking by the clamour in the hall. Silence being at length obtained, he addressed the livery in a speech to the following effect:

"Gentlemen of the Livery,

"Your having favoured me with your suffrages to re-elect me into the office of chamberlain, requires my most grateful thanks. It is an evident proof that you approve of my conduct hitherto, and you may rest assured I will continue to deserve your approbation. I think it is unnecessary to take notice of what has been advanced by my opponent; for I do assure you, upon my word, that if there was the least truth in them, I should not have dared to appear on these hustings to solicit your suffrages. I solemnly declare they are not true. No engagement, either of business or pleasure, shall at any time interfere with the duties of the office to which you have been pleased to elect me; and if the bank direction (in which I shall always esteem it an honour to be) should tend thereto, I will immediately relinquish it; but I have already had four months experience, and do not find that it in the least interferes with the office of chamberlain.

"I cannot conclude this address without returning my warmest thanks to the worthy sheriffs, for their very polite and impartial conduct during the contest, and their great care and attention to preserve peace and good order."

After the above business was over in the common hall, a court of aldermen was held, in order to swear in Mr. Hopkins, when Mr. alderman Lee presented a protest, signed by about 20 liverymen, against Benjamin Hopkins, Esq; being sworn into the office of chamberlain. They founded their objection upon a bye-law of the court of common council, which was made in the year 1572, which says, "That the lord mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and common-council of this city, should not have power to give away any office of honour or emolument in the city to any person whatever, who is not a freeman by birth or servitude." Upon this protest's being read, and a question being put by Mr. Alderman Lee, which was seconded by Sir Watkin Lewes, that Benjamin Hopkins, Esq; should not be sworn into his office, very warm debates commenced; which being terminated, and the question put, alderman Kennett, Allop, Plumbe, Rawlinson, Thomas, Peckham, Plomer, Bull, Hayley, Newnham, Clark, and Wooldridge voted for swearing Mr. Hopkins into his office, and only Sir Watkin Lewes and Mr. Lee opposed it. Mr. Hopkins then took the oath of office for the due execution of the trust reposed in him.

July 25.] The following ships have been taken by the Provincials in Boston harbour, in sight of the men of war, viz. the Brigantine Jane, James Fulton, master, from Corke, laden with coals, candles, and provisions; the brig William, Richard Pine, master, from St. Michael's, with wine and fruit; the ship Hope, capt. Lamdale, from England, last from Corke, having on board 1500 barrels of gunpowder, all copper hooped, 1000 carbines with bayonets, scabbards, and steel rammers, 1000 carbine cartouch boxes and rings, with sundry travelling carriages for heavy cannon, &c. a vast variety of tools, implements, and necessaries of iron ware for the army and artillery. She is esteemed to be worth near 50,000l. sterling. This ship had six carriage guns and twenty men, and was taken by capt. Mugford's vessel of inferior force without firing a gun. The enemy on board the men of war, being intolerably vexed to see her taken, armed several boats, and in the night boarding capt. Mugford's vessel, he in his defence was killed. He was interred at Marblehead with suitable military honours, by a detachment of the 14th regiment.

27.] Capt. Williamson, of the Francis, who is arrived in town from Antigua, brings us the following accounts, viz. that a few days after they were on this side the Bermuda islands, the following ships were taken by the Revenge and Montgomery American privateers, viz. the Fanny, Blyth, from Barbadoes to Halifax; the Rover, Hunter; Isabella, Kirk; and Devonshire, Fisher, from Antigua, bound to Ireland; and the Polly, Lear, from ditto for London; and the Harlequin, Goodwin, from Nevis, and carried them into Salem; they had also taken Capt. Williamson, but being in ballast they released him.

From another hand we have the following list of ships taken by the Revenge and Montgomery Provincial privateers, viz. the Fanny, Blyth, from Barbadoes to Halifax, taken the 28th of May; Rover, Hunter, from Antigua to Dublin, taken the 13th of June; Isabella, Kirk, from ditto, for ditto, taken the 15th; Devonshire, Fisher, from ditto, for Coike, taken the 1st of July; Harlequin, Goodwin, from ditto, for London, taken the 2d; Polly, Fear, from ditto, for London, taken the 21; and the Francis Williamson, from ditto, was taken and released, being a Guineaman, in ballast, who is arrived at Dover.

Capt. Stephen on, of the Lady Juliana, arrived in town yesterday morning, and gives us the following account of the capture of his ship the Lady Juliana, from Jamaica to London, in company with the Reynolds, capt. Ruiden, from ditto, for ditto, and the Juno, capt. Marlam, from ditto, for Bristol.—On the 9th and 12th of May last they were attacked by two American privateers, off the Matanzas, bearing S. S. E. and that the Reynolds, Ruiden, was taken by the American privateer, —, capt. Henry, mounting six three pounders, and ten swivels, on the 9th of May; and Lady Juliana, Stevenson, and Juno, Marlam, were taken by the Chance, capt. Adams, who mounted four six pounders and ten swivels, the 12th; that the Provincials put the captains and passengers on board a Spanish vessel that was leaky, who carried them into Providence, where the captains purchased a vessel, called the Baltimore, which is since arrived at Plymouth.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Monday, July 22.

AT one minute after four o'clock in the morning, a gentleman mounted on an Irish poney, set out from James's-gate, for Elm-hill in the county of Clare (a distance of ninety-eight miles) where he was to arrive at one minute before eight in the evening of the said day; or lose a bet of one hundred guineas:—The poney is about 12½ hands high:—And agreeable to the above stated time, the wager for his performance was to go from sunrise to sunset.—Many considerable bets depended on the issue.

The gentleman who some time since undertook the journey on the Irish poney, has favoured us with the following particulars.—On Monday, July the 22d ult. John Bouchier Brampton, Esq; was to ride a poney 13 hands high, from James's-gate, Dublin, to Elm-hill in the county of Clare, a distance of 90 miles, for a considerable wager, from the rising of the sun, to the setting of the same; notwithstanding he drew stakes, he rode said poney, on the aforesaid day, from four o'clock in the morning to ten at night, from James's-gate, to the bridge of Killahee, and 18 miles back; being 74 turnpike miles, and 37 computed miles, making in the entire, 150 English road-miles: a distance no horie has been known to travel in so short a time.

A young man genteely dressed in claret-coloured clothes, with his hair queued, came to Mr. Benson's house in Sackville-street, on Wednesday evening, July 24, and being shown into the parlour, took the opportunity of the servant's going for a glass of water for him, to carry off a gold laced hat, and tea chest.—This is inserted as a caution to the public.

On Wednesday night the 24th of July, inst. a soldier belonging to his majesty's 19th regiment of foot, being on his duty as sentinel at Blackpool, in the north suburbs of Cork, was most barbarously and wantonly houghed by two persons unknown, without the least provocation; a reward of 50l. is offered by the right worshipful the mayor, sheriffs and common council of that city, for the apprehending any or either of the offenders.—Likewise a great reward is offered by the principal inhabitants of Blackpool.

26.] Four prisoners of the names of Green, Pigeon, Laycock and Allen, attempted their escape out of Kilmainham gaol; the three first succeeded, but the last was detected by the turnkey, after he had got as far as the outer door of the gaol; he is under sentence of death for robbery on the circular road, and is to be executed on this day se'nnight; he was disguised in woman's wearing-apparel, and had a pistol in his breast at the time of detection.

On Monday morning, July 29, at ten o'clock, a recruit belonging to one of the regiments of foot in our barrack was shot at a place called the Flats of Chapel-izod, in the Phoenix Park, for desertion. The regiments in garrison all attended, and formed a hollow square round him three deep, the unhappy boy (for he was no more than 18 years of age) kneeled down, and after praying some time, he threw from him with seeming reluctance the fatal signal of death; five soldiers, who were standing with pointed muskets within about twelve inches of his breast, then fired, and he instantaneously died without a groan. The regiments all marched by the dead body, which afterwards in its mangled condition was thrown into a coffin, and sunk in a hole about two hundred yards from the place of execution.

For many days after Newlan the deserter was shot in the park, a man said to be a clergyman, but supposed disordered in his senses, visited the place where that unhappy victim is buried, and proceeded to open the grave, alleging, that upon seeing the body, he would restore it to life.

Newry, 29.] Last Friday evening a boy went into Crown Bridge river to bathe, and the place being remarkably deep, was likely to be instantly drowned, when a young man jumped in to his assistance, caught hold of the boy, and pitched him out on the land; but from the force of throwing out the boy, he could not recover himself, whereupon another went in to endeavour to save him, and that not being likely to have the wished for effect, a third went in to assist the two, and all three were unfortunately drowned.

On Tuesday, July 30, the right hon. the earl of Drogheda, master general of the ordnance, reviewed the royal Irish regiment of artillery in the Phoenix-park, when the regiment performed a variety of evolutions and firings with cannon and small arms, together with howitzer and mortar practice, and went through the whole entirely to his lordship's satisfaction; after which the corps had the honour of being entertained by his lordship at Chapel-ized.

Last Sunday forenoon, at the raising of the psalm in Kevin's church, a clergyman, supposed to be disordered in his senses, left his pew, and having placed himself close to the clerk in the aisle, sung so loud and out of tune, that dean Bayley was under the necessity of requesting him to withdraw. When the service was ended, the dean very humanely made inquiry after this unfortunate gentleman, and being informed of his character and connections, he, with his usual benevolence, not only contributed to his present support, but promised, at the same time, to make his deplorable case known to the archbishop of Dublin, and other dignitaries of the church, that a subscription may be opened for the care and support of this son of the church, during his present melancholy disorder, until Providence be pleased to restore him to the right use of his intellects.

August 1.] On Saturday morning the brig Boscawen, with deals for Mess. W. and I. Ogle struck on the rock Hawlbowl, and would have been totally lost, but for the vigilance of John Winder, Esq; and the revenue officers, who brought the vessel off, and saved the cargo. On this alarming occasion the inhabitants of the adjacent country behaved with great humanity, by whose seasonable aid not the smallest article that belonged to ship or crew was lost.

Extract of a Letter from Swanlinbar, August 1st, 1776.

"The foundation stone of the new ball-room was laid this day by Miss Downs the band of music attended, and all the water-drinkers joined in chorus, to the glorious first of August.—Mr. Carth has begun a new eating-room, 50 feet by 20; when these rooms are finished, this place will vie with most of the water-drinking places in Europe. We have had 90 subscribers this season in the rooms already."

Waterford, 2.] Last Wednesday Morning a horse belonging to an officer in the 32d regiment, run against time for a bet of 100 guneas. He was to run from the barrack to Pertlaw (a distance of near nine miles) in 45 minutes, but performed it in 37. The road is remarkably hilly and rugged.

Galway, 2.] Yesterday came on at the tholiel before Elias Tankerville, Esq; the present mayor, attended by the recorder, sheriffs, and town clerk, the election of magistrates for this town, for the ensuing year from michaelmas next, when James Shee, Esq; one of the present sheriffs was chosen mayor, James O'Hara the younger, Esq; the present recorder, was chosen recorder, Mr. James Burke and Mr. Samuel Grace, burgesses, were chosen sheriffs, and Mr. Robert O'Hara, attorney, was chosen town clerk.—On the same day, pursuant to a posted notice, signed Patrick Blake, Esq; mayor, another election was held at his house in this town, where George Carter, Esq; burgess, was chosen mayor, Martin Kirwan, counsellor at law, was chosen recorder, Mr. John Mandeville, and Mr. Charles Truelock, burgesses, were chosen sheriffs, and Mr. George Staunton, jun. was chosen town clerk.

Sunday afternoon, August 4, three gentlemen took up the coach, No. 57, Augier-street stand, for the Black-rock, paid the coachman the set down, and, agreeable to his own terms, engaged him to wait their return to town, however, he thought more convenient not to keep his word, took up some other fare, and without giving any notice to the company he was engaged to, drove off:—The gentlemen thinking themselves secure in a carriage, stayed until evening was far advanced, when, they were surprized by dis-appointment, obliged to walk to Dublin; and, what adds to the distress, (like every one in the same dilemma) are left no remedy to punish the deception of the driver.

A mineral spring has lately been discovered on the banks of our canal, just opposite Archer's-grove mills, within a small mile of Kilkenny, on the estate of his grace the archbishop of Cashel, which is likely to prove an acquisition of the greatest consequence, as it is found to possess a medicinal quality, which has proved extremely efficacious in many dropsical, scrophulous and rheumatic cases, indigestion, loss of appetite, &c. It is frequented by great numbers of persons of all ranks, several of whom have already experienced its good effects. The gentlemen of the faculty, we hear, have recommended it in the above and many other disorders incident to the human body.

The following singular circumstance is certainly true.—A few days ago a calf belonging to a gentleman at Hawkhead, in Lancashire, was heard to make an uncommon noise by the side of a river, where it had been drinking; on going up to it, there was a large pike seen hanging to its nostrils, which, it is supposed, had seized the calf while it was drinking, and which the calf had dragged about 50 yards from the river. One of the people disengaged them by striking the pike with a stone which killed it. There were found in the belly of this voracious fish, a large Norway rat, and a perch entire, besides parts of several other fishes.—The pike weighed 45 pounds.

The public will please to observe, there are now in circulation, an incredible number of counterfeit shillings, as of the coin of George II. so exceedingly well executed as not to be discovered but by those who are judges of filver. The date is 1758, the head is a fine impression of the late king; the fleur de lis, crown, &c. are highly finished; the milling on the edge is very coarse, and the piece is near one third thicker than the tower coin; its value not three half-pence.—Close attention to the above description, will effectually prevent imposition.

By a letter from Belfast we learn, that a young man, supposed to be disappointed in love, leaped from the battlements of the bridge at low water, and falling upon the piles was killed.

Several thousand groce of chamber-pots are now finishing in this city, on the inside of which, on the bottoms, a most laughable resemblance of Richard Twiss (that fellow of the royal society, who published a tour thro' Ireland) is painted. The original, from which this device is taken, was finished by a celebrated artist, now in Corke, for the purpose of exposing this tour-writer, in a situation, where his very likeness must undergo a disgrace, which in propria persona he has long merited.

THIS experienced warrior, who now exerts his abilities against those he formerly served, says of himself, in the introduction to his journals, " Such, in particular, was the situation of the place in which I received my early education, (probably also of his birth) a frontier town in the province of New Hampshire, where I could hardly avoid obtaining some knowledge of the manners, customs, and language of the Indians, as many of them resided in the neighbourhood, and daily conversed and dealt with the English.

" Between the years 1743 and 1755, my manner of life was such as led me to a general acquaintance, both with the British and French settlements in North America, and especially with the uncultivated desert, the mountains, vallies, rivers, lakes, and several passes that lay between and contiguous to the said settlements. Nor did I content myself with the accounts received from Indians, or the information of hunters, but travelled over large tracts of the country myself, which tended not more to gratify my curiosity, than to inure me to hardships, and, without vanity, I may say, to qualify me for the very service I have since been employed in."

September, 1776.

How well Mr. Rogers was qualified for the service of a capital partizan, and a former and leader of rangers, amply appears by a detail of his exploits from the beginning of the year 1755 to the 14th of February, 1761.

Accordingly we find him in the year 1755, commanding a company of the New Hampshire troops. From that time he was almost constantly employed in scouting parties, to reconnoitre the forts and passes of the enemy, gain intelligence, take prisoners, and cut off convoys; in all which, and in the several engagements into which his duty forced him, he behaved with an exemplary courage, prudence, and address. His personal bravery animated those he commanded, and his stratagems enabled him to distress the enemy, and essentially serve the cause in which he was engaged. In this perilous, though necessary service, the labour, hardships and fatigues he endured are almost incredible. Yet he was not content to testify his own zeal in the defence of his country, but introduced his two brothers, Richard and James, to the same course of life. Captain Richard Rogers died of the small pox at Fort William Henry, a few days before that fort was besieged and taken by the French in August, 1757; but such was the rage and cruelty of the enemy, after their conquest, that they dug him out of his grave and scalped him.

On the 6th of April, 1758, Captain Robert Rogers was made a Major, by Major General James Abercrombie, then commander in chief of the forces in America; and he contributed greatly to the success of the war by his courage and conduct, and by the excellent rules and orders he composed for forming, disciplining, and conducting the Rangers; a set of men extremely useful in an American war, where the European discipline has been frequently found of little avail.

Yet, notwithstanding Major Rogers's perils, wounds, fatigues and services, he appears to have been several times treated with ingratitude, nay with injustice, as will appear from his own words:

"About this time [Feb. 1757,] I again wrote to his Lordship (Lord Loudoun), earnestly soliciting his friendly interposition and assistance to obtain from government an order for payment of what was due to me and my men, for our respective services during the winter of 1755; but if that could not be obtained, that he would be pleased to direct me what method to take for the recovery thereof. Whereto his Lordship replied, that as those services were antecedent to his command here, it was not in his power to reward them.—General Amherst, afterwards, on a like application, gave me much the same answer. These applications not being attended with any success, and suits of law being afterwards commenced against me, by and on the behalf of those who served under me in that campaign, and verdicts obtained in their favour, I was not only obliged to answer their several demands, to the amount of 828l. 3s. 3d. sterling, which I paid out of my private fortune, but also a considerable sum for law charges, exclusive of what I ought to have received for my own services during that inclement season: But for all which, I have not at any time since received one shilling consideration."

In the year 1758, Major Rogers was ordered to raise five additional companies of Rangers, which he did in a very short time; and on this head he says, "Four of these companies were sent to Louisbourg to join General Amherst, and one joined the corps under my command; and though I was at the whole expence of raising the five companies, I never got the least allowance for it:

"And one of the captains dying, to whom I had delivered a thousand dollars (225l.) as advance pay for his company, which, agreeable to the instructions I had received, I had a right to do; yet was I obliged to account with the government for this money, and entirely lost every penny of it."

These were not the only losses Major Rogers sustained from his zeal for his duty. The enemy, in 1760, took his own sley, with 1196l. in cash, besides shoes and other necessaries: 800l. of this money belonged to the crown, which (O wonderful!) was afterwards allowed him; the remaining 396l. was his own, which he entirely lost.

But ingratitude and injustice was his lot; not only on the subject of pay and recompence, but in a more tender point, in which his honour as a soldier, and the lives of many under his command were shamefully sacrificed. In March, 1758, it was publicly given out, that Major Rogers was to proceed against the French forts with a strong party of 400 Rangers. This intelligence reached the ears of the enemy, by means of a deserter and of a sutler's servant, who was taken prisoner; and when Major Rogers marched from fort Edward towards Ticonderoga, on the 8th of March, pursuant to Colonel Haviland's orders, he found he had only 180 men, officers included. What he says on this subject is very affecting:—"I acknowledge I entered upon this service, and viewed this small detachment of brave men march out, with no little concern and uneasiness of mind; for as there was the greatest reason to suspect that the French were, by the prisoner and deserter above mentioned, fully informed of the design of sending me out; what could I think to see my party, instead of being strengthened and augmented, reduced to less than one half the number at first proposed? I must confess it appeared to me (ignorant and unskilled as I then was in politics) incomprehensible; but my commander doubtless had his reasons."

However, this brave officer did not shrink from duty: He proceeded on the service till the 13th, when his little party fell into an ambush laid for him of 700 Canadians and Indians, with whom it maintained a very unequal fight; when after killing above 150, and wounding as many more, he was obliged to retreat, with the loss of seven officers, five sergeants, and one hundred and eighteen privates.

his duty till the 14th Feb. 1761, when the war being over there, he returned to New York; and although he had borne the commission of Major from April, 1758, and had that commission confirmed by General Amherst the 20th of June, 1759, giving him that rank in the army from the date of his first commission; yet he was placed on the half-pay list only as captain of one of the New-York independent companies.

After such usage and indignities, we cannot wonder that Major Rogers is now high in command in the American army: But we may lament that a man of his abilities and experience has been forced to take an active part against the British arms, which he so often and so nobly defended.

We have no certain account of the parentage of Major Rogers, or even the place of his birth; but, as we hinted above, it is probable he was born in some part of the Province of New Hampshire, and of a family of some consequence; for he says, he expended part of his own private fortune in the service of his country. However, if born in New England, he was still a British subject, and exerted himself as such, although he met with ungenerous returns. But ingratitude of men in power towards the most deserving warriors, is no new circumstance, nor peculiar to Great Britain: Yet it must be remembered, that such ingratitude has frequently produced fatal consequences, which ought to be a constant memento to all who have the administration of public affairs.

The ingratitude of the Romans to their brave general, Caius Martius Coriolanus, who had conquered and bled for them, drove him, through resentment, to join the Volsci; and brought the Romans to sue for peace to him whom they had disgracefully banished. Aristides, surnamed the Just, Cymon, and Themistocles, met with the same fate from the Athenians, who soon found themselves obliged to repeal the banishment, and court the services of the two former, whilst the Persian Monarch, the greatest enemy to the Greeks, kept the latter attached to him till the hour of his death. Alcibiades, another Athenian general, in revenge for his ill usage went over to the Spartans; yet returned back to the service of his countrymen on their repentance, and obtained many signal victories for them; but on his lieutenant, Antiochus, losing a naval battle, although he fought contrary to his general's orders, the same ingratitude returned, and forced Alcibiades again into banishment. In short, history is full of similar instances; each of which brought shame and sorrow on the perpetrators.

Men should consider, that although during a peace, those who have signalized themselves in war cease to be immediately useful, yet the time when their abilities may be again wanted is very uncertain, and common prudence dictates that they should be rewarded for their past services, and so firmly attached to their country by good usage, that they should be willing to engage anew in its defence. Military men, of all others, may be supposed to have the quickest sense of honour. A slight thrown on those who are conscious they have deserved well, can hardly be brooked, more especially when acts of injustice are exercised against them; their losses unrecompensed, their rank withheld, and men of no experience, or no merit but their birth or parliamentary interest, promoted over their heads. These events are not unfrequent in this age; and to this may be attributed the loss of a Lee, a Putnam, and a Rogers; for when these circumstances unite with an enthusiasm in the cause of liberty, few men have so much passive attachment to the name of a Monarch, as to overlook those contrary incentives, and act in its favour.

Disinterested Love: A Novel.

Solid Love, whose Root is Virtue, can no more die

Than Virtue itself.

LOVE often becomes serious, when meant to be an amusement. The veracity of this observation cannot be more exemplified than in the following story. The Marquis de P—, who was young, amiable, and formed to please, had refused several matches, every one of which was more considerable than the other: but his taste for liberty had been a bar in the way of settlement. However, a plain country girl disconcerted the plan of independence which he had sketched out to himself, and he soon was induced to give his hand to his own farmer's daughter. De P—, such as I have just now described him, purchased a small but compact estate that lay contiguous to his own. This purchase he made through the solicitations of one of his tenants, whose name was Le Cheyne, a downright honest man.

The marquis was desirous of improving this land, and, though he had no thought of residing there, yet he was eager to set labourers upon it: for man must have some object of employment, and his estate served de P— instead of a heir. One day as he happened to be at Le Cheyne's, he saw there a young woman extremely pretty, which made him very earnest in enquiring who she was; the farmer told him she was his daughter, whom he had placed out at a convent for her education. As this is not an usual thing among country people, de P—— asked him, why he did not keep her at home, that she might be assisting to her mother? The reason for it, answered Le Cheyne, is, because I have no other intention than to procure her happiness. I could wish that Miranda would resolve to take the religious veil upon her. Think not, added he, that it is with any view of sacrificing her to the interest of my son; they are both equally dear to me. I would, however, freely consent to bestow half of what little I have in the world to see her take that resolution; and it is purely for her good, that I have conceived any such wish. For, in short, what settlement for life can I procure her? none where she can find so much happiness, as in a cloister; and, I may add too, none that is more worthy of herself: yes, continued the honest farmer, I may speak in this manner too, and whoever shall be acquainted with her, cannot imagine that I am guided by a blind fondness in the opinion I have conceived of her.

She does not then give into the same opinion with you, answered the Marquis, and a cloister is not to her taste. Yes, returned the father, it is, and yet she cannot resolve to take the religious veil; not that she has a mind to marry, for she is as well convinced as I am, that I cannot procure her in that state the happiness she deserves. She has a heart exalted above her condition; and, without entertaining any contemptible notions of her equals, she does not find herself formed to live among them, nor to employ herself wholly in such occupations as the narrowness of her fortune will oblige her to take up with. Moreover, she is afraid to engage herself in a state from which death alone can deliver her; and I, for my own part, fear every thing, should I happen to die before she has made choice of a settlement. She is a girl of understanding, it is true; but what assurance can one conceive of a young woman that is left to her own conduct? for should her heart speak to her in behalf of any body, to what hazards must she be exposed?

As he ended these words, his daughter came in; upon whom the Marquis could not forbear looking with admiration. He asked her a few questions; she gave him modest answers to them, but with all the sprightliness imaginable. He then returned to his country seat; thither the idea of Miranda followed him, and from that day forward he was very often at the farmer's. Here he saw his charming creature, and tried every way in his power, to convince her by his eyes that the pleasure of seeing her was the motive that drew him thither.

After some interval, he found her one day at home by herself, when she offered to go and look for her father; no, no, says he to her, I'll wait for him; and whilst I am with you, continued he, I shall not perceive that he stays long: Miranda gracefully returned the Marquis's politeness. He then asked her if she should tarry any time with her father, to which she made answer, that in a few days she proposed to return to the convent.

What, so soon, replied de P——, will you voluntarily shut yourself up? would not you rather chuse to stay here? If I had any great mind to that, returned she, my father has friendship enough for me not to oppose it, but I have been brought up from my tenderest years in the convent, where are a thousand charms calculated for me: the habit of living there, and the tranquillity I there enjoy, serve me as amusements. That is wisely spoken, returned de P——, but tell me now frankly, does your liking to a retired life proceed from your natural inclination, or from some other cause that determines your reason? Suppose you were to find yourself in a more brilliant situation, would you still retain that inclination? I do not know that, says she, but I will own to you, that the liking which I have for a reclus life is no more than a comparative one; I love it better than the life I lead here: but were it in my power to lead any other, perhaps the scale would not incline to the side of the cloister.

It were a great loss that such a lovely creature as you are should shut herself up all the rest of her life. Fair Miranda, continued the Marquis, you affect, as if you did not understand me; though you might for some time past, have read in my eyes what passes in my heart. Know then, that I adore you, sweet angel! fortune has put it in my power to repair the injury she has done you, and it is only from this moment, that I know the value of those blessings which she has bestowed upon me. My love can perform any thing for you; will you refuse to do something in return to it? Upon uttering these words the Marquis would have embraced her, but she turned away with an air of disdain.

I am, says she, a very unhappy creature, that my poverty should expose me to such kind of language: It does not become a man of honour to demean himself so as to insult me with a state which I never before found so miserable as at this present moment. Here the tears flowed copiously from her eyes. De P——, at this time imagined that her virtue, after being alarmed by an attack which it had never before undergone, would soon languish and give way in the arms of an importunate lover; he therefore, gave fresh assurances that he adored her, and thinking to persuade her, not so much by the rhetoric of his words as gestures, he had a mind to push matters a little farther.

I make, says Miranda, seizing a knife which lay on the table, what defence I can against an assassin, and the man that would rob me of my honour, I look upon such. —The Marquis withdrew in surprise. Come not near me, continued she, or I shall let you know the injustice you do me in suspecting me capable of baseness.

De P——, astonished at a steady firmness which he did not expect, changed his battery immediately. If, says he to her, it be criminal to love you, if my passion make you outrageous, revenge yourself, I find that I cannot but be still culpable; I will then always love you.

Your friendship, answered Miranda, does me honour, and it shall be my endeavour to merit your esteem; my heart is noble, if my extraction be not so: Want of birth is not at all incompatible with honour, and should not draw upon me the disrespect you plainly meant me.

At each word, the marquis's surprise rose higher and higher; now esteem, respect, and love, took place of those sentiments which had at first set him to act in so unbecoming a manner.

You form a very wrong judgment, says he to her, of my way of thinking; the most violent love has been the cause of my crime; for I look upon myself as guilty, in that I could even have disobliged you. I have, continued he, the most sincere esteem for you, but is not your heart capable of some measure of sensibility?

It would perhaps, answered Miranda, have been so weak as to have had too much of it for any one who had given me less provocation; and you have done me service, by letting me know your way of thinking.

De P. could make her no answer: He perceived Le Cheyne coming, whereupon he endeavoured to conceal the confusion he was in, and he put off till next day, any farther conversation on this subject.

The first sentiments with which Miranda had inspired the Marquis, were very indelicate; the heart had but very little share therein, and it was just no more than the liking which draws us towards an object we find amiable, that had thus far actuated him. He wanted employment, and he imagined he should find an amusement to fill up the vacant hours of so long a stay in the country, and being naturally of an indolent disposition, he had looked on this as a charming intrigue, in which he reckoned money would defray the charges, save him from a thousand little anxieties, and deliver him from that resistance which the sex usually make as a prelude to the favours they grant.

But his sentiments were now quite changed, the esteem which he conceived for the farmer's young daughter, had quite refined them; the heart spoke: what spirit, what greatness of soul, and what virtue, said he to himself, is there in returning to her! She is not insensible, and I may hope to be able to communicate my sentiments to her; this I am assured by the last words she spoke, and more still by that lovely frankness of her's: "You have done me service in letting me know your way of thinking." Is not this telling me her heart is for me?

He was possessed with this sweet reverie a long while; and he represented to himself his own happiness, sometimes as an object near at hand, and at other times, as afar off, but always as a thing incontestible. He imagined that a woman, whose heart is affected for one person, does not hold out long against him, if he knew how to improve his advantage.

The night passed, and the marquis was preparing to return to Miranda, when he received a letter from LeCheyne, acquainting him that his daughter, having earnestly importuned him to reconduct her to the convent, he could not refuse her that favour; but as soon as he returned he would be sure to wait on him to receive his commands.

What news was this to a man who believed himself already happy! can I, said he to himself, see the lovely object? Will permission be granted me for that purpose? Thus he passed a very uneasy day, when towards evening the farmer arrived, and by the manner in which he talked of his daughter, the marquis was confirmed in the fears he was under, that she had complied to her father of him.

The marquis was near eight days before he durst venture to go near the convent, but at length, he took horse and arrived there: he called for Miranda in her father's name, who soon appeared in the parlour, into which he had been introduced just before. She shewed great surprize at the sight of de P——, and was even upon the point of withdrawing out of the room. He read her intention in her eyes.

Pray, madam, says he to her, stay, nor fly a lover who had no need of your putting up bars to keep him within the bounds of that respect which is due to you from him. If I could be so unhappy as to disoblige you, I am come to offer you a penitent criminal, and to submit to whatever penalty you shall be pleased to inflict; he will reckon himself happy, if you will but permit him to see you sometimes, which is the only recompence that the most tender passion demands. Will you refuse me this?

I do not know as to that, answered she, and considering in what manner you have treated me, I cannot refer it to you what I ought to do; otherwise I would have put it to yourself, whether the noise your visits would be very likely to make, might not prove injurious to my reputation.

I would have followed your advice some time ago, but what appearance is there I should trust to it after?—Yes, fair Miranda, returned the Marquis briskly, you may very safely; your sentiments are too respectable, but that I must answer the confidence you repose in me as I ought. I shall see you then as seldom as possible in public. Yet how dear will this reserve cost me! But what is it that I shall scruple to do, in order to save a reputation, upon which depends all my happiness? And you will still persist inflexible to my love?

Take, says she to him, thorough cognizance of me, and see yourself what you may expect, by that which I have already been capable of doing, and by what I am going to declare to you.

From the first moment I saw you, I cannot tell what has passed within my breast. I have always wished to see you again, and felt uneasiness in your absence. In short, added she with a blush, my heart has spoke a language to me in your behalf, to which I was quite a stranger before I knew you.

The Marquis, all in raptures, returned the fair his thanks for this open declaration, and pronounced himself the happiest man alive. I wish, replied she, that may be so; but in loving you I was able to fly from you, I find that I have resolution enough still left, never to see you any more, if you fail of that decorum and reserve which I require of you. De P—, after assuring her, that she had nothing to fear on that score, told her all that could inspire her with the most lively and tender passion, and at length took his leave and withdrew.

While upon the road, he reflected upon the emotions of his own heart, and the effects which they might produce, and trembled when he considered how far this passion might carry him.

Miranda, said he to himself, is a woman of spirit, and virtue too, or she affects to have enough of it, to be able to deprive me of all hope of being happy; I love her, and I can do any thing.

He was wholly taken up with these thoughts till he came to his country seat, when such reflections flowed in to his assistance, as determined him to see her no more. However, his reason, in pointing out to him what he had to fear from such a resolution, did not leave him strength enough to get the better of his passion.

He continued some days without going to see Miranda; he quitted the country for a while, but absence only inflamed his love. He returned again fully resolved to conquer, whatever was the cost, the inflexibility of the fair one. Accordingly he repaired to the convent, and used all the arts he was master of, to prevail upon her to return to her father's, but she still persisted obstinate.

I don't at all fear you, said she; and I don't know, if I ought not to be apprehensive of fear myself; let me live in peace; nothing can make me change my resolution; you love me, and I have avowed to you that I love you, what would you have more? Let us then live satisfied with this friendship; you may see me here the same as at my Father's; and if it be true, that you have an esteem for me, you can desire no more of me.

What would be the case, were I to quit the convent? What, do you think I am capable of such weakness, and that I am tired with opposition? It is you that have forced me to retire hither. To what dangers shall I expose myself, if I return home? I should see you every moment, you would importune me; I should perhaps yield; reflection would afterwards raise horror in my breast against you; I should hate you, and could no longer see a man, whose presence would be an eternal reproach to me. I will go farther, suppose I should soon be lost to all sense of shame, then you would ruin me with the same earnestness which you now affect to show in finding me out. I should all my life have cause to condemn myself for a crime, and moreover, I should have the mortification of seeing myself despised.

You are a man of honour, added she. I appeal to yourself upon this head, whether these are monstrous chimeras which I raise to myself without any manner of occasion, and whether one of these three things, just now mentioned, would not be the case.

No, charming Miranda, answered the Marquis; and to shew you how far my tenderness is founded on sincerity, do but consent to make me happy, and I fly this moment to ask your Father's approbation. Will you have any scruple to take me for a husband?

Miranda paused for some time without making an answer, she appeared all in a flutter and confusion, but, resuming soon the thread of her discourse, No, says she, I will not consent to it, and this would be ill requiting the sentiments you entertain of me, should I accept a proposal which your passion alone induces you to make.

This passion will not always last, I know what you are, and what I am myself, without birth, and without fortune; you will quickly repent of having given me your hand, and in that case, I should be the most wretched woman upon earth. Baniish, returned de P—, such fears, they do but wrong me; I love you, and you flatter me with some kind of return, so that we must needs be happy together. An illustrious birth, and an ample fortune do not constitute happiness; such blessings as these are extrinsic to man; you have advantages that peculiarly belong to yourself, and which I value infinitely more; your virtue and your beauty are true blessings, and this is a more real merit, than that which is commonly tacked by the world to birth, where fortune is the sole arbitress.

You are quite blinded, says Miranda to him, by your love; reflect, Sir, not for the present moment, but for the remainder of your life. This beauty which you account so much, and extol so highly above what it really is, is a blessing of a short duration; the least accident in life can strip me of it, and even without that, years will anon bring it to decay. When the external figure of my body ceases any more to be pleasing, you will abate a good deal of the opinion you had conceived of my understanding; you will bring it down to its true value, that is, to a mere trifle. It requires not great attention to see, that very often the fine shape of a woman solely adds weight to what she says, and which would be looked upon as nothing in any other mouth. The time will come when this shall be my case.

With regard to my character, it is impossible for you to know it thoroughly; two months of marriage might perhaps discover to you in it, such oddities, as might throw you into the gulph of despair. No, I repeat it to you again, I will never consent to see you miserable. Let us know each other, and love each other; I shall have no reason to reproach myself with the knowledge of your worth, and I will let my heart follow its own inclinations; so that this is all I can do for you, and be persuaded, that if I loved you less, I would not have refused your offer.

The Marquis, in his going to see Miranda, had not absolutely a mind to take her to wife; but the obstinate resistance he met with at last determined him. He did all he could to persuade her, but it was to no purpose. In fine, he told her, that he would go and obtain her at her father's hands. If you prevail with him, says she, to second your wishes, I do not hesitate one minute longer, here I take on the veil. I chuse rather to sacrifice myself, than to expose you to certain remorse, which would disturb the ease of your life, and lay me open to all those chagrins and anxious reflections which would constantly attend me, and which I could never shake off.

De P— withdrew more enamoured than ever, and communicated his thoughts to the Father. Le Cheyne, struck with surprize, flew immediately to his daughter, whom he pressed in the most urgent manner, to comply with her lover's solicitations; but she gave him the same answer as she had already given the Marquis. In short, as to the intention of taking her from the convent, she protested, that if they committed the least violence upon her inclinations, she would take the vows.

The Marquis returned to see Miranda, complained to her, and accused her of having but very little affection for him. But, she still answered him, that if she had loved less, her conduct would have been quite different. De P—, when he saw that nothing could conquer her obstinacy, took his leave, and set out to return to Paris. He imagined that he might lose the very idea of his love, in the midst of pleasures; but this proved a vain remedy; his passion was too strong, he returned to his estate in the country, from whence he flew to the convent more enamoured than ever. Miranda still continued in the same mind, yet she was glad to see her lover again, who being deeply affected at her inflexible perseverance, fell dangerously ill; she was sorry to hear the state the Marquis lay in, but her father at length got her to quit the convent; she went to see de P—, was affected at his indisposition, and at last, came to get the better of her delicacy; upon which the Marquis quickly recovered, and Hymen crowned both these tender lovers.

Now the Marquis de P— is the happiest man alive; he still finds in Miranda a tender-hearted and delicate female, who knows her province is, a refined friend, endearing spouse, and one who gives him no other uneasiness, than that of being able to flatter himself, he still deserves her.

A Love Letter of a peculiar and serious Cast; written in the younger Part of Dean Swift's Life, before his Vices were more limited, and his Ambition less boundless, than both appeared not long afterwards to be.

To Mrs. ———

Madam,

Dublin, May 5, 1700.

I AM extremely concerned at the account you give of your health; for my uncle told me he found you, in appearance, better than you had been in some years, and I was in hopes you had still continued so. God forbid I should ever be the occasion of creating more troubles to you, as you seem to intimate! The letter you desired me to answer I have frequently read, and thought I had replied to every part of it that required; however, since you are pleased to repeat those particulars wherein you desire satisfaction, I shall endeavour to give it you as well as I am able. You would know what gave my temper that sudden turn, as to alter the style of my letters since I last came over. If there has been that alteration you observe, I have told you the cause abundance of times. I had used a thousand endeavours and arguments, to get you from the company and place you are in; both on the account of your health and humour, which I thought were like to suffer very much in such an air, and before such examples. All I had in answer from you, was nothing but a great deal of arguing, and sometimes in a style so very imperious, as I thought might have been spared, when I reflected how much you had been in the wrong. The other thing you would know is, whether this change of style be owing to the thoughts of a new mistress? I declare, upon the word of a christian and a gentleman, it is not; neither had I ever thoughts of being married to any other person but yourself. I had ever an opinion that you had a great sweetness of nature and humour; and whatever appeared to the contrary, I looked upon it only as a thing put on as necessary before a lover: but I have since observed in abundance of your letters such marks of a severe indifference, that I began to think it was hardly possible for one of my few good qualities to please you. I never knew any so hard to be worked upon, even in matters where the interest and concern are entirely your own; all which, I say, passed easily while we were in the state of formalities and ceremony; but, since that, there is no other way for accounting for this untractable behaviour in you, but by imputing it to a want of common esteem and friendship for me.

When I desired an account of your fortune, I had no such design as you pretend to imagine. I have told you many a time, that in England it was in the power of any young fellow of common sense to get a larger fortune than ever you pretended to: I asked, in order to consider whether it were sufficient, with the help of my poor income, to make one of your humour easy in a married state. I think it comes to almost a hundred pounds a year; and I think, at the same time, that no young woman in the world of the same income would dwindle away their health and life in such a sink, and among such family conversation: neither have all your letters been once able to persuade that you have the least value for me, because you so little regarded what I so often said upon that matter. The dismal account you say I have given you of my livings I can assure you to be a true one; and, since it is a dismal one even in your own opinion, you can best draw consequences from it. The place where Dr. Bolton lived is upon a living which he keeps with the deanry; but the place of residence for that they have given me is within a mile of a town called Trim, twenty miles from hence; and there is no other way, but to hire a house at Trim, or build one on the spot: the first is hardly to be done, and the other I am too poor to perform at present. For coming down to Belfast, it is what I cannot yet think of, my attendance is so close, and so much required of me; but our government sits very loose, and I believe will change in a few months; whether our part will partake in the change, I know not, though I am very apt to believe it; and then I shall be at leisure for a short journey. But I hope your other friends, more powerful than I, will before that time persuade you from the place where you are. I desire my service to your mother, in return for her remembrance; but for any other dealings that way, I entreat your pardon; and I think I have more cause to resent your desires of me in that case, than you have to be angry at my refusals. If you like such company and conduct, much good do you with them! My education has been otherwise. My uncle Adam asked me one day in private, as by direction, what my designs were in relation to you, because it might be a hindrance hindrance to you if I did not proceed. The answer I gave him (which I suppose he has sent you) was to this effect: "That I hoped I was no hindrance to you; because the reason you urged against an union with me was drawn from your indisposition, which still continued; that you also thought my fortune not sufficient, which is neither at present in a condition to offer you; that if your health and fortune were as they ought, I would prefer you above all your sex: but that, in the present condition of both, I thought it was against your opinion, and would certainly make you unhappy; that, had you any other offers which your friends or yourself thought more to your advantage, I should think I were very unjust to be an obstacle in your way."

Now for what concerns my fortune, you have answered it. I desire, therefore, you will let me know if your health be otherwise than it was when you told me the doctors advised you against marriage, as what would certainly hazard your life. Are they or you grown of another opinion in this particular? are you in a condition to manage domestic affairs, with an income of less (perhaps) than three hundred pounds a year? have you such an inclination to my person and humour, as to comply with my desires and way of living, and endeavour to make us both as happy as you can? will you be of your mind, so as to make us entertaining company for each other, without being miserable when we are neither visiting or visited? can you bend your love and esteem and indifference to others the same way as I do mine? shall I have so much power in your heart, or you so much government of your passions, as to grow in good humour upon my approach, though provoked by a —? have you so much good nature as to endeavour by soft words to smooth any rugged humour occasioned by the cross accidents of life? shall the place wherever your husband is thrown be more welcome than courts and cities without him? In short, these are some of the necessary methods to please men who, like me, are deep read in the world; and to a person thus made, I should be proud in giving all due returns towards making her happy. These are the questions I have always resolved to propose to her with whom I meant to pass my life; and whenever you can heartily answer them in the affirmative, I shall be blessed to have you in my arms, without regarding whether your person be beautiful, or your fortune large. Cleanliness in the first, and competency in the other, is all I look for. I desire, indeed, a plentiful revenue, but would rather it should be of my own, though I should bear from a wife to be reproached for the greatest.

I have said all I can possibly say in answer to any part of your letter, and in telling you my clear opinion as to matters between us. I singled you out first from the rest of women; and I expect not to be used like a common lover. When you think fit to send me an answer to this, without —, I shall then approve myself, by all means you shall command, Madam,

Your most faithful humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

S I R,

THE following extraordinary account I find related in an extract of the Reverend Mr. John Wesley's Journal; but as many of the circumstances (for I suppose him capable of preserving the memory of so unsupported a story) exceed the common lengths of credulity, I did at least look to find it delivered in terms of doubt and suspicion as he must needs think were justly due to it: this not being the case, I take the liberty of sending the same, which I have copied verbatim, to you, Sir, to be inserted in your useful magazine; if haply by that means it may obtain a more particular confirmation, and thence deserve better credit with,

Sir, yours, &c.

An Occasional Correspondent.

"Tuesday 12. Before I left Newcastle I heard a strange relation which I knew not what to think of. I then desired T. Lee, who was going to the place, to enquire particularly concerning it. He did so, and in consequence of that enquiry, wrote me the following account:

"R—— J—— lived about twelve miles from Newcastle. His son some time since married without his consent. At this he was so enraged, that he wished his 'right arm might burn off if ever he gave or left him a sixpence.'

"* However, in March last, being taken ill, he made his will, and left him all his estate. The same evening he died. On Thursday 10, his widow laying her hand on his back, found it warm. In the evening, those who were with him went into the next room to take a little refreshment. As they were eating, they observed a disagreeable smell, but could find nothing in the room to cause it. Returning into the room where the corpse lay, they found it full of smoke. Removing the sheet which covered the corpse,

they saw (to their no small amazement) the body so burnt, that the entrails were bare, and might be seen through the ribs. His right arm was nearly burnt off, his head so burnt, that his brains appeared, and a smoke came out of the crown of his head like the steam of boiling water. When they cast water on his body it hissed just as if cast on red-hot iron, yet the sheet which was upon him, was not singed, but that under him, with the pillow-bier and pillow, and the plank on which the body lay were all burned, and looked as black as charcoal.

“They hastened to put what was left of him into the coffin, leaving some to watch by it; but after it was nailed up, a noise of burning and crackling was heard therein. None was permitted to look into it till it was carried to Abchester churchyard. It was buried near the steeple. As soon as it was carried to the grave the steeple was observed to shake. The people hastened away, and well they did, for presently part of the steeple fell; so that had they stayed two minutes longer, they must have been crushed to pieces. All these were related to me and my wife by those who were eye and ear witnesses.” Thus far the history.

If this account is not too like an imitation of those Pagan priests who forged their Ancilia to secure their sacred shield which fell from heaven, or can be incontestibly proved, what solution will philosophers find out to enable them to own the miracle without shuddering?

Anecdotes of an extraordinary Character.

THE Abbe de Nateville was born in Franche Comte the beginning of the present century: He was a man of lively imagination and warm passions.—Hearing one day a sermon on the fire of Hell, he was instantly seized with the terror of damnation. In order to mortify his unruly passions, he became a Capuchin Friar. But, finding no sufficient mortification in this order, he entered into that of the Carthusians. There he passed three or four years in a very edifying manner; but, not being able to drive from his memory the pleasures of the world, he settled in the opinion, that to live in the world would be no obstacle to his salvation. Having laid a plan for his escape, he was seized by the Prior in attempting to scale the wall. To disengage himself, he pulled out his knife, and laid the Prior dead at his feet. In the inn where he lodged that night, he had a quarrel with a young French officer: They went to the field in the morning, and the officer was killed. Nateville inclining to enlist in the troops of the King of Spain, his master obtained letters of recommendation to several gentlemen in Madrid. At Perpignan, where he stopped some days, he debauched the daughter of his landlord, promising to marry her as soon as he should be in office.—While he was soliciting employment at Madrid, he quarrelled with a Cavalier in the street: They fought by moonlight: The Cavalier was killed; and, being found to be the son of a Grandee, our adventurer retired to a village where there was a nunnery, to the Abbess of which he had letters of recommendation. He told her his adventure, and suggested to her the necessity of hiding till the matter should be forgot. The Abbess received him with great civility, and permitted him to converse with the nuns at the grate. He fell in love with one of the nuns, young and handsome, who had been thrust into the nunnery against her inclination. It was not difficult to gain her heart; and they made a shift to meet sometimes without being obstructed by the grate. The intrigue being discovered, he was bitterly reproached by the Abbess for his ingratitude. He shed many tears, and appeared to be a sincere penitent. Her advice was, that he should slip off privately; and she even gave him money for his journey. He wrote to his nun, with an offer to marry her; she made her escape, and flew to his arms. They got to Lisbon without being discovered, where they found a ship ready to set sail for Smyrna. He sold his horse, bought some merchant goods, and agreed with the captain for his passage. The captain treated him with great civility, chiefly on the lady's account, who touched his heart. She appeared so fond of her husband, that he lost all hopes; but he esteemed her the more on that account.

Having landed at Smyrna, Nateville was warmly recommended by the captain to his acquaintance. In this city the lady fell ill and died, leaving her husband inconsolable. He set out for Constantinople, procured a commission in the troops of the Grand Seigneur, and, by his vigilance, activity, and insinuation, became the chief favourite of the Aga, his captain, who persuaded him to turn Mahometan, as a sure road to preferment. He was warmly recommended by the Aga, and by his means obtained a considerable post in the army. His appointment enabled him to purchase five or six female slaves, with whom he lived much at his ease. After passing seventeen or eighteen years in this indolent sort of life, his patron was disgraced and turned out of office. Nateville found it necessary to take new measures; resolving to leave a country where he had no longer any protection or hope of preferment. He wrote a letter to the Pope, signifying, that he was stung with remorse of conscience; and that, with permission of his holiness, he was resolved to return to his own country, and die a good Christian. Another letter he wrote to the King of Spain, demanding an employment that would yield him eighteen thousand livres yearly, the same he enjoyed among the Turks. At the same time he wrote to the Emperor's general in Hungary, that, upon obtaining a favourable response from the Pope and the King of Spain, he would betray into the general's hands four thousand Turks, who were under his command. The Emperor at that time being at war with the Grand Seignior, gladly embraced Nateville's offer, and obtained for him all he demanded.—Nateville returned to Franche Comte, the place of his nativity, where he passed most of his time in hunting and destroying noxious animals. He was fond of good cheer; but bestowed in charity all he could spare from living. He settled pensions on two surgeons for taking care of the poor. He entertained two school-masters for educating the poor boys and girls in the neighbourhood; and he gave a pension to an advocate for assisting him in accommodating differences among his neighbours. He was both severe and sudden in his punishments; otherwise easy in his temper; a good neighbour, just and benevolent. It is reported that he died in firm hopes of Paradise, being persuaded that his sincere penitence would procure him God's pardon to his crimes.

A Discourse recommending the Study of Mechanics, with Mechanical Demonstrations of two well known Problems.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

S I R,

IF you think the following essay worth inserting in this month's Magazine, you must be at the expence of engraving the enclosed figures to illustrate it. Though it is a subject that will afford but little entertainment to great numbers of your readers, yet the few to whom it may be acceptable will be the more your debtors. I am informed that a learned Fellow of our University now makes mechanics his study, which gives me hopes, that it may become more fashionable than it has hitherto been reckoned; if it was considered that the other arts can never flourish but in conjunction with the mechanic one, I am persuaded they would not be neglected as they are. I am, Sir,

Your well-wisher and constant reader,

Dublin, Aug. PHILOMECHANICUS.

IT seems to be the peculiar misfortune of this nation, that while the politer arts and sciences are cultivated with application and success, that the more necessary, tho' less elegant, arts are not only neglected but despised; and any thing that either bears the name, or any analogy to mechanics, is shunned as a pestilential disease, which would contaminate the Gentleman or the Scholar; insomuch, that men of sense and erudition, who would willingly contribute to the improvement of their country, are, for the want of some mechanical knowledge, deterred from it, as they are apprehensive of becoming the dupes of every ignorant pretender, of which they must not live in Ireland if they have not known examples.

But I think I hear some gentleman, who can trace his genealogy from kings, thus express himself:—So! here is a fellow that would have me sit down to disgrace my lineage by studying the properties of screws, levers, and pulleys, when the machine of state is the only one which deserves my attention, or is fitted to my rank and genius!—It may be so, and therefore let him pursue it in God's name: but let him not attempt to build a house, a mill, or a bridge; lay out a road, or cut a canal, for if he does, he runs a great risque of being buried under their ruins, breaking his neck, or drowning himself;—I mean his purse runs those risques, which as the world now goes, is much the same thing. Let us oppose to this man, one who along with those branches of learning, which in modern phrase are termed polite, has made it his study to turn natural philosophy and mathematics to their true use, of ornamenting his country, and putting it in the power of his countrymen to provide with greater ease, all the conveniencies of life, and thereby adding to their happiness, and securing to future ages, a sure resource of riches; because a domestic one, that cannot be wrested from them but with their lives and liberties!

Who can be ignorant that I here allude to his Grace of Bridgewater? whose memory will be recorded, when the name of our would-be Premier shall be sunk in oblivion.

It is well known that a fatal prejudice against mechanic trades, has got a fast hold of the majority of my countrymen; but with pleasure I observe, that it is beginning to give way to a more just way of thinking. It may not be unentertaining to trace this peculiarity in us to its original: For this we must recur to that period of Irish History, when almost every county in the island had its king, its court, and its own species of government. Many of a trade, (especially when thus pent up together,) can never agree; perpetual wars and dissensions were unavoidable; mens thoughts were entirely engaged by what was necessary for their defence, and thus personal courage and military skill became the most desirable acquisitions: gallantry is their constant concomitant, and poetry was sometimes protected and encouraged, because it was found a fit instrument to varnish the crimes, by exaggerating the virtues and exploits of the most successful spoiler; and in the more covert war against the fair sex, it has always been a powerful auxiliary. Thus we see industry was then useless; and when we became subjected to a people who had begun to know its utility, and to practise it, we to a hatred of the men joined that of their manners, and prided ourselves upon the very thing that made us their inferiors. And so deep root has this prejudice taken, that it is no uncommon thing even at this day, to hear persons who have no visible way of supporting a grown up family—say—God forbid that they should be the first to demean their family, by making their child work for his bread! no! no! though I can't do for my son as I could wish, yet he has relations who will not see him want! which is just the same as to say with the old song, that

I shall now point out some of the bad consequences of this national antipathy to the manual arts.

First, It prevents improvements in agriculture, whereby we are disabled from entering into a competition with other nations at foreign markets.

Secondly, It has kept us far behind our neighbours in manufactures, and only for the bad policy of some of them, we never should have had that one to boast of, which is now our principal support.

Thirdly, Whenever any work of ingenuity is to be done, it lays us under the necessity of employing foreigners to conduct it; on which last head I shall enlarge a little, by shewing the different consequences of having natives qualified to conduct works of use or ingenuity, and of being under the necessity of employing strangers.

1st, A native will not think himself wiser than all the rest of his countrymen.

A foreigner will think he is superior to them all, otherwise they had no need to employ him.

2dly, A native will make no mystery of any thing he knows.

But it is the interest of a stranger to do so.

3dly, A native will be contented with a reasonable compensation for his labour.

A foreigner who comes abroad with the view of making a fortune, will not.

4thly, We may have some knowledge of the character and abilities of a native.

Recommendations (how procured we can't tell) is all we have to guide us in respect of foreigners.

I believe these remarks will not be controverted, and yet I am constrained to acknowledge, that, notwithstanding their force, it is often found necessary to employ strangers, but that they could be rendered unnecessary, I am inclined to believe, and shall endeavour to point out the means; which I believe would be attained by a school, with persons qualified to give lectures on the subject, whereto every person who had served a regular apprenticeship to some trade, or had studied natural philosophy and the mathematicks, should be admitted on producing their qualifications.

That a fund should be appropriated to assist the pupils to make experiments, or models, in case the professors shall have reason to think them practicable, and that if successful, the model, and an account of the experiment to be lodged in apartments provided for that purpose.

These are the fundamentals of the plan, which I suppose will not be deemed chimerical, even by those who never soar above precedent, if they will take the trouble of turning over Sully's Memoirs, where they will find that Henry the IVth's untimely end prevented this very plan from being carried into execution.

One necessary qualification in the mechanical professor would be, never to demonstrate mathematically while he could do it mechanically, that he might be more generally understood; for a great many things, of which the mathematical demonstrations are quite unintelligible, except to an adept in the science, might be made very plain and satisfactory to any person, by a mechanical demonstration.

Of this I shall endeavour to give an instance, in demonstrating two well known problems.

First, To find the superficies of a circle, multiply Count de St.

The Marshall & Son

multiply half the diameter by half the circumference. The truth of this rule may be thus demonstrated.

Suppose this circle to consist of a number of rings, A B C D E, as represented in the plate; then suppose these rings cut at one side, as from A to E, and extended to their greatest length, as at A B C D E, they will form the triangle A G F H, whose perpendicular A F is equal to half the diameter, and whose base H G is equal to the circumference of the circle.

Now the rule for finding the superficial content of each; a triangle being to multiply the perpendicular by half the base: If the one is right, so must the other; and that this last is right may be demonstrated thus: Suppose the triangle A H G divided into two, at A F, and the oblique parts of the one joined to the oblique parts of the other, as A J H, they will compose a quadrangle A J H F, two of whose sides shall be equal to the semi-diameter of the circle, or perpendicular of the triangle, the other two being equal to half the circumference of the circle and half the base of the triangle, as is evident upon inspection, and as the most ignorant and illiterate would be at no loss for a rule, whereby to measure a right angled quadrangle. Further demonstration would serve rather to obscure than explain.

I now ask, whether these demonstrations may not be clearly comprehended by any person, whether he has been taught the mathematics or not? and whether the mathematical demonstrations of the same problems would have that advantage?

PHILOMECHANICUS.

Histories of a Tete-a-Tete annexed: or, Memoirs of Count de B—— and the Vainx-ball Syren.

WE have not for a considerable time ushered into the company of our readers any of the diplomatic body; but the nobleman with whose memoirs we are now going to present the public, justly merits their attention. Born of an illustrious family, in Germany, he, however, does not derive so much honour from his descent as his own personal merit. Possessing talents that would adorn the most elevated station, he has cultivated them as the scholar, the philosopher, and the gentleman; and he has blended these characters so happily, as to do honour to the great potentate whom he represents.

He has travelled through most parts of Europe, and visited the different great courts, where he has always met with the most gracious reception. At Berlin he was highly caressed by the Prussian monarch, who was happy to find in a nobleman of his rank so many eminent qualities. At Turin the king of Sardinia did not entertain a less favourable opinion of him, being frequently of his private parties, and they were sometimes in conversation together tete-a-tete for hours. After the opinions of two such judicious princes, in behalf of the count's superior understanding, the reader cannot dispute his claim to uncommon merit.

As a traveller of genius, he failed not to make make his observations upon the customs, manners, polity, intrigues and dispositions of the different courts he visited. From these accurate remarks he became perfectly acquainted with the interests of princes and the views of their ministers; in a word, no man was better qualified to fill one of the highest ranks in the diplomatic body.

But although the count thus advantageously employed the greatest part of his time during the course of his travels, he was not such a cynic as to be destitute of a taste for pleasure and social enjoyment, and the ladies in particular ingrossed no small share of his attention. At Venice he entered into the true spirit of the carnival, and the charms of the beautiful Venetians were not lost upon him.—Being of an amorous complexion, he had now an opportunity of revelling at large among variegated delight. An adventure he had with a noble Venetian's lady had nearly proved fatal. The consequence of detection was a challenge; but the point of honour being settled with the point of the sword, and a trifling wound his antagonist received, he got through this business very luckily. When at Paris he found such vivacity, and beauty, among the fair Parisians, that he was not proof against the attacks of their charms. His first amour in this capital did not however rise higher than a figurante at the opera; but his visits were soon discontinued, upon finding that her fingers were as nimble as her tongue. In one of their amorous conversations the count missed his gold repeating watch: he was surprised, but did not suspect his Thais, as it must be acknowledged the filles de joye above the common sort are generally very honest; but all rules have exceptions, and to his great astonishment, by some accident, the watch chimed in her pocket. She was greatly confused, the count recovered his watch, but never after went into her company.

This circumstance gave our hero a very unfavourable opinion of the French ladies of easy virtue, whose favours could be purchased; and he resolved to soar higher for the future in his intrigues. An opportunity soon presented itself of his becoming upon a very good footing with a certain amorous countess at the court of Versailles, who is said to have had as many chers-amis as there are days in the year. She was a fine woman, and much caressed by the nobility, nevertheless he found her an easy conquest, and her husband by no means jealous. Some weeks passed before he discovered that the consequence of this intrigue would compel him to make a trip to Montpellier for the recovery of his health; the serenity of the air of that place being pronounced by the faculty very salutary for love-sick swains.

A few weeks restored him to his pristine vigour, and he soon forgot the too charming countess, who had given him so much pain. Being now in the south of France, he resolved to pay a visit to that great genius Voltaire, whose works he had read with admiration, and whose conversation he longed to enjoy. The philosopher received him with great hospitality and politeness at Ferney, and the count remained here some days as if he had been in Elysium—for nothing can be a greater treat to a man of letters, than to meet with another of professed erudition.

The Count having intimated to him that he believed he should soon go over to England in a public character, Voltaire took an opportunity of drawing a picture of this country in very unfavourable colours. He represented the lower class to be little better than savages, frequently boxing upon the most trivial occasions, sometimes for wagers, and sometimes for amusement, when one of the combatants was frequently left dead, or speechless, upon the spot: that there was one day in the year they consecrated to the torture of poor innocent fowls; that scarce an hour passed without their enticing two dogs to devour one another; that in their eating they were cannibals, gorging themselves with raw meat in amazing quantities; and that in their manners, especially to foreigners, they were scarce superior to the brute creation. Such a description, added to an account of our boasted but imaginary liberty; the futility and inconsistency of our laws, with the caricature portraits of some of our first nobility, so alarmed the Count, that he almost resolved to supplicate his master, to dispense with his services in such a barbarous region, where he thought his knowledge, politeness, and address, would be no recommendation to him. However, meeting soon after with an impartial foreigner, who had resided some time in England, he so far disabused him with respect to this unfavourable idea of us, which Voltaire had endeavoured to make the Count imbibe, that he altered his opinion, and accepted the honour of representing one of the greatest monarchs in Europe at this court, where he was soon convinced of the fallacy of the bard's colouring, and the exaggeration of his satire.

The count, who is greatly esteemed by his master, resolved, upon his arrival here, to exert his abilities not to appear unworthy of being his representative, and he accordingly soon ingratiated himself with all the foreign ministers, was caressed by the English nobility, and graciously received at court. So far from our customs and manners displeasing him, he greatly admired them: our diversions were far beyond any he had met with in Europe, and he became a constant frequenter of Ranelagh and Vauxhall, the Pantheon, Cornely's, the Opera, the Play-houses, and in fine every public and private entertainment.

In the course of these agreeable pursuits the ladies could not fail attracting his attention. He was soon introduced to lady H—, who has laid it down as a rule to be the first happy female with all foreign princes and ministers, on their arrival here. She accordingly made him such overtures as a man of far less discernment than the Count could not possibly mistake, and she thought herself imperially happy with his excellency. Our hero, though he considered her ladyship as a very fine woman, like the Venus de Medicis, she was by time somewhat decayed, and her repairs were too visible not to be distinguished from the original model.

Resolved to unite youth with beauty he repaired to the several nunneries about St. James's, and desirous of contracting his late Messalina in point of age, the mother abbesses were instructed to provide for him the youngest tits they could find. From twelve to fourteen was the extent of his order, and some innocent girls have reason to lament the arrival of the count in this kingdom, or at least his first connexion with lady H—.

Several animadversions have lately appeared in print, and particularly in this Magazine, concerning the insolence of French servants, and we have now an opportunity of illustrating these strictures, with an anecdote of recent date. The count had a valet de chambre, a native of France, whom he thought a very good and trusty servant. His master had dressed one evening for a private concert, but one of the capital performers being taken suddenly ill, it was deferred, which made him and another nobleman change their plan of operations. It being Pantheon night, they agreed to go thither. They had scarce entered the rotunda before the Count perceived his valet tete-a-tete with the celebrated and beautiful Miss B—mf—d, dressed in one of his master's best suits of cloaths, and all the necessary accompaniments from the same wardrobe. Monsieur no sooner caught his master's eye than he sneaked off, leaving his dear dulcinea to take care of herself. It were needless to say that the Count, upon his return home, discharged his servant; but the sequel was very fortunate for Miss B—mf—d. Sir William M—er perceiving a disconsolate damsel deserted by her lover, immediately paid his respects to her; an agreeable and lively conversation ensued; he became enamoured with her, allows her a very handsome support, and it is believed has made her a very genteel settlement.

We now approach the time when the Vauxhall Syren made the first impression on the Count. It was in these very gardens, where being first captivated with her singing, he was ravished with her person. She possessed that je ne scai quoi which he never could withstand. Night after night he attended to hear, to see her, and dissolve in antedated extasy. At length, through the medium of a well known procureur, he obtained a meeting at the house of this venerable merchant of beauty.

This lady's origin we acknowledge ourselves ignorant of; but some time since a certain doctor in music, being pleased with her voice, and more with her person, took her for a pupil, and taught her as much music as was necessary to bring her upon the stage.—Her success there cannot be boasted of; however she got money, and the doctor spent it. A vacancy offering at Vauxhall, he gave her another dose of melody to fit her out for a voyage across the water. She was engaged, and here, as we have already mentioned, our hero beheld and heard her with extacy.

After the interview at Mrs. M—'s, we may suppose the count was too good a negociator not to ratify the Cyprian treaty. Nevertheless, he as eagerly as ever attends at Vauxhall, to be still more captivated, or at least fan his passion with the gentle zephyrs of the garden.

Bon Mot.

BARON B—, a celebrated gambler, well known by the name of the left-handed Baron, being detected some time ago at Bath secreting a card, the company in the warmth of their resentment, threw him out of the window of a one-pair-of-stairs-room, where they had been playing. The Baron meeting Foote some time after, was loudly complaining of this usage, and asked what he should do? "Do!" says the wit, "why it is a plain case, never play so high again as long as you live."

Reflections on Dramatic Performances.

IF the stage should be really what the generality of our polite writers tell us it ought to be, a school of agreeable morality, lity, it naturally follows that those plays are the best which afford us the most pleasing instruction, and that it is neither a strict adherence to the severity of critical discipline, nor a slavish imitation of the antients, which can possibly constitute the excellence of dramatic literature.

Nothing is more necessary for an author to consider, who means to exhibit his productions upon the stage, than the genius of the people before whom they are to be represented; different countries have their different manners, and on this simple account, it is utterly impossible ever to establish an universal criterion for dramatic excellence in writing. The cold declamations, for instance, which suit the taste of a French audience, would make an Englishman yawn at Drury-Lane house; and on the other hand, that force of fable, that strength of plot, and variety of business, which is requisite to entertain an English spectator, would be deemed impertinent or pantomimical, barbarous or unnatural, according as the piece happened to be comic or distressful, by the refining criticism of a Parisian theatre.

It is whimsical enough to hear our modern critics recommending the antients to our imitation, as the great fathers of the drama, when they themselves acknowledge, that even the best tragedy of Sophocles would be banished indignantly from our stage; not because it would want either the fire of exalted genius, or the spirit of animated poetry, but because it would want that redundancy of business, that complication of incident which alone can keep a British audience from manifesting a public disapprobation. A fine poem may be a very bad play; a fine play may be a very bad poem. Addison's Cato is the former; the versification is polished—the sentiments elevated—the characters marked—the manners consistent—and the conduct critical: yet with all these advantages, it languishes, most miserably in the exhibition. All our reverence for the author is necessary to restrain our disgust, and had not the political circumstances attending its original appearance, fortunately rendered it a favourite, no less with the Tories than the Whigs, we are confident it never could have survived a second representation.

Yet even admitting that Sophocles, and the various celebrated tragic writers of antiquity, abounded as much in incident, as they are notoriously deficient in that necessary article, there is one circumstance which would render them not only disagreeable but ridiculous on our stage; the classical reader must see we allude to the chorusses of these poets, which are always offensive to common sense, and constantly destroying every idea of probability. About fifteen years ago a sensible, satirical piece, entitled the Wishes, or Harlequin's Mouth opened, was performed in the summer season at Drury-Lane under the direction of Mr. Murphy and Mr. Foote. The author of this ingenious performance introduced an episode, which illustrates the present observation, relative to the great chorus very happily. The episode consisted of a mock tragedy, which was called Gunpowder Treason, and of which the supposed author, Mr. Distress, made Guy Faux, naturally enough, the hero. When Guy comes to that passage where he proposes to blow up the Parliament House, the Chorus exhorts him to reject so barbarous an enterprise, and made use of all the arguments which are obviously applicable in such a situation. Guy, however, continues immoveably fixed, and prepares to execute his horrid resolution. On which one of the spectators enquires, why the Chorus does not immediately send for a constable, and carry the villain before a justice of peace. Mr. Distress answers something to this effect,—"Poh, poh, that would be natural, and the Chorus is never to discover a secret."

When we see, therefore, that the best of the Grecian plays are so generally destitute of business, as to be mostly dramatic conversations, and when we see the chorus, the vehicle, through which the argumentative part of their plays is chiefly conveyed, is thus ridiculously fabricated, why are they eternally held up to us as objects of imitation! Are we to imitate what we know will be disapproved, or to copy an absurdity upon the authority of Sophocles, or Euripides? Are we to crowd our stage with chorusses, when the chief person in the drama, is perhaps talking, in a soliloquy, of something improper for a second ear? or to tell a number of humane people our design to commit a murder, without ever suffering their humanity to operate agreeably to the dictates of justice? In fact, highly as the Greek stage may be at present admired by the affectation of criticism, our own is upon a much better establishment. Whatever is repugnant to nature, is with us immediately condemned, and though we tolerate many scenes in favourite pieces, which are palpably unnatural, the beauties nevertheless must greatly exceed the imperfections to obtain so considerable an indulgence at our hands.

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

Containing the Lives of the most eminent Natives of Great-Britain and Ireland, in an Alphabetical Series. With a succinct Account of their Writings.

The Life of Queen Anne.

Anne, queen of Great-Britain, was the daughter of James duke of York, afterwards king James II. by Anne Hyde, eldest daughter of Edward earl of Clarendon. The duke was privately married to this lady during his first exile, in the year 1659. In 1660 she was, by an order of council, declared duchess of York, and to have the precedence of the princess of Orange and the queen of Bohemia. She had issue by the duke, four sons and four daughters. The princess Anne was born at St. James's palace, on the 6th of February, 1664. In the year 1669, she went into France for the recovery of her health, which having pretty well established, she returned to England. On the 28th of July, 1683, she was married to his royal highness prince George, brother to the king of Denmark, by whom she had several children, who died young. Upon the death of king William III. which happened the 8th of March, 1702, she was proclaimed queen of Great Britain, France and Ireland, in the cities of London and Westminster, and was crowned the 23d of April following. Immediately after her accession, she resolved to declare war against France, and communicated her intention to the house of commons, by whom it was approved; and war was proclaimed accordingly, on the 4th of May.

This declaration of war on the part of the English, was seconded by similar declarations by the Dutch and Germans, all on the same day.

A great part of the history of this reign, consists in battles fought upon the continent. These triumphs, it is true, are passed away, and nothing remains of them but the names of Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde, Malplaquet, &c. where the allied army obtained great, but with respect to England, useless victories.

The ministry of England understanding that the French were employed in equipping a strong squadron in Brest, sent out Sir Cloudesley Shovel, and Sir George Rooke, to watch their motions. Sir George, however, had farther orders to convoy a body of forces in transportships to Barcelona, upon which a fruitless attack was made by the prince of Hesse. Finding no hopes, therefore, from this expedition, in two days after the troops were reembarked, Sir George Rooke, joined by Sir Cloudesley, called a council of war on board the fleet, when they resolved to make an attempt upon Gibraltar, which was but slenderly provided with a garrison. Thither they failed, and on the 21st of July, 1704, the prince of Hesse landed on the isthmus with eighteen hundred marines: he then summoned the governor to surrender, but was answered, that the place would be defended to the last extremity. Next day the admiral gave orders for cannonading the town; and perceiving that the enemy were driven from their fortifications at the South Mole-head, commanded captain Whitaker to arm all the boats, and assault that quarter. The captains Hicks and Jumper, who happened to be nearest the Mole, immediately manned their boats, and entered the fortifications sword in hand. But they were premature; for the Spaniards sprung a mine, by which two lieutenants and about a hundred men were killed or wounded. Nevertheless, the two captains took possession of a platform, and kept their ground, until they were sustained by captain Whitaker and the rest of the seamen, who took by storm a redoubt between the Mole and the town. Then the governor capitulated, and the prince of Hesse entered the place, amazed at the success of the attempt, considering the strength of the fortifications. When the news of this conquest was brought to England, it was for some time in debate whether it was a capture worth thanking the admiral for. It was at last considered as unworthy public gratitude: and Sir George Rooke was soon displaced from his command, for having so essentially served his country. Gibraltar has ever since remained in the possession of the English, and continues of the utmost use in resisting that part of the navy destined to annoy an enemy, or protect our trade in the Mediterranean.

While the English were thus victorious by land and sea, a new scene of contention was opened on the side of Spain, where the ambition of the European princes exerted itself with the same fury that filled the rest of the continent. Philip the 4th, grandson to Lewis the 14th, had been placed on the throne of that kingdom, and had been received with the joyful concurrence of the greatest part of his subjects. He had also been nominated successor to the crown by the will of the late king of Spain. But in a former treaty among the powers of Europe, Charles, son of the emperor of Germany, was appointed heir to that crown; and this treaty had been guarantied by France herself, though she now resolved to reverse that consent in favour of a descendant of the house of Bourbon. Charles was still farther induced to put in for the Spanish crown by the invitation of the Catalonians, who declared in his favour, and by the assistance of the English and Portuguese, who promised to take arms in his cause. He was furnished with two hundred transports, thirty ships of war, and nine thousand men, for the conquest of that extensive empire. But the earl of Peterborough, a man of uncommon bravery, offered to conduct them; and his single service was deemed equivalent to armies. His first attempt upon landing in Spain was taking Barcelona, a strong city, provided with a garrison of five thousand men. These successes, however, were of short continuance; Peterborough being recalled, and the army under Charles being commanded by the earl of Galway. This nobleman having received intelligence, that the enemy, under the command of the duke of Berwick, were posted near the town of Almanza, he advanced thither on the 14th of April, 1707, to give them battle. The conflict began about two in the afternoon, and the whole front of each army was fully engaged. The center, consisting chiefly of battalions from Great-Britain and Holland, seemed at first victorious; but the Portuguese horse, by whom they were supported, betaking themselves to flight on the first charge, the English troops were surrounded and attacked on every side. In this emergency, they formed themselves into a square, and retired to an eminence; where, being ignorant of the country, and destitute of all supplies, they were obliged to surrender prisoners of war, to the number of ten thousand men. This victory was complete and decisive; and all Spain, except the province of Catalonia, returned to their duty to Philip their sovereign.

In the year 1708, major general Stanhope landed with three thousand men on the island of Minorca, and attacked Fort St. Philip, where the garrison which consisted of a thousand Spaniards, and six hundred French, surrendered in three days; the men were made prisoners of war, and the whole island conquered in three weeks. On the 28th of October, the same year, prince George of Denmark, her majesty's consort, died of an asthma and dropsy, with which he had been long afflicted. He was a prince of an amiable rather than a shining character, brave, good-natured, modest and humane, but devoid of great talents and ambition.

In January 1712, the conferences for peace began at Utrecht, under the conduct of Robinson, bishop of Bristol, lord privy seal, and the earl of Strafford, on the side of the English; of Buys and Vanderluffen on the part of the Dutch; of the marshal d' Uxelles, the abbot of Polignac, and Mr. Menager, in behalf of France. The ministers of the emperor and Savoy assisted at the conferences, and the other allies sent also plenipotentiaries, though not without reluctance. As England and France were the only two powers that were seriously inclined to peace, it may be supposed that all the other deputies served rather to retard than accelerate its progress. They met rather to start new difficulties, and widen the breach, than to quiet the dissensions of Europe. The English ministers therefore, finding multiplied obstructions from the deliberations of their allies, set on foot a private negotiation with France. They stipulated certain advantages for the subjects of Great Britain in a concerted plan of peace. They resolved to enter into such mutual confidence with the French, as would anticipate all clandestine transactions to the prejudice of the coalition. In the beginning of August, lord viscount Bolingbroke was sent to the court of Versailles, to remove all obstructions to the treaty between England and France. He was accompanied by Mr. Prior, and the abbe Gualtier, and treated with the most distinguished marks of respect. He was caressed by the French king and the marquis de Torcy, with whom he adjusted the principal interests of the duke of Savoy and the elector of Bavaria.

The ratifications of the treaty being exchanged, the peace was proclaimed on the 5th of May, 1713, to the inexpressible joy of the nation in general. By the treaty of peace, the French king obliged himself to abandon the pretender, acknowledge the queen's title and the protestant succession; to raise the fortifications of Dunkirk within a limited time, on condition of receiving an equivalent; to cede Newfoundland, Hudson's-Bay, and St. Christopher's topher's to England; but, the French were left in possession of cape Breton, and at liberty to dry their fish on Newfoundland. By the treaty of commerce a free trade was established, according to the tariff of the year 1664, except in some commodities that were subjected to new regulations in the year 1699. It was agreed, That no other duties should be imposed on the productions of France imported into England, than those that were laid on the same commodities from other countries; and, That commissaries should meet at London to adjust all matters relating to commerce: as for the tariff with Spain, it was not yet finished. It was stipulated, that the emperor should possess the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, and the Spanish Netherlands. That the duke of Savoy should enjoy Sicily, with the elector of Bavaria, as an indemnification for his losses: That the states general should restore Lisle and its dependencies: and, that Namur, Charleroy, Luxemburg, Ypres, and Newport, should be added to the other places which they already possessed in Flanders: That the king of Prussia should have Upper Guelder, in lieu of Orange and the other estates belonging to that family in Franche Comte. The king of Portugal was satisfied; and the first day of June was fixed for the emperor's acceding to these articles, as he had for some time obstinately refused to assist at the negociation. Thus Europe seemed to be formed into one great republic, the different members of which were cantoned out to different governors, and the ambition of any one state, amenable to the tribunal of all.

In 1706 the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland took place.

On the 29th of July, 1714, the queen was taken dangerously ill with a great heaviness and acute pains in her head; whereupon her physicians were consulted, and she was cupped; which gave her some present ease. But her indisposition returned, and she was seized with a fit of apoplexy: she continued to doze in a lethargic insensibility, with very short intervals, till the first of August in the morning, when she expired, in the fiftieth year of her age, and the thirteenth of her reign. Queen Anne was in her person of the middle size, and well proportioned. Her hair was of a dark brown colour, her complexion ruddy, her features were strong and regular, her countenance was rather round than oval, and her aspect more comely than majestic. She had a very good ear for music, and performed on the guitar. Her voice was clear and melodious, which particularly appeared in the graceful delivery of her speeches to the parliament. Her capacity was naturally good, but not much cultivated by learning; nor did she exhibit any marks of extraordinary genius, or personal ambition. She was certainly deficient in that vigour of mind by which a prince ought to preserve his independence, and avoid the snares and setters of sycophants and favourites: but, whatever her weakness in this particular might have been, the virtues of her heart were never called in question. She was a pattern of conjugal affection and fidelity, a tender mother, a warm friend, a munificent patron, a mild and merciful princeess, during whose reign no subject's blood was shed for treason. She was zealously attached to the church of England, unaffectedly pious, just, charitable, and compassionate. She felt a mother's fondness for her people, by whom she was universally beloved with a warmth of affection which even the prejudice of party could not abate. In a word, if she was not the greatest, she was certainly one of the best and most unblemished sovereigns that ever sat on the British throne.

The Life of Arthur Annesley.

Annesley (Arthur) earl of Anglesey, and lord privy seal in the reign of king Charles II. was the son of Sir Francis Annesley, bart. and was born at Dublin on the tenth of July, 1614. He continued in Ireland till he was ten years of age, when he was sent to England. In the sixteenth year of his age he was entered fellow commoner at Magdalen college, Oxford; and, in 1644, removed to Lincoln's inn, where he studied the law with great assiduity, till his father sent him to travel. Having made the tour of Europe, and continued some time at Rome, he returned to England in 1640. In the beginning of the civil war, Mr. Annesley inclined to the royal cause, and sat in the parliament held at Oxford, in 1643, but afterwards became reconciled to the opposite party. He was sent commissioner to Ulster in the year 1645, where he managed affairs with so much dexterity and judgment, that the famous rebel Owen Roe O'Neal was disappointed in his designs; and the popish archbishop of Tuam, who was the great support of his party, and whose councils had been hitherto very successful, was not only taken prisoner, but his papers were seized, and his foreign correspondence discovered, whereby vast advantages accrued to the protestant interest. The parliament had sent commissioners to the duke of Ormond, for the delivery of Dublin, but without success; and the state of affairs making it necessary to renew their correspondence with him, they made choice of a second committee, and Mr. Annesley was placed at the head of this commission. The commissioners arrived at Dublin June 7, 1647, and they proved so successful in their negotiations, that in a few days a treaty was concluded with the lord-lieutenant, which was signed the 19th of that month, and Dublin was put into the hands of the parliament.

After the death of Oliver Cromwell, February 21, 1660, Mr. Annesley was chosen president of the council of state, and was principally concerned in bringing about the Restoration. The same year king Charles II. raised him to the dignity of a baron, by the title of lord Annesley, of Newport Pagnell, Bucks; and a short time after, he was created earl of Anglesey. He had always a considerable share in the king's favour, and was heard with great attention both at council and in the house of lords. In 1667, he was made treasurer of the navy. On the 4th of February, 1671-2, his majesty, in council, was pleased to appoint the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Anglesey, the lord Holles, the lord Ashley Cooper, and Mr. secretary Trevor, to be a committee to peruse and revise all the papers and writings concerning the settlement of Ireland, from the first to the last, and to make an abstract thereof in writing; and accordingly, on the 12th of June, 1672, they made their report at large, which was the foundation of a commission, dated August 1, 1672, to prince Rupert, the dukes of Buckingham and Lauderdale, the earl of Anglesey, the lords Ashley and Holles, Sir John Trevor, and Sir Thomas Chicheley, to inspect the settlements of Ireland, and all proceedings thereunto.

In the year 1673, the earl of Anglesey had the office of lord privy-seal conferred upon him. In October 1680, his lordship was charged by one Dangerfield, in an information delivered upon oath, at the bar of the house of commons, with endeavouring to stifle evidence in relation to the popish plot, and to promote the belief of a presbyterian one. The uneasiness he received from this attack, did not prevent his speaking his opinion freely of those matters in the house of lords, particularly in regard to the Irish plot. In 1680, the earl of Castlehaven wrote Memoirs concerning the Affairs of Ireland, wherein he was at some pains to represent the Irish rebellion in the lightest colours possible, as if it had been at first far from being universal, and at last rendered so by the measures pursued by such as ought to have suppressed the insurrection. The earl of Anglesey having received these Memoirs from the author, thought fit to write some animadversions upon them, in a letter to the earl of Castlehaven, wherein he delivered his opinion freely with respect to the duke of Ormond and his management in Ireland. The duke expostulated with the lord privy-seal on this subject, by letter, to which the earl replied. In 1682, the earl drew up a very particular remonstrance, and presented it to king Charles II. it was very warm and loyal, but did not meet with a favourable reception. This memorial was intitled, "The Account of Arthur, Earl of Anglesey, Lord Privy-seal, to your most excellent Majesty, of the true State of your Majesty's Government and kingdoms, April 27, 1682."

The duke of Ormond was prevailed upon to exhibit a charge against the earl, on account of his reflections on the earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs. This produced a sharp contest between these two peers, which ended in the earl of Anglesey's losing his place of lord privy-seal; though even his enemies were forced to confess, that he was harshly and unjustly treated. After this disgrace, the earl remained principally at his country-seat at Bleckingdon, in Oxfordshire, where he devoted his time to his studies, and meddled very little with public affairs. However, he got into favour again, in the reign of king James II. and it is generally believed he would have been appointed lord-chancellor of England, if not prevented by his death, which happened on the 6th of April, 1686, in the seventy-third year of his age.

The Life of Anselm.

Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. was born at Aost, a town at the foot of the Alps, in the year 1033. After having travelled for some time in France

France, he took the monastic habit in the abbey of Becc, in Normandy, of which Lanfranc, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, was then prior. Three years after, when Lanfranc was made abbot of Caen, Anselm succeeded him in the priory of Becc; and upon the death of Herluin, abbot of that monastery, was promoted to the abbacy. In 1092, Anselm came over to England, and soon after his arrival, William Rufus nominated him to the see of Canterbury: but the abbot steadily refused the dignity, fell on his knees, wept, and intreated the king to chuse some other person; and on his finding William obstinate in forcing him to receive the pastoral staff, kept his fist so fast clinched, that it required the utmost violence of the by-standers to open it, and oblige him to accept that ensign of spiritual dignity. He was consecrated archbishop with great solemnity on the 4th of December, 1093. Soon after his consecration, the king having a design to take the duchy of Normandy from his brother Robert, and endeavouring to raise what money he could for that purpose, Anselm made him an offer of five hundred pounds, which the king thinking too little, refused to accept, and the archbishop thereby fell under his majesty's displeasure. The next year the king being ready to embark for Normandy, Anselm waited on him, and desired leave to convene a national synod; but William refused his request, and treated him very harshly, whereupon the archbishop and his retinue withdrew from court.

Great disputes arose on Anselm's persisting in his resolution of going to Rome to receive the pall from pope Urban, the king absolutely refusing to let him leave the kingdom. This contest was carried to a great length. At last William dispatched agents to Rome, with secret instructions to treat with Urban, offering to acknowledge that pontiff as duly elected, if he would send over to him the archbishop's pall, and let him dispose of it as he should think proper. Urban was pleased with this message, and immediately sent the pall by the bishop of Albano, who brought it to William without Anselm's knowledge, and promised that monarch, in the name of the pope, a full confirmation of all the prerogatives and rights of his crown, by the papal authority, if he would acknowledge and obey him, as sovereign pontiff. Anselm was informed, that Urban had sent the pall to the king, and that it was reasonable he should at least pay as much to that prince as it would have cost him in going to Rome to fetch it. The archbishop persevered in refusing to give the king any money. At last, William despairing of selling him the pall, consented to give it him. But Anselm conceiving, that to take it from his hands would be a kind of acknowledgment of his having received it, not from the papal, but regal authority, refused to accept it. However, after some altercation upon this delicate scruple of conscience, it was at length ended by a very singular expedient: the pall was laid on the high altar of Canterbury, and Anselm took it from thence, as from the hands of St. Peter.

Anselm was now persuaded to give his faith to the king, and promise to obey and maintain the royal customs and laws of the realm; but the king returning from a war against the Welsh, complained, that the men whom the archbishop had furnished for that expedition, were neither so well accoutered, nor so fit for the service, as they ought to have been, and summoned him to answer that charge in his court. Anselm was determined not to obey; but applied to some of the chief nobles, and by them acquainted the king, that being compelled by the most urgent necessity, he desired leave to go to Rome. William sent back a denial. Nevertheless the prelate repeatedly renewed his petition, though the charge against him was dropped; till at last the king grew impatient, and sent him word, that if he did go to Rome, he would seize his temporalities, and acknowledge him no longer for his archbishop: notwithstanding which, Anselm still persisted, and at length set out with the scrip and staff of a pilgrim. William, on hearing that he had crossed the sea, ordered all his goods and revenues to be brought into the Exchequer. Anselm, on his arrival at Rome, was honourably received by the pope, whom he accompanied to his country seat near Capua. His holiness wrote to the king, enjoining him, by his authority, to reinstate Anselm in all the profits and privileges of his see. An ambassador from England was arrived, in order to disprove that prelate's allegations and complaints against his master; and partly by presents, and partly by promises, he prevailed upon the court of Rome to desert Anselm. Anselm retired tired to Lyons, where he remained till the death of king William, which happened in the year 1100.

Henry I. having succeeded to the throne of England, invited Anselm to return to his archbishopric. That prelate accepted the invitation with transport, and landed at Dover, October 24, to the inexpressible joy of the whole nation; but when it was required that he should be re-invested by the king, and do the customary homage of his predecessors, he refused to comply, alledging the canons of the late synod at Rome, about investitures. The king was not a little disgusted at Anselm's non-compliance: it was agreed, however, that the dispute should rest till the Easter following, and that in the mean time some persons should be sent to Rome, with a remonstrance to the pope, desiring his holiness to dispense with the canons of the late synod, in relation to investitures. About this time Anselm convened a synod at Lambeth, on occasion of the king's intended marriage with Maud, or Matilda, daughter of Malcolm, king of Scotland; and here it was determined, that the king might lawfully marry that princess, notwithstanding she was generally reported to be a nun, having worn the veil, and had her education in a religious house.

The persons deputed by the king and the archbishop to Rome, returned with a letter to his majesty from the pope, in which his holiness insisted upon the performance of the canons concerning investitures. The king resolved not to give up his prerogative; and the majority of the bishops and nobility were on his side: some of whom pressed his majesty to break entirely with the see of Rome. However, it was not thought advisable to proceed to an open rupture without making a further trial for an accommodation: the king accordingly sent ambassadors to the pope, to endeavour to prevail with him to recede from his declaration; but he protested that he would sooner lose his life than cancel the decrees of the holy fathers, and signified his resolution by letters to the king and Anselm. At length the ambassadors returned from Rome, and brought with them a decision more favourable than the former; though his holiness would not give up the point of investitures, yet he dispensed so far as to permit the bishops and abbots to do homage for their temporalities. The king being highly pleased with this concession of the pope, sent to invite Anselm to England; but the messenger finding him indisposed, his majesty went over in person to Normandy, and made him a visit at the abbey of Becc, where all differences were perfectly adjusted.

Anselm died at Canterbury, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and seventeenth of his prelacy, on the 21st of April, 1109. The largest edition of his works is divided into three parts; the first is entitled Monologia, and contains dogmatical tracts; the second contains practical and devotional tracts; the third takes in his letters. He was the first archbishop who restrained the English clergy from marrying: this was done in the national synod held at Westminster in 1102, the fourth canon of which provides, that no archdeacon, priest, deacon, or canon, should be allowed to marry, or live with his wife already married. Anselm was canonized in the reign of Henry VII.

The Life of Lord George Anson.

Anson (George, Lord) whose merit, as a naval commander, raised him to the rank of nobility, was the second and youngest son of William Anson, Esq; of Shuckborough, by Elizabeth, sister to the countess of Macclesfield, and aunt to the present earl.

Mr. Anson, having very early devoted himself to the sea-service, was made captain of the Weazle sloop in 1722; and, the year following, captain of the Scarborough man of war. On the breaking out of the Spanish war, he was recommended to his majesty for the command of a squadron destined to annoy the enemy in the South Seas; and, by an unfrequented navigation, to attack them with vigour in their remotest settlements. A design which, had it not met with unaccountable delays, would have amply answered the intention, and might have given, perhaps, an irretrievable blow to the Spanish American power.

Mr. Anson sailed from St. Helens on the 18th of September, 1740, in the Centurion of sixty guns, with the Gloucester and Seyvern of fifty each, the Pearl of forty, the Wager store-ship, and the Tryal sloop. His departure having been retarded some months beyond the proper season, he did not arrive in the latitude of Cape Horn till about the middle of the vernal equinox, and in such tempestuous weather, that it was with much difficulty that his own ship, with the Gloucester and the sloop, could double that dangerous cape; and his strength was considerably diminished by the putting back of the Severn and Pearl, and the loss of the Wager store-ship. Yet, notwithstanding this disappointment, and the havoc that the scurvy had made among the ships that were left, he arrived at the fertile, though uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez; where having repaired his damages, and refreshed his men, with the above inconsiderable armament, he kept, for eight months, the whole coast of Peru and Mexico in continual alarm, made several prizes, took and plundered the town of Paita, and, by his humane behaviour to his prisoners, impressed on their minds a lasting idea of British generosity. At length, with the Centurion only (the other two ships having been destroyed) he traversed the vast extent of the Pacific Ocean in a three months voyage; in the course of which, his numbers were so much farther reduced by sickness, that it was with the utmost difficulty he reached the island of Tinian, one of the Ladrones.

The commodore, and most of his people, were in great danger of being left here for ever, or of being imprisoned or massacred by the neighbouring Spaniards; the Centurion being driven from her anchors, one night, in a violent storm, and, after nineteen days absence, being brought back with difficulty, by the few hands that were left on board. Mr. Anson arrived at Macao, in China, in 1742, where having completely refitted his ship (as was generally supposed, for an European voyage) he steered back as far as the Philippine islands, with a view of meeting the Acapulco ship; a plan as wisely laid as it was wisely conducted. After much beating about and uncertainty, he at length got sight of the ship of which he had been in search, and soon after came up with and took her. This crowned his voyage, and greatly enriched himself and his crew. With a handful of men and boys (of whom two only were killed) he made this vast acquisition, and took three times his own number of prisoners. He returned with his prize to China, where he obtained, with ease, at an audience of the viceroy of Canton, an exemption from the emperor's usual duties, thus supporting the honour of his majesty's flag in those far distant regions. On his arrival in England (by the Cape of Good Hope) after near four years absence, in June 1744, he found that the hand of Providence seemed still to protect him, having sailed, in a fog, through the midst of a French fleet, then cruising in the Channel. In short, through the whole of this remarkable voyage, he experienced the truth of that saying of Teucer, which he afterwards chose for his motto, "Nil est desperandum."

Soon after his return, he was appointed rear-admiral of the Blue, and one of the lords of the admiralty. In April 1745, he was made rear-admiral of the White; and, in July, 1746, vice-admiral of the Blue. He was also chosen member of parliament for Heydon in Yorkshire. That winter he commanded the Channel squadron, and had not the duke d'Anville's fleet, returning with disgrace from North America, been accidentally apprized of his station, his long and tempestuous cruise would then have been attended with his usual success. However, in the ensuing summer, he was once more crowned with wealth and conquest. Being then on board the Prince George, of ninety guns, in company with admiral Warren, and twelve other ships, he intercepted, off Cape Finisterre, on May 3, 1747, a powerful fleet, bound from France to the East and West Indies; and, by his valour and conduct, again enriched himself and his officers, and strengthened the British navy, by taking six men of war, and four East Indiamen, not one of that fleet escaping. The speech of the French admiral, M. Jonquiere, on presenting his sword to the conqueror, deserves to be recorded: "Monseigneur, vous avez vaincu l'Invincible, et la Gloire vous suit," Sir, You have conquered the Invincible, and Glory follows you," pointing to the two ships so named. For these repeated services, the late king rewarded him with a peerage, on the thirteenth of June, by the title of lord Anson, baron of Soberton in Hants. On the fifteenth of July, in the same year, he was appointed vice-admiral of the Red; and, on the death of Sir John Norris, was made vice-admiral of England.

In April, 1748, his lordship married the honourable Miss Yorke (eldest daughter of the late earl of Hardwicke, then lord high chancellor) who died in 1760, without issue. In the same year he was appointed admiral of the Blue, when he commanded the squadron that conveyed the late king to and from Holland, and ever after constantly attended his majesty on his going abroad, and on his return to England. In June, 1751, he was appointed first lord of the admiralty, admiralty, in which post he continued (with a very short intermission) till his death. In 1752 he was appointed one of the lords justices, as he also was in 1754. That year, on the rupture with France, so active and spirited were his measures, that a fleet, superior to the enemy, was equipped and manned with amazing expedition. In 1758, being then admiral of the White, having hoisted his flag on board the Royal George, of one hundred guns, he sailed from Spithead on the first of June, with a formidable fleet, Sir Edward Hawke commanding under him; and by cruizing continually before Brest, he covered the descents that were made that summer at St. Maloes, Cherbourg, &c. After this, he was appointed admiral and commander in chief of his majesty's fleets.

The last service his lordship performed at sea was the conveying to England our present queen; for which purpose he sailed from Harwich in the Charlotte yacht, on the seventh of August, 1761; and that day month, after a long and tempestuous voyage, landed the princess at the same place. At length, having been some time in a languishing state of health, he was advised to the Bath waters, from which he was thought to have received benefit; but, soon after his return, being seized suddenly, just after walking in his garden, he died at his seat at Moor-park, in Hertfordshire, on the fifth of June, 1762. By his lordship's will, great part of his fortune devolved to his sister's son, George Adams, Esq; member for Saltash, in Cornwall.

The Life of Dr. Francis Anthony, or Antony.

Anthony, or Antony, (Dr. Francis) a learned physician and chemist of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, was born on the 16th of April, 1550. He received his education at Cambridge. On his coming to London in the year 1598, he published a treatise on the excellence of a medicine drawn from gold, which he called his Aurum Potabile; but not having taken the necessary precaution of obtaining a licence from the college of physicians, he was summoned, in 1600, before the president and censors, when, confessing that he had cured twenty persons without a licence, he was fined and imprisoned; and afterwards persisting in the practice of physic, he again suffered the same effects of their displeasure. He wrote in Latin several defences of his Aurum Potabile, and at length obtained a very extensive and beneficial practice. He was a man of unaffected piety, untainted probity, modesty, and unbounded charity. He died on the twenty-sixth of May, 1623, in the seventy-fourth year of his age.

Dr. John Anthony, his son, was the author of "Lucas Redivivus, or the Gospel Physician, prescribing (by way of meditation) divine physic to prevent diseases not yet entered upon the soul, and to cure those maladies which have already seized upon the spirit." He died April 28, 1655, aged seventy, as appears by the monument erected for his father and himself in the church of St. Bartholomew the Great, in London.

The Life of Eugene Aram.

Aram (Eugene) a person remarkable for being a prodigy of learning, considering his education, and possessing superior abilities that were degraded by an enormous crime, was born at Ramsgill, a little village in Netherdale, Yorkshire, and went to school near Rippon, till he was capable of reading the New Testament, which was all he was ever taught, except a long time after, when he received about a month's instructions from a clergyman. At the age of thirteen or fourteen, he attended his father, who was a gardener at Newby, where his propensity to literature first discovered itself. Mathematics first engaged his attention, and he soon understood quadratic equations, and their geometrical constructions. At sixteen years of age he became book-keeper to a tradesman in London; and after staying here a year or two, went to Bondgate, where he renewed his mathematical studies, but soon after turned, with avidity, to poetry, history, and antiquities, the charms of which quite destroyed all the heavier beauties of numbers, whose application and properties he now pursued no longer, except occasionally in teaching. After some time he was invited into Netherdale, his native air, where he first engaged in a school, and there married.

Prompted by an irresistible thirst of knowledge, he determined to make himself master of the learned languages. He got and repeated all Lilly's Grammar by heart. He next undertook Camden's Greek Grammar, which he also repeated in the same manner. Thus instructed, he entered upon the Latin Classics, and at first hung over five lines for a whole day; never, in all the painful course of his reading, leaving any passage till he thought he perfectly comprehended it. Having accurately perused all the Latin Classics, both historians and poets, he went through the Greek Testament, and then applied to Hesiod, Homer, Theocritus, Herodotus, Thucydides, and all the Greek tragedians. In the midst of these literary pursuits, he went, in 1734, on the invitation of William Norton, Esq; to Knaresborough, where he became much esteemed; and here, with indefatigable diligence, he acquired the knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. In April, 1744, he came again to London, and taught both Latin and writing, at Mr. Painblac's, in Piccadilly, above two years. He next went, in the capacity of writing-master, to a boarding-school at Hayes, in Middlesex, kept by the Rev. Mr. Anthony Hinton. He was afterwards employed in transcribing the acts of parliament to be registered in Chancery, and about the beginning of December, 1757, went down to the free-school at Lynn. From his leaving Knaresborough to this period, which was a long interval, he had attained the knowledge of history and antiquities, and also of heraldry and botany. Few plants, either domestic or exotic, were unknown to him. Amidst all this, he ventured upon the Chaldee and Arabic, but had not time to obtain any great knowledge of the latter. He found the Chaldee easy enough, on account of its connection with the Hebrew. He then investigated the Celtic, as far as possible, in all its dialects; began collections, and made comparisons between that, the English, the Latin, the Greek, and even the Hebrew. He had made notes, and compared above three thousand words together, and found such a surprising affinity, that he was determined to proceed through the whole of all these languages, and form a comparative Lexicon. He was also far from being a contemptible poet.

With this immense stock of learning, acquired without the assistance of a master, and the most extraordinary talents, which might have made him shine in any station of life, it is to be lamented that he was guilty of an action inconsistent with every principle of humanity; for in the year 1758, he was taken up at Lynn, in Norfolk, for the murder of Daniel Clark, a shoemaker of Knaresborough, who had been missing upwards of thirteen years, and removed to York September, 1776.

castle, where being brought to his trial, on the third of August, 1759, he read a most admirable defence, in which he displayed equal modesty, good sense, and learning; but was found guilty, and the next morning confessed the justice of his sentence, acknowledging to a clergyman, that his motive for committing the murder was his suspecting Clark of having an unlawful commerce with his wife. When he was called from bed to have his irons taken off, he refused to rise, alledging that he was very weak. On examination it was found that he had attempted to take away his own life, by cutting his arm in two places with a razor. Tho' weak, he was conducted to the gallows of York, and there executed.

It is remarkable, that when he was usher to the Rev. Mr. Hinton at Hayes, (which was after he had committed the murder for which he suffered) if he saw a snail, or a worm, on a path or gravel walk in the garden, he always carefully removed it to prevent its being destroyed; hoping, as Mr. Hinton supposes, to atone for the murder he had perpetrated, by shewing mercy afterwards to every kind of animal.

The Life of Dr. John Arbuthnot.

Arbuthnot (Dr. John) one of the most celebrated wits in the reign of queen Anne, and an eminent physician, was the son of an episcopal clergyman in Scotland, nearly allied to the noble family of that name. He was educated in the university of Aberdeen, where he took the degree of doctor of physic. The Revolution deprived the father of his church preferment; and necessity obliged the son to seek his fortune abroad, though he was possessed of a small paternal estate. He came to London, and it is said, he first taught the mathematics for his support. About this time, viz. in the year 1695, Dr. Woodward's Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth was published, which contained such an account of the universal deluge, as Dr. Arbuthnot thought inconsistent with truth: he therefore drew up an examination of it. This work, entitled, "An Examination of Dr. Woodward's Account of the Deluge, &c. with a Comparison between Steno's Philosophy and the Doctor's, in the Case of Marine Bodies dug up out of the Earth, &c." was published in 8vo. 1695, and procured our author no small share of literary fame. His extensive learning, and agreeable conversation, versation, introduced him by degrees into practice, and he became eminent in his profession, so that, in 1709, he was appointed physician in ordinary to queen Anne, and admitted a fellow of the college. His gentle manners, polite learning, and excellent abilities, procured him the acquaintance and friendship of the celebrated wits, Pope, Swift, and Gay; and, in the year 1714, he engaged with the two former of these in a design to write a satire on the abuse of human learning in every branch, which was to have been executed in the humorous manner of Cervantes, the original author of this species of satire, under the history of feigned adventures. But this project proved abortive by the fatal incident of the queen's death, when they had only drawn out an imperfect essay towards it, under the title of the first Book of the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus. Dr. Warburton tells us, that the Travels of Gulliver, the Treatise of the Profound, of literary Criticism on Virgil, and the Memoirs of a Parish Clerk, are only so many detached parts and fragments of this work. The same writer declares, that polite letters never lost more than by the defeat of this scheme, in which each of this illustrious triumvirate would have found exercise for his own peculiar talent, besides constant employment for that which they all had in common. Arbuthnot was skilled in every thing which related to science, Pope was master of the fine arts, and Swift excelled in the knowledge of the world: wit they had all in equal measure, and that in so eminent a degree, that no age, perhaps, ever produced three men to whom nature had more bountifully bestowed it, or art brought it to higher perfection.

The queen's death, and the disasters which befel his friends on that occasion, sunk deeply on our author's spirits; and, to divert his melancholy, he paid a visit to his brother, a banker at Paris. After a short stay in that metropolis, he returned to London; and, having lost his former residence at St. James's, took a house in Dover-street. In 1727, he published Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures, in quarto. He continued to practise physic with great reputation, amusing himself in his leisure hours with writing papers of wit and humour. He contributed, in 1732, towards detecting and punishing the scandalous frauds and abuses that had been carried on under the specious name of the Charitable Corporation. The same year he published his excellent Essay concerning the Nature of Aliments, the Choice of them, &c. which was followed the next year by the Effects of Air on Human Bodies. He was apparently led to the subjects of these treatises by the consideration of his own case, an asthma, which gradually increasing with his years, became at length desperate and incurable. In the year 1734 he retired to Hampstead, in hopes of procuring some small relief for his disorder; but he died at his house in Cork-street, Burlington-gardens, in February, 1735.

The Life of King Arthur.

Arthur, king of the Britons, was born at Tindagol, in Cornwall, in the year 452, or 453. In 467 he succeeded his father Gorlous in the kingdom of Danmonium, and was immediately engaged in a war with Howel, king of Areclute, whom he slew with his own hand in 470, being then only eighteen years of age. In 476 he was raised to the rank of a patrician by Ambrosius; and, in 490, made a voyage to Jerusalem. Upon the death of Ambrosius in the year 508, Arthur was elected monarch of Britain; and indeed his extraordinary merit entitled him to that pre-eminent station. He was crowned at Caerleon, and soon after gave the Saxons a total overthrow in Lancashire. In 511, Cerdic, a Saxon chief, having laid siege to Bath, Arthur assembled his troops, and marching to its relief, attacked the Saxons with such fury, that they were obliged to quit the siege, and take refuge on Badon-hill; from whence they were the next morning dislodged by the British hero * with great slaughter. The Saxons, however, prosecuted the war with such vigour and perseverance, that Arthur was at last obliged to conclude a treaty, by which he yielded to Cerdic the counties of Hants and Somerset.

Arthur, in the decline of life, was prevented from interrupting the success of the enemy, by domestic troubles that produced a civil war. His first wife had been carried off by Meluas, king of Somersetshire, who detained her a whole year at Glastonbury, until Arthur, discovering the place of her retreat, advanced with an army against the ravisher, and obliged him to give her back. In his second wife, perhaps, he might have been more fortunate, as we have no mention made of her; but his third consort was debauched by his own nephew Mordred, a Cumbrian prince. By such an outrage he incurred the vengeance of the uncle. At last the two princes met in the battle of Camlan in Lancashire, and attacked each other with such amazing fury, that Mordred received his death upon the spot, and Arthur a mortal wound, of which he died at Glastonbury, at the great age of ninety, seventy-six years of which had been spent in the exercise of arms; for though he had reigned but thirty-four years, yet before he came to the crown he had long commanded the British armies under Ambrosius. The body of this celebrated monarch was, at his dying request, transported to the old church of Glastonbury, and interred by his second wife Guinever, between two pyramids.

Henry II. passing through Wales, and hearing a Welsh bard sing to his harp the story of Arthur, concluding with his death and burial in the churchyard of Glastonbury, was seized with an emotion of curiosity to know the truth; and, in the year 1189, he granted a warrant to search for the body of that monarch. After having dug seven feet, they found a broad grave-stone, on the undermost surface of which was fixed a leaden cross, inscribed, "Hic jacet sepultus inclitus rex Arthurus in insula Avallonia;" i. e. "Here lieth the famous king Arthur, buried in the isle of Avalon." Some feet lower in the ground, they discovered a wooden coffin, containing the skeleton of a man of very large dimensions; and Giraldus Cambrensis, who was then present, says, he reckoned ten wounds upon the skull, all of which had been healed up, except one that remained still open, and was, in all probability, the immediate cause of his death. At the same time the tomb of his second wife Guinever was opened, when her golden tresses appeared entire and bright, and plaited in a very curious manner; but when touched they sunk into dust. Both skeletons were removed into the new church, and here buried in a marble tomb, and the leaden cross was kept in the treasury of

Observations on the Poison of Copper and Brass, and the very great danger attending the Use of utensils, made of these Metals, and other mixed Metals, wherein Copper and Brass make a Part, especially in the preparing and keeping of Food and Physick, &c. By William Falconer, M. D. F. R. S.

WE might imagine copper in its metallic form not very likely to find admission into the body; but I suspect it occurs oftener than is apprehended. Halfpence and farthings are frequently given to children to play with, and, as they generally put their toys into their mouths, they are often swallowed, or part of the copper abraded by their teeth. The last of the above circumstances is applicable to all toys whatever, for young children, made of brass or copper, or other mixed metals wherein copper makes a part of the composition. I likewise believe, that sometimes copper in this form gains admission into our food, by the scraping of the bottoms of brass or copper pans, &c. especially when they contain some viscid substance, as sweetmeats, or some other food dressed with thick sauces. The like may happen from some of the coarser kind of spoons made of a mixed metal called ockamy, (corruptly for alchemy) which is a coarse kind of brass. These are in frequent use among servants and the lower kind of people, and I have often seen them greatly diminished in their substance by use. The dangerous custom of many, of putting pins into their mouths, deserves to be particularly noticed, as it is generally imagined all the danger lies in its mechanical action, if swallowed; but, by the aforementioned account of its effects, it appears to be likely to produce disagreeable consequences by its specific action as metal.

Great caution should be had in the use of copper vessels by those who inhabit a country where mines, of coal especially, are frequent; as the springs in such situations are frequently impregnated with this acid.

Fermented liquors likewise (whether from an acid generated in the vinous fermentation, or from part of the liquor having gone on to the acetous, is not certain) are observed to corrode copper.

On this account, we should be very cautious relative to the cocks by which wine and beer are drawn off, that they are kept as clean as possible, and not be suffered to remain longer in the wine casks than is necessary for bottling it. This caution is more especially necessary with respect to made wines, which are more acedent and imperfectly fermented, part of them being generally in a state of must, and part changed into vinegar, and more apt to corrode copper than the foreign wines. I suspect that an emetic quality, which I have several times observed in made wines, may sometimes be produced by some accident of this kind. For malt liquors which are drank out of the cask, I think the common wooden spigot and faucet much cleaner and safer than brass cocks; and I think some contrivance of the same kind might be found out for wine, which is drank out of the cask; or perhaps some compound metal of tin and bismuth, which is not affected by the vegetable acid, might answer very well.

All the above cautions are applicable, in a greater degree, to vinegar, which corrodes copper very powerfully, and even quicker than the native acid, in my opinion. I have observed the vapour of vinegar to be remarkably corrosive of this metal; and, on this account, the distillation of vinegar is a point of great importance to be attended to*. I have frequently found distilled vinegar to have gained an impregnation of copper, which was probably contracted from the head of the still in distillation. Indeed, I think no vessels but those of glass are proper for this operation.

The above mentioned quality of vinegar should make us very cautious in what vessel it is boiled, as it is frequently done for pickles. The preparation of these is a matter of great consequence, as they are so much used, especially by those of higher rank. The fine blue and green colour, for which several of them are so much valued, has been esteemed by many a presumptive circumstance of their having gained some impregnation of this kind. As this fact is very material to be ascertained, I made the following experiments in order to determine it.

N O T E.

* This caution is very necessary to be attended to in some pharmaceutical preparations, as in distilling the aqua alexiteria spirituosus cum aceto, and all others where vinegar is directed to be distilled.

I took about an ounce of pickle from some cucumbers which were bought at a noted shop, and were remarkable for their colour in a high degree. It had a peculiar taste of the metallic kind, and smelled like the effluvia from copper that has been strongly rubbed, which was even so powerful as to produce a slight degree of nausea. Into this I put some bright iron wire, which in a short time was covered with a red rust, exactly resembling what iron acquires from a solution of copper in an acid. I tried the same experiment with some pickle of the same kind from cucumbers procured from another place, which were rather inferior in colour, but still shewed some, though less, signs of containing copper. Pickles, I have observed, which are prepared without any impregnation of this kind, are generally of a faint green, rather inclining to yellow; and I am persuaded that this colour, which is made so greatly a test of their goodness, is always owing to this cause.

It is a well known maxim among house-keepers, that pickles will never be green, unless a copper or brass pan be used, and, if the desired colour be not obtained thus in sufficient degree, it is common, I am informed, to throw in a few halfpence afterwards, which seldom fails to impart the tinge required. This is very probable when we consider that copper is more acted on by the vegetable acid in the cold, than when heated. I have examined some books of modern cookery, and find that, whenever a green or blue colour† is desired, a brass, bell metal, or copper pan, is directed to be used. It is not improbable that this often happens when such an adulteration is neither designed nor suspected, from using distilled vinegar, which is often employed for these purposes, and is frequently impregnated with copper from the head of the still. Vinegar likewise dissolves the copper alloy loy in silver, and even the vapour that exhales from it when cold will have the same effect. On this account I think the tops of Vinegar cruets are improperly made of silver, as is now frequently the fashion. I have seen these acquire a thick coat of verdigrease on their inside, especially when they are made hollow with a narrow opening, so as to be with difficulty cleaned. This objection holds still stronger when the spout itself, through which the vinegar is poured, is made of silver.

Maryland.

THIS province is bounded to the west by the Apalachian mountains; to the east by Chesapeake Bay, and the Northern Ocean; to the south by Patowmack River, and to the north by Delaware Bay; lying between 37°. 50. and 40°. north latitude, and extending about one hundred and forty miles in length, and one hundred and thirty five in breadth. It had the name of Maryland from Henrietta Maria, daughter of Henry IV. of France, and queen to King Charles I. of England, who granted it by patent to Cecilius Calvert, lord Baltimore, anno 1632.

The air of this province is said to be excessive hot some part of the summer, and equally cold in winter, when the north-west wind blows; but the winters are not of more than three or four months duration, and in these they have seldom one month of bad weather; all the rest, they are happy in a clear air and bright sun, and are scarce ever troubled with fogs. In this, and in all the other colonies, the air continually acquires a greater degree of salubrity in proportion as the land is cleared, and the country inhabited.

Maryland may be divided into the low lands, next the sea, and the hilly country, lying towards the Apalachian mountains. It is watered by innumerable springs, forming a great many fine rivers, of which the chief are Patowmack, Pocomoac, Patuxhent, Severn, Cheptouk, Sassafras, and Wicomoca rivers, and that of St. George. These and other rivers, capable of receiving large ships, with the numerous bays and creeks that indent the land on every side, give the seamen an opportunity of bringing their vessels up to the planters doors. The chief bays are those of Chesapeake and Delaware, and the most noted cape that of Henlopen, at the entrance of Delaware Bay. The bay of Chesapeake divides the province into two parts; of which one lies on the east, and the other on the west.

The chief commodity is tobacco, of which it is said to have exported annually, many years ago, upwards of thirty thousand hogheads, each hoghead seven hundred pounds weight. This commodity forms the medium of currency of Maryland, being received in debts and taxes; and the inspector's notes for tobacco, delivered to him, are transferable. It is said, that an industrious man can manage six thousand plants of tobacco, and four acres of Indian corn. The tobacco of this province, called Oroonoko, is stronger than that of Virginia; and, though not much liked or used in England, yet, in the eastern and northern parts of Europe, it is preferred before the sweet scented tobacco of James and York rivers, in Virginia. Another considerable commodity of Maryland is pork, of which large quantities are exported, salted, and barrelled; the woods containing vast droves of wild swine, which are generally of a small size. Good land in Maryland yields about fifteen bushels of wheat an acre, or thirty bushels of Indian corn; but the grain is said to be very subject to the weevil. Great quantities both of hemp and flax are raised in this province, and the mountains yield abundance of iron ore, which is run into pigs, and refined into iron. Maryland oak is not greatly esteemed for building large ships, but is very proper for staves, and small craft. Their black walnut is very proper for joiners work; and they have likewise poplars, cedars, chestnuts, and other woods, with most of the different species of grain and fruits, both of Europe and America.

The planters, generally speaking, live in farms dispersed all over the country, chiefly near the banks of rivers, or on the sea-coast. They seem to have an aversion here, as well as in Virginia, to reside in towns, or rather they find it more convenient for the management of their plantations; and as the situation of the province has all along secured it, in a great measure, from the incursions and ravages of the Indians, they have not found it necessary to haulk their inclinations. No planter can plant more than six thousand plants of tobacco per negro, besides raising some barrels of corn. The weekly allowance to each negro is a peck of Indian corn, and some salt. Besides the manufactures we have mentioned, a kind of woollen cloth is made here, and a wax extracted from the fruit of what they call the wax-tree, being a kind of myrtle, which, when mixed with tallow, makes candles. They likewise make excellent cyder for their own drinking.

The commodities imported into Maryland consist chiefly of wines, from Madeira, Fyal, and France; of rum, from Barbadoes; of slaves from Africa; and of malt, beer, linens and woollens, furniture, utensils of every kind, and indeed most of the elegancies and conveniencies of life, from England, till of late.

Maryland was discovered in the year 1606, when Virginia was first planted, and for some time was esteemed a part of Virginia, till king Charles I. in 1632, granted all that part of Virginia which lay north of Patowmack river to the lord Baltimore, of the kingdom of Ireland, and his heirs. The Baltimore family were deprived of the government of this province during the civil wars in England, but recovered it again at the Restoration; and they still remain proprietors. The estate enjoyed by them here is the most considerable of any subject of Great Britain abroad; for, besides their plantations, they have certain revenues granted to them by several assemblies, as a duty on each hogshhead of tobacco, and other incomes, which, with the sale of lands, uncultivated and unpurchased, must amount, at present, to a very considerable sum yearly.

The first adventurers having been Roman catholics, followed by many families of that persuasion, who came over from England to avoid the penal laws, many of the planters still profess that religion: however, the church of England is established here, and churches have not only been built, but parishes allotted to them with annual stipends to the ministers: every Christian male sixteen years old, and negroes male and female, above that age, paying forty pounds of tobacco, which is levied by the sheriff, among other public burdens, and yields about one hundred pounds sterling, at a medium, to each.

Maryland contains above a dozen counties, in which the chief places are Annapolis, St. Mary's, Dorchester, Williamstadt, Harrington, Warrington, Calverton, Piscataway, Bristol, Baltimore, Abington, Masterkout, St. Michael, and Colingbroke. Annapolis was formerly called Severn, but received its present name in 1694, when it was made a port town, and the residence of a collector and naval officer. The county court was removed hither in 1699, and ever since it has always been the chief seat of justice, and held to be the capital of the province. Here is a free-school, as well as in several other places of the province.

Virginia.

This province is bounded on the south by Carolina; on the north-east by the river Patowmack, which divides it from Maryland; on the east by the Atlantic Ocean; and on the west by the Apalachian mountains; extending about two hundred and forty miles in length, and two hundred in breadth.

The air and seasons here depend very much upon the wind, as to heat and cold, dryness and moisture. The north and north-west winds are very nitrous, piercing cold, and clear, or else stormy; the south east, hazy and sultry hot. In winter they have a fine clear air, and dry, which renders it very pleasant. Their frosts are short, but sometimes so very sharp, that they will freeze the rivers over, three miles broad. Snow falls sometimes in pretty large quantities, but seldom lies above a day or two. Their spring is about a month earlier than in England; in April they have frequent rains; in May and June the heat increases; and the summer is much like ours, being mitigated with gentle breezes, that rise about nine o'clock, and decrease and increase as the sun rises or falls. In July and August these breezes cease, and the air becomes stagnant and sultry hot; in September the weather commonly changes suddenly, and heavy rains fall, and then the inhabitants are generally very sickly. It is to be observed, however, that here, and in all other colonies, as the cultivation and population of them advances, the air grows better, to which the cutting down of the woods greatly contribute.

As to the face of the country in Virginia, it is generally low and flat towards the sea-coast, and for an hundred miles up the country; so that there is hardly a hill or stone to be seen, except here and there some rocks of iron ore, and some banks of a kind of petrified oyster-shells. The whole country, before it was planted, was one continued forest, interspersed with marshes, which in the West-Indies they call swamps. No country now produces greater quantities of excellent tobacco, and yet the soil is generally nerally so sandy and shallow, that after they have cleared a fresh piece of ground out of the woods, it will not bear tobacco above two or three years, unless cow-penned, and well dunged.

The forests here yield oaks, poplars, pines, cedars, cypresses, sweet myrtles, chesnuts, hickery, live oak, walnut, dog-wood, elder, hazel, chinkapins, locust-trees, sassafras, elm, ash, beech, with a great variety of sweet gums, and incense, which distil from several trees; pitch, tar, rosin, turpentine, plank-timber, masts and yards. Virginia yields also rice, hemp, Indian corn, plenty of pasture, with coal, quarries of stone, and lead and iron ore.

Of spontaneous flowers, there are a great variety here, particularly the finest crown-imperial in the world, and the cardinal-flower, so much extolled for its scarlet colour; almost the whole year round the plains and valleys are adorned with flowers of one kind or another. In this country also is found the tulip bearing laurel-tree, which has the pleasiest smell in the world, and keeps feeding and blossoming several months together.

Silk grafts grows spontaneous in many places; the fibres of which are as fine as flax, and much stronger than hemp. Their trees are much loftier than ours, and no underwood or bushes grow beneath; so that people travel with ease through the forests on horseback, and never want a fine shade to defend them from the summer heats.

Among other animals in Virginia are elks, but not common; red deer in great plenty; musk rats, racoons, beavers, and wolves. As for reptiles, they have lizards, with several kinds of snakes, particularly the rattle-snake. Of birds, they have several sorts of eagles, hawks, and owls. The white owl is very beautiful, all the feathers of the back and breast being as white as silver, except a black spot immediately below the throat: their turkies are very large, some of them weighing forty pounds; their partridges are smaller than ours, but very well tasted: their nightingales are well known in England: they have a bird called the mocking-bird, of two sorts, grey and red, esteemed the finest singing bird in the world: it has its name from imitating the notes of all other kinds of birds it hears: they have here also that beautiful little bird called the humming bird.

Besides the animals that are natives of the country, most of the quadrupeds of Europe have been introduced here; such as horses, cows, sheep, and hogs, which are prodigiously multiplied, great numbers running wild in the forests, besides what they have tamed in their plantations.

In February, March, April, and May, shoals of herrings come up into their very brooks; some of the size of ours, but for the most part much larger. Among many other species, they have three somewhat remarkable; namely, the sting-grass, the toad-fish, and the tobacco-pipe fish. The sting-grass takes its name from a sting in its tail; the toad-fish, from its swelling monstrously when taken out of the water, and the tobacco-pipe fish, from its resembling that instrument: all these are eaten. They have great quantities, in summer, of those destructive worms that eat into the bottoms of ships wherever they find the coat of pitch, tar, or lime, worn off the timber; these worms having a kind of horn or screw in their head, with which they force a passage through any wood to which they stick.

Four great rivers, namely James River, York River, Rappahannock, and Patowmack, which rise in the Appalachian mountains, run through this province, or along its borders, from the north-west to the south-east, and fall into the bay of Chesapeake. James River is generally about two miles over, and navigable at least four-score. York and Rappahannock are not so large; but Patowmack, as we had occasion to observe before, is navigable for near two hundred miles, being generally seven miles broad, and in some places nine. The great bay of Chesapeake runs up through Virginia and Maryland, almost due north, three hundred miles, and upwards, being navigable most part of the way for large ships. The two promontories that form the mouth of the bay, are called Cape Charles, and Cape Henry.

The government here is formed upon the English model; the governor acts as the king, the council supplies the place of a house of lords, and the house of representatives that of the commons. The chief court, next to the assembly, is the general-court, held by the governor and council, who are judges of it, and take cognizance of all causes, criminal, penal, ecclesiastical, and civil. There lies no appeal from this court, unless the matter in dispute amounts in value to above three hundred pounds; and then an appeal lies to the king and council council in England. In criminal cases there never was any appeal; but the governor can pardon persons for any crimes except murder, and reprieve, even for that, till his majesty's pleasure is known. The governor, as representing the king, has a negative on all the acts of assembly; which he calls, prorogues, and dissolves. He calls also, and presides in the council, makes justices of the peace, and all the officers of the militia, under the degree of a lieutenant-general: he issues proclamations, keeps the seal of the colony, disposes of the king's lands according to the charter, and the laws of the country: all payments out of the treasury are ordered by him, or in his name: he is vice-admiral, by virtue of a commission from the admiralty, and has a salary of two thousand pounds a-year, which, with an hundred and fifty pounds a-year for house-rent, and perquisites, may amount to near three thousand pounds. The king nominates the counsellors; but the governor fills up the vacant places of such as die, or are removed, without staying for orders from England. When the governor and deputy governor are absent, the administration falls to the president of the council for the time being. The council have an equal vote with the governor, in calling assemblies, disposing of the public revenues, placing and displacing officers, in votes and orders of council, proclamations, grants, and patents. The privileges of the assembly-men are the same with those of the members of parliament in England; and their power much the same as that of the house of commons. The laws of Virginia are the acts of parliament and statutes of England, which extend to all his majesty's dominions in general; the statutes and acts of the assembly, which relate only to this colony, and must be sent to England to be confirmed by the king; and the orders of the king and council in England, which, in many things, have the force of laws in the plantations.

There are several public officers, besides the governor, who have their commissions immediately from his majesty; particularly, the auditor of the revenue, the receiver-general, and the secretary, in whose office are kept the public records, and all deeds and other writings proved. The ecclesiastical commissary receives his authority from the bishop of London. The treasurer of the province is appointed by the general-assembly, and receives the money raised by the acts of that assembly.

As to the forces of the colony, every freeman, that is, all that are not servants, from sixteen to sixty years of age, are enlisted in the militia, and are mustered once a year at a general muster, and four times a year by troops and companies, in their respective counties; and they are reckoned above two thousand men; the whole inhabitants, men, women, and children, amounting to upwards of one hundred thousand, and the slaves and servants to twice that number. However, the population of Virginia is not such as might have been expected from so antient and flourishing a colony; nor are the towns of any considerable note. This last circumstance is owing to the vast commodiousness of water carriage which every where presents itself to the plantations of private persons, and the scarcity of handicrafts. Virginia, however, is distinguished by several magnificent public buildings: it still retains its original staple manufacture and commodity of tobacco; and till the unhappy differences with the mother country they carried on a great trade with the West Indies, in lumber, pitch, tar, corn and provisions; and with Britain, in flax, hemp, iron, staves, and plank.

The public revenues arise from a rent reserved by the crown of all lands granted by patent, a duty of two shillings a hoghead on all tobacco exported, a duty of sixpence a head for every passenger brought into the country, fines and forfeitures, duties on foreign liquors, and on slaves and servants imported, and, lastly, money raised by acts passed in the assemblies: besides the duties laid on tobacco, in the countries that produce it.

As to the religion of the Virginians, the body of the people are members of the church of England, intermixed with some quakers and presbyterians. In each parish there is a church, built either with timber, brick, or stone, and decently furnished with all things necessary for the celebration of divine service. In large parishes there is a chapel of ease, and sometimes two, for the convenience of the parishioners. The ministers maintenance is settled at sixteen thousand pounds of tobacco each yearly, besides perquisites. The power of induction, upon the presentation of ministers, is lodged in the governor's hands by law. The bishop of London's commissary, missary, whose business it is to make visitations of churches, and superintend the clergy, is allowed one hundred pounds a year.

Some attempts were made by Sir Walter Raleigh and others to settle colonies here, and at Carolina, in the reign of queen Elizabeth; but all of them, thro' neglect, proved ineffectual, till James I. by his letters patent, dated the 10th of April 1606, authorized Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Summers, Richard Hackluit, clerk, (prebendary of Westminster) and other adventurers, to plant the coast of Virginia, between 35 and 45°. of north latitude. Hereupon having fitted out three small ships, they set sail from the Downs the 5th of January, 1606, arrived in the Bay of Chesapeake, and sailing up the river Powhatan, now James River, they landed on the peninsula about fifty miles up the river, where they built a fort, and afterwards a town, which they called James Town, in honour of king James I. This was the first town built by the English on the continent of America. There happened some skirmishes between the English and the natives at the landing; but the fear of fire-arms brought the latter to a pretended reconciliation, waiting, however, for an opportunity of falling upon these strangers to advantage. The fort being furnished, captain Newport, who commanded the expedition, returned to England on the 22d of June, 1607, leaving one hundred and four persons in the new settlement. The garrison soon finding themselves in want of provisions, and the natives refusing to supply them with any, though they offered to give them the full value for them, the English found themselves under the necessity of plundering the country, upon which an open war ensued between them and the natives. However, fresh supplies and reinforcements coming over, commanded by the lord Delaware, the Indians were glad to enter into a treaty of peace, during which the English finding a great demand for tobacco in Europe, began to encourage the planting of it, in which they succeeded beyond their expectations; and at the same time Sir Gregory Yardly, the governor, established a government, resembling that of England; and the first general-assembly met at James Town, in May, 1620, and negroes were first imported into Virginia the same year. The planters, not long after, falling out among themselves, the Indians took advantage of their divisions, and made several attempts to recover their country, killing great numbers of the English by surprize. These misfortunes being ascribed to the maladministration of the company, king Charles I. dissolved it in the year 1629, and reduced the government of Virginia under his immediate direction; appointing the governor and council himself, ordering all process and patents to be issued in his name, and reserving a quit-rent for every hundred acres of land. The planters, however, falling into factions and parties again, the Indians made a third effort to recover their lost liberties, and cut off near five hundred more of the English; but they were at length repulsed, and Sir William Berkeley, the then governor, afterwards made a peace with them that continued a considerable time, during which he promoted manufactures of silk and linen, and was in all respects esteemed an excellent governor. But the act of navigation restraining the planters from sending their merchandize to foreign countries, and from receiving cloathing, furniture, or supplies from any country but England, having created a great deal of discontent, Mr. Bacon, a popular factious gentleman, took advantage of their disaffection, and setting up for himself, drew the people into rebellion, deposed the governor, and compelled him to fly to the eastern shore of the Bay of Chesapeake; and had not Bacon died soon after, he had probably made himself sovereign of Virginia. Upon his death Sir William returned to his government, and the people to their duty; since which there have been no material alterations in the state of Virginia; but they have hitherto almost entirely neglected the culture of silk, wine, and every other branch of business which the soil and climate seem proper for, and employed themselves wholly in planting and curing tobacco.

September, 1776.

Character and Anecdotes of Dr. Charles Lucas, an Apothecary and Citizen of Dublin. By Benj. Victor.

MY intimacy with this extraordinary person (whom I am proud to call by the name of friend) may perhaps lead me into a warmth, that his enemies will call partiality. His person is very agreeable; he has all the requisites to render him engaging in social life; he has all the requisites to render him useful in public life; he is a good scholar, and to crown all, he is a man of virtue. His peculiar happiness as an orator was so universally admired, that it largely contributed to his seeming ruin.

When he was chosen into the Common Council of this city, his talents were so superior to all in that assembly, that he soon grew a leader there. And as the richer body of men in all kingdoms are apt to distress the poorer, it was not to be wondered the aldermen had committed numberless encroachments on the city, with impunity. Charles Lucas had penetration to discover, elocution to display, and joined to these abilities, the greatest firmness of mind that ever possessed the breast of a human being. From all this you will not wonder at his carrying every thing before him—or that his election for the city to parliament would have met with the least doubt—but his opponents in the city were too contemptible for so enterprising a genius; he soared at higher game, and from rescuing the city from slavery turned his thoughts at once to rescue the nation. He began that attempt when confined to his chamber in a long fit of the gout. I found him one day so earnestly employed with his papers, that it excited my curiosity to enquire after his subject—he consented, and read to me for an hour, which was nothing less than a satirical description of the political situation of Ireland with England. I heard with amazement! and when I had expressed my dislike to it with some warmth, he laughed it off, by asking my pardon for forgetting I was an Englishman! To conclude, he published this work in three or four large pamphlets, which gave great offence to government; and when the earl of Harrington came over Lord Lieutenant, those pamphlets were bound in a handsome volume, which he had the spirit and indiscretion to present to his Excellency one morning at his levee. Thus many persons have been ruined by those popular virtues, for which they were first admired.

On the day the Lord Lieutenant went to the House of Lords, to open the parliament, Mr. Lucas came to visit me, and when the cannon were firing to denote the business of the day, I laid my hand upon his, and said, “You hear those guns—prithce tell me, Charles—have you no fears?”—He answered “he had not;” and I really believed him, so secure was he of safety in his popularity; but in less than four hours after, it appeared in print that the Lord Lieutenant, in his speech from the throne, had pointed him out as an object of resentment to the House of Commons. The Commons proceeded with severity, but at the same time with a dignity becoming that house; and the best friends of Mr. Lucas were obliged to assemble to force him into a boat, to carry him to the Isle of Man, to avoid his commitment to Newgate—that measure was happy for him and government, considering the outrageous temper of the populace; had he been committed, great mischiefs must have ensued, which must all have been carried to his account.

He was a long time in London; if you had met with him, you would have found the truth of his character:—he was particularly kind and friendly to Miss D—. He was in the theatre the first night she appeared in the character of Indiana—and what with his fears for her, and the distress of the character of the last act (which was new to him) and the successes he met with—from all these circumstances he was seen to shed a plentiful number of tears; of so gentle and tender a disposition is the heart of this amiable man.

An Oriental Fable.

TIME, the devourer of all things, has permitted me to be the spectator of a long series of events. The colour of my locks is now changed to that of the swans, which sport in the gardens of the mighty kings of the earth. Age and experience have taught me to believe, that the sovereign disposer of our destinies has given to man a heart susceptible of virtue, and a soul capable of tasting the pleasures which arise from doing good. A noble and disinterested action must, somewhere, meet with its reward. Listen, O! sons of Adam, listen to my faithful tale!

In one of those delightful vallies, which cut the chain of the mountains in Arabia, for a long time lived a rich pastor. He was happy, because he was content, and his happiness consisted in doing good. One day, as he was walking on the enamelled borders of a torrent, under the shade of a grove of palm trees, which extended their verdant branches even to the heads of the lofty cedars, with which the top of the mountain was crowned, he heard a voice which frequently echoed into the valley the most piercing cries, and sometimes low murmuring complaints, which were lost in the noise of the torrent.

The venerable pastor hastened to the place from whence the voice proceeded: he saw a young man, prostrate on the sand at the foot of a rock: his garments were torn, and his hair in wild confusion covered his face, on which were easily to be traced the flowers of beauty faded by grief. Tears trickled down his cheeks, and his head was sunk on his bosom: he appeared like the rose, which the rude blasts of a storm had levelled to the earth. The pastor was touched at the sight. He approached the youth, and said to him, “O child of grief, hasten to my arms! let me press to my bosom the offspring of despair!”

The youth lifted up his head in mournful silence. With astonishment he fixed his detriment, by the pernicious kindness of a too delicate and tender method of treatment. The nursery must always be overheated, in order to be well aired. Miss must never be dressed, nor undressed, but before a large fire. Nor have her hands and face washed, but in warm milk and water, corrected with alder-flowers, or with a decoction of tansey. Nor, on any pretence, be carried out of doors, except when the sun shines.

At four or five years old, she is taught to entertain false ideas of her own importance. Her mamma will not let her be contradicted. If she falls into a passion, she must be soothed and humoured; not to say, applauded, as a child of spirit. If she invents a falsehood, the dear little creature, instead of being punished as she deserves, is kissed and commended for her wit.

By degrees, she begins to consider herself as formed of more refined materials, and as cast in a more elegant mould, than the generality of other people. She is struck with the glare of pomp and equipage. Grows haughty and insolent to the servants. Values herself upon dress. And admires the reflection of her own face in the looking-glass.

At six or seven years of age, she looks over her papa and mama, when they play at cards. And miss has some idea of gaming, before she is thoroughly versed in her a b c.

In due season the care of her head-piece is committed to a friseur, a monsieur le Puff from Paris. Her "noddle island" is also carefully cultivated by the millener and the jeweller, who decorate with festoons, the pyramid which the friseur has raised. Perhaps, the little (pullet shall I call her? or chicken?) suddenly erects herself into a gigantic pea-hen, by tufting the pyramid with plumes half a yard high.

But what is a superb roof without a well finished front? Swayed by this consideration, she begins to pencil her eyebrows, and with a little of her mamma's instruction, to assume an artificial complexion. But let her not enamel. Let her also abstain from colouring her neck, her breast, and arms; lest she fall a martyr to white lead, and kill herself in a few months, as many a lady of fashion has done before her.

That miss may be thoroughly accomplished from head to foot, the aid of a foreign dancing master is called in. A French governess teaches her the language of that country, ere she is well mistress of her own; and, perhaps, poisons her mind with popery into the bargain. An Italian instructs her on the guittar. And a singing master teaches her to squeak, at least, if nature will not let her sing. She has also to attend her, a monster (unheard of till the present age) called a card-tutor, that she may know how to cheat genteelly when she goes into polite company.

By this time I take for granted she is a perfect adept in several smaller, but not unnecessary embellishments; which the late Lord Chesterfield would have called, female graces. Such as, to lisp; to mince some words, and be utterly unable to pronounce some letters; to be extremely near sighted; to toss the fan with elegance; to manage the snuff-box according to art; to stroak a monkey, to address a parrot, or to kiss a lap-dog with delicacy, to fall into agreeable tremors and confusion; to languish with propriety; and be just ready, on some occasions, to faint away judiciously.

And now for routs, assemblies, balls, operas, public gardens, masquerades, card-parties, ridottos, and theatres. In a word, for every dissipation that can exhaust money, stifle reflection, kill time, gratify the lust of the eye, and feed the pride of life.

Amidst all this profusion, if miss does not inherit what is called a great fortune; she may possibly lie upon hand, and die at last without changing her name. But if she be entitled to an opulent estate, it may sell her to some rake of distinction, and they may live together, without quarrelling, about three days; and continue faithful to each other for near a week. I mean she may marry a rake of distinction, if she do not previously steal a flying march to Scotland with her father's butler, or valet de chambre, or with the spruce friseur abovementioned. In which case the disappointed rake of distinction must hunt for a wife elsewhere.

When the young lady becomes a mother, she gives her children an education similar to what she received from her own mamma. And thus the wheel goes round.

It should have been observed in its due place, that miss would have been carried within the walls of the parish church, a few weeks after she was born; if the clergyman had not been sent for to christen her at home.

She would also have gone to church on her wedding day, but for one or other of the following circumstances. Supposing her to have taken a trip to Scotland, going to church on the occasion, was necessarily out of the question. And if she married with her parents consent, it is ten to one that the ceremony was performed in her mamma's drawing room by special licence.

I must

I must add, that she would certainly see the inside of a church once a year, (to wit, after every lying-in) if it were not the fashion for people of quality to be chambered, instead of church'd, by having the thanksgiving service read in their own apartments. And thus, perhaps, miss never enters the House of God till, at her interment, she is carried in, feet foremost.

A Satyrish.

The English Theatre.

Foote's Theatre, Haymarket.

MONDAY evening the 19th instant, Mr. Foote brought out a new comedy of three acts, at this theatre, called The Capuchin.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Father O'Donovan,	Mr. Foote.
Sir Harry Hamper,	Mr. Parsons.
Dr. Viper, -	Mr. Palmer.
Mr. Minnikin, -	Mr. Edwin.
Kit Codling, -	Mr. Bannister.
Trompefan, -	Mr. Baddeley.
Dicky Drugget, -	Mr. R. Palmer.
Lady Abbess, -	Mrs. Lowe.
Mrs. Minnikin, -	Miss Sherry.
Mrs. Clack, -	Mrs. Gardiner.
Jenny Minnikin, -	Mrs. Jewell.

Scene, Calais.

Miss Jenny Minnikin, a pert, vulgar lass, and daughter to a pin-maker in the city, having eloped with Dickey Drugget, a foolish stripling, her father's apprentice, they land at Calais, and open the piece, before the celebrated Hotel d'Angleterre, into which we find them about to enter, in order to regale themselves after the fatigues of the voyage, and to enquire of the host to direct them to a friendly clergyman, who will join them in wedlock.

Monf. Trompefan, however, coming out to them, they immediately make their situation known to him, and intreat his instantaneous assistance. He informs them, that there is a reverend gentleman of his acquaintance not far off, chaplain to a Lord Anglois on his travels, who would do the job for them; but he fears he is not at home, as he sometimes takes a trip over the channel by night to serve his friends with a little of the best brandy;—but he recommends the young lady to put herself under his protection, as she is apprehensive of the arrival of her friends; that he will lodge her safe in a convent hard by, from whence she might return as soon as Dr. Viper could be found to perform the marriage ceremony.—Here Dicky Drugget going to the quay to hear if there were any tidings of the old folks, a scene of gallantry succeeds on the part of the French publican, in which, however, he is foiled; for on Drugget's return she tells him of Trompefan's behaviour, who gets out of the scrape by ascribing the liberties he had taken to French politesse, and by assuring them, that he was so desirous of serving them in their present distress, that his own wife should accompany the young lady to the convent, and then there could be no cause for suspecting his integrity; he retires with them in order to fulfil his engagement.

The next scene opens with Mr. and Mrs. Minnikin, their sister Clack, and Kit Codling, the young fishmonger, their intended son-in-law, who all come over in the packet in pursuit of Jenny; they soon hear of her having retired into a convent. Sir Harry Hamper appears, joins conversation with them, and proposes, as they are of the same country, that they may henceforth be considered as one family. This proposal, generously made by the one party, is candidly accepted by the other. They are about to retire to dinner, when the Capuchin enters, and as is customary with the religious of that order, he prefers his petition for eleemosynary relief. The strangers enter into conversation with the father, and he, as a recommendation to their favour, imparts unto them the whole news of the town. He relates the number and the quality of the English fugitives. There is one who had caught the gaol distemper whilst attending his own trial at the Old Bailey. He had been sentenced to try the efficacy of the American air. The troubles at present subsisting in that part of the world, had prevented him from obeying the laws of his country by the execution of such a scheme. He had therefore taken refuge at Calais, as a place affording a temporary asylum for such characters, “for it was, in fact, only an English colony well inhabited by knaves.”

Another of the English fugitives who resided at Calais was a very ingenious artist, who having tried his skill in the imitative part of writing, had subscribed the name of another person to a draft of some consequence. Thus was Calais, according to the capuchin, filled with English, of the honesty of whom there could be so little doubt, that the roguery of each might be safely asserted, without the person, who ventured the assertion, being liable to be questioned as a defamer.

The Minnikins and Mrs. Clack, finding the capuchin so intimately versed in the several characters of the place, doubted not but that he could instruct them in the method of gaining Jenny out of the nunnery. Jenny was the daughter of Mr. Minnikin, and the niece of Mrs. Clack. To retrieve her from a convential life, and marry—marry her to an object whom they had selected to be her conjugal partner, was the only inducement which had prompted their visit to Calais; and the only business they had to transact whilst they continued in that town. They advised with the capuchin as to the means of seducing Jenny, by stratagem, from the nunnery. He knew of no contrivance; and was even startled at the profanity of the proposal; until Mrs. Clack, perceiving from what his scruples originated, proposed the application of a golden specific, which might for ever silence them. The capuchin could not touch money. St. Francis had forbidden it. But the capuchin wore an habit, which was so made, as to be a kind of purse sufficient to hold whatever largesses the generosity of benefactors might induce them to contribute. The family took the hint. The holy father being feed properly, undertook to manage the business dexterously. The Minnikins and Mrs. Clack retire. Dominick, alias Viper, enters. He hath seen Jenny, and is racking his invention to obtain her, when, discovering the capuchin, he lays aside his reverie. The capuchin accosts him with a submissive bow. He intimates his necessities by an inclination of his head, and he shews the conveyance by which they may be supplied, by exhibiting the sleeve of his tunic.

The interest of a brother in distress doth not very sensibly affect Dominic. His charity is enclosed in a marble-hearted urn. His passions serve but as lighted torches to display the Mausoleum wherein that urn is placed. Dominic treats the Capuchin with all the insolence of wealthy scorn. The capuchin, on nearer inspection of his features, recognizes the man; and a conversation takes place, in which the capuchin charges Dominic with having been the doer of a scandalous chronicle, at the time when the good father was death hunter to the same paper. Dominic charges him with having, by his false paragraphs, killed several persons who were yet in perfect health. The capuchin pleads guilty of the charge; but alleges in his defence, that those were innocent murders, committed only to defray his necessities; whilst Dominic, by his venomous pen, had destroyed the reputations of the innocent. "Those whom I killed, says the Capuchin, felt no injury from the wound. My dead men are living and well, whilst those men whom your pen has suffered to live, had better be dead."

This altercation soon subsides; for both parties seem well convinced that neither can get any thing by the continuance of the dispute. Dominic proposes an amicable adjustment of the quarrel. The capuchin agrees to the proposal. Each acknowledges himself to be a knave, they agree henceforth to live in friendship, and to "hunt honestly in couples."

It is then proposed that the capuchin shall contrive the means of seducing Jenny from the convent, Dominic undertaking that Sir Harry shall pay him handsomely for the job.

The second act exhibits the scene of the nunnery in which Jenny has taken refuge. Her parents visit her at the grate. The mother abbeis declares the girl to have an inward vocation, and that St. Francis had taken her to his bosom. Her father observes, in answer to this, "That if St. Francis had taken Jenny to his bosom, he was sure the girl had spirit enough to kick his bowels out."

After a change of scenery, the real lover of the lady enters. He perceives the capuchin leading in the lady. The holy father leaves her with her lover. Dominic enters, and, to frustrate the wishes of both parties, he assures them of their danger, advises the lover to embark for England, as it is death by the law of France to seduce a lady from a nunnery. The young man obeys. Dominic prevails on the lady to entrust her person to his care, and her honour to his protection. On the assurance of his being a clergyman, she places full confidence in every benefit the sacredness of his character would stimulate him to confer. He retires with a declaration, that he means nothing more than what the duties of a christian prompted him to perform.

The capuchin, in conformity to a plot which had been concerted by Dominic, undertakes to pass himself on Sir Harry for the girl whom he was employed to procure. The meeting was to be in the dark. The deception is therefore supposed to be not difficult. Sir Harry is introduced groping his way into the room. The capuchin enters, and preparing him for the approach of the lady, feminizes his voice as much as possible. Sir Harry approaches his fair enamorado; seizes her supposed hand, and declares it rather larger than ordinary. Then proceeds to touch her cheeks, but unhappily he lays hold of the beard of the capuchin. Before he could recover from his astonishment, a noise is heard without. Jenny having entrusted herself to the protection of Dominic, has soon reason to perceive that the sacredness of his function affords little security to her honour. She cries aloud for help. Mr. and Mrs. Minnikin enter the house with an officer of the police. They are all surprised to find Sir Harry and the capuchin chambered together. Jenny and Dominic are are brought forth. The former flies to the arms of her parents. The latter is upbraided by the officer. Dominic, in reply, charges him with being descended from a parent who fought against the reigning family in the rebellion. The officer pleads guilty to the charge. But he glories that England has now a sovereign too gracious to visit parental transgressions, by inflicting sufferings on the innocent children. This same officer, however, still continues in the service of France. Whatever of gratitude he may feel, his mode of conduct is not altered. He still bears arms against the prince who had been so gracious as to save him from the gallows.

The capuchin, perceiving the gathering storm, sneaks off. Dominic, though threatened on all sides, braves the denunciations of every party.

Sir Harry is convinced of his folly, in being connected with so unworthy a character, and laments the errors into which it had betrayed him. Kit Codling, seeing the affections of Jenny are placed on Drugget, recommends it to her father and mother to approve of her choice, telling them, he intends to travel and make a larger tour. Mr. and Mrs. Minnikin, finding all opposition to their daughter's choice entirely fruitless, consent to make her happy, which concludes the piece.

The Capuchin was prefaced by a prologue, written by Mr. Colman, and spoken by Mr. Foote.

Though this piece cannot be ranked as the first of Mr. Foote's performances, it is by no means the last, except in the order of production. The first act is admirable. Trompefan's character is finely drawn, and highly coloured. Codling also is entirely an original. His remarks on the different manners of the French and English are very striking, and many of them entirely new; and his account of the English persons resident at Calais is full of pleasant satire. The friar's dialogue is poignant, but of a more dry and sarcastic turn than Mr. Foote generally gives to those parts which he performs himself. The scene with Viper is as correct and true a satire as ever was penned; but the introduction to it is rather heavy, and the business from the beginning of the second act is rather awkwardly conducted: the catastrophe, in particular, is destitute of that air of probability and nature, which a man of Mr. Foote's genius is expected ever to keep in view. The fact is, this piece laboured under a peculiar disadvantage; every man who knows the art of writing, knows how exceedingly difficult it is to take out a character; for the purpose of producing which alone, a piece has been written, and supply its place with any tolerable degree of success. The plot is in such a case entirely deranged; the incidents are necessarily much altered, and the denouement obliged to be new worked. This has been the case with The Capuchin; which was formerly The Trip to Calais. Much allowance, therefore, should be made by the critics.

ON the 26th of August, a new musical piece was performed at this theatre, called the Metamorphoses. The story is as follows:

Pedro, an old rich miser of Seville, is guardian to Marcella, whom he wants to marry, in order to possess himself of her fortune. The young lady entertains a passion for Lyfander, who also loves her. Fabio, servant to Lyfander, plans various means to convey his master's letters to his mistress, and to obtain the possession of her hand, which it appears she is not likely to bestow on him, unless she is rescued from the clutches of Pedro, who watches her with the most wary caution, and through the blundering conduct of Peres, Lyfander's servant, becomes acquainted with all his rival's schemes to get his ward from him. Notwithstanding this, Fabio, who is chief engineer to Lyfander, assumes different shapes, and dresses up his master likewise, by which means they surmount all difficulties and carry on their design. He first appears as a tinker, then as a sailor, who pretends madness: then as a ballad singer; and next as a bully, who draws Pedro aside to settle a point of honour, while his master slips into the old fellow's house and after a tete-a-tete, in which he is surprized by the guardian, carries off his mistress, by persuading Pedro himself to deliver her up under a veil, pretending that she had just run away from him, and was his wife, which the old fellow is simple enough to believe, as his maid Julietta has passed the stage veiled before him.

This piece is professedly a compilation from various authors. The main incident is as stale as any upon the stage;—that of Pedro's delivering his ward to Lyfander,—Moliere first started it, and it has been handled a thousand times since. We saw it last year in the Duenna, and we could quote various instances of the use of it. Peres is a direct copy of Lolpoop in Betterton's Wanton Wife.

To criticize the Metamorphoses with any sort of severity would be ridiculous. A musical piece is a sufficient warrant for absurdity,—we shall therefore content ourselves selfs with observing upon the whole, it is not equally entertaining with those of Mr. Dibdin's producing, which are now in acting. The music, though entirely Dibdinish, and a perpetual memento of something we have before heard, is not altogether destitute of merit, but is greatly inferior to the Padlock, and other compositions of the same gentleman. The first movement of the overture was pretty, and the quintetto at the end of the first act remarkably so.

The following airs pleased most :

AIR. Mr. BANNISTER.

I am a tinker by my trade,
Each day I live I mend ;
I'm such an universal friend,
I hide the faults by others made.
Work for the tinker, ho ! good wives ;
'Twere well, while I your kettles mend,
If you'd amend your lives.

The best that's going is my trade,
'Tis even better than the law ;
By them are breaches wider made,
I daily stop up many a flaw.

That we shou'd mend, is each man's cry,
A doctrine 'tis that all will teach ;
Then how much better pray, am I,
Who practise what they only preach ?

AIR. Mr. DIGHTON.

Ah, dear Marcella ! maid divine,
No more will I at fate repine,
If I this day behold thee mine,
For dearly do I love thee.

Thy ease shall be my sweet employ,
My constant care, my every joy,
May then no chance my hopes destroy.
For dearly do I love thee.

Sweet is the woodbine to the bee,
The rising sun to every tree,
But sweeter far art thou to me,
For dearly do I love thee.

And let me but behold thee mine,
No more will I at fate repine,
But while I live, thou maid divine,
With rapture will I love thee.

AIR. Mrs. JEWEL.

What state of life can be so blest,
As love that warms a lover's breast ;
Two souls in one the same desire,
To grant the bliss, and to require ?
But if in heav'n a hell we find,
'Tis all from thee, oh ! jealousy,
Thou tyrant of the mind.

False in thy glass all objects are,
Some set too near, and some too far ;
Thou art the fire of endless night,
The fire that burns, and giv'es no light.

All torments, ev'ry ill, we find
In only thee, oh ! jealousy,
Thou tyrant of the mind.

Adventures in a Coffee-House.

To the Editor.

S I R,

AS I stepped into a city coffee-house the other day to eat my slice of bread and butter, and take my coffee, I sat myself down immediately opposite a fat figure of a man, who with his hands tucked under his perriwig to support his head, was snoring away in the solidity of sleep, while a dish of coffee stood smoaking under his nose, and a plate with butter, and a roll upon it, in vain inviting his mouth. Let not the reader utterly detest me, if I should honestly confess the plain truth : upon putting my hand into my pocket, I made a certain discovery that made it adviseable for me to forbear calling for my coffee ; so I contented myself with feasting upon the news of the morning. It is a strange thing that Nature will attack a man at the most unseasonable periods. The appetites are sometimes very ill-bred, and will tease one without either considering time or place. The perusal of a paragraph is a meagre breakfast ; and I really own, I could have been very glad of mere animal gratifications. Just at this crisis I cast my eye upon the sleeper. " Here's a fellow now (said I) falls fast asleep over his coffee, and if he continues to dose much longer, it will be actually destroyed and good for nothing. Suppose now, I was to do him the good-natured office of taking it off before it is spoiled ?" I was actually, though involuntarily, proceeding to the cup and plate, when the proprietor of their contents opened upon me a pair of large, somnific, stupid eyes, and called the waiter to take away that damned cold stuff, for that he could not eat and drink so soon after his nap ; he paid for what he did not enjoy, and was going to waddle away. Never was I so tempted in my life to any thing, as to desire he would make a compliment of the said damned cold stuff to me. While this thought was in motion, an ill-shaped, bandy-legg'd, little, Jew-looking fellow came to the box, and took out of his pocket a large canvass purse, emptying without any ceremony its golden contents upon the table. I was miserable enough to have all these treasures within five inches of my fingers ends, and yet, though every one of them itched, I dared not extend my hand. I was almost ready to tell these two honest gentlemen, that five guineas would be the making of me for ever ; but shame and a knowledge of the world, got the better even

even of hunger and other solliciting wants; and so I only bit my nails the harder, and the nearer to the quirk, while the fellow was telling the cash. After it was done, the sleeper gathered up about 200*l.* carelessly, gave the purse a twist, and put it with an air of indolence, even while he yawn'd, in his waistcoat pocket; after which, telling the other man that he might go about his business, folded his arms together, and composed himself again to sleep. For the soul of me I could hold no longer; but thinking there might be a feeling heart under all that immensity of fat, I called for half a sheet of paper, and wrote upon it as follows:

‘SIR,

‘THE Gentleman who is now sitting opposite to you, has been witness to your receiving a large sum of money: he has a dear wife, and several children, and is this moment in the most critical situation in which a husband, a father, and a man can possibly be thrown into. I am a stranger, sir, but I am still a fellow-creature; and I can in ten minutes convince you, that I am a man of integrity, honour, and breeding. Will you relieve a whole family, by parting for a short time with a few guineas? I have not the confidence to meet your eye when you wake, therefore I shall fold my hands over my sight, and beg you will wake me, if you comply with my request. If you do not, pray leave me without the confusion of speaking on the subject. Farewell, sir.’

I folded up this Billet, and laid it close by him; and presently afterwards I looked through my fingers and beheld him take it up gazingly. He then threw his capacious eyes at me, got up, and calling the waiter, asked him, in a half whisper, whether it was easy for a man to escape out of Bedlam, and give his keeper the slip. After this Sally of pleasantry, he burst into a violent laugh, and went shaking his sides out of the coffee-room.

My situation cannot easily be imagined: I paid for my paper, execrated my folly, and hurried away with the burning blushes of disappointment. In my way to my own little apartment, I broke forth into such sentiments as these:

“Oh my God of Heaven! Is it—is it possible? Can the human heart be so egregiously inhuman? If this fellow did not chuse to relieve me, why, ah! why should he insult me! Why should he add the pains of indignity to those of indigence! How could he stoop from humanity so very low! But his heart will ache for his behaviour yet; and I shall hear that he suffers for it.”

As I was turning a corner, a poor female figure with a small bundle of matches invited my pity, with want in her face, sorrow in her voice, and grief in her eyes: “Indeed I am not a common beggar, sir (said she); my husband is too sick to labour, my children are too young to work—pity me then, and excuse me; a half-penny would buy us the bread we have wanted since last night.”

I had but a penny upon earth, but I had a dinner provided at home for my family: so I gave her the penny, and apologized for the size of the present. The woman said nothing; but looked every thing, laid her hand upon her heart, held her apron up to her eye, and went away.

What I felt upon this action Almighty God only can tell—He gave it, he only can describe it. I went up into my room, where I had no sooner entered than my wife threw her arms round my neck, and told me she had news for me—“Poor Mr. Jenkins, my love, (said she) has been grateful enough to return you the two guineas you lent him two years ago, and we may now make ourselves quite happy.” We sat down to dinner, and it was a most luxurious meal; for Love, Gratitude, Friendship, and Content were our guests. “Weep no more, my best Billy, (said my wife) after dinner; Providence never forsakes us, but assists us in the very moment of extremity. Little George is much better than he was in the morning; Sally’s fever is abated; I have got in a new supply of plain work, and Betty can quite master the Song you are so fond of; and so, if you chuse to indulge yourself in your half pint of wine she shall try her voice, and we shall be the happiest circle in the world.” “And is it possible, (said I) that Tenderness and Constancy should be thus superior to all the unwieldy apathy of Wealth and Plenty. Oh the warm glow of Sensibility! Oh the tender grace of the domestic heart! I feel it, I venerate it, I weep over it!”

In a few minutes my daughter, in a sweet and pathetic voice, sung the following verses:

S O N G.

I.

WHAT is splendour, what is wealth?

What the diamonds dazzling shine?

Real Riches glow in Health;

Those are genuine, those are mine!

II.

True it is, the coach of state,

The palace, and the costly fare,

Are to me denied by Fate:

These I lose—but these are care.

III.

Then begone the joys of gold,
Farewell folly, farewell dress!
Calmly I the heaps behold,
And only ask for Happiness.

An easy Way of preserving dead Bodies, as related by Mr. John Dryden, junior.

THE oddest and most surprising sight we ever beheld was at the Capuchins, in Palermo, about half a mile out of the gate that leads to Montreal, where one of those fathers conducted us down into a long cross vault under their church and convent. Here we saw an abundance of Capuchins standing in a row, one by another against the wall, seemingly in a devout posture; when coming near to them, we found they were so many dead men, all dried up, but with all the flesh and skin on their hands and faces entire, nor were the nerves rotted. This wonderful way of preserving their dead bodies they perform with the greatest ease imaginable, only by extending their dead on four or five cross sticks, over a receptacle or small place built up of brick, hollow, and in form of a coffin; and so the dead body continuing to lie thus extended or at length over this hollow, supported by the cross sticks, vents all its corruption away, and in a year's time the skin and flesh remain dry on the bones. We saw several standing up that had been dead but a year, with an inscription on the bodies who they were; for notwithstanding the bodies are all clothed in Capuchins habits, yet an abundance of them had been laymen and persons of the best quality in Palermo; and that which is almost incredible, the faces retained some resemblance of the persons to whom they did belong: for not only Mr. Gifford at first sight called them by their names, saying, this was a very honest fellow and my broker, this such a one, and so of the rest, but the father who led us down did in particular point to one of the dead bodies, who had been a Capuchin, saying, this father was a very handsome comely man; and indeed it appeared so, not only below, in respect of the other dead, but also above stairs, where he showed us the picture of that dead father, which he did to convince us that the dead had not lost the resemblance of what they had been formerly when alive.

Among these dead bodies there were many of an hundred years standing, which were as entire as the newest, and you might handle their faces and hands without damaging them.

This way of preserving the dead among the living is easy, I imagine, to be practised in any country; but in my mind it is but a very melancholy renewing of an acquaintance with our friends to see them in this posture; though in Catholic countries it serves to put those who come to see them, in mind of praying for their souls. Mr. Gifford told us, that he had already taken a place for himself to stand in among the dead of this vault.

The posture of two among those dead bodies was very remarkable; the one on its knees, with its arms extended, and hands closed, as at prayers; the other with its arms quite out at full stretch, standing upright in posture of one crucified. The account the fathers gave of these two was, that they had both been very devout in their lives; and that the body of that person which is in the posture of a crucifix could by no means be altered by the fathers, who had tied down the arms more than once when the corpse was fresh, and still found it soon returned to that posture, which therefore they judged to be the will of God that it should so remain, since it was known that person had been a great and devout contemplator of our blessed Saviour's passion: the same kind of an account they gave of the other body in the kneeling posture, averring that they found it raised of itself in that fashion, going in to visit the bodies that lay a venting in the close vault, which they open only for that end, or to put in a fresh body.

The Parting Lovers: A Dramatic Tale.

IN a delightful retirement, at a short distance from the city of Cadiz, a few years since, lived a gentleman of an ancient Spanish family, called Don Felix. His brother Don Pedro had been employed in a public character by the Court of Madrid, and possessed one of the best Governments in South America. Felix had been married some years, and Heaven favoured him with a daughter, called Angelina, as much distinguished for her beauty and virtue, as the brilliancy of her wit. Felix's wife was again pregnant, when his brother returned from America, and the latter, being resolved to live a bachelor, from a peculiarity of humour, declared, that, if the child, his sister-in-law should have, proved a boy, he would leave him his whole estate.

The lady was delivered soon after, and, to her great disappointment, of a girl. One of her friends, however, who knew Don Pedro's intention, thought it a pious fraud to deceive him, and, with the concurrence of the mother, reported the child was a male, and it was accordingly brought up with great care, as one of that sex.

A few years after Don Pedro died, and, upon his Will being opened, it appeared he

he had bequeathed his whole fortune to the supposed son of Felix, by which another kinsman, Ferdinand, was entirely excluded.

This young gentleman's situation interested every body in his favour, as he had been educated by Don Pedro; and it was generally believed, from his many amiable qualities, the former would have made a handsome provision for him. His connection with Felix's family, however, was not dropt in consequence of his disappointment, and he was constantly received in it as one of their own children.

The charms of Angelina were too great for Ferdinand to withstand, and he frequently expressed his admiration of them to her supposed brother, whom they had called after his uncle, Pedro. Angelina's affections, however, had been early engaged by a young English Gentleman, Mr. Manly, who had been recommended to her father, in consequence of his going to Cadiz upon his tour through Spain.

Ferdinand, who lived upon the most friendly footing with Pedro, had painted his passion for Angelina in such animated terms, that the young lady became in love with him herself; but, suspecting the instant she discovered her sex to him, he would probably assert his right to her fortune, she was under a necessity of acting with the utmost circumspection in so delicate a situation. After some consideration, she undertook to be mediator between him and Angelina, and told him that her sister, whatever appearances she might assume, was passionately fond of him; but feared to shew it, lest she should incur her father's displeasure, who had determined to marry her to a Spanish Grandee, from whom he had lately received very advantageous proposals.

Ferdinand's passion for Angelina increased upon this information, and her sister saw with regret she had only a bold card to play or lose him for ever. In order to carry her scheme into execution, she appointed a meeting between him and Angelina that night in the garden, and, putting on a habit suitable to her sex, met him in the place of her sister, where she acted her part so artfully, that Ferdinand thought himself the happiest man in the world at her consenting to his bringing a Priest with him the next evening, in order to unite them for ever. Suffice it to say, that the marriage ceremony was performed, after the supposed Pedro had stipulated with Ferdinand that it should be kept a profound secret.

During these transactions Manly was made exceedingly unhappy at the familiar manner in which Ferdinand behaved to Angelina. He frequently expostulated with the lady upon that subject, but received little satisfaction, as she could no more account for those freedoms than himself.

The composure of Ferdinand after he fancied he had been made happy by Angelina, was a new source of jealousy to Manly, which was increased by some intelligence he received from his servant, who was accidentally in the garden, and saw Ferdinand with a lady, whom he supposed to be his Master's Mistress, the night the former was married.

After many struggles Manly determined to part for ever from an object that gave him so much unhappiness. He acquainted Angelina with his intention, which hurt her pride so much that she resolved to imitate his example, drive him from her heart, and fix a more worthy object in his place. She directed her maid to tie up his letters, and collect all the presents he had made her, in order to return them to him. They met soon afterwards, attended by their servants, when Manly told her, with great appearance of resolution, he was determined never to see her more. She smiled at this speech, and declared she was perfectly easy whether she, from that moment, ever exchanged one word or look with him. On this he twitched her picture from his breast, and offered it to her with a look of disdain. This was returned by a bracelet being restored on her side, and their resentment seemed to have arrived to its highest pitch, when Manly, as he was hurrying out of the apartment, suddenly stopped, and, with a look of great contrition, repeated her name in the tenderest accents. He told her, a heart like his should not be treated so: She replied, in a faltering tone, she had not deserved his ill opinion, and that the heart where love presided could admit no thought against the honour of its Ruler. In short, an interesting conversation took place, which ended in a mutual forgiveness.

A few days after, a circumstance occurred which renewed the distress of the two lovers; for the supposed Pedro, having secured Ferdinand by the clandestine marriage in the garden, was apprehensive, if she met him often there, her imposition might be detected, and therefore favoured him with her company as seldom as possible.

This put the young gentleman out of humour; and he determined, whatever consequences might ensue, to declare his marriage with Angelina, who, he apprehended, treated him with great neglect and coldness. Determined upon this conduct, he proceeded to her apartment, and told her, with great warmth, he could live no longer without publishing their marriage; that he would run any hazard—whatever her father's resentment could execute—rather than exist without the enjoyment of her company.

The astonished lady thought him distracted, and told him so in plain terms. At this instant Manly entered the room, and a scene of confusion ensued, which is easier imagined than described. The lady asserting her innocence of the charge, and Ferdinand as positively insisting she was his wife, produced an altercation between him and Manly, which terminated in a challenge.

The sister of Angelina was thrown into the utmost confusion, on being applied to by Ferdinand to be his second upon this affair, which the latter, with the most solemn imprecations, declared arose from the perfidy of Angelina. She promised to attend him to the field, if matters could not be accommodated before the next morning, and flew to her sister and Manly, to whom she explained the whole mystery.

After the first emotions of surprise had subsided, they agreed to discover the truth to Don Felix. The old gentleman was soon reconciled to the step his daughter had taken; but, as well as herself, was greatly apprehensive of the bad consequences which might ensue by discovering to Ferdinand the trick which had been played him. No time, however, was to be lost; and Felix, after directing his daughter to appear in her feminine character, went in pursuit of Ferdinand, whom he accused, in the bitterest terms, of having destroyed Angelina's honour by a malevolent falsehood.

'So far from her being your wife,' said Felix, 'there is a lady now in my house who declares she has been for some time lawfully married to you, and the priest who joined you is ready to corroborate her testimony.' Saying this, he led the astonished youth to the apartment where Manly, Angelina, and her sister, richly adorned with female ornaments, were seated.

'There, Sir,' continued Don Felix, 'fits the lady who lays claim to you. We all intreat your forgiveness for having so long imposed upon you. In your old friend Pedro, see your wife, and receive with her a noble fortune, which in justice was yours before, but now the god of love has done you right.'

The amazement of Ferdinand is not to be expressed; but, his wife falling on her knees before him, he tenderly embraced her, protesting the proofs she had given him of her love deserved the greatest acknowledgments, and had intirely removed his passion for Angelina. 'Forgive me, madam,' said he, turning to that lady, 'if what I owe this virtue and these charms I, with my utmost care, my life, my soul, endeavour to repay.'

The natural conclusion of this Tale is what the Reader will no doubt anticipate, that Manly availed himself of this period of general joy, and obtained the consent of Don Felix to his marriage with Angelina, which was solemnised soon after with great pomp, and the future attentions of Ferdinand to his lovely Deceiver proved the truth of the declaration he made when he discovered the imposition.

A Letter from a Gentleman at Paris to his Friend in London.

Dear Sir,

THIS gay metropolis was never more crowded with our countrymen than at present, and never did English guineas fly about with greater rapidity.

My lords Anglois purchase very dearly their titles, though but temporary; and the ladies who plume themselves upon being des anges Angloises pay very handsomely for their descent on earth to be adored by French counts and marquises. The dutchess of Kingston is soon expected here, and will meet with a very cordial reception, notwithstanding the issue of her trial; her gallantries being considered as a mark of her taste; and her being capable of having two husbands at one time, as the strongest proof of her corporeal and mental charms. The French nobility are entirely ignorant of the nature of divorces, as jealousy is not among the number of passions or vices that disgrace this country. An affair that has lately happened here makes some noise. Mrs. Sc-tt, the late divorced wife of general Sc-tt, came over here a few months ago. Her intrigue in Scotland, and her detection at Barnett, were not generally known: her personal attractions every male beholder was convinced of; but none so forcibly as the Marquis de C——. This nobleman is possessed of a very ample fortune, and he resolved to please himself in the choice of a wife. Mrs. Sc-tt was formed to his mind, and he paid his addresses to her in an honourable manner. The bait was too alluring for her not to catch at it—she readily consented; but the marquis was a man of such nice honour, that he would not conclude the match till he had wrote to the lord her father for his consent. The old gentleman's answer was curious: he said, 'he had no objection to the match; but that he thought it incumbent on him, as a man of honour, to acquaint him, that her infidelity fidelity to her first husband had occasioned their separation, and for ever cancelled all paternal affection in his breast."

This answer produced no other effect upon the marquis than to inform Mrs. Sc-tt it had not in the least diminished his esteem for her, or altered his intention; that what was past he cast an entire veil over, provided she made him a good wife. She was charmed with his generous sentiments, and promised the strictest regard to the conjugal vow; they were married, and are considered as the happiest couple upon the ton in all France.

As to politics, I know you expect none from me, I shall not, therefore, disappoint you. The Coffe de Canté swarms with politicians; but I never go near them, and leave them in astonishment to think that an Englishman can so far have divested himself of his national disposition as not to trouble his head about the political state of Europe.

I am, Sir,

The Journal of a Woman of High Taste for a Week.

I Am young, not ugly, and possessed of what is called a genteel fortune: I am therefore rather importuned by the men; but as I shall not chuse, when I change my name, to alter my style of life, I have drawn up a journal for a week, that the man who marries me may know what he has to expect.

Sunday. Rose late, not having any thing material to do—In twenty minds whether I should go to church or not—Upon looking in the glass happened to be pleased with the air of my head—ordered my chair—might as well have staid at home—little company, so chatted most part of the time with Mrs. Cautic, who pulled half the congregation to pieces. Mem. People who live regularly, and come constantly to church, are not a bit better than one of us. Made fifteen morning visits—Walked in the green—Wind monstrous high—Shewed my new slippers to advantage, though there were scarce any but the mob to see them—Dined alone—quite stupid, and so sat down to begin my journal—threw it aside—did not know what to do with myself—sat upon every chair in the room—Perked up at seven, and dressed for lady Counter's rout—Held shocking cards, and actually lost fifty guineas at loo, which lord Lurcher offered to lend me. Mem. It is not come to that yet. Went to bed excessively out of humour, and dreamed that I had lost every thing, and that I had a crowd of fine fellows laying their hearts and fortunes, like so many corporation addresses, at my feet.—Mem. The latter part of the dream not amiss.

Monday. Rose early, being determined to order a polonese after a fancy of my own, which should both elevate and surprise; which should, by adorning my person, raise the envy of every other woman, and make her ready to tear my eyes out—Gave up the whole morning to this laudable design, in close consultation with Pinup, my woman, and the habit-maker.—Three o'clock; tired to death with their nonsense, ordered my chair—Slipped out in an undress, to dine with my most intimate friend Mrs. Lovejoy, a pretty young widow, left with four qualling brats, and a very small jointure—Communicate my design to her, because I know the scantiness of her purse would not permit her to rival me—Left her dying with envy, and came home to order an additional trimming—Sat jogging my foot and meditating on the conquests I should make—Sir George Freeair announced—Ran to the glass—Hair derangée—Was going to be denied—but finding myself in a humour to trifle, admitted him. Divinely dressed! but looked more at himself than me—An impertinent coxcomb. Mem. Determined to think no more of him.

Tuesday. Lay in bed late, thinking that Sir George might really have made me half in love with him if he had taken the right method. Mem. The men are all fools. A visit from lady Harriot Hair-brain before I had done breakfast—Desired to go with her to hear the ode—A great deal of good company there—Told by lord Courtly that I was handsomer than the Venus of Medicis. Mem. His title agreeable enough; but an Irish peer with a poor estate is not the thing. Began to think I should never be married—Found by the bills that Fischer was to play—Sent in a hurry to Lovejoy's insisting upon her being my chaperon—Went late on purpose to make the fellows stare—Told by Lovejoy that she was charmed with my fancy in my new polonese, and that she resolved to have one of the same; adding, that she would keep the children another half year from learning to dance, as she was one of their guardians, and let them live entirely upon potatoes and milk.

Wednesday. Waked by Pinup, who told me that the habit-maker waited—Rose in an instant, tried on my polonese, and found myself an absolute nymph—Not a sufficient disguise for the masked ball—Having appeared in almost every female character but a Mad-woman, fixed upon that, as it would allow a vast scope for the imagination in dress, sentiments, and language—Began to practise my attitudes before the glass, while Pinup was decorating my hair with straw—Interrupted by Sir George—Intreated to admit him of my party—Hesitated whether I should or should not consent—Recollecting that the woman who deliberates is lost, granted his request—Threw him into ecstasies—Apprehensive of having gone too far—told him that I had changed my mind, made him a courtly, and wished him a good morning, adding, that I was engaged for the rest of the day—Heard him mutter the words confounded flirt, while he flew out of the house, and laughed aloud at his disappointment—Order my chair to lady Figet's—Joined by a very smart officer in the guards, destined to America. Mem. How ridiculous, to send all the fellows out of the kingdom!—Talked to Mrs. Clackit, about powder for cleaning the teeth—Informed by her where to get the best rouge: and assured by her, upon her honour, that Miss Bloom painted white, half an inch deep—Hurried from thence to Mr. Tripit's ball—Danced an allemand with lord Languish—Frowned on by Sir George Free love the whole time, who wanted however to engage me for cotillions afterwards. Mem. Men are capricious creatures.

Thursday. Waked with a violent headache, after having danced all night with Sir George—Huddled on my cloaths, and went a shopping with Mrs. Sharply and Miss Craveall—Turned over an infinite number of silks, but bought nothing—No variety—No new patterns—Ordered a suit of lace, but without knowing whether I could pay for it—Stepped into a warehouse to choose a masque—Stumbled upon Sir George's domino by chance—Determined to plague him all night—Longed for the evening—Prevented from dressing by a formal set of relations from the country, who think that going to the masquerade is very little better than going to the devil. Mem. How detestable are such tabbies!—Yawned till they left me, and then dressed for Masquerade—Followed Free love, and told him a fine story of Miss Lovely—Found him eager to discover me, but was too cunning for him—Had the satisfaction of hearing the pretty mad woman admired—Refused dancing with a masque whom I did not like, and seeing Sir George near me, screamed, when he became impertinent, and affected to faint—A quarrel on my account, and a challenge. Mem. Nothing makes a woman so much talked of, nothing raises her consequence so much as a duel: when a woman is known to be the taste, she may do just what she pleases.

Friday. Did not rise till noon, having been up all night—Sat with the hair-dresser till dinner was upon table, as my head had not been combed out for six weeks—Obliged to visit some cousins—A most tiresome evening—Pestered with a thousand questions—Minutely criticised, and awkwardly imitated. Told by my aunt that it was not proper for young women to be out late by themselves—Waited on home by a horrid common-council-man, who would have made love to me in the coach—Treated him, in return, with such ineffable contempt, that he will not, I imagine, attempt to speak to a woman of fashion again in a hurry.

Saturday. Received, as soon as I was up, a letter from Sir George, requiring a kind of categorical answer to his proposals. Mem. Does the man think I am mad in earnest, to give up my liberty already? On second thoughts, married women may take prodigious freedoms—Did not chuse to send Sir George a serious answer—Received a visit from him in person in a couple of hours—Was found by him with a young fellow, who came purely to kill time—Accosted him with a shout, and told him that I thought he had either been run through the body, or shot through the head—Disconcerted on his leaving me with an impertinent reply—Shut myself up to consider how I should recall him—Went to bed at one in the morning (earlier by two hours than in any night in the whole week) without being able to think of any thing to the purpose.

Such is my journal for a week, and if you think it merits a place in your Magazine, among your other literary curiosities, it is very much at your service.

CHARLOTTE SPRIGHTLY.

The Attraction and Direction of the Loadstone accounted for.

AS there is a continual or uninterrupted current of air passing from each Pole to the Equator, and a perpetual succession of streams of light from the Equator to the Pole; and as the Loadstone is composed of different laminæ, which run in a direct line from one end of the stone to the other: and as the pores in the parts which compose the sides of these laminæ, are impenetrable by light in particles of the same size with those which pass through the interstices between the laminæ of the stone; from this form we may easily imagine that the current of light, or Æther, going from the Equator (which is in much the smallest particles) gains entrance at the north end of the loadstone.—[By which the author means, that end which points to the south.]

The

The particles of air coming from the Equator to each Pole are of different sizes; and then as the loadstone, from the smallness of its pores, admits nothing through it but light, the remaining particles of the air will be forced off on each side of the loadstone by the succeeding current of light and air, in the same manner as water is through the arches of a bridge; where we see, that after the middle arch, where the stream is the strongest, has admitted as much of the water as it can contain, the remainder is turned off on each side; so the loadstone admitting nothing but particles of light, the remainder of the air (which is too large to pass through the pores of the loadstone) is forced off on each side of it by the following current of air. And it must necessarily happen, that the loadstone, or magnetic needle, when hung at liberty, will point north and south; for this current of light striking against its superficies, and not being able to enter the loadstone or needle in that direction, it must cause an alteration in its situation, till the length of its pores coincide with the direction of the above current.

The reason why iron or steel is the thing which the loadstone attracts is, because the iron is composed of matter that hath the same kind of pores, and of the same size with those of the loadstone, which are filled with particles of light, or æther, of the same size or kind.

That the attraction of the loadstone is not caused from any magnetical effluvia, or part of the very substance of the stone continually flying off from it (as has been generally imagined) may with ease be proved beyond contradiction; for was this the case, whenever a steel-bar is made magnetical, the loadstone must lose some of its weight, and the steel-bar receive an addition to its weight: but we find just the contrary to this happens; the loadstone continues the same, and the steel-bar, instead of gaining, loses part of its own weight. We also find, that we can give a steel-bar a power of magnetism stronger or weaker in proportion to its hardness, and to the force with which this æther is pushed through it, by being touched with another loadstone; and we also find that where a loadstone is not to be had, yet the magnetic power is easily given it, by striking it in a strait direction with a piece of iron only; which proves to a demonstration, that this magnetical power proceeds from the current of air forcing the æther in strait lines through its length, and not from any magnetical effluvia, or power inherent in the loadstone.

THE sole question of the pre-eminence between the antients and the moderns, being once rightly understood, comes to this: Whether trees were formerly higher than they are now? If so, Homer, Plato, Demosthenes, cannot be equalled in these latter ages; but if our trees are as tall as those of old, we may equal them. Let us explain this paradox. If the antients had more wit than we, it follows that the brains of those times were better disposed, formed of firmer or more delicate fibres, and filled with a greater quantity of animal spirits: but by what means should the brains of those times have been better disposed? The trees ought then to have been higher and more beautiful, for if nature was then younger and more vigorous, trees, as well as the brains of men, ought to have felt the influence of that youthful vigour. When the admirers of the antients tell us, that they are the springs of judgment and reason, and the lights designed to enlighten the rest of mankind, that the measure of our admiration of them is the test of our wit, and that nature has exhausted herself to produce these great originals; in truth, they represent them of another kind than us, and natural philosophy cannot be reconciled to all these fine phrases. Nature hath in her hands a certain clay that is always the same, which she turns and handles continually a thousand different ways, and out of which she forms men, animals, and vegetables; and certainly she hath not shaped Plato, Demosthenes, or Homer, of a finer or better prepared earth than our modern philosophers, orators, and poets. What I observe here is with respect to our spirits that are not of a material nature, and by their different dispositions produce all the differences that are among them.

It is plain, that all the differences between the antients and us, must be occasioned by foreign circumstances, as time, government, and the state of the generality of affairs. The antients, some will say, have invented all, therefore they possessed more genius than us; but this does not follow, they were only before us. They may as well be extolled for having drank before us the water of our rivers, and we lessened and scorned for only drinking their leavings. Had we been in their place we should have invented; were they in ours, they would add to what they found already invented. There is no great mystery in all this.

I do not speak of those inventions which owe their birth merely to chance, and which may honour the greatest blockhead in the world: I only speak of that which required some meditation and effort of spirit. It is certain that the meanest of that kind have been reserved for extraordinary men; and that all we could have expected from Archimedes, in the world's infancy, might have been to invent the plough; whereas placed in another age, with glasses he contracts the sun's dilated rays, and burns the Roman ships, if this be not a fable.

If we would give specious and dazzling proofs, it might be affirmed, to the glory of the moderns, that the mind hath no need of a greater effort for the first discoveries; and that nature seems to lead us to them herself: but that there is need of a greater effort to add something to a discovery, and the greater in proportion to what additions it hath already received, because the matter is then found more drained, and what remains to be discovered of it, is less exposed to our eyes. Perhaps the admirers of antiquity would not neglect such an argument, if it favoured their party; but I freely confess it is not solid. It is true, that to add to the first discoveries, there is often need of a greater effort. The mind is already enlightened by those discoveries, which are already made. We have insights borrowed from others, which add themselves to those of our own stock; and if we surpass the first inventor, it was he helped us to do it: so that he always partakes of the glory of our work; and if he withdrew what belongs to him, we should have no more share in it than he.

I am even so nicely conscientious in this point, that I do not charge the antients with an infinite number of false ideas, false consequences they have drawn, and foolish things that they have said. Such is our condition, that we are not allowed to attain all at once to any thing that is reasonable upon any subject whatsoever; we are first obliged to go astray a long time, and wander through several sorts of errors, and various degrees of impertinence. One would imagine that it ought always to have been very easy to discover that all the daily sport of nature consists in the figures and motions of bodies: yet before we could reach to this, we have been obliged to try the ideas of Plato, the numbers of Pythagoras, and the qualities of Aristotle; and all these having been found to be false, the world hath been reduced to take the true system. I say reduced, for in truth there was never another left; and it seems men have received it as late as they could. We are obliged to the antients for having drained for us most of the false ideas we could have had; there was an absolute necessity of paying to error and ignorance the tribute which they have paid, and we ought to be grateful to those who have discharged us from it. The like happens upon various occasions, wherein there is an infinite number of foolish things, which we could say, had they not been said, and, as it were, snatched from us already. Nevertheless, some of the moderns seize on them again, because they have not yet been said often enough. Being thus enlightened by the lights, and even by the faults of the antients, it is not to be wondered at if we surpass them: only to equal them, would prove us of a nature much inferior to theirs, and rob us of the title of men, whilst we know they were no more.

I am afraid that many will not be reconciled to the following remark; yet I will venture to give it for those who have a nice taste of reasoning.

The antients are subject not to reason with the nicest precision. With them weak conveniencies, little similitudes, witticisms not over solid, wide and confused discourses with digressions, often pass for proofs, and thus, indeed, they easily prove any thing: but what the antients used to demonstrate with so much ease, would cost a great deal of labour to the poor moderns: for how severe are we not grown in point of reasonings? they must now be intelligible, just and conclusive. The world is so critical as to point out the least equivocal expression, either of ideas or of words; and so severe as to condemn the most ingenious thing if it does not come to the point. Before Newton, Bacon, and Locke, people used to reason with more ease; the former ages are very happy not to have had these great men. In short, there is to be found, not only in our works of natural philosophy and metaphysics, but also in those of religion, morality, and criticism, an exact justness, and nice discrimination, but little known to former ages. I am even very much assured that they will be brought to a still greater perfection, as we shall one day be antients too, and then it will be very reasonable that our posterity, in their turn, correct and outdo us, principally in the manner of reasoning, which is a particular science, and though the most difficult, the least cultivated of any.

Monday, March 4.

LORD North moved, that the resolutions of the committee of supply be reported. The first resolution being read, Colonel Barre pointed out several objectionable passages in the treaties; allowing the hiring foreign troops, even for argument sake, to be a wife and politic measure, he desired to know, in the first instance, as the treaty provided that the Hessian officers should have every emolument that natives are allowed, and to be put on a footing, in every respect, with our own tried veterans, whether the two-pences in the cloathing to the colonels, were meant to be included, and likewise where the cloathing was to be procured, whether in Germany or in Britain? He was very jocular on this species of military profit; and said, he did not doubt but this sale of human blood would turn out as advantageous to the woollen manufactures of Brunswick and Hesse, in the cloathing branch, as it was already likely to become lucrative to their respective sovereigns. He observed, that the treaty might probably continue in force for four years, for it was difficult to fix the period on many accounts, which he forebore now to mention; if then, by any accident arising from defeat, pestilence, or the danger of the seas, the Hessians should be reduced to 8000 men, perhaps to half their number or less, in such a possible, nay all circumstances considered, such a probable event, he should be glad to be informed by the minister, or his trusty friend the minister of the war department, who now and then steals a peep into the cabinet, though he is never permitted within the hallowed door, whether the Landgrave of Hesse, or Duke of Brunswick, is to have the full pay, as if their respective quotas continued full and complete?

Lord Barrington replied, he could not answer that question till he had taken time to consider. After a little pause, his Lordship said, "The best time to answer the honourable gentleman's question will be, when such a reduction actually happens."

Mr. J. Johnstone said, it was impossible to deal with people who thus played at cross-purposes; and though a young member, he ventured to pronounce it to be the first time that ever such an answer was offered to be given in parliament. He remarked, it was no bad beginning: the noble Lord used to be pretty liberal of his promises; but so many of them had been lately either falsified or overruled. his Lordship, he presumed, was determined, in future, to make only such as he was certain could neither be falsified nor contradicted; for his promise, if it could be at all called one, was such, that let the event be what it might, he could not possibly be charged with a breach of it.

Lord Clare said, it was the first time he ever heard a minister called to promise for events it was impossible for any man at present, September, 1776.

sent to foretel. The whole force now sending to America might be cut off; or it might not suffer the loss of a single man; but in either event it was plain, that we should not be obliged to pay for more men than were in actual service; it being evident, that as we were obliged to pay the expence of recruiting, it could not at the same time be expected that we should pay for the non-effective.

Sir John Griffin Griffin allowed that the noble lord's observation was very just; it could not be supposed that we were to be at the expence of recruiting, and be obliged to pay for levies that were not complete; but yet it seemed a little extraordinary, that the noble lord in office should have expressed himself so cautiously on a matter, which if it had not been mentioned, did not, in his opinion, leave the least foundation for ambiguity or misrepresentation.

Governor Johnstone was severe on administration: he said, whether we had a double cabinet, or had not, he would not pretend to determine; but he was certain that we had a double administration, or the same men presented two faces, according as it answered their present convenience, or suited their present views. One minister [Lord Hillsborough] assured the Americans, in the most solemn manner, that it was never the intention or wish of this country, to tax them. The other [Lord North] had the other night in debate, openly and decisively declared, that America ought, and should submit to be taxed by the British Parliament, and to every law this country might think proper to pass for her future government and regulation.

General Conway observed, it was true enough that the noble Lord alluded to [Lord Hillsborough] had broke his word with America; and so had administration, as approving of the circular letter, in which every claim to taxation was formally renounced; but for his part, it appeared to him from the very beginning, whatever assurances to the contrary might have been given or held out, to the present moment, that what the country gentlemen avow to be their motives for prosecuting the war against America, were likewise the great objects administration had in view. Administration told the country gentlemen, support us and we will ensure you a revenue from America. The country gentlemen are now giving that support, in expectation of getting a revenue, of which perhaps they will never see a shilling; or if they should, never to be of the least service in lightening those heavy burdens, of which they now so loudly complain.

Mr. Fox attacked the minister on his frequent breach of promise, ever since he came into office; not but in his opinion he was full as much bound by a promise when he was only chancellor of the Exchequer, as since he became first Lord of the Treasury. He was not deserving of the first, if he could retain an office, the very essence of which was to look into and take care of the public finances of the nation; and yet permit a letter which

at once gave up and surrendered so fundamental a right of the British parliament, as the right of taxation was now contending to be; for either he approved of the letter in question or he did not. If he did, how can he now come and contradict his former opinion, when he and his colleague's approbation of that letter is perhaps the very cause of the present civil war? Or, if he never approved of the letter, how could he, consistently with his own honour, remain in a situation in which he was virtually pledged for a true and faithful performance of its contents? Why not resign, sooner than give his concurrence in council to measures of which he secretly disapproved?

Lord North denied that he was bound by any man's promise but his own. It did not become him to disclose the secrets of his office, or betray the confidence that had been reposed in him. It was enough for him now to declare, that he never gave either promise or assurance, and that consequently, he had not broken any.

The resolution being read a second time, the question was put, "Is it your pleasure to agree with your committee in this resolution?" And the House divided, ayes 120; noes 48. The question was put likewise on the other resolution, and agreed to without division.

Colonel Barre then rose, and made the following motion: "That an humble address be presented to his majesty to humbly desire him to use his interest, that the German troops in the British pay, now or hereafter, may be clothed with the manufactures of this country." Agreed to.

Tuesday, March 5.] Second reading of the Scotch militia bill.

Right Honourable T. Townshend said, he had been always averse to any further encrease of a perpetual armed force, as it had been uniformly fatal to the liberties of every country where such a destructive policy was permitted to prevail. The liberties of France had been overthrown by a standing military establishment; and so had every free government in Europe. But if he had no fears on that account, he owned he had very strong objections on the ground of expence, and the disproportion between the quantum of taxes paid by the people of the southern and northern parts of this island. The House, he observed, was then much thinner, than from the importance of the subject now under discussion might be well expected, but supposed it would be shortly much fuller; at which time, he said, he would move to postpone the further consideration of the bill for three months. He passed several compliments on the candour and parliamentary decorum of the noble Lord [Lord Mounstuart] who brought in the bill, in putting it off from time to time, in expectation of its at length being discussed in a full house; that, however, from the disinclination to public business, which had been manifested since the commencement of the present session, was more than was to be expected.

Mr. Dempster. He declared how painful it was always to him, when he found himself under the necessity of differing from his right honourable friend; but he believed, when the bill should come into a committee, that gentleman, as well as many others who now disapproved of it, would very probably change their sentiments. The expence would not be so great as some gentlemen might be inclined to believe, as the whole number meant to be embodied, was no more than 6000 men; who were to be paid out of the Scotch revenue. In answer to the great disproportion between the taxes, he urged, that except the land-tax, all other duties and taxes stood upon an equal footing in both countries; and he presumed, were proportioned to the abilities of those on whom they were raised. As to the land-tax, it was fixed by solemn and national compact at the treaty of union.

Lord John Cavendish. If a militia for Scotland be at all necessary, it should be only on the condition of Scotland bearing the additional expence, and laying that burden on her own lands, which were very low taxed, and not pay it out of the customs and excises, the produce of which was already appropriated. The militia was a force raised by the land-owners to defend their property; the expence was borne by them, and directly paid out of the land-tax. The proportion which Scotland bore of that tax was hardly worth mentioning; one county in England paying more than the whole kingdom of Scotland. Besides, the share Scotland bore in national representation was not above the proportion of one to eleven; so that taking it in any light, either of taxation or representation, Scotland was intitled to no militia, unless she accepted of that privilege, and took it with all its consequences; namely, defraying the whole expence, or submitting to pay such a proportion of the land-tax, as would entitle her to the favour she seemed so desirous of obtaining.

Right hon. Sir Gilbert Elliot said, a well-ordered militia in Scotland would be the means of giving additional strength and security to the whole island; and contended, if such a body of men had existed in the years 1715 and 1745, those rebellions would have been crushed in the very commencement. It was the bad policy of those times, that those who are ill affected to the government were provided with the means of disturbing the public tranquility, while those who were dutiful and loyal subjects, were left at their mercy, naked and defenceless. The evil now no longer existed in one instance, and he hoped it would be likewise removed in the other.

Mr. Burke. In his opinion, Scotland was neither properly taxed, nor fully represented; nor until she was, could she be entitled to the favour now desired. The proportion between the numbers to be embodied in both kingdoms, was in a proportion of one to five, whereas Scotland did not pay above one-fortieth of the land tax, the very specific tax out of which the money for the pay and cloathing of the militia was to be drawn. He therefore could not possibly conceive how the people of that country could come to parliament, and expect that a Scotch militia, at least five-sixths of the expence to be incurred by such an establishment, must be paid by English land-owners. It was an absurdity on the very face of it; it was directly repugnant to the first principles on which a national militia was formed or paid. He had other objections against against the bill; one was, that it threw more power into the hands of the crown than had hitherto been thought consistent with public liberty. In king William's time, when one half of the kingdom were attached to their exiled prince, and when one of the most powerful and ambitious monarchs that ever sat on the French throne, or any throne in Europe for several centuries, and who besides had a personal enmity to our new-elected king, even in such a critical season as that, 7000 standing forces were thought fully sufficient to protect this kingdom against all its open foes and secret enemies; and will any man, who wishes to be believed, pretend to tell us, that a standing force of five times the number, in times of profound peace, and an English militia of 32,000 men, are not, when none of those causes exist, fully adequate to every purpose of preserving domestic tranquility, and of repelling any attempts of our foreign enemies?

Governor Johnstone allowed, that the land-tax paid by Scotland, bore no proportion to the proposed number to be embodied, but that was but one tax; for in every other respect Scotland paid to the extent of her abilities; and though perhaps the other taxes did not rise in proportion as they had done in England, that proved no more than that the former had not increased equally in riches with the latter. He said there was a circumstance which deserved consideration; that was, that the greatest part of the landed income of Scotland was spent in England, therefore in point of material benefit, the difference was very little to this country, whether that was taxed three-pence, or four shillings in the pound; for the money, the principal as well as part of the land-tax thus remitted, ultimately centered here. He observed too, that the present bill was in some respects better than the English militia act, because it contained a clause that no man should be permitted to serve twice as a substitute, which would be the means of training a much greater number of men to the use of arms.

Sir Adam Fergusson disclaimed all partiality or local prejudices. Said he did not take up the matter as a Scotchman, but as a Briton, because he believed it would be a means of procuring a complete national defence. He was surprized to hear so much said about the disproportion of the revenue of this country, and that when a moment's impartial consideration would point out, that a revenue could not be raised in two places on the same sum! The greatest part of the landed income arising in Scotland was drawn out of it and spent here. What matter then to this country, whether the money was collected in Middlesex or in the shire of Edinburgh? If it made any difference, it was the convenience of collecting the revenues on the spot. But besides the revenues acquired in this manner, how were they increased through the medium of our manufactures? Nay, he had no doubt, if the amount of the revenue, on the English manufactures, sent to, and consumed in Scotland, were properly stated, it would exceed the whole of the revenue, arising from the consumption of all North-America.⁶ Look at the labouring man's hat, it is English. Look at his coat, it is English. His shoes, stockings, and buckles are all English. Look again at the wives and daughters of every rank, from the duke to the peasant, and their gowns, ribbons, &c. are all English. He observed, that several persons of rank, who held offices of great profit in Scotland, resided constantly in England. Among others he alluded to a noble Lord in the House, [Lord Frederick Campbell] and a noble Duke in the other, [the Duke of Queenberry]. In short, as the treaty of union had abolished the names of Englishman and Scotchman, and united them in that of Briton, he wished that all local distinctions were forgotten, and that individuals, copying the language of the legislature, would do the same.

Mr. Byng opposed the commitment, chiefly on the ground of the expence. He was of opinion that no necessity at present existed for a militia in Scotland; and as there did not, he thought it would be only incurring an expence to answer no solid or beneficial purpose whatever.

Sir Cecil Wray said he had been always for a militia, as the only sure and safe constitutional defence; that he had acted under the law for several years as deputy-lieutenant, and experience had convinced him how well suited it was to effect the purposes for which it was first established.

Lord Frederick Campbell said, the honourable gentleman [Sir Adam Fergusson] he understood had alluded to him, as spending the money derived from his office in this country; but he begged leave to assure him, that for the last two years he had resided more in Scotland than in England; and if the honourable gentleman would repay him the money his office had cost him, he should have all the money he ever received, with all its emoluments, and the office itself into the bargain. He thought it therefore not fair to compare him to the noble Duke, who had not so much as seen Scotland for several years.

Mr. Turner, against militias in general, said they were the cause of idleness; and, in times of real danger, would be of very little use.

Mr. Powys gave notice, that he would move a clause in the committee, to confine the Scotch militia to that part of the island.

Wednesday, March 6.] The Lord Mayor [Mr. Sawbridge] made his annual motion, that leave be given to bring in a bill to shorten the duration of Parliaments.

Mr. Turner seconded the motion.

Mr. Alderman Bull. As I consider the question now before us of infinite importance, I cannot content myself with giving it a silent vote.

The frequent instructions our constituents have given, to attempt in this instance a restoration of the constitution, is to me an additional recommendation of it.

The Livery of London, Sir, are the most numerous body of electors in the kingdom; and I can with confidence assert, that on this point the greatest unanimity prevails amongst them. In this respect they are by no means singular; for if you refer to the opinions of all parties, as delivered in an almost infinite number of instructions and recommendations from the year 1716, when that violation of the people's rights, the septennial act, passed, to the present time, you will find, that the utmost dread and apprehension of the evil consequences of that act are expected, accompanied with the most earnest recommendations to their representatives, to obtain a repeal of it, that the people may be thereby restored to their ancient right of frequently electing new Parliaments.

The concurring testimony of all sorts of men, on a great variety of occasions, it might reasonably be supposed, would obtain without difficulty a point so important to their interests; and but for the experience of many years, it would be thought incredible, that the bulk of the people should thus earnestly solicit, and yet solicit in vain.

Short Parliaments, Sir, are essential to the security of the English liberty.

Power cannot revert too often to those to whom it belongs; and the more frequent the appeal is made to the people, the more entire will be their confidence in the executive parts of government.

I consider the many calamities which we at present labour under, as resulting from long Parliaments; under their sanction and influence corruption has been reduced to a system; and it will be happy for posterity if it does not eventually sap the very foundations of our once glorious constitution, and overwhelm it in irretrievable destruction.

Bad ministers confide in long Parliaments, and consider them as their great security. Hence it is the people are surprised and betrayed, one Parliament suddenly dissolved, and another speedily elected, and power thereby almost perpetuated. But for this security can it be supposed, that in our days we should have such undue exertions of ministerial power, as the people have complained of?

Should we have seen the glories of a successful war obscured by a shameful and ignominious peace? The privileges of the members of this House sacrificed, in the person of an individual, to private resentment; the rights of the electors violated; enormous sums granted without enquiry, and without account; Popery established under a Protestant government; and a long black catalogue of other enormities? Should we, Sir, have had these things to complain of, but for the influence of corruption, and that increased and established by long Parliaments?

I will venture to say we should not. I will only add, that if we have any regard for the virtue of the people; if we wish to preserve the constitution and all that is dear to a free nation; if we respect the opinions of a manifest majority of our constituents; and if we have any regard to our own reputation as independent men; and as uncontaminated by ministerial influence, we shall all give our most hearty Amen to this question.

Sir George Yonge spoke in favour of the motion.

There was no reply.

The question was called for, and put. For the motion 64: against it 158.

Thursday, March 7.] Examined evidence on Hindon incapacitating bill. Adjourned it to the 19th.

Friday, March 8.] Lord Barrington gave notice that he should move the House on Monday next the 11th, "That a supply be granted to his Majesty for the extraordinaries of the army for the current year."

Colonel Barre made several observations on the articles of expence contained in the accounts of the extraordinaries of the army in North-America. It appeared to him, from the accounts of the extraordinaries for North-America, that the sum of 600,000*l.* was charged for the support of 6000 men in Boston only, which is at the rate of 100*l.* per annum for every soldier; what then, he asked, must it cost the nation, if it be found necessary to employ 40,000 men on this fatal service, who are to be supplied with all the necessaries of human life (water excepted) from this country? He added, that he could not return home to his constituents with a safe conscience, without calling for a particular account of the expenditure of such a sum, to know in what the charge consists, so as to justify his voting the supply on Monday next. He therefore begged leave to make the following motion, "That there be laid before this House, copies of the requisitions made by the commander in chief of his Majesty's forces in North-America, on which the sums have been advanced (which appear in the account of extraordinary services incurred, and paid by the Right Honourable Richard Rigby, pay-master-general of his Majesty's forces, between the 9th of March 1775, and the 31st of January 1776, and not provided for by Parliament, to have been advanced) to Thomas Harley and Henry Drummond, Esquires, to be by them applied and invested in the purchasing Spanish and Portugal coins, for the use and service of his Majesty's forces in North-America, together with an account of the expenditure thereof, as far as the same can be made up."

Mr. D. Hartley seconded the motion. He spoke of the propriety of it, and expatiated upon the necessity, on many accounts, of going into the proposed enquiry.

Lord North promised to lay before the House the requisitions of the commander in chief, on which the warrants from the Treasury were issued; but as for the accounts of the expenditures, he said they were not made out; many of them were not arrived; all the money issued was not expended; it was necessary, in case of emergencies, that the commander in chief should have sums in hand; consequently of these it was impossible to give any account till they were expended by him: but such accounts of expenditures as were arrived should be laid before the House.

Sir Grey Cooper said, the requisitions of the commander in chief were the vouchers for the warrants of the Treasury.

Mr. Cornwall explained the nature of those accounts, and the method of passing them.

Colonel Barre said, in transactions of a private nature, he knew no gentleman to whose word or assurance he would sooner trust than the last honourable gentleman, but in affairs of public public concern, in which he was not permitted to act in a discretionary manner, he could not accept of any thing but the most satisfactory proofs; the papers must therefore be produced, or flatly refused.

Mr. Rigby objected to that part of the motion, requiring accounts of the expenditure. He said, they could not always be had; that he had not heard from the deputy pay-master in his department for many months, and then he had a large sum in hand unexpended; and consequently of which no particular account could yet be laid before the House.

On this ground, Mr. Cornwall rose again, and wished Colonel Barre to withdraw that part of the motion; but Mr. Hartley strenuously insisted on it, as the reason for having seconded the whole.

Colonel Barre again observed, that he insisted not so much on the requisitions of the commander in chief, but on the grounds of those requisitions, which might appear in his letters to the noble Lord at the head of the Treasury, or to another noble Lord, secretary of state for the colonies; that the minister and his friends seemed to evade this; there might be secrets, as Lord North had hinted, improper to lay before Parliament; may be, he said, with a smile, 100,000l: has gone among the members of the congress. At length his motion was agreed to.

Adjourned to March 11th.

March 11.] Lord Barrington moved, that a sum not exceeding 845,165l. 14s. 8d. be granted towards defraying extraordinary expenses of the land forces, and other services incurred, between the 9th of March 1775, and 31st of January 1776.

Colonel Barre said, the annals of this country did not furnish another instance in which a nominal body of 11,000 men (never amounting at any time within the period mentioned in the resolution to above 8500 effective men) had cost the nation so much money. The campaign of Bunker's-Hill and Lexington was ludicrously compared with the glorious campaigns of the immortal John Duke of Marlborough; and the forcing the lines thrown up by a mob in the course of a summer's night, opposed to the victories of Blenheim, Schellenburgh, the conquest of Gibraltar and Minorca, the traversing the vast circuit of the kingdom of Spain by Lord Peterborough, and the renowned impressions made by the Duke of Ormond at Vigo and Port St. Mary. Mytic river was compared to the Danube; and the operations of a war that pervaded half Europe, and in which a British army and foreigners in British pay, amounting to 70,000 men, had rendered the power and glory of the British arms immortal, was balanced against those carried on within a circuit of little more extent than what is taken up by the site of this metropolis. The expence of the former was shewn to amount to a sum no more than two millions, while the other, including the expences of the fleet, cost near three millions, the very extraordinary and ordnance service alone amounting to 1,300,000l. He finished with an eulogium upon General Montgomery, the account of whose death in an attempt to take Quebec by escalade, had arrived but a few days before.

Mr. Burke drew several comparisons between the victories of Mr. Pitt and those of the noble Lord, [Lord North] and contended, that the campaign which gave the great continent of North-America to this country, though the force consisted of 40,000 men, fell considerably short of the expence of maintaining 8000 wretched men, starved, disgraced, and cooped up in the single town of Boston. He paid very high compliments to General Montgomery, who had conquered two thirds of Canada in one campaign.

Mr. Fox vied with Mr. Burke in his eulogium of General Montgomery.

Lord North censured, what he called this unqualified liberality of the praises bestowed on General Montgomery, by the gentlemen in opposition, because they were bestowed upon a rebel; and said, he could not join in lamenting his death as a public loss. He admitted indeed, that he was brave, he was able, he was humane, he was generous; but still he was only a brave, able, humane, and generous rebel; and said, that the verse of the tragedy of Cato might be applied to him — "Curse on his virtues, they've undone his country."

Mr. Fox rose a second time, and said, the term of rebel, applied by the noble Lord to that excellent person, was no certain mark of disgrace, and therefore he was the less earnest to clear him of the imputation; for that all the great assertors of liberty, the saviours of their country, the benefactors of mankind, in all ages, had been called rebels; that they even owed the constitution, which enabled them to sit in that house, to a rebellion — Sunt hic etiam sua præmia laudi, sunt lacrymæ rerum et mentem mortalia tangunt.

Lord North said, whatever uneasiness this dispute with America might occasion, whatever consequences it might have, he hoped it would be recollected, he had not raised, had not disturbed the question. It was in agitation before he came into office. He found it there.

Governor Johnstone expressed his astonishment at this declaration, thus uttered in the face of his country! in the face of the house! Infranced the Tea Duty, and —

Lord North (suddenly) said, should he answer that? — The tea duty was not laid on by him, he only carried it forward.

Governor Johnstone to explain, said, it was very disorderly to interrupt him in that very abrupt manner. However, he thought the noble lord's explanation or vindication of himself, made the matter ten times worse against him.

The question being called for, the house divided; for it, 180, against it, 57.

(To be continued in our next.)

Account of the Proceedings of the American Congress, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. (Continued from p. 569.)

Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, July 4.

WHEN, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident :— That all men are created equal ; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights ; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness ; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed ; and whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new governments, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate, that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes ; and, accordingly, all experience hath shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But, when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present ——— of Great Britain, is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute t—— over these states. To prove this let facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained ; and when, so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend them.

He has refused to pass other laws for accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the rights of representation in the legislature ; a right inestimable to them, and formidable to t—— only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly, for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolution, to cause others to be erected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise ; the state remaining, in the mean time, exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these states ; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice, by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their subsistence.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

He has combined, with others, to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws ; giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation.

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us :

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states :

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world :

For imposing taxes on us without our consent :

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefit of trial by jury :

For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences :

For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighbouring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries, so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies :

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments :

For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is, at this time, transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries, to complete the works of death, desolation, and t——, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy, scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian savages, savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress, in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury.—A —, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a —, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have we been wanting in attention to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts, by their legislature, to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice, and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states, and that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour.

Signed by order, and in behalf of the Congress,

JOHN HANCOCK, President.
Attest, CHARLES THOMPSON, Sec.

Whether those grievances were real or imaginary, or whether they did or did not deserve a parliamentary enquiry, we will not presume to decide. The ball is now struck, and time only can shew where it will rest.

We concluded our last account of military operations on that continent with Gen. Carleton's letter to Lord Geo. Germaine, reciting the flight of the Provincials out of Canada, and with their burning the fort of St. John's. The London Gazette has since informed us of the measures concerted between Gen. Carleton and Capt. Douglas, of the Isis, for the establishment of armed vessels, to be employed on the lakes Champlain and Ontario, to accelerate the passage of the army under Gen. Burgoyne in their pursuit of the fugitives. On this occasion mention is made of a contrivance to float the craft through the Rapids between two camels, as practised in Russia and Holland. With what success this contrivance has been carried into execution we have not yet learnt, though a whole month has elapsed, and the zeal, vigour, and unanimity, of his Majesty's servants on both elements have never before been so conspicuous on any other service.

It must not be forgotten, that mention was made in our last of a very bold enterprize undertaken by the Provincials, which, however, was repulsed with loss. But our reason for recalling it to mind on this occasion is to do honour to the humanity of a gentleman who, by some warm expressions which have escaped in the ardor of his zeal for Government, has been suspected of too keen a resentment to those unhappy men against whom he is employed. Effectually to efface every calumny of that kind, let the following Proclamation stand as a full refutation:

PROCLAMATION.

"Whereas I am informed, that many of his Majesty's deluded subjects, of the neighbouring provinces, labouring under wounds and divers disorders, are dispersed in the adjacent woods and parishes, and in great danger of perishing for want of proper assistance; all Captains and other Officers of Militia are hereby commanded to make diligent search for all such distressed persons, and afford them all necessary relief, and convey them to the General Hospital, where proper care shall be taken of them: All reasonable expences which may be incurred in complying with this order shall be repaid by the Receiver-General.

"And, lest a consciousness of past offences should deter such miserable wretches from receiving that assistance which their distressed situation may require, I hereby make known to them, that as soon as their health is restored, they shall have free liberty to return to their respective provinces.

"Given under my hand and seal of arms, at the castle of St. Lewis, in the city of Quebec, this 10th day of May, 1776.

"GUY CARLETON."

Since the publication of the above Proclamation, it has been given out, that the Indians had prevented its effect by massacring and scalping the wounded stragglers: but as this report comes unauthenticated, it scarce deserves to be mentioned, the Indians in general being a braver race of men than to murder helpless cripples in cold blood. They have, indeed, to the number of 700, joined the King's troops; but they have hitherto been employed in furnishing the army with provisions, not in butchering the enemy.

In the Pennsylvania Journal copies of the intercepted dispatches from Lord G. Germaine to Gov. Eden, of Maryland, are inserted. They were taken on board a small vessel sent by Lord Dunmore to carry them to Annapolis, but contain little more than the circular official letter, which his Lordship, no doubt, intended to be made as public as possible in America, and the following notice to Gov. Eden, "That an armament, consisting of seven regiments, with a fleet of frigates and small ships, is now in readiness to proceed to the Southern Colonies, in order order to attempt the restoration of legal government in that part of America. It will proceed in the first place to North-Carolina, and from thence either to South-Carolina or Virginia, as circumstances of greater or less advantage shall point out. If to the latter, it may have very important consequences to the colony under your government, and therefore you will do well to consider of every means by which you may, in conjunction with Lord Dunmore, give facility and assistance to its operations."

In consequence of this information Gen. Lee dispatched the most peremptory orders to Mr. Pourvoyance, Chairman of the Committee of Safety at Baltimore, "as he valued the liberty and right of the community, not to lose a moment, but immediately to seize the person of Gov. Eden, for which he took upon himself to be answerable to the General Congress;" but this order was not only not obeyed, but severely censured by the Committee. How Gen. Lee will relish this rebuff remains to be known. It is not likely, from the known warmth of that gentleman's temper, that it will pass unnoticed. It has, however, been thought prudent to bring off Gov. Eden, though a promise had been extorted from him not to depart the province till the meeting of the provincial Congress, which was to be held on the 29th of May. The Fowey man of war was sent up the river, with orders to take the Governor on board, and secure his person from insult.

The public anxiety that has lately been shewn for the landing of the troops under Gen. Howe was on the 10th instant relieved by the following extracts of two letters from that General, dated "Staten-Island, July 7 & 8.

"The Mercury packet is dispatched to inform your Lordship of the arrival of the Halifax fleet, on the 29th of June, at Sandy-Hook, where I arrived four days sooner in the Greyhound frigate. I met with Gov. Tryon on board of a ship at the Hook, and many gentlemen, fast friends to Government, attending him, from whom I have had the fullest information of the state of the Rebels, who are numerous, and very advantageously posted, with strong entrenchments, both upon Long-Island and that of New-York, with more than one hundred pieces of cannon for the defence of the town towards the sea, and to obstruct the passage of the fleet up the North river, besides a considerable field train of artillery.

"We passed the Narrows with three ships of war and the first division of transports; landed the grenadiers and light infantry, as the ships came up, on this island, to the great joy of a most loyal people, long suffering on that account under the oppression of the Rebels stationed among them, who precipitately fled on the approach of the shipping. The remainder of the troops landed during the next day and night, and are now distributed in cantonments, where they have the best refreshment. In justice to Capt. Reynar, of his Majesty's ship Chatham, who was directed by the Admiral to make the disposition of boats for landing the troops, and to Capt. Curtis, commanding the Senegal fleet of war, who was to superintend the execution, I must express my entire satisfaction in the conduct of those gentlemen, and the dependance to be placed upon their future services in this line.

"I propose waiting here for the English fleet, or for the arrival of Lieutenant-General Clinton, in readiness to proceed, unless by some unexpected change of circumstances, in the mean time, it should be found expedient to act with the present force.

"Vice-Admiral Shulldham was joined on his voyage by six transports belonging to the Highland corps, having three companies of the 42d and three of the 71st on board. There is no other intelligence of this embarkation, excepting an account published in the New-York papers, that two transports of the fleet were taken by the enemy's privateers, and carried into Boston; that Major Menzies was killed in the engagement, and Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell of the 71st made prisoner, with 15 other Officers, and about 450 men.

"Governor Franklyn, who for a long time maintained his ground in Jersey, has been lately taken into custody at Ambay, and is at this time detained a prisoner in Connecticut: and the Mayor of New-York was confined a few days ago upon a frivolous complaint of sending intelligence to Gov. Tryon, brought to trial, and condemned to suffer death; but, by the last intelligence, the sentence was not carried into execution.

"Notwithstanding these violent proceedings, I have the satisfaction to inform your Lordship, that there is great reason to expect a numerous body of the inhabitants to join the army from the provinces of York, the Jerseys, and Connecticut, who, in this time of universal oppression, only wait for opportunities to give proofs of their loyalty and zeal for Government. Sixty men came over two days ago, with a few arms, from the neighbourhood of Shrewsbury in Jersey, who are all desirous to serve; and I understand there are 500 more in that quarter ready to follow their example. This disposition among the people makes me impatient for the arrival of Lord Howe, concluding the powers with which he is furnished will have the best effect at this critical time.

"A naval force is preparing to be sent up the North-river, and orders are given for two of his Majesty's ships, the one of 40 guns, and the other of 20, to proceed upon that service. Several men have within these two days come over to this island, and to the ships; and I am informed that the Continental Congress have declared the United Colonies Free and Independent States.

"Lieutenant-Colonel Blunt, of the 4th regiment, who has my leave to return to Britain from the particular situation of his affairs, will deliver these dispatches."

The following is an extract of a letter from Gov. Tryon to Lord Geo. Germaine, dated on board the ship Duchess of Gordon, off Staten-Island, July 8.

"I have the satisfaction to acquaint your Lordship of the arrival of the fleet under the command of Admiral Shulldham in this port on the 29th ult, and that Gen. Howe disembarked the troops under his command on Staten-Island without opposition; on which occasion the inhabitants of the island came down to welcome the arrival of their deliverers, and have since afforded the army every supply and accommodation in their power.

"On Saturday last I reviewed the militia of the island at Richmond-town, where near 400 appeared, who cheerfully, on my recommendation, took the Oaths of Allegiance and Fidelity to his Majesty. To-morrow I am to have another muster for the enlistment of volunteers, to form a provincial corps for the defence of the island, as the General finds it an important quarter to hold against the Rebels."

By a letter received at the Admiralty-Office on Aug. 10, from Vice-Admiral Lord Shulldham, dated Staten-Island, near New-York, 8th of July last, it appears, that his Lordship arrived there on the 3d of that month, with his Majesty's ships under his command, and the whole fleet of transports, victuallers, and store-ships under his convoy, without any loss or separation; that his Majesty's troops under the command of Gen. Howe were landed, on that day and the next, upon Staten-Island, without any opposition or interruption, the inhabitants having, immediately on the troops landing, surrendered, and put themselves under the protection of his Majesty's arms; that 200 of the inhabitants were embodied; that the whole island had taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Fidelity to the King; and that a party of 60 men, with their arms, had made their escape from the province of New-Jersey, and joined the King's troops.

The arrival of Lord Howe, and the reinforcement under Commodore Hotham, were daily expected at Staten-Island, Lord Shulldham having stationed his cruisers in the properest manner to fall in with, and direct them thither.

The London Gazette further informs, that Capt. Bryne, of his Majesty's ship the Hind, had burnt a ship upon the stocks in Sunbury river belonging to Georgia, intended for a privateer of 20 guns, and also set on fire a brig that was lading there; that the cruisers under the command of Vice-Admiral Young in the West-Indies had seized 17 trading ships on those seas, over and above those already mentioned in the Gazette of the 8th of July, amounting to 70 in number.

A plot, or pretended plot, has been discovered at New-York, to seize General Washington, to spike up the cannon in the night, and to render the landing of the King's troops easy, and their victory sure. For this plot, or more probably for holding a private correspondence with Gov. Tryon, the Mayor has been tried, condemned, and now probably will be executed, as things are driven to the last extremity. This plot is said to have given the natives a horrible idea of the Scots and Tories, and to have incensed the multitude to a violent degree against them.

Since the departure of the King's forces from Boston, the Provincials have erected strong batteries on all the eminences that command the harbour, in consequence of which the King's ships that were left to protect the transports that should thro' ignorance put into that port, have been obliged to abandon their stations, and retire.

Two of his Majesty's ships, the Roe-buck and Liverpool, have likewise been obliged to quit the Delaware river by row-galleys constructed by order of the General Congress. The Roe-buck was unfortunately grounded, and was thereby exposed to a heavy fire. She notwithstanding maintained her station so bravely that she sunk one of the row-galleys, and as soon as afloat made her escape from the rest. The Liverpool was not much hurt.

Vice-Admiral Lord Viscount Howe, arrived off Halifax, in the Eagle, on the 1st of July, and proceeded to the Southward the same evening. The next day a great number of transports, with troops on board, followed his Lordship, but there is no certain advice of his having joined the General.

Lord Dunmore, with the friends of government, are now at Gun's-island, in Chelapeakebay, with about 100 sail of ships, on board of which the friends of government are accommodated and secured. His Lordship has hitherto been supplied with cattle from Maryland, in which province the King has many friends. The Americans give out that Lord Dunmore was driven there for shelter, after a signal defeat; but little credit is given to their report.

To balance this report another has been circulated, by which the victory is said to have terminated in favour of the Royalists. The scene of action is laid at Lake Champlain; the combatants, Capt. Forrester, with two companies of Regulars, and 500 Indians on one side, against 700 Provincials on the other, 50 of whom are said to have been killed, and 500 wounded or taken prisoners, who, being exchanged for a like number of Regulars formerly taken at St. John's, had their ears marked by the Indians, by whom they were told, that if they fell into their hands again they should receive no quarter.

The Indians of the Six Nations have declared a neutrality. It is, however, more than probable, that they will join the strongest side.

By a letter from the General Congress, to the Provincial Convention of New-York, earnestly pressing that assembly to draw forth the militia of the province with all possible dispatch, the president Hancock assures them, that the Congress have reason to believe that an attack upon their capital city will be made in less than ten days, from the then 11th of June, the day on which the Congressional letter is dated, and entreating them to forward them in companies, or in any other way that will hasten their arrival in that city, as the important day is at hand, that will decide not only the fate of the city of New-York, but in all probability that of the whole province. Previously, however, to the receipt of this letter, the Provincial Congress had, on the 8th, resolved to thank General Washington for his services, and to assure him of every support within their power; so that no entreaties seemed necessary to animate that assembly to continue firm to the cause in which they were embarked.

While things remained in a state of suspension in the middle and northern colonies, an account has been received of the total miscarriage of an attempt made by Sir Peter Parker and General Clinton on the southern.

The following extracts from the letters of the commanding officers, published in the London Gazette, contain the particulars:

"It having been judged advisable, says Sir Peter Parker, in his letter, to make an attempt upon Charles-Town, in South-Carolina, the fleet sailed from Cape Fear on the 1st of June, and on the 4th anchored off Charles-Town bar. The 5th founded to the bar, and laid down buoys preparatory to the intended entrance of the harbour. The 7th all the frigates and most of the transports got over the bar into Five Fathom Hole. The 9th General Clinton landed on Long-Island, with about four or five hundred men. The 10th the Bristol got over the bar with some difficulty. The 15th gave the captains of the Squadron my arrangement for the attack of the batteries on Sullivan's island, and the next day acquainted General Clinton that the ships were ready. The General fixed on the 23d for our joint attack, but the wind proving unfavourable prevented its taking effect. The 25th the Experiment arrived, and next day came over the bar, when a new arrangement was made for the attack. The 28th, at half an hour after nine in the morning, informed General Clinton, by signal, that I should go on the attack. At half an hour after ten I made the signal to weigh; and about a quarter after eleven the Bristol, Experiment, Active, and Solebay, brought up against the fort. The Thunder Bomb, covered by the Friendship armed vessel, brought the salient angle of the east bastion to bear N. W. by N. and Colonel James, (who has ever since our arrival been very anxious to give the best assistance) threw several shells a little before and during the engagement in a very good direction. The Sphynx, Actæon, and Syren, were to have been to the westward, to prevent fireships or other vessels from annoying the ships engaged, to enfilade the works, and, if the rebels should be driven from them, to cut off their retreat, if possible. This last service was not performed, owing to the ignorance of the pilot, who run the three frigates aground. The Sphynx and Syren got off in a few hours, but the Actæon remained fast till the next morning, when the captain and officers thought proper to scuttle and set her on fire. I ordered a court martial on the captain, officers, and company, and they have been honourably acquitted. Capt. Hope made his armed ship as useful as he could on this occasion, and he merits every thing that can be said in his favour. During the time of our being a-breast of the fort, which was near ten hours, a brisk fire was kept up by the ships, with intervals, and we had the satisfaction, after being engaged two hours, to oblige the rebels to slacken their fire very much. We drove large parties several times out of the fort, which were replaced by others from the main. About half an hour after three a considerable reinforcement from Mount Pleasant hung a man on a tree at the back of the fort, and we imagine that the same party ran away about an hour after, for the fort was then totally silenced, and evacuated for near an hour and a half: but the rebels finding that our army could not take possession, about six o'clock a considerable body of people re-entered the fort, and renewed the firing from two or three guns, the rest being, I suppose, dismounted. About nine o'clock, it being very dark, great part of our ammunition being expended, our people fatigued, the tide of ebb almost done, no prospect from the eastward, and no possibility of our being of any farther service, I ordered the ships to withdraw to their former moorings.—Their Lordships will see plainly by this account, that, if the troops could have co-operated on this attack, his Majesty would have been in possession of Sullivan's island. But I must beg leave here to be fully understood, lest it should be imagined that I mean to throw the most distant reflection on our army: I should not discharge my conscience, were I not to acknowledge, that such was my opinion of his Majesty's troops, from the General down to the private soldier, that, after I had been engaged some hours, and perceived that the troops had not got a footing on the north end of Sullivan's Island, I was perfectly satisfied that the landing was impracticable, and that the attempt would have been the destruction of many brave men, without the least probability of success: and this, I am certain, will appear to be the case, when general Clinton represents his situation. The Bristol had 40 men killed, and 71 wounded: the Experiment 23 killed, and 56 wounded, and both of them suffered much in their hulls, masts, and rigging: the Active had lieutenant Pike killed, and 6 men wounded; and the Solebay eight men wounded. Not one man who was quartered at the beginning of the action on the Bristol's quarter-deck escaped being killed or wounded. Capt. Morris lost his right arm, and received other wounds, and is since dead; the master is wounded in his right arm, but will recover the use of it: I received several contusions at different times, but as none of them are on any part where the least danger can be apprehended, they are not worth mentioning. Lieutenants Caulfield, Molloy, and Nugent, were the lieutenants of the Bristol in the action; they behaved so remarkably well, that it is impossible to say to whom the preference is due; and so, indeed, I may say of all the petty officers, ship's company, and volunteers. At the head of the latter I must place Lord William Campbell, who was so condescending as to accept of the direction of some guns on the lower-gun deck. His Lordship received a contusion on his left side, but I have the happiness to inform their Lordships, that it has not proved of much consequence. Captain Scott, of the Experiment, lost his left arm, and is otherwise so much wounded, that I fear he will not recover. I cannot conclude this letter without remarking, that when it was known that we had many men too weak to come to quarters, almost all the seamen belonging to the transports offered their service with a truly British spirit, and a just sense of the cause we are engaged in. I accepted of upwards of fifty to supply the place of our sick. The masters of many of the transports attended with their boats, boats; but particular thanks are due to Mr. Chambers, the master of the Mercury.

"All the regiments will be embarked in a few days. The first brigade, consisting of four regiments, will sail in a day or two, under convoy, for New-York; and the Bristol and Experiment will, I hope, soon follow with the remainder."

Sir Peter Parker's Squadron consisted of the following ships and vessels, viz.

Whitehall, August 24. It appears, by Lieutenant General Clinton's letter to Lord George Germaine, dated July 8, 1776, from the camp on Long Island, province of South Carolina, that Sir Peter Parker and the General having received intelligence that the fortrefs erected by the Rebels on Sullivan's Island (the key to Charles-Town harbour) was in an imperfect and unfinished state, resolved to attempt the reduction thereof by a coup de main; and that, in order that the army might co-operate with the fleet, the General landed his troops on Long Island, which had been represented to him as communicating with Sullivan's Island by a ford passable at low water; but that he, to his very great mortification, found the channel, which was reported to have been eighteen inches deep at low water, to be seven feet deep; which circumstance rendered it impossible for the army to give that assistance to the fleet in the attack made upon the fortrefs that the General intended, and which he, and the troops under his command, ardently wished to do.

Of the Origin and Use of Money; from Dr. Smith's Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations.

WHEN the division of labour has been thoroughly established, it is but a very small part of a man's wants which the produce of his own labour can supply. He supplies the far greater part of them by exchanging that surplus part of the produce of his own labour, which is over and above his own consumption, for such parts of the produce of other men's labour as he has occasion for. Every man thus lives by exchanging, or becomes in some measure a merchant, and the society itself grows to be what is properly a commercial society.

But, when the division of labour first began to take place, this power of exchanging must frequently have been very much clogged and embarrassed in its operations. One man, we shall suppose, has more of a certain commodity than he himself has occasion for, while another has less. The former consequently would be glad to dispose of, and the latter to purchase, a part of this superfluity. But if this latter should chance to have nothing that the former stands in need of, no exchange can be made between them. The butcher has more meat in his shop than he himself can consume, and the brewer and the baker would each of them be willing to purchase a part of it. But they have nothing to offer in exchange, except the different productions of their respective trades, and the butcher is already provided with all the bread and beer which he has immediate occasion for. No exchange can, in this case, be made between them. He cannot be their merchant, nor they his customers: and they are all of them thus mutually less serviceable to one another. In order to avoid the inconveniency of such situations, every prudent man, in every period of society, after the first establishment of the division of labour, must naturally have endeavoured to manage his affairs in such a manner, as to have at all times by him, besides the peculiar produce of his own industry, a certain quantity of some one commodity or other, such as he imagined few people would be likely to refuse in exchange for the produce of their industry.

Many different commodities, it is probable, were successively both thought of and employed for this purpose. In the rude ages of society, cattle are said to have been the common instrument of commerce; and, though they must have been a most inconvenient one, yet in old times we find things were frequently valued according to the number of cattle which had been given in exchange for them. The armour of Diomed, says Homer, cost only nine oxen; but that of Glaucus cost an hundred oxen. Salt is said to be the common instrument of commerce and exchanges in Abyssinia; a species of shells in some parts of the coast of India; dried cod at Newfoundland; tobacco in Virginia; sugar in some of our West India colonies; hides or dressed leather in some other countries; and there is at this day a village in Scotland, where it is not uncommon, I am told, for a workman to carry nails instead of money to the baker's shop or the ale-house.

In all countries, however, men seem at last to have been determined, by irresistible reasons, to give the preference, for this employment, to metals above every other commodity. Metals can not only be kept with as little loss as any other commodity, scarce any thing being less perishable than they are, but they can likewise, without any loss, be divided into any number of parts, as by fusion those parts can easily be reunited again; a quality which no other equally durable commodities possess, and which more than any other quality renders them fit to be the instruments of commerce and circulation. The man who wanted to buy salt, for example, and had nothing but cattle to give in exchange for it, must have been obliged to buy salt to the value of a whole ox, or a whole sheep at a time. He could seldom buy less than this, because what he was to give for it could seldom be divided without loss; and if he had a mind to buy more, he must, for the same reason, have been obliged to buy double or triple the quantity, the value, to wit of two or three oxen, or of two or three sheep. If, on the contrary, instead of sheep or oxen, he had metals to give in exchange for it, he could easily proportion the quantity of the metal to the precise quantity of the commodity which he had immediate occasion for.

Different metals have been made use of by different nations for this purpose. Iron was the common instrument of commerce among the ancient Spartans; copper among the ancient Romans; and gold and silver among all rich and commercial nations.

Those metals seem originally to have been made use of for this purpose in rude bars without any stamp or coinage. Thus we are told by Pliny, upon the authority of one Remeus an ancient author, that, till the time of Servius Tullius, the Romans had no coined money, but made use of unstamped bars of copper to purchase whatever they had occasion for. These rude bars, therefore, performed at this time the function of money.

The use of metals in this rude state was attended with two very considerable inconveniences; first, with the trouble of weighing them; and secondly, with the trouble of assaying them. In the precious metals, where a small difference in the quantity makes a great difference in the value, even the business of weighing, with proper exactness, requires at least very accurate weights and scales. The weighing of gold, in particular, is an operation of some nicety. In the coarser metals, indeed, where a small error would be of little consequence, less accuracy would, no doubt, be necessary. Yet we should find it excessively troublesome, if every time a poor man have either occasion to buy or sell a farthing's worth of goods, he was obliged to weigh the farthing. The operation of assaying is still more difficult, still more tedious, and, unless a part of the metal is fairly melted in the crucible, with proper dissolvents, any conclusion that can be drawn from it, is extremely uncertain. Before the institution of coined money, however, unless they went through this tedious and difficult operation, people must always have been liable to the grossest frauds and impositions, and, instead of a pound weight of pure silver, or pure copper, might receive, in exchange for their goods, an adulterated composition of the coarsest and cheapest materials, which had, however, in their outward appearance, been made to resemble those metals. To prevent such abuses, to facilitate exchanges, and thereby to encourage all sorts of industry and commerce, it has been found necessary, in all countries that have made any considerable advances towards improvement, to affix a public stamp upon certain quantities of such particular metals, as were in those countries commonly made use of to purchase goods. Hence the origin of coined money, and of those public offices called mints; institutions exactly of the same nature with those of the aulagers and stampmasters of woollen and linen cloth. All of them are equally meant to ascertain, by means of a public stamp, the quantity and uniform goodness of those different commodities when brought to market.

The first public stamps of this kind that were affixed to the current metals, seem in many cases to have been intended to ascertain, what it was both most difficult and most important to ascertain, the goodness or fineness of the metal, and to have resembled the sterling mark which is at present affixed to plate and bars of silver, or the Spanish mark which is sometimes affixed to ingots of gold, and which being struck only upon one side of the piece, and not covering the whole surface, ascertains the fineness, but not the weight of the metal. Abraham weighs to Ephron the four hundred shekels of silver which he had agreed to pay for the field of Machpelah. They are said however to be the current money of the merchant, and yet are received by weight and not by tale, in the same manner as ingots of gold and bars of silver are at present. The revenues of the ancient Saxon kings of England are said to have been paid, not in money but in kind, that is, in victuals and provisions of all sorts. William the Conqueror introduced the custom of paying them in money. This money, however, was, for a long time, received at the exchequer, by weight, and not by tale.

The inconveniency and difficulty of weighing those metals with exactness, gave occasion to the institution of coins, of which the stamp covering entirely both sides of the piece, and sometimes the edges too, was supposed to ascertain not only the fineness, but the weight of the metal. Such coins, therefore, were received by tale as at present, without the trouble of weighing.

The denomination of those coins seem originally to have expressed the weight or quantity of metal contained in them. In the time of Servius Tullius, who first coined money at Rome, the Roman as or pondo contained a Roman pound of good copper. It was divided into the same manner as our Troyes pound, into twelve ounces, each of which contained a real ounce of good copper. The English pound sterling, in the time of Edward I. contained a pound, Tower weight of silver, of a known fineness. The Tower pound seems to have been something more than the Roman pound, and something less than the Troyes pound. This last was not introduced into the mint of England till the 18th of Henry VIII. The French livre contained in the time of Charlemagne a pound, Troyes weight, of silver of a known fineness. The fair of Troyes in Champagne was at that time frequented by all the nations of Europe, and the weights and measures of so famous a market were generally known and esteemed. The Scots money pound contained, from the time of Alexander the first to that of Robert Bruce, a pound of silver of the same weight and fineness with the English pound sterling. English, French, and Scots pennies too, contained all of them originally a real pennyweight of silver, the twentieth part of an ounce, and the two hundred and fortieth part of a pound. The shilling too seems originally to have been the denomination of a weight. When wheat is at twelve shillings the quarter, says an ancient statute of Henry III. then wastel bread of a farthing shall weigh eleven shillings and four pence. The proportion, however, between the shilling, and either the penny on the one hand, or the pound on the other, seems not to have been so constant and uniform as that between the penny and the pound. During the first race of the kings of France, the French sou or shilling appears upon different occasions to have contained five, twelve, twenty, forty, and forty-eight pennies. Among the ancient Saxons a shilling appears at one time to have contained only five pennies, and it is not improbable that it may have been as variable among them as among their neighbours, the ancient Franks. From the time of Charlemagne among the French, and from that of William the conqueror among the English, the proportion between the pound, the shilling, and the penny, seems to have been uniformly the same as at present, though the value of each has been very different. For in every country of the world, I believe, the avarice and injustice of princes and sovereign states, abusing the confidence of their subjects, have by degrees diminished the real quantity of metal which had been originally contained in their coins. The Roman as, in the latter ages of the republic, was reduced to the twenty fourth part of its original value, and, instead of weighing a pound, came to weigh only half an ounce. The English pound and penny contain at present about a third only; the Scots pound and penny about a thirty sixth; and the French pound and penny about a sixty-sixth part of their original value. By means of those operations, the princes and sovereign states which performed them, were enabled, in appearance, to pay their debts, and to fulfil their engagements with a smaller quantity of silver than would otherwise have been requisite. It was indeed in appearance only; for their creditors were really defrauded of a part of what was due to them. All other debtors in the state were allowed the same privilege, and might pay with the same nominal sum of the new and debased coin whatever they had borrowed in the old. Such operations, therefore, have always proved favourable to the debtor and ruinous to the creditor, and have sometimes produced a greater and more universal revolution in the fortunes of private persons, than could have been occasioned by a very great public calamity.

It is in this manner that money has become in all civilized nations the universal instrument of commerce, by the intervention of which, goods of all kinds are bought and sold, or exchanged for one another.

What are the rules which men naturally observe in exchanging them, either for money or for one another, I shall now proceed to examine. These rules determine what may be called the relative or exchangeable value of goods.

The word value, it is to be observed, has two different meanings, and sometimes expresses the utility of some particular object, and sometimes the power of purchasing other goods which the possession of that object conveys. The one may be called, 'value in use'; the other 'value in exchange.' The things which have the greatest value in use have frequently little or no value in exchange; and, on the contrary, those which have the greatest value in exchange have frequently little or no value in use. Nothing is more useful than water; But it will purchase scarce any thing; scarce any thing can be had in exchange for it. A diamond, on the contrary, has scarce any value in use; but a very great quantity of other goods may frequently be had in exchange for it.

An authentic Account of the curious Researches and valuable Discoveries of the late John Bradley Blake, Esq; one of the English East-India Company's Resident Supercargoes at Canton, in China.

MR. Blake's plan was great and noble: it was to procure the seeds of all the vegetables produced in China, which are used in medicine, manufactures, or food, or are in any shape serviceable to mankind; and to forward to Europe not only such seeds, but the plants producing them, in order to be propagated either in Great Britain and Ireland, or in our Colonies of America, whose soil and climate might best suit them; which colonies on the continent, by stretching from Cape Florida southward, to Nova Scotia northward, as well as the West-India islands, by lying in similar latitudes with the respective provinces of China, &c. gave him reason to hope they would all succeed, either in one or other of those climates, if got thither in a vegetable state. Nor did he confine himself to the produce of that empire only; he likewise established an intercourse (by means of the junks) with Japan and Cochín China, and success has attended his endeavours; for the seeds, which three or four years ago he sent to John Ellis, Esq; of Gray's Inn, of the fine Cochín China rice, which in that country grows on the hills and uplands, have already been propagated in Jamaica by Henry Ellis, Esq; of that island, and on General Melville's estate in Dominica, as also by Dr. Garden, of Charlestown, South Carolina, who informed his correspondent in London, that it not only flourished in his own garden, but likewise in those of many other gentlemen to whom he distributed a part of the seeds that were sent him; and that, by getting into fresh seeds, it promised to be a valuable grain to that province, especially in the hilly back parts of it.

The tallow tree, likewise, the seeds of which Mr. Blake sent home some years past, flourished not only in Carolina, but also in Jamaica, and many other of our colonies. In short, both these articles bid fair to be of as much utility to our colonists, as they are to the Chinese; and may in time, with many other things, become considerable articles of commerce.

In the South Carolina and American General Gazette of Dec. 28, 1772, mention is made of both these articles in the following words, after taking notice of a treatise on the culture of different kinds of rice, intitled, Travels of a Philosopher:—We have (says that Gazette) the pleasure to inform the public, that, by the indefatigable industry of a very curious gentleman at Canton, a sufficient quantity for experiment of the upland rice from Cochín China, so long wished for, has been sent by the Thame's Indian to his friend in Gray's Inn, who will take proper care that it is distributed to such persons in our southern colonies as will make a fair trial of this most useful grain.—We are likewise indebted to this curious gentleman for a parcel of the seeds of the Croton Sebiferum of Linnæus, or tallow tree of China, &c.

Dr. Garden, in a letter to his correspondent, written in the year 1773, acquaints him of his having received from Mr. Blake, of Parliament-street, father to the young gentleman whose memory we are commemorating, seeds of two sorts of China indigo, the one of a deep, and the other of a sky blue; the lacquer tree; the oil tree, used to mix up the lacquer for cabinets; the alcea, described in Kempfer's History of Japan, which is an article of vegetable food; and many other seeds from Pekin, and other more northerly provinces of China, particularly several from Corea, a country between China and Tartary, above 300 leagues from Canton. And the Doctor observes, that himself and many others were sensible such an intercourse between the East Indies and America, having for its object the propagating the seeds of such trees and plants as are useful either in medicine or commerce, would be very beneficial to the latter. His words are,—"When gentlemen of such benevolent dispositions and public spirit as Mr. Blake and his father, engage in such attempts, much advantage must soon flow from a plan of this kind, at least ought to flow from it, if as well seconded on this side the Atlantic."

All the before-mentioned plants, with a variety of others from seeds sent to England by Mr. Blake of Canton, and distributed by his father with a liberal and impartial hand, are likewise flourishing in his Majesty's garden at Kew, under that ingenious and skilful botanic gardener, Mr. Aiton: at Chelsea, in the Apothecaries Company's gardens, under the care of Mr. Forsyth; as also at Dr. Fothergill's, near Stratford; Dr. Pitcairn's, near Islington; Mr. Malcombe, at Kennington Common; Mr. Basington, at Hoxton; and, particularly, at Mile-End, in the garden of that well-known practical botanic gardener, Mr. Gordon, who moreover has the care of several plants sent in pots from China by Mr. Blake to his friend Mr. John Ellis, of Gray's Inn, whose botanic knowledge and correspondence in some degree excited Mr. Blake in his pursuit. Among those plants are the Lichee; a very fine fruit of China, of several sorts; as also the Gardenia, a fine yellow dye; both which the writer saw there, in the summer 1773, in a flourishing state; with many others, the names of which he does not at present recollect. And he finds that Mr. Ellis, and also Mr. Blake, have each of them a fine flourishing plant of the tea tree, propagated and multiplied by Mr. Gordon; both which, he is told, stood the open air all the winter of the last months of 1773, and the first months of 1774, by advice of Mr. Blake, who some time ago wrote from Canton, that this valuable shrub was under snow, in some of the northern provinces of China, for many weeks together in the winter season, and therefore recommended it to be no longer treated in England altogether as a hot-house plant.

It would require too much room to particularize the various seeds Mr. Blake has from time to time sent to England since he first set out for China, the latter end of the year 1766; or to enumerate the many plants of his sending that are now flourishing in several botanic gardens in this kingdom.

There is among them a variety of new species, the seeds whereof, I am informed, were put up by Mr. Blake's own hand, in so peculiar a manner as to bring with them their vegetative qualities, not only in England, but likewise for the second season of sowing to America.

He also sent home, at various times, above fifty drawings of choice plants, curiously delineated from Nature, with all their parts of fructification, dissected by himself, and coloured. These drawings, in the possession of his father, have been shewn to many of the curious, particularly to that ingenious and learned botanist, Dr. Solander, who has declared them to be exquisite performances, and has classed and arranged the plants they represent according to the great Linnæus's system, from their parts of fructification: so accurately were these parts described in the drawings.

Had it pleased God to have spared Mr. Blake's life, he intended, in like manner, to have gone through the whole botanic system of China; for which purpose, and to forward his work, he had engaged to his assistance one of the most ingenious draughtsmen in China, who, under Mr. Blake's directions, followed Nature as close as pencil and paint could enable him to do.

This person, I am told, Mr. Blake, at no small expence, had retained solely in his service, and even bound him by a formal contract to continue with him as long as he should remain in China. This assistant was in Mr. Blake's apartments in the factory every day from nine in the morning till six in the evening, for the three or four years previous to Mr. Blake's death; and in the leisure time afforded by the shipping being dispatched for Europe, Mr. Blake sat at the same table with him eight or nine hours a day, laying out the natural specimens as they were from time to time gathered, dissecting the parts of fructification, which the Chinese know nothing of, and drawing the outlines for his assistant to colour and finish: and indeed, they are all so elegantly and scientifically disposed, as to appear like the natural plants themselves to every one who has viewed them.

Mr. Blake's genius was not confined to botanic subjects: he had begun to collect some fossils and ores, or rather to procure them; for Europeans are literally imprisoned, when at Canton, in a less space of ground than is allowed to many prisoners for debt in England; although, when they retire to the island of Macao, in the absence of the shipping, they have a range of larger extent. This island is deemed the European country recess; and though so desirable, particularly during the hot season, yet Mr. Blake, the writer is informed, denied himself that satisfaction one year. When a ship which had lost her passage remained in Canton river, and some of the supercargoes were allowed to continue at the factory there, he chose to be confined to it the whole year, in order to view the progress of some particular plants thro' the various seasons; by which, and a too sedentary life, he brought on a gravelly complaint, and once had a most severe fit of the stone, which which endangered his life. It is believed a return of this disorder brought on the fever, of which, after a short illness, he died at Canton the 16th of November, 1775, greatly lamented by all the gentlemen of our factory, and all other Europeans in that place, as likewise by the Chinese themselves, who, we hear, held him in great esteem.

But to proceed, mineralogy was likewise a branch of his researches; and, some time before his death, he sent Mr. Ellis, before-mentioned, a specimen of lead ore from a mine the Chinese had of late discovered in the interior parts of China; and by one of the ships arrived in England last summer, he had forwarded a specimen of the ore Paaktong, or white copper, from the mines in the province of Yunnan, together with zink or spelter, and other materials; as also the processes by which the Paaktong metal is made in China into utensils of various sorts for the table, sideboard, &c. in order for experiments to be made thereby in England, under the direction of his friend, Mr. Samuel More, Secretary to the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce; and this Gentleman, from these materials and processes, has produced a metal equally white and pure, but more ductile than the Chinese make it themselves, his specimen having been flatted in a mill to the thinness of common paper.

What is more, from the appearances of the Chinese copper-ore which Mr. Blake has sent, and the writer has seen, there is reason to hope a similar one may be found in this country in our copper-mines: and this ore, before it is divested of its arsenical qualities, and other matters with which it is mixed in the mine, and rendered too pure for this operation, may probably, by the same processes, whiten with zink and the other materials, which are obtainable in England.

Mr. Blake likewise sent to Mr. More specimens of the earths, clays, sand, stones, and other materials used in making the true Nankin porcelaine, all which Mr. More put into the hands of Mr. Wedgwood, the most celebrated potter in this country. This ingenious artist has, from these materials, produced some pieces of excellent porcelaine, and has declared the earths, &c. were so compleat a set of specimens, and yet so simple, as beyond a doubt to be the true porcelaine materials; desiring nothing more than a larger quantity, to distribute it among the different counties in England, in order that they may search for the like materials; and to be further favoured by Mr. Blake with a description of the nature of the land these materials were found upon in China, or what mines or minerals accompanied them, to lead to a further discovery here; with plans and sections of their kilns: all which Mr. Blake would doubtless have procured; for he was endeavouring to collect models of machines used in every art practised, and manufacture carried on, by the Chinese, in order that his native country might equally benefit by the ingenuity of their invention.

Of all this we have many proofs in the various specimens of wrought gold, silver enamel, and ivory; colours; paintings on glass; insects, and moths, several of them non-descript; which Mr. Blake had forwarded to his father in England, all which the writer has seen, but must not pretend to describe, lest he should exceed all bounds in such a publication as the present. Therefore, having indulged himself with the heart-felt satisfaction of paying this tribute to so meritorious a youth, snatched from us in the prime of life, (for he had but just entered the 29th year of his age,) he concludes with assurances, from his own knowledge of his (Mr. Blake's) father's public spirit, and of his having so zealously hitherto seconded his son's endeavours, that no part of what his son has already sent to England, or may be preserved among the remains of his labours in China, will be lost to his country.

While Mr. Blake's father was deploring the loss of so dear a child, his friends were taking the proper steps to procure him that honour he so richly deserved, the honour of being numbered among the learned and ingenious men who compose the Royal Society. What must, therefore, have been their grief and surprize, when, on their presenting the certificate required for that purpose, they were informed by the President, that the object of their kind offices was no more! It was, however, no small comfort to them, that the President seized this occasion of lamenting the death of Mr. Blake as a public misfortune; and he did it in the most pathetic terms. He insisted on the many marks of attention which Mr. Blake, though so young, had already shewn to the sciences in general, and that of natural history in particular; declaring, that, in the opinion of the best naturalists, there never had been in that part of the world in which Mr. Blake had spent the last years of his life, a person of more real knowledge; and that he did not doubt but every member of the Society would sympathize with him in regretting so great and so general a loss.

POETRY.

Pempe Pæanica, or the glorious first of August, 1776.—Humbly inscribed to the College of Physicians of Dublin.

Cui religas comam,

Simplex tristitius? Hor. L. i. Od. 5.

ALL hail, of heav'n-taught fages wisest, best,
Eblana's Leeches! well have ye atchiev'd,
Well ended great exploit; full-bottoms spurn'd,
Which long the craniums of your bigot fires
Opprest umbrageous, horrent freight of hair.

Not with more weight, the drifted depth of snows

Possesses Alpine ridge, or Hæmus' peak,
Nor whiter seems in hue, than Peruke borne
On noddle of sedate practitioner;
Nor chills the Traveller with more fatal
damps;

A wizard old bears mighty sway with men,
And Custom is he hight. This Magus dire
Erst, muttering spell mysterious, wrapt the head
Of Pæan's votarist in unsightly bath;

Whence,

Whence, shorn of fair proportion, ræful, pale,
(Eclipse disastrous!) peeps the lengthen'd face,
Unlovely, undesir'd, ill-omen'd sight;
Like bird of midnight from her ivy bower.
Beneath the fleecy burden long they groan'd,
Deny'd each honour of a modern pate; 20
The Queue prolix extended; and the Club,
Bologna-sausage shaming, snare of maids,
Perus'd with timid, nor incurious glance;
The Lawyer's tails, that like twin bobbins show From housewife's cushion pendant. Hence they mourn'd

Expulsion sad from sudorific dance,
From Misses' tea-table, and every scene,
Where dress secures admission. Hapless they!
With jaundic'd matron scandal talk'd, in room
That reek'd of medicines all a summer's eve; 30
Or toil'd at cards with wither'd dowager,
Long wintering out a young man's revenue;
Till one of manly thewer, and courage firm, Bespoke his brethren (Heav'n the champion rous'd

To pierce the Gothic darkness, whose thick gloom

Obscur'd the Graces medical, and dispel
The Cloud of brooding Perukes) thus he said:

"Friends! Brethren! Pæan's Sons! once blooming youths,

"Bugbears of children now, and scorn of maids:
"With fashion shall Hygeia warfare wage? 40
"Does Phæbus from his tripod, 'broider'd suit,

"And bag, and sword-knot sternly interdict?
"Forbid it, Gods! let 'Pothecaries Hence

"Such sparkling honours (they, whose squalid task,

"Or clystrix, or emetic, dreads a stain)
"For black funeral, or dirt-veiling drab;

"Meet emblem of their function: while the

"In splendid colours flames, or neat and gay,
"Blue, yellow, red and green. Or should the Fates

"Reluctant doom our limbs to fable weeds; 50
"Yet shall, at least, the Bag, appendage grave;

"Adorn our wigs, the rapier grace our thighs;
"While to our hands the friendly muff preserves

"Their milky smoothness, and their tangent powers;

"To trace the pulse blue-heaving, or explore,
"Exalted privilege, less obvious charms.

"Nor is the bag not typic of our art:
"Fitted it is for ornament and use;

"To grace the wig, within its fable womb
"Medicaments to bear, or haply serve 60

"Applied to homelier end, should dire distress,
"Stern mother of invention, so command."

He ended, plaudits follow'd, as from men,
Who thus reflected view'd their proper thought;

When thus a Senior of the croud pursu'd:
"Oh Son! thy sentence capital perforce

"I must applaud, and generous bold emprise;
"From Gothic bondage, Crizale foul, obscene,

"To free thee sapient head. Myself will tell,
"If rising woe can tell, what chanc'd me late. 70

"Long had I mourn'd, beneath fleece of hair,
"Instinct with powder, ample and outspread;

"With forestop peering, orn'ous o'er my brow,

"Rough as the plumage of a Friezland hen,
"Or quills upon the fretful porcupine.
"A lazy Crone, a round and ancient Nurse,
"Hands me an ample vase, replete with streams
"Saline; streams that in Pæan's mystic rite
"Claim dearest, best inspection. I receiv'd,
"With haud, not carelefs, and with pious awe,
"Upheld th' orac'lous fluid: not the priest,
"The Jewish, or of Pagan lore, receiv'd
"With holier zeal the fuming censer, fill'd
"With spicy drugs from Araby the blest;
"Than I the vase perus'd, intent to read
"The Fates; in what the scum portends, and what

"The sediment; the colour what, and taste;
"Digestion or concoction. Dire disgrace!

"Scarce can I speak; the fore-top of my wig,
"Prone o'er my forehead staring, deep im-merst 90

"Drank the prognostic; and meanders vile "Insinuate cours'd my cheeks. But say, com-peers!

"Will not this mighty change, so sudden wrought,

"Move gaping wonder, scoff, and ridicule,
"Lament, and outcry loud, and furious rage?

"Hear then the council, Friends, of tem'perate age.

"By slow degrees enure the croud to change,
"That gradual comes unfeard. Suppose we hang

"Ev'n to our present wigs, addition quaint,
"Bags of all sizes, multiform and mix; 100

"Full-dress and Rose. Our antique Brush shall save

"From tongue of obloquy, with sacred shade,
"The modern ornament: till crafty hand

"Shall, lock by lock, and hair by hair, abate
"The bushy nuisance; and refine it down

"To Scratch mechanic, or to squirely Bob—"
He more had talk'd (as age is prone to talk)

A youth indignant on his calm harangue
Impetuous broke, and shamelefs thus pursu'd: "

"Who talks of Bob-wigs? Gods! confound a thought 110

"So poor, so vile! To Orcus with the crew
"Of Bobs and Scratches! rascal trumpery!

"No, let us rather choose through full Round,
"Adorn'd with bag and rapier, all at once

"To force resistless way; in goodly rows,
"To sounds of urinal and mortar sweet,

"In Dorian measure marching: the new attempt

"Shall strike the world with wonder and dismay,

"And chain calumnious tongue. Besides, who dares

"Reproach? For hold not we the sheers of Fate?" 120

He ended frowning; and his brow denounc'd
Enormous bag, and innovation dire

On ancient usage.
The sentence pleas'd the million; puissant minds

In desperate deeds delight.
Thy Calends, August! were the day decreed,

The great, th' important day, big with the fate
Of Bags and Pæan's Sons: for then intense

The youth of Dublin croud, (a brilliant train)
Rotunda, spacious dome! frequent and full. 130

White

While Clío's trump some lofty Bard inspires
With note harmonious, and no common blatt
Of Albion's happiness, and Brunswick's line.

The solemn morn arrived; and croud on croud,
A waving sea of heads, assembled stood
In fearful expectation. Pæan's Sons
Appear'd, a goodly band, in meet array,
And seemly phalanx marching. Every tongue
Was hush'd, nor breath itself was heard to pass
The barrier of the lips. Attention strange! 140
And holy reverence, child of great event!

Apothecaries boys (like Henchmen) march'd,
With clank of mortar, dulcet pestlery.
Them follow'd lusty wenches, and in scorn
To mop-sticks fix'd those abdicated wigs,
Which late physicians bore; now, sad reverse,
Unpowder'd, frizzled, curls upstaring rough,
They sweep the dust. Meantime, their whilom

Lords,
With graceful gesture, goodly, grave and prim,
In mournful finery, or mourning fine, 150 Sword, bag, and black full-trim'd, mov'd two and two,

Harmonious; passing rare, such amity!
In outward show, they seem'd, or Ushers staid,
Or Lords in waiting, at the dolorous court
Of him, the Lover of Proserpina.

Now foremost in the sacred rolls of Fame,
O'er ides of March, or twelfth of July ninety,
Shall stand the first of August, glorious day!
It made the race of Brunswick Kings, and free'd
From wigs, a Gothic yoke, the healing band. 160

* * If the ingenious author of the above Poem, or any other correspondent, will favour us with an applicable design, we will take care to get it properly engraved, so that it may be bound up with the Magazine in its proper place, at the end of the year.

The Dying Rose.

Alba Ligustra cadunt.

Virg.

DEAD fall the leaves upon the lurid ground,
That were of late so sweet and pleasant found,

Expressive emblem of that mournful Fall,
Which, soon or late, one day awaits us all:
Pensive beneath this bower let me stay,
And say to Satan: "Satan, keep away;"
But pray to God my freedom to maintain,
Inspire my thoughts, and bless the moral strain.
Shine out, bright Sun! luminous orb of day,
For see! who hither wins her easy way:
Bright Laura, blest with each triumphant charm,
That can the captivated bosom warm,
And would with such advantages excel,
Did she herself not know the same too well.

Now coming nearer to the boding bower,
Casting her eyes on a sad fading flower:
Did not this flower, cries the maid, remain
The foremost beauty of the bloomy train;
Though abject now it hangs the haggard head,
Its odour gone, its vivid colour fled!
Then must I some time hence like this obey;
Then must I like this Dying Rose decay!
If this is so, what object should I deem Sacred to Love, and worthy my esteem?

September, 1776.

That humankind like flowers spring and fade,
Full many moralists long since have said:
Yet though, indeed, like this, thou must decay,
By taking Virtue to conduct thy way,
Like it thou art not lost; a part remains,
The noble heir of the empyrean plains,
Which doth from mouldy dust exultant rise,
And soars immortal to its native skies.

To Miss ———

ACCEPT, fair maid, the off'ring of my muse,
My weak attempt to sing thy worth excuse;
Could I but sing with all th' hallow'd fire,
That did immortal Milton once inspire;
Thy matchless charms with his fair Eve's should vie;
Thy matchless charms like her's should never die;
Accept, fair maid, the off'ring of my muse,
My weak attempt to sing thy worth excuse.

A C R O S T I C.

My muse, inspire me with poetic fire,
And teach to sing her charms which all admire,
Reason triumphant, judgment most refin'd,
Youth, beauty, wit, in her are all combin'd;

Harmonious sweetness on her tongue does lie,
And charms resistless sparkle in her eye;
Charms unfading grace her virtuous mind,
Kind heav'n in her its fairest work design'd,
Envy herself can't blot her spotless fame,
That's pure as dew-drops on the lucid stream.

Prologue. Written by Captain Thompson, and spoken by Mr. Jefferson, before the Performance of the Farce of St. Helena; or, The Isle of Love; as acted with great Applause at Richmond Theatre.

OUR bard on bold advent'rous pinions flies,
In search of foreign beauties, foreign skies,
Tho' few the spots upon the world's great chart,
Like this can please the eye, or charm the heart;
Thy prospect, Richmond, and thy sylvan scenes,
For ages honour'd by our kings and queens;
Where all our heroes have retir'd from war,
The vet'ran soldier, and the gallant tar;
Where all the wits and beauties of our isle
Have deign'd to sweetly sing, and sweetly smile;
Thro' whose Elysian groves our bards have play'd,

Then peaceful slept beneath the laurel's shade.
To-night we use no pantomimic skill
To bring St. Helena to Richmond-hill;
That halfway house, where India captains bait,
And to their cabbins take an extra mate;
Where pompous nabobs, rich by Bengal plunder, wonder;
Talk of their lacks, to make the maidens
And come like Jove in showers of gold and thunder.

Where the brisk sailor sings o'er bowls of rack,
Nor sighs for red cheeks, while his girl has black;
He seeks no roses to adorn her face,
But laughs in spite of all the laws of grace.

To

To-night a first attempt our author brings,
To lead the Muses to the seat of kings ;
Yet a fair herald comes our cause to plead,
Who with your * gentle natures must succeed ;
For sure no belle to her can cruel prove,
Nor beau—unless he's with himself in love ;
Aye, there's the rub—that is our greatest care,
Beaux love themselves too well to love the fair.
† Ye who have cross'd our Twick'nham, Isle-worth ferry,

I'm sure of you, ye're always kind and merry ;
There Thomas squeezes black-cy'd Susan's hand,
A kinder couple lives not in the land ;
William—and John—in beauty's cause will fight,
Lend us your hands to row us cross to-night !
Give us your wishes, and we'll drop all fears ;
You are the rudder—which our vessel steers ;
And if successful—you'll this pleasure prove,
Upon this spot to fix the Isle of Love.

Prologue to the Capuchin. Written by George Colman, Esq; and spoken by Mr. Foote.

CRITICS, when'er I write, in every scene
Discover meanings that I never mean ;
Whatever character I bring to view,
I am the father of the child 'tis true,
But every babe his christening owes to you. }
" The comic poet's eye, with humorous air, Glancing from Watling-street to Grosvenor-square,

He bodies forth a light ideal train,
And turns to shape the phantoms of his brain :
Mean while your fancy takes more partial aim,
And gives to airy nothings, place and name."

A limner once, in want of work, went down
To try his fortune in a country town ;
The waggon, loaded with his goods, convey'd }
To the same spot his whole dead stock in trade,
Originals and copies—ready made.
To the new painter all the country came,
Lord, lady, doctor, lawyer, 'quire, and dame,
The humble curate, and the curate's wife,
All ask a likeness—taken from the life,
Behold the canvas on the easel stand !
A pallet grac'd his thumb, and brushes fill'd his hand :

But, ah ! the painter's skill they little knew,
Nor by what curious racks of art he drew.
The waggon-load unpack'd, his antient store
Furnish'd for each a face drawn long before, }
God, dame, or hero—of the days of yore.
The Cæsars, with a little alteration,
Were turn'd into the mayor and corporation :
To represent the rector, and the dean,
He added wigs and bands to Prince Eugene :
The ladies, blooming all, deriv'd their faces
From Charles the second's beauties, and the Graces.

This done, and circled in a splendid frame,
His works adorn'd each room, and spread his fame.

The countrymen of taste admire and stare,
" My lady's leer ! Sir John's majestic air !
Miss Dimple's languish too !—extremely like ! }
And in the stile and manner of Vandyke !
Oh ! this new limner's pictures always strike ! } Old, young ; fat, lean ; dark, fair ; big, or little ;

The very man or woman to a tittle !"

Foote and this limner in some points agree,
And thus, good sirs, you often deal by me.
When, by the royal licence and protection,
I shew my small academy's collection,
The connoisseur takes out his glass, to pry
Into each picture with a curious eye ;
Turns topsy-turvy my whole composition,
And makes mere portraits all my exhibition.
But still the copy's so exact, you say ;
Alas, the same thing happens every day !
How many a modish well-dress'd fop you meet,
Exactly suits his shape—in Monmouth-street ;
In Yorkshire warehouses, and Cranborn-alley,
'Tis wonderful how shoes and feet will tally !
As honest Crispin understands his trade,
On the true human scale his lasts are made,
The measure of each sex and age to hit,
And every shoe, as if bespoke, will fit.
My warehouse thus for Nature's walks supplies
Shoes for all ranks, and lasts of every size.
Sit still, and try them, sirs ; I long to please ye !
How well they fit ! I hope you find them easy :
If the shoe pinches, swear you cannot bear it,
But if well made—I wish you health to wear it.

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

Petersburgh, July 19.

YESTERDAY morning the Empress, attended by many of the great officers of state and household, went in a magnificent barge from Oranienbaum to Admiral Greig's ship. Her Imperial majesty was welcomed by cheers from each of the men of war as she passed them, the yards, &c. being manned at her approach. As soon as the Empress went on board the admiral's ship, the Imperial standard was hoisted ; upon which the whole fleet saluted by a general discharge of their cannon, as did likewise the fortifications of Cronstadt, which mount 900 guns. The admiral's ship returned the salute of the fleet, which honour was acknowledged by each ship firing half its number of guns. After the Empress had dined at a table of 100 covers, with the principal officers of the marine and other departments, and many persons of the first distinction, a signal was made for the whole fleet to weigh anchor, and her Imperial Majesty, attended by the Prince and Count Alexis Orlov, Field Marshal Galitzin, and Count Bruce, the Adjutant on duty, rowed along the line of the fleet in her barge, being again saluted by a general discharge from the men of war and batteries ; after which her Imperial Majesty went on board one of the yachts, sailed for a short time with the fleet, and returned between six and seven o'clock to Oranienbaum.

Vienna, July 27. Letters from Hungary advise, that on the 17th instant a dreadful fire broke out at Eisenstadt, near the frontiers of Austria, which entirely consumed 118 houses (the inhabitants of which are reduced to the utmost misery) and two convents.

Genoa, July 31. We have accounts from Modena, that the Duke has published an Edict with regard to the age of the girls who take the veil, veil, which permits no parents or guardians to put their children, nieces or wards, into a convent, till they are ten years of age; that none shall take the habit till they are twenty, nor make their vows till the year of their noviciate is finished.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

London, July 26.

A Mutiny on board the Elizabeth transport at Harwich, occasioned by a quarrel between the English convicts and German recruits, alarmed the whole town. The convicts attempted an escape, and, on the interposition of the German officers, became outrageous. They began by throwing the baggage belonging to the Germans into the sea, and by endeavouring to force the officers who opposed them overboard. The cries of the sailors reaching the shore, a guard from the town hastened to their assistance, by whom the ringleaders were secured; but in the fray four of the convicts made their escape.

Last Tuesday, the 23d instant, Prince Henry of Prussia, in the name of the Empress of Russia, made the demand of the Princesses of Wirtemberg in marriage for the Grand Duke. The same day, the contracting his Highness with that Princess took place.

31.] Four Russian men of war arrived at Spithead, where fourteen more are said to be expected; but whither bound is not certainly known.

Aug. 1.] Lists of ships ordered to be got ready immediately, viz. Prince George, Queen, and Sandwich, of 90 guns; Bedford, Courageux, Culloden, and Hector, of 74 guns; St. Alban's, Augusta, Bienfaisant, and Rippon, of 64; the three last to be sheathed with copper.

A light was exhibited on the Smalls, which is to be continued. It was seen at nine leagues distance.

A letter from Plymouth, dated July 28th, says, "I send this purposely to inform you, that this morning arrived here a coaster, the master of which declares, that yesterday he met with a Topham pilot-boat, who told him, that between the Start and Torbay he met with an American privateer, mounting 12 carriage guns, spread a great deal of canvas, full of men, and is painted black. He asked the pilot many questions, and among the rest, what East or West Indiamen were expected. When I first heard this account, I did not believe it, but sent a letter to the captain of the coaster, who confirmed the above relation, so that I now believe it true, and would have you make it public."

2.] Six houses are now pulling down within the Tower, in order to build what they call a mill-house, for a new coinage of silver. It is expected that the building will be finished at Midsummer next, and the coinage is to commence immediately. The artists are to make what is termed sixty journeys a day, which amounts to seven tons and a half of silver weekly; and in the course of two years, during which this coinage is to continue, the value of the new silver issued will be about 5,148,000l.

3.] The Grand Duke of Russia had his audience of taking leave of the Royal Family of Prussia. The King made him the following magnificent presents: A dessert-service, and a coffee-service, with ten vases of china, of the manufacture of Berlin; a ring, with his Majesty's portrait, covered with a diamond valued at 30,000 crowns; a set of Prussian horses; and four pieces of rich tapestry.

The assizes at Dorchester ended on Saturday last with the conviction of a person for bribery at the Shaftesbury election; penalties to the amount of 11,000l. were recovered by the present member. This is the most decisive cause ever yet determined in favour of the independency of the landed interest.

12.] This morning at six o'clock, the bells in the town of Windsor noticed to the adjacent villages, that the day was to be spent in mirth and jollity; before seven o'clock small guns were fired, and the town seemed alive.

At a quarter before nine o'clock, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Bishop of Osnaburg, with his two other brothers, attended by their preceptors came to the King's apartments; a signal being given, some guns in the town were again fired, and the bells rung another peal.

At nine o'clock the whole guard were under arms, and formed a lane from their Majesties apartments through the Castle-yard, to the south door of the Cathedral. At ten o'clock the King, Queen, and children, attended by the Duke of Montague, Lord Bruce, Lady Liffingham, Lady Weymouth, Lady Charlotte Finch, &c. went in procession to the Cathedral; the Princess Royal and her two sisters walked after their Majesties; the Prince of Wales and his six brothers (all dressed in blue and gold) following, with their attendants on each side. When they came to the church door, the Provost, Prebendaries, Canons, and Poor Knights received them; and as soon as they entered the Cathedral, the organ struck up, and continued till the Royal Family were seated. His Majesty, the Prince of Wales, Bishop of Osnaburg, and the Duke of Montague, before the service began, went to the altar and made their offerings of gold and silver; Doctor Boslock and Doctor Lockman receiving the same in a gold dish.

The arrangement of the Royal Family, when in the choir, was thus: the King sat in the Dean's seat, the Queen under the Duke of Gloucester's banner, with the Princesses standing at her side, the Prince of Wales, and his brother the Bishop, under their own banners; the rest of the children, with the ladies of quality, and other attendants, in the upper stalls on the right hand of the choir. The Duke of Montague took his seat under his own banner.

The service then began, and was read by the Provost; Mr. Kent's Te Deum and Jubilat were sung; and Doctor Green's anthem, "God is our hope and strength, &c." concluding with the grand chorus from the Messiah; the whole of which took up an hour and an half. The procession from the Cathedral was in the following order, viz. Poor Knights, two and two; Prebendaries Trebellaries, Canons, Provost, their Majesties, the Princess Royal with her sisters, and their attendants, Prince of Wales and the Bishop of Osnaburg, the rest of the Royal brothers two and two, Duke of Montague, Lord Bruce, Ladies Effingham, Weymouth, Lady Charlotte Finch, &c. on each side. The gentlemen of the Cathedral took leave of them at the door; their Majesties and the children then went into the castle, and afterwards upon the terrace. The party belonging to the 25th regiment was drawn up in the Park, upon a spot called the bowling-green, and as soon as the children appeared at the terrace, they gave three volleys. The King and Queen, Princes and Princesses, went afterwards into their own apartments to dinner, and at half past six o'clock, the Prince of Wales and the three elder brothers returned to Kew.

16.] There are now in circulation a number of counterfeit shillings, in imitation of the Linnæa money of George the second, well executed, date 1746; not differing from the Tower money, but by a flatness on one part of the edge instead of being round.

Tuesday night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, the corpse of the Countess of Abercorn, who died a few days since, at her son's, the Earl of Abercorn, in Grosvenor-square, was interred in their family vault in Westminster-abbey. Her ladyship was 100 years old.

17.] A young gentleman, eldest son of Lord M——n, and heir to an estate of 30,000l. per annum, put an end to his existence on Wednesday night last, at the Bedford arms in Covent-garden. A few moments before he committed this rash act, he was in company with four women of the town, and Burnet the blind musician, drank hard, but did not express, either by words or actions, the least degree of despondency. He held the pistol close to his temple, as is conjectured, in order to prevent a loud explosion; and in case the first attempt should fail, had secured another ready charged, and laid it within his reach. After the women were dismissed, he ordered Burnet to go down stairs for about twenty-five minutes, who returning at the expiration of that time to the apartment, was the first who discovered, by the strong smell of gunpowder, the dreadful event. When the waiters entered, the deceased was discovered sitting, and in the same attitude in which it is supposed he committed the fact. The coroner's jury sat on the body yesterday morning, and pronounced their verdict, lunacy.

No cause can be assigned by any of the unfortunate young man's friends for the perpetration of the above act; it seems he had indeed lost a sum of money (though not a very large one) which he was himself unable to pay, but which, through the friendly interposition of Lord G—— G——, was yesterday to have been advanced by his father, Lord M——, who was to come to town the same day totally for that purpose. He has left a widow behind him, but fortunately no children to lament his loss.

24.] The following is an account of the regatta and boat race at Richmond on Thursday, in honour of the Prince of Wales's birthday.

As soon as the race was determined on, the right of being candidates for the prizes was determined by lot at Waterman's Hall: those young watermen, whose apprenticeships had expired between August 1773, and 1776, being permitted to draw, and the 12 successful ones to row, two in a boat. The race was to be from the centre of the river, opposite Sir Charles Algill's house, to the Royal Nursery at Kew, and back to the farthest extremities of Lady Cowper's Island, on which a standard was affixed, to mark the place at which the contest was to end. On this island were also erected above 20 other standards, by way of ornament, and a guard of six soldiers and a corporal were placed upon it. A similar guard was also placed on the Richmond side of the water, on the opposite bank of the river.

By two o'clock the town was crowded; and at three a band of music, belonging to the train of artillery, came up the river; and now arrived immense numbers of sailing-boats, barges, cutters, wherries, &c. many of them distinguished by elegant awnings.

The manager was Mr. Slingsby, who directed that the candidates should assemble at the Roe Buck to receive instructions: their dresses were striped linen waistcoats and trowsers, with caps painted with stripes, and in front somewhat resembling those of the light horse, with white stockings and pumps. Previous to the starting the company was amused by the boats rowing against each other; and by the sight of a number of vessels which anchored off Lady Cowper's Island, where the company dined and drank tea. In a word, the whole was a perfect fair.

Soon after four o'clock several guns were fired, which was understood as a signal that their Majesties were coming from Kew; it was, however, at length, near half past five o'clock, and neither appearing, the boats put off on the firing of a pistol. When they had passed about twelve minutes, the royal pair arrived, his majesty driving a pair of small ponies, in a low four-wheeled chaise. Their majesties took their stations in a temporary summer-house, (erected on the occasion) in a nursery ground adjacent to Sir Charles Algill's house. Their majesties saluted the company, who received them with loud marks of loyalty and esteem, several audibly repeating, "God bless our king and queen!" The king enquired if the procession was passed, and being informed it was, waited for the return of the boats, which came in so as to afford little sport, the first being full a hundred yards before the second, and so of all the rest, except one, which was a great way behind.

On their arrival at the island, the first boat received the adjudged prize of five, the second three, and the third two guineas. The contest being ended, the different companies were rowed to Richmond, with streamers flying, where they landed, and went immediately to the assembly-room, which was soon filled with a variety of company of all ranks.

The day proving uncommonly favourable, the scene turned out upon the whole a very pleasing one, and drew together an immense concourse of people.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Clonmell, September 5.

THE following persons have been tried, acquitted, and received sentence, viz.—Maurice Shehane, otherwise James Shehave, for the murder of Ambrose Power, Esq; acquitted.—John Meany, for burning Mrs. Glais's corn at the deer-park of Carrick-on-suir, in September, 1774, and cutting the tongue of John Broderick, acquitted.—John Slatery, late gaoler of Clonmell, for negligently permitting Maurice Hayes, confined for the murder of Ambrose Power, Esq; to escape, was fined 20l. and is to be imprisoned three months.—Patrick Cull, otherwise Cole, turnkey, for the like offence, was fined 5l. and to be imprisoned three months.—Timothy Eagan, near Carrick-on-suir, for an assault, fined 50l. and to be imprisoned six months; and there were several other lesser fines for assaults.

Tralee, Sept. 5. The small pox has been so ripe and fatal in Corke, for five or six weeks, that it is almost pestilential, the children dying in great numbers.

There is a melonary now making in the gardens of Barry Denny, Esq; (on a new plan) constructed in a manner never before practised in this country. This method will prevent the dung being in view, and likewise enable any person who has the least knowledge of gardening to raise melons and cucumbers with the greatest ease, to a perfection equal to any from abroad.

Galway, Sept. 5. Last Saturday morning, 33 porpoises were discovered and killed in a creek, at the bay of Moyrith, in Cunnema, into which, on the preceding high tide, they were drawn, as is supposed, in pursuit of some fish, and at the ebb were left behind. Some of them were prodigiously large, and will prove a profitable prize to the captors, who are four men only of that neighbourhood.

Carlisle, Sept. 7. Yesterday our assizes ended, when the following persons were tried, viz. James Morton, for several petty felonies, to be whipped through the town of Leighlin-bridge.—Michael Timmin, for stealing a pair of plated spurs out of the house of the Rev. Edmund Doyle, acquitted; but is to be transmitted to the county of Dublin for a felony.—James Garrett, commonly called Bocky Garrett, and Launcelot Holmes, to remain in gaol till bailed.—John Nowlan, Edmund Dowling, alias Gowbeg, and Edward Bryan, otherwise Slasher Bryan, were tried on the White Boy Act and acquitted.

Kilkenny, Sept. 14. Last Tuesday ended the assizes for the county of Kildare, held at Athy, when Sylvester Watters, of Blackrath, in said county, was tried and found guilty of murdering Patrick Delany; as also, Michael Tyrrell, for the barbarous and inhuman murder of his wife, and afterwards throwing her body into the river Liffey: They both received sentence to be hanged and quartered on Tuesday the 17th inst.—Rose Rafter, found guilty of a felony to the value of 6d. to be whipped, and imprisoned one month.

DUBLIN.

An officer at Wandsworth in Surry, who had a consumptive complaint in his breast, was dissolving over a chaffing-dish of fire, in a very close room, an equal quantity of white pitch and yellow bees-wax, with an intention of soldering some bottles; and after having for some time breathed in the vapour arising from it, he found the complaint in his breast greatly relieved. This observation, extremely interesting to himself, determined him to continue for some days the same fumigation; he soon perceived a considerable amendment, and at length was entirely cured.—Whatever prejudices or objections may arise from this prescription, as being suggested by chance, they will certainly be much invalidated upon upon the recollection of the many useful and important discoveries which have been made by the same means.

A few days since, as two gentlemen, who live on Milltown Road, were returning home, they were accosted by a genteel man, gravely dressed, resembling a clergyman, who begged they would step with him to an adjacent publick house, as he had something of moment to communicate: This being complied with, he asked one of the gentlemen whether he was ever possessed of a gold watch, and being answered in the affirmative, he then inquired whether he could recollect the maker and number; the gentleman replied, that a space of upwards of 22 years had intervened since he was robbed of his watch and some cash by five men, and could not possibly know it again: but the other saying he remembered its construction, the stranger produced the watch, which proved to be the same the gentleman had been robbed of, and also, 25 guineas, the sum taken from him. The gentlemen then asked him how he came by these articles, as they were confident he only acted in an official capacity: he desired to be excused giving a direct answer, but added, that three of the men who robbed him were now in opulent circumstances, and the other two had died since.——Happy are they, said he, who having the misfortune in their younger days to despoil their neighbour unjustly of his property, make ample restitution in their riper years; this shews their principles are not entirely vitiated, and their repentance sincere; but thrice happy are they who have no need of this repentance.

In consequence of the Jubilee, we hear several sums of money, watches, and other effects, which had been stolen, were returned to the owners. In the parish of Swords, six hanks of thread, which had been stolen twelve years ago, were lately restored to the owner.

Extract of a Letter from Oughternone, in the County of Kerry.

“The inhabitants of this place have been lately alarmed with a very extraordinary appearance in the church-yard. About a fortnight since one Patrick Lynch, a labouring man, returning home about eleven o'clock at night, from having carried a message to the next village, as he passed by the church-yard he saw something white sitting on the grave of a worthy gentleman, who had been buried there about five years. At first he thought it might be a white horse who had got into the church-yard, and he threw a stone at it in order to drive it towards the gate, which was open; but immediately he perceived it to rise to a surprising height, and after hovering over his head for some minutes vanished suddenly. The fellow ran home, and told what he had seen, but was too much terrified to attempt any description of its form or figure. He was laughed at for his cowardice so much, that the next night he went to the same place, and saw the same appearance on the grave, on which he immediately came and called five of his neighbours, who went with him, and were satisfied he had said nothing but truth. The next night above thirty of the inhabitants went with a clergyman to the spot, when they distinctly beheld a female figure robed in white, which vanishing soon after, their ears were struck with the most ravishing music. The apparition still continues to be seen every night in the same place, and has caused many conjectures in the neighbourhood.”

27.] An adjournment of the Quarter Sessions was held at the Tholsel, when Patrick Buchanan was found guilty of robbing on the King's highway, and received sentence to be executed the 7th of September.

Extract of a Letter from Oughternone, in the County of Kerry.

“The appearance of the female spectre, mentioned in my former letter, still continues in our church-yard to the great surprize of the neighbourhood for many miles round. The concourse of spectators every night is amazing. It has been seen by above a hundred people at a time. Several clergymen, both of the Romish and Protestant church have spoken to the apparition, but it never returned any answers; prayers and intreaties were all in vain. On last Thursday night, a young man, who is son to a certain shoemaker not a great way from hence, and had expressed no curiosity to see a sight that attracted the attention of the whole neighbourhood, was brought here by his father almost against his will; at his approaching the wall of the church-yard, the spectre rose up and stood directly facing him. The young man shewed some signs of confusion and slipped out of the croud, who were too attentive to the apparition to take any heed of him, and it was thought he was gone home. But it seems he has quitted this part of the country, and whether he is gone is totally unknown. However his absence has given ground for various surmises, which time only can ascertain. If any thing more happens in consequence of this affair, I shall send you the particulars.”

Extract of a Letter from Dundalk, dated August 31, 1776.

“This day came on before the Hon. Mr. Justice Tenison and a most respectable jury, the trial of Daniel M'Neale, Neale M'Neale, John Eastwood and George Murdock, for the supposed murder of Matthew Warren, on the 1st of July last; when after an hearing of upwards of seven hours, they were most honourably acquitted, to the entire satisfaction of the court and country. The Jury did not take three minutes to return their verdict. The council for the prisoners examined only four witnesses in order to shew where the riot on that particular day began, and the occasion of it; the innocence of the young gentlemen having fully appeared from the testimony of the witnesses produced on the part of the crown.”

Captain Cathrew, of the Duchesa of Leinster, belonging to Dublin, arrived here from Antigua with rum, in six weeks and four days; and says, that in Lat. 20, and Long. 62, she was chased and boarded by the Surprizal Privateer, belonging to Philadelphia, Captain Weekes of sixteen guns: Captain Cathrew being carried on board the Privateer, on examining his papers, the vessel and cargo being found Irish property, the captain of the Privateer said that he would not distress him, because he was sure the Irish would not not distress them; after keeping him on board for about half an hour, he gave him up vessel and cargo, and wished him a safe passage.— There were on board the Privateer, Captain Robinson, of the Neptune, of Irvine, from Antigua, with rum; a captain belonging to London, from Grenada; and a Captain belonging to Bristol, from St. Kitt's, all prisoners, and their vessels sent to North America, because they were British property.

Mr. K——, a gentleman well known in the polite world, and who owns a considerable property in the province of Connaught, met the noted TWISS a few weeks since at a coffee-house in London. Mr. K—— politely asked the Tour-writer, if he had not lately been in Ireland? To which an answer being given in the affirmative, Mr. K—— said, "And pray, sir, did you not write and publish your travels through that country?" "I did," replied Twiss. "And pray, sir, (continued Mr. K——) do you remember what account you gave of the inhabitants of Connaught, and that you believed that part of the Ireland was inhabited by Savages?" "Something similar to it," answered Twiss, (who spoke with courage on his own dunghill.) Mr. K—— then, looking him steadily in the face, said, "I give you credit for being so candid, Mr. Twiss; and to convince you that your judgment, in respect to Connaught, is well founded, I now tell you that I am one of those Savages whom you have so truly denominated; and not being able to get rid of my native ferocity, although surrounded by so many well-bred gentlemen as I see here, I feel myself inclined to give you a sensitive demonstration of our savage wildness." On concluding which words, he fell on our miserable Tour-writer, and tore his face in such a manner, as to leave a crimson streak from each spot where the nails of his fingers first entered. After thus disciplining the unhappy Twiss, according to the fellow's own wanton idea of Connaught, Mr. K—— took him by the nose, beat him round the coffee-room with an oaken saplin, and then kicked him out to the street, to the great astonishment of all the gentlemen present. When this business was finished, (for which the whole nation stand largely indebted to their champion) Mr. K—— sat down; and one or two gentlemen saying it was unfair to attack a man in that manner who had not his sword on, our young gentleman went respectively up to each person in the room, and coolly asked him, "Had he any inclination to take up the cause of that rascal, who had been just now so deservedly chastised? That if any GENTLEMAN had, he (Mr. K——) was ready to meet him, and decide the matter, either that moment on the spot, or hereafter, when and where any or each of them pleased, and at any weapon a gentleman would choose to arm himself with."—A general silence prevailed;—but that they might not make any ungovernable remarks if Mr. K—— absented himself, he remained in the coffee-room until he saw every other person depart, and then went home, conscious of having meritoriously chastised an ignorant, impertinent puppy, and of having convinced the English, that he who makes unjust reflections on the Irish, will not long remain unpunished.

Last Monday about two o'clock at noon, a lady and her servant, riding in the Phoenix Park, were stopped near the Black Horse by a man on foot, very genteelly dressed in white clothes and a gold-laced hat. He demanded the lady's money, which she gave him, amounting to twenty-six guineas. Having put the cash into one of his pockets, he took from the other a small diamond hoop ring, which he presented to the lady, desiring her to wear it for the sake of an extraordinary highwayman, who made it a point of honour to take no more from a beautiful lady than so much as he could make a return for, in at least the full pecuniary value; he then with great agility vaulted over the wall and disappeared.

As the declaration for Independency of the North American Colonies hath caused frequent Allusions to the League of the thirteen Cantons of Switzerland, some Account of that memorable Alliance, and of those Cantons cannot be unpleasing to our Readers.

"Fired with the oppressions of the house of Burgundy, a confederation was formed in the year 1708, by the three cantons of Schwitz, Un and Undervald, which began to form a republic called ever since the Swiss, from the name of the first canton. The canton of Lucerne entered into the league in 1332. That of Zurich in 1351. That of Zug in 1352; and in the same year those of Berne and Glans joined them, and formed what are called the eight ancient cantons, which alone formed the Swiss for near a century. Fribourg and Soleure were received into the confederation in 1481. Basle and Schaffhausen in 1501, and Appenzel in 1513.

"The allies of the Swiss are the abbey and city of St. Gall, the city of Malhousen, and the city of Bienné. Those make a part of the Helvetic body, having seats and voices in the general diet, or congress. But the Grisons, the Valais, the republic of Geneva, the principality of Keuschatel, and the bishoprick of Basle, although allies, are not members of the Helvetic body, nor have seats in the diets. Of the thirteen cantons those of Zurich, Bern, and Schaffhausen, are Protestants; those of Lucerne, Uri, Schwitz, Undervald, Zug, Fribourg, and Soleure, are Romans; and the cantons of Glaris and Appenzel are mixed.

"The whole length of Switzerland, from Geneva to the extremity of Schaffhausen, is 156 miles, and its whole breadth, from Mount Jara to the extremity of Glans, is 147 miles, and it contains (without reckoning the allies) about one million of people, one-third of which are in the canton of Berne.

"Switzerland, with its allies, is bounded on the North by the circle of Suabia, in Germany, on the South by Savoy, the Milanese and the republic of Venice; on the West by France, and on the East by part of Germany and part of Italy, having its whole Southern frontier defended by the Alps."

One of the watchmen of St. Michan's parish was found dead in the watch-house on the Inn's-quay.

A Sporting

A sporting gentleman at Stansted, in Hertfordshire, laid a bet of 100l. that on the 2d of September he would kill twelve brace of partridges, between the hours of five and twelve in the morning, and won the wager, having killed eleven brace and a half before ten o'clock, when he returned home to breakfast, and set out again after eleven o'clock, and discovered a single bird; when, in order to shew his skill, he let it go the distance of eighty or ninety yards, and then shot it, to the astonishment of four gentlemen who accompanied him on the occasion. What is more remarkable, a son of the above gentleman killed nine brace the same day, who is but twelve years of age.

We are assured, by a person of veracity, who lately arrived here from France, that several of the reformed officers of the Irish brigades there, have given up their paltry half-pay (which to an ensign is under 20l. per year, other ranks in proportion) and sailed for America. As this corps is known to consist of some of the best disciplined officers in Europe, there is no doubt but what they will meet with all suitable encouragement.

Authentic Memoirs of General Washington.(With an elegant Likeness of that experienced Officer.)

THE family from which General Washington is descended, was originally settled in Lincolnshire, but afterwards removed to the city of Coventry, where this gentleman was born, on the 3d of September, 1727. His mother was of the same family with General Monk, who for his services at the Restoration was created Duke of Albemarle.

Mr. Washington discovered an early inclination to arms, and first entered as a private man in General Wade's regiment in the year 1746, being then not twenty-one, and soon after he bought a Cornet's commission in the same regiment, and served against the Scottish rebels. He continued in the service till the peace, when he went abroad to improve himself in the military profession.

When the French war broke out in America in the year 1755, Mr. Washington went over to that country, where his courage and military abilities being known, he was raised to the rank of Major in the Provincial forces, and was at Fort Edward, under the command of General Webb, when Monf. Montcalm advanced to take Fort William Henry on Lake George.

Major Washington having heard of the intended attack, and being apprehensive that Lt. Col. Monro, who then commanded at Fort William Henry, would not be strong enough to resist the French, eagerly interceded with his General to be sent with his forces to the assistance of Monro. But his ardour was restrained, and the unfortunate commander forced to make the best terms he could with the French General, who afterwards, in violation of the treaty that had been made, permitted the Indian savages to fall upon them, and to strip them of every thing of value.

The Americans soon afterwards raised Major Washington to the command of a regiment, in which rank he remained, till the peace, when he retired to the cultivation and improvement of a very considerable estate he possessed in the province of Virginia.

When the present troubles in America arose on account of the famous Tea Tax, Colonel Washington was one of the foremost in expressing his detestation of imposing a tax on people who were not represented; and when a General Congress was thought necessary to be convened, he was chosen one of the Delegates for the province of Virginia, and in that capacity signed the Association on October 20th, 1774; the Letter to the American People; the Letter to the People of Great Britain, dated September 5th; and the Petition of the Congress to the King, in November of the same year, (all which may be seen in our Magazine for 1775, pages 28, 29, 35, and 71). On the 21st of June, 1775, the Continental Congress appointed General Washington to the supreme command of their armies; which commission was addressed "To our beloved Brother, George Washington, Esq; Captain General and Commander in Chief of all the Forces of the United Colonies. The Congress annexed a very considerable salary to this important post, which he nobly refused to accept, declaring he would not take wages for his services in the cause of Freedom, but desire only a reimbursement of the necessary expences.

Having received his commission, he set out towards New York, to head the Assembled Troops. On the 26th of June the Congress of that Province presented the following Address, which has not yet appeared in any Magazine:

"To his Excellency George Washington, Generalissimo of all the Forces in the Confederate Colonies of America.

"May it please your Excellency,

"AT a time when the most loyal of his Majesty's subjects, from a regard to the Laws and Constitution, by which he sits on the Throne, feel themselves reduced to the unhappy necessity of taking up arms to defend their dearest rights and privileges; while we deplore the calamities of this divided empire, we rejoice in the appointment of a gentleman, from whose abilities and virtue, we are taught to expect both security and peace.

"Confiding in you, sir, and in the worthy Generals immediately under your command, we have the most flattering hopes of success in the glorious struggle for American Liberty, and the fullest assurances, that whenever this important contest by that fondest wish of each American soul, an accommodation with their mother country, you will cheerfully resign the important deposit committed into your hands, and reassume the character of our worthiest citizen.

"By order,

"P. V. B. LIVINGSTON, Pres."

To this Address he returned the following Answer:

"Gentlemen,

"AT the same time that, with you, I deplore the unhappy necessity of such an appointment, as that with which I am now honoured, I cannot but feel sentiments of gratitude for this affecting instance of distinction and regard.

"May your warmest wishes be realized in the success of America, at this important and interesting period; and be "assured that every exertion of my worthy colleagues, and myself, will be equally extended to the re-establishment of peace and harmony between the mother country and these colonies;—as to the fatal, but necessary operations of war, when we assumed the Soldier, we did not lay aside the Citizen, and we shall most sincerely rejoice with you, in that happy hour, when the establishment of American Liberty, on the most firm and solid foundations, shall enable us to return to our private stations, in the bosom of a free, peaceful, and happy country.

"G. WASHINGTON."

The General fixed his head quarters at Cambridge, near Boston, when his humane disposition prompted him to send that letter, (relative to the treatment of prisoners) to General Gage, which we inserted in page 615 of our last year's Magazine, together with General Gage's answer; but as we have not yet given General Washington's reply, we here insert it, as a proof of his abilities as a scholar, a close reasoner, and a friend to Liberty.

General Washington's Answer to General Gage's Letter of the 13th of August, 1775.

"S I R,

"I addressed you on the 11th instant, in terms which gave the fairest scope for the exercise of that humanity and politeness, which were supposed to form a part of your character. I remonstrated with you on the unworthy treatment shown to the officers and citizens of America, whom the fortune of war, chance, or a mistaken confidence, had thrown into your hands.

"Whether British or American mercy, fortitude, and patience, are most pre-eminent; whether our virtuous citizens, whom the hand of tyranny has forced into arms, to defend their wives, their children, and their property, or the mercenary instruments of lawless dominion, avarice and revenge, best deserve the appellation of rebels, and the punishment of that cord, which your affected clemency has forborne to inflict; whether the authority under which I act, is usurped, or founded upon the genuine principles of liberty, were altogether foreign to the subject. I purposely avoided all political disquisition; nor shall I avail myself of those advantages, which the sacred cause of my country, of liberty, and human nature give me over you, much less shall I stoop to retort any invective.

"But the intelligence you say you have received from our army requires a reply. I have taken time, Sir, to make a strict enquiry, and find that it has not the least foundation in truth. Not only your officers cers and soldiers have been treated with the tenderness due to fellow-citizens and brethren, but even those execrable parricides, whose councils and aid have deluged their country with blood, have been protected from the fury of a justly-enraged people. Far from compelling or permitting their assistance, I am embarrassed with the numbers, who proud to our camp, animated with the purest principles of virtue, and love of their country.

"You advise me to give free operation to truth, to punish misrepresentation and falsehood. If experience stamps value upon counsel, yours must have a weight, which few can claim. You best can tell how far the convulsion, which has brought forth ruin on both countries, and shaken the mighty empire of Britain to its foundation, may be traced to these malignant causes.

"You affect, Sir, to despise all rank, not derived from the same source with your own. I cannot conceive one more honourable, than that which flows from the uncorrupted choice of a brave and free people, the purest source, and original fountain of all power. Far from making it a plea for cruelty, a mind of true magnanimity and enlarged ideas would comprehend and respect it.

"What may have been the ministerial views, which have precipitated the present crisis, Lexington, Concord, and Charlestown can best declare. May that God, to whom you then appealed, judge between America and you! Under his providence, those who influence the councils of America, and all the other inhabitants of the united colonies, at the hazard of their lives, are determined to hand down to posterity those just and invaluable privileges which they received from their ancestors.

"I shall now, Sir, close my correspondence with you, perhaps for ever. If your officers, our prisoners, receive a treatment from me different from what I wished to show them, they and you will remember the occasion of it.

I am, Sir,

Your very humble servant,

G. WASHINGTON."

Since that period to the last advices, General Washington has employed his utmost endeavours to strengthen the posts he occupied; that in which he has continued since the evacuation of Boston is New York, which became more exposed by the taking of Long Island, of which we have had recent accounts. How General Washington will defend New York may be guessed at, that it will be—to the last extremity. And indeed the eyes of all men are turned to that important attack, of which we expect hourly to receive authentic intelligence. The Intrenchments which General Washington hath thrown up round New York, with the new fortifications he has raised at that city, are said to be constructed in such a manner as to require either a long siege, or to make the forcing of them a work of such danger, as the cool consideration of Sir William Howe will scarce think expedient to attempt.

In Reply to the many Pamphlets written against the Americans, there has lately appeared one, said to be written by Dr. Johnson. Its Title is, "Americans against Liberty: Or, an Essay on the Nature and Principles of true Freedom, shewing that the Design and Conduct of the Americans tend only to Tyranny and Slavery."

AFTER a very long, and rather tedious enquiry of above one third of the book, into what liberty and government are; and many arguments being brought against the ideas of Mr. Locke on those subjects, the Author comes to apply his maxims to the present case of the Americans, and proceeds thus:

"British freedom then is a freedom of law, a constitutional freedom, a freedom of acting and speaking what is right, a freedom founded in reason, happiness, and security. All licentious freedom, called by whatever specious name, is a savage principle of speaking and doing what a depraved individual thinks fit, without regard to the convenience of others, or the welfare of the world. The former is undeniably a substantial good: the latter is indisputably the greatest curse, that could be established for mankind.

"We may now ask; For which of these two is the present contest and contemplation of the Americans?

"It cannot be for the first; for they have enjoyed, ever since they could be called a people, all the advantages and immunities of Britons. Not the nearest subjects to the throne in England, nor the remotest members of the state in Asia, have had a wider field of freedom to range in, than the once happy sons of highly-favoured and indulged America. Can it be then for the last of these? Is it possible? The great majority of the empire, as well as the government and constitution of it, are against them in this claim, and against them for their own, as well as the general, welfare. It is not their interest to possess such a freedom: it is our duty to prevent it.

"The matter then (as we shall find) will come to this issue; that the rebel-Americans, in the wildest delusion and by the worst of means, are avowing themselves the open enemies to the public and general liberty of the British empire.

" This may appear a strong proposition; but a little further consideration may evince it true. I give them, or rather the uninformed bulk of them, credit, that they mean not at present to carry matters to this enormous length; but, while I am happy in making every concession in their favour, consistent with truth, I must add, that they have been seduced, imposed upon, and betrayed.

" They have been seduced by dishonest and designing men. Some, wishing to cancel their debts to Britain, have imagined that, by the confusion of affairs, all claims upon them may be buried in the ruins. Others, having little to lose and much to hope for, are for commencing political architect, and would upon these sad ruins erect a fabric of their own. Thus between roguery and ambition, poor John Bull is to be turned out of his house!

" They have been imposed upon by inflammatory publications, both at home and abroad, while the truth, and especially of late is denied an access, and ex parte histories alone have received a brisk circulation. Misinformed and mistaken men have suggested their prejudices, and operated upon an irritable and passionate temper, to a surprizing degree of romance and enthusiasm. Factious and republican incendiaries have also, with a malignant industry, circulated a thousand scurrilities and falsehoods, while the head has been too hot to examine, and the judgment too biassed to compare.

" They are betrayed into a civil war, upon very unequal terms, with a state, which wishes them no evil, and whose very interest it is to do them none;—with a state, which would receive them with open arms, upon the ground of honour, law, and reciprocal communication.

" Thus the enemies to British and constitutional liberty, by dishonesty, falsehood, and ambition, have engaged the great bulk of the Americans to adopt their own views, and, by a series of artifices, to support interests, which will destroy them. Could they succeed in their violence, it were easy to point out the path of their ruin both from themselves and from others; but if they should not, as indeed they cannot, how can they expect in future that complaisant indulgence to their interests from Great Britain, which she has often given in preference to her own?

" I am, however, more directly to shew, how the Americans (the greater part, as I said before, through much ignorance and simplicity), in their present hostile aims, are militating against them the public liberties of the British empire.

" Their conduct falls under this description, as it respects;

" 1. Their refusal of subjection to the British legislature:

" 2. Their demolition of the provincial legislatures: And

" 3. Their attempt to establish republicanism.

" The two first are, in fact, comprized, in the third; but we will proceed to this analysis argumenti gratia, and for a clearer detection of their proceedings.

" 1. The oppugnation made to the supreme legislation of Great Britain.

" The constitution of Great Britain is the palladium of British liberty throughout the empire. This constitution (as we have observed) consists, and has for ages consisted, of king, lords, and commons, in whom, collectively, the supremacy of power is lodged over the whole. Before the existence of her present colonies, every member of the state was understood to be under this supreme power of the state; and when their existence began, they were considered as so many branches springing from the original stock, and receiving their life, their support, and their all from it. They were without the means of defence, and accordingly looked up for it to their indulgent parent; nor ever looked in vain. They received, for their conduct, laws and regulations made in England, and were allowed to make local and municipal decrees for themselves, subject however to the controul of England, and not repugnant to her general and statute laws. This plainly implies their entire subordination and subjection to those statute laws, and consequently to the power that enacts them. In case of disobedience, they were to be " put out of the king's allegiance and protection." They were ever considered, and ever expressed, under the title, and upon the footing, of " natural born subjects;" which would have been an absurdity, but upon the idea of their being equally subject to the supreme, controuling power of the king and parliament. Upon this ground stood, and now stand, the liberties of America; and upon the same ground stand the liberties of Great Britain. They are interwoven by one constitution. American liberties are not to twine like ivy round the British oak, feed upon its sap, and impoverish the stock; but must grow together with it, and form the luxuriant branches of one spreading tree."

The author next proceeds to show, that there is no intention, in either king, lords, or commons, to adopt what truly deserves the the name of tyranny, and that neither intended to enslave America. He then examines the position of taxation without consent, in these words :

" But is not taxation, without consent, ' tyranny ? '—The propositions of the house of commons in February (1775) have absolutely annihilated that controversy. It is true, Great Britain cannot give up her right of demanding, from every part of the empire, the proportionate service and burden of each for the common defence ; yet the offer, held out to America, of adjusting the mode of raising that share, gives an entire new turn to the question. So that it is no longer, whether the king and parliament by the officers of the crown shall raise a revenue in the colonies ; but, whether the colonies are not bound, upon every principle of reason, justice, and duty, to contribute to the support of the general burden in common with the subjects of Britain, who have hitherto been taxed million upon million for them. Nor are they expected to pay it into the royal coffers as a civil list subscription ; but into a public stock, subject to parliamentary controul, for their own defence. But they have rejected this peaceful plan, and notoriously upon a system, inimical to the supremacy of Great Britain, their best and their only protector. ' Tis true, before their project was ripe enough to be owned, some of them, and the Pennsylvanians in particular, did talk of ' settling a revenue, from a ' sense of duty to their sovereign, and of ' esteem for their mother-country : ' * But 'tis equally true, that they never have taken one step to put this sense of duty into exercise. They reprobated the proposition of Britain ; but have never exhibited another in its stead. Their last address to the throne does not so much as glance at any such thing ; but talks of their rights and their expectations, as though the mother-country had none."

After shewing how ungratefully the Americans have treated those peers who were their greatest friends, as soon as they refused to countenance their rejection of lawful authority, the next step of the Author is to take a view of what the Colonists have already done, and to prove their actions to be tyrannical as well as rebellious.

" The Americans, as one of the first acts of their joint enmity to the authority of the King and the British parliament, that only palladium of true liberty to Britons, interdicted the British commerce, upon pains and penalties, insisted by no law, and specified by no measure. So far from wishing the sanctions of law and justice, they have shut up their courts of law to every claim of the British merchants, whose credulity, unsuspicious of such enormous dishonesty in persons who make the loudest pretences to urbanity and religion, had entrusted them with their property, and supported them in their trade. So consummate a fraud, by so large a body of men, was never transacted by a combination of Turks. A Turk would deem himself insulted to be compared with Christians like these. The very Arabs would scorn so vile and so mean a breach of confidence, and with no pretences of piety, would detest a conduct so glaringly impious. The property, not only of the inhabitants of Britain, but of the residents of America, has been seized by lawless committees, merely on account of a difference in opinion, or the suspicion of a difference. Persons, who have transgressed no law, have been stigmatized and held up as public enemies for assassination or ruin, only for refusing obedience to the arbitrary dictates of an audacious committee or an impudent mob. Houses, the castles of Englishmen, have been violently forced and searched for the seizure of what any man has a right to keep, when the law has forbidden it to none. The very food and apparel of people have been prescribed, not from the plea of a physical regimen, but from the illegal determination of an illegal assembly of men, who, scarce qualified to be servants, have dubbed themselves masters of an empire. Out of sheer liberty, people are obliged to eat, drink, and wear nothing as they please. And, as if it were not sufficient to force people against the laws, the arbitrary Republicans have combined to cheat them out of their property. For they have voted a paper-currency, upon their own faith (Græca fides!) as a legal tender, which, when it has answered the vile and insidious purpose of getting treasure and property out of the hands of the holders, will not, and cannot, be worth, in the sum of things, one single farthing to the possessors. No persons dare to refuse this paper, through fear of arbitrary punishment, and of exposing themselves, their families, and their all, to the mercy of a furious and ungovernable multitude. And thus they have begun a ruinous war, in which they have staked, both voluntarily and involuntarily, all the wealth and peace of America, against the power and opulence of Great Britain. Nor is there any chance of escaping from ruin by this manœuvre,

but by ruining their only prop and stay, Great Britain; and not even then, for their treasure will be expended, their commerce destroyed, and every means of wealth exterminated, in the very decision of the contest. This idea, very able persons among themselves, who cannot be suspected, and whom they do not suspect, to have any separate attachment or predilection for Britain, have stated again and again. Such men were too wise for their first Congress, and were therefore omitted in the second. And so anxious have their incendiaries been to bring matters to this tremendous crisis, that they have not suffered them to hold out one conciliatory proposition, but in such a way and of such a kind, as offered insult to the patience and dignity of the state. To crown all their savage enormities, the persons, as well as the properties, of innocent individuals, must, willing or unwilling, be committed in rebellion; for they have forced husbands from their wives and children, and sons from their parents, under the penalty of a goal and the most dangerous severities, into an army, whose leaders are composed either of ungrateful and ambitious deserters, or of ignorant and despicable leaders. In short, no severity has been spared to intimidate or compel the loyal subject, against his will, his interest, and his duty: no cruelty has been omitted, which savages would omit, upon those, who have opposed their violent proceedings, and have had the misfortune afterwards to fall into their hands. Thus are the Americans arrived to the full development of Mr. Locke's great "mystery (as he terms it) in politics"—"A government without laws, inconceivable to human capacity, and inconsistent with human society."

"This is a true representation, and no exaggerated description or caricature, of the proceedings of the arch-rebels, who have had the effrontery to style that part of the British dominions, 'The twelve united provinces of North America,' thereby erecting themselves, or meaning to erect themselves, either into a sovereign independent state, or, which is more likely, into several distinct and independent democracies.

"Of the liberty to be enjoyed under these rebellious demagogues, we have an admirable sample before us: and I would ask any dispassionate man, who loves the reality more than the mere name of liberty, whether any thing of this sort is to be apprehended under the mild, auspicious system, either here or in America? A system, in the management of which, as foreigners with amazement and admiration are compelled to own, that, "if they look at the conduct of all public officers in England, from the minister of state, or the judge, down to the lowest officers of justice; they find a spirit of forbearance and lenity prevailing in England among all persons in power, which cannot (they say) but create the greatest surprize in those, who have visited other countries." This lenity and forbearance none have experienced more than the Americans themselves; and yet none have upbraided the government, with more harsh and loud appellations of tyranny and arbitrary rule than they. Could they but have experienced the difference of any one other government upon earth, they would be ready, too ready, to say of their countrymen, what all the world must say of them;

O nimium fortunati, bona si sua norint.

Our constitution is obliged to foreigners for an eulogium, which they, who feel its blessings, should have been the first to pay themselves."

And this celebrated Pamphlet, which has run through sundry editions, ends thus:

"It appears then, upon the whole, that those of the Americans, now in rebellion, are aiming to reduce the strength and constitution of Great Britain, by impeding her commerce, denying her supremacy, and abolishing her civil officers of government among them: and also that they are endeavouring, with the basest ingratitude to a parent from whom they derive all their consequence, to strip her by force of arms of a considerable part of her dominions, for which she sacrificed her blood and treasure in a war, principally undertaken for their protection and security. It further appears, that all this is maintained against the clearest dictates of equity, duty and reason, which with one consent, delivered by the pen of their favourite reasoner, assert, that "as government cannot be supported without great charge, 'tis fit that every one, who enjoys a share of the protection, should pay, out of his estate, his proportion for the maintenance of it." But this proportion is more than they are desired to pay. Leave has been given them, with the utmost liberality of sentiment, to specify their own sums among themselves; and government, rather than bear the imputation of harshness upon its younger children, would accept any reasonable acknowledgment of their duty, either by a ratio established on the taxes of Britain, or otherwise as may suit them better, and still impose the weight of the load upon those elder shoulders, who have borne borne it ſo long (and without reſiſtance too) for the general good.

“ At all events, we Britons know for what we contend; but the Americans (excepting their republican demagogues) know not. We ſtand up only for our conſtitution, and to keep it from being ſplit into parts for an eaſy deſtruction by external foes. In doing this, we ſtrive for the only ſecurity which our liberties can find upon earth: and it will be ſeen that, in this contention and in ſuch a cauſe, Britons are Britons ſtill; and that, as America has been the firſt to take up arms, Great Britain will be the laſt to lay them down. The rebels, on the other hand, are diſputing either for an eſtabliſhment of anarchy, or for the erection of weak diſjointed ſtates, which, if the object could be obtained, muſt be one of the greateſt evils that could befall them. I mean not that the Americans in general have this deteſted ſcheme in view; but, 'tis now conceived, who among them have. Hungry adventurers, broken merchants, pettifogging lawyers, and ambitious leaders, are always ſuſpicious diſputants for liberty; eſpecially, as ſuch people ſtick at no means to accompliſh their ſelfiſh and deſperate ends. The conſtant wiſh, of ſuch men reſembles the petition of the old highland chieftains, whoſe uſual fervent grace was, “ Lord! turn the world upſide down, that Chriſtians may make bread out of it!” The plain Engliſh (ſays my author) of this pious requeſt is, that the world might become, for their benefit, a ſcene of rapine and confuſion *. In the ſame ſtrain of piety, the “ pulpit, and drum eccleſiaſtic,” have reſounded the infamous alarm, and exhibited a ſtriking proof, how much a ſet of men, who pretend to inculcate the religion of peace, have

Laid out their ſpiritual gifts to further
Their great deſigns of rage and murder;
And fancy that they have a miſſion
To preach the faith with ammunition.
Theſe build the church and ſtate upon
The holy text of pike and gun;
Decide all controversies by Infallible artillery;
And prove their doctrine orthodox
By apoſtolic blows and knocks.

But the ſhipwrights and other tumults are quieted, foreigners are deaf, and the tranſmiſſion of falſhoods can deceive no more. There are ſome, who will thoroughly comprehend theſe hints: it will be happy for them, if ſuch proof be not accumulated, as to preclude all neceſſity of amendment.

Conſtant additions cannot fail of filling up the meaſure of iniquity.

“ In the mean time, every true patriot, not the noiſy reſtleſs animal uſually miſcalled by that name, will join hand and heart, ſo far as his influence extends, that neither the rebels themſelves, nor their inſtigators here, may triumph over the conſtitutional ſupremacy of his King and Country. Nothing could more evince the real patriotiſm and magnanimity of adminiſtration, than their voluntary expoſure of themſelves to the cenſure of the miſguided and miſinformed multitude, to the trouble of carrying on this diſagreeable conteſt, and to the anxiety which muſt naturally ariſe in the direction of all coercive meaſures; when, by giving up the fortrefs of our happy conſtitution to the clamour of the ignorant or ſeditious, they might have paſſed on with as much eaſe and tranquillity, as the proſpect of an enervated dominion and a ſinking land could have afforded them. Their conduct, in this cauſe hitherto, deſerves the thanks of their country: a timid and conceding behaviour would have merited, in the ſum of things, its ſevereſt indignation.”

The Speech of Lawyer Brief againſt Tediouſneſs and Prolixity.

My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury,

THERE are a ſet of men in the world of ſuch a tedious, tireſome, trifling, troubleſome habitude, temper, and diſpoſition of mind, that they perplex, confound, entangle, and puzzle every circumſtance in every caſe which they undertake, proteſt, deſend, and juſtify. Inſtead of coming to the point, matter, buſineſs, and debate, they deviate, vary, fly off therefrom. When we expect truth, ſatisfaction, conviction and deciſion, we find, perceive, obſerve and remark, nothing but uncertainty, ambiguity, doubtfulneſs and difficulty. This, my lord, I humbly apprehend, conceive, think, preſume, and ſuſmiſe, is owing to tediousneſs, and prolixity; the nature, genius and extent of which, I ſhall conſider, weigh, examine, expatiate, and ſerutinize. In the firſt place then I ſhall ſhew, prove, and demonſtrate, the nature of tediousneſs and prolixity; by ſhewing, proving and demonſtrating, that there is nothing to unnatural; for the buſineſs of a tongue, utterance, ſpeech, or language, is to come to the point, argument, contemplation, or queſtion, at once, point blank, ſlap-daſh, and conciſely, without any prevarication, equivocation, retardation, or any circum-bendibus whatſoever. And now in the ſecond, ſucceeding, following place, point and preliminary, I come to promulgate the genius of tediousness, and prolixity, which is done, effected, performed, and brought about, by manifesting that they have no genius at all; and so far from any men of genius making use of them, none but your egregious, absurd, ridiculous dolts, dunderheads, and blockheads ever admit, acknowledge, receive, or embrace, any such notions, ideas, maxims, principles, or tenets. Thirdly, my lord, I beg leave, according to order, form, series, and succession, to animadvert upon the extent of tediousness, and prolixity; and this is managed by demonstrating that it is infinite and without bounds; and consequently can have no extent at all. And now, my lord, I will open the cause, spring, origin, fountain, rise and foundation of these vices, which is tautology, and which is the speaking, saying, delivering, uttering, pronouncing, divulging, declaring, remarking, observing, repeating, or expressing the same identical, individual thing, an hundred, and an hundred, and an hundred, and an hundred, and an hundred, and an hundred, hundred, hundred times over. And now, my lord, I beg leave, pardon, permission, and sufferance, to lay down only six and fifty particulars; every particular, my lord, shall consist of only seventy-two divisions; every division shall comprehend, contain, and consist of only eighty-two subdivisions; every subdivision shall be concluded with the six and fortieth article, shall consume, expend, and cost no more than an hour and an half.

Here the court was out of all manner of patience, and here the judge, with great indignation, put a period to a discourse, which, if the lawyer's tongue had not been mortal, might have lasted to all eternity.

Bon Mot. By Mr. Foote.

THE death of the late Mr. Holland, of Drury-lane theatre (who was the son of a baker at Chyswick) had likewise a very great effect on Foote's spirits; being a legatee, as well as appointed, by the will of the deceased, one of his bearers, he attended the corpse to the family-vault, at Chyswick, and there very sincerely paid a plentiful tribute of tears to his memory. On his return to town, by way of alleviating his grief, he called in at the Bedford-coffee-house, where an acquaintance coming up to him, asked him if he had not been paying the last compliment to his friend Holland? "Yes, poor fellow," says Foote, almost snivelling at the same time, "I have just seen him shoved into the family-oven."

Masonical Aphorisms, from an Introduction to Free Masonry, by Mr. Meeson, M. M.

"THE mighty pillars on which Masonry is founded, are those whose basis is wisdom, whose shaft is strength, and whose chapter is beauty.

"The wisdom is that which descends from above; and is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy.

"The strength, is that which depends on the living God; who resisteth the mighty, and scattereth the proud in the imagination of their hearts; who giveth us power to resist and escape all temptations, and to subdue our evil appetites. A strength, which is a refuge to the distressed; a bond of unity and love amongst brethren, and of peace and quiet in our own hearts.

"Our beauty, is such as adorns all our actions with holiness; is born out of the rock, which is Christ, and raised upright by the plumb-line of the gospel; squared and levelled to the horizontal of God's will, in the holy lodge of St. John: and such as becomes the temple, whose maker and builder is GOD."

"Those societies dwindle away and vanish, which are not contrived, supported, and adorned with the wisdom, strength, and beauty, of our most ancient and honourable order; where nobility is ennobled; where knowledge is improved, and where conversation is rendered useful; as masons and rational creatures draw no design, but on the trassel board of a good intention.

"Though we are all free and on the level, yet it is our duty always to keep within compass, and to conduct ourselves according to the square and plumb."

"Prudence is the queen and guide of all other virtues; the ornament of our actions, the square and rule of all our affairs.

"Faith, hope, and charity, are the three principal graces, by which we ascend to the grand celestial Lodge, where pleasures flow for evermore.

The

The unexpected Interview: A Moral Tale.

AN officer of family, appointed to a command in America, felt an uncommon satisfaction at his departure from England. He had not, indeed, for some years found any felicity in his native country, having been compelled by his father, when he was very young, to marry a lady with a large fortune, but by no means the woman whom he would have chosen for a wife. In consequence of this compulsive alliance, he was not in the least sorry to have a decent pretence for a removal from her. Eighteen successive years had not been sufficient to make him forget the day on which he had been prudentially obliged to take a step, which strongly militated against his inclination.

Upon his arrival in that part of the American Continent to which his regiment had been previously ordered, he was received in a manner which gave him the most flattering hopes; as there not only appeared among his own men an impatience to be led on to action, but a considerable body of the Indians came over, with a warm desire to distinguish themselves on the side of his Royal Master.

Among the troops ready in America to co-operate with this general in his military manœuvres, there was a young subaltern, who recommended himself particularly to his attention, by the extreme exactness and address with which he performed all the duties required of him, by the immediate obedience he paid to all his orders, and by the alacrity with which he carried them into execution.—The general, highly pleased with his behaviour both as a soldier and as a man, determined to take the first opportunity to reward him for his uncommon merit.

As this young soldier was as pleasing in his person as he was amiable in his manners, the general frequently singled him out from the rest of his corps, not only to converse with him about military affairs, but upon other subjects as they were occasionally started. Upon every subject he acquitted himself greatly to his commander's satisfaction; but there was a seriousness, or rather dejection about him, not often observed in so young a man, especially in a man who could not avoid being conversant with people of dispositions very different from his own. Desirous of being acquainted with the cause of so unusual an appearance of melancholy, the general had several times intended to gratify his curiosity; but he had no leisure to attend to the private histories of any of those under his command, in whose fortunes he felt himself interested.

October, 1776.

While he was one day engaged in the attack of a fortification, his foot unfortunately slipped, and he fell down. One of the besieged instantly availing himself of this accident, pointed a pistol at him, in order to take away his life, having dropped his sword in the conflict. At this moment Percy, the young officer abovementioned, seeing his general in a dangerous situation, snatched the pistol out of his adversary's hand, and laid him dead at his feet with his sword.

The general, who had not been much hurt, immediately recovering himself, cast a look full of the most lively gratitude at his deliverer; he then pushed on the attack with additional vigour, and succeeded agreeably to his wishes.

When he had gained possession of a place which he considered as an important acquisition, he enquired eagerly after the preserver of his life, who had been, during the hurry and confusion of the day, separated from him. No sooner did he perceive him than he flew into his arms, pressed him affectionately to his bosom, and poured out the effusions of his heart in a way which convinced the young hero, that the service he had done was highly estimated: and he received all his commander's striking proofs of gratitude and regard with a modesty and respectfulness which could not but enhance his merit, and render him still more worthy of being greatly esteemed.

From this time the general and his young deliverer became almost inseparable companions; the more they conversed with each other, the more were they pleased with each other's company; and of course became mutually interested in each other's happiness.

Satisfied, however, as the general was with his success, and pleased with young Percy's companionable parts, he was, like him, far from being happy; like him, he was at times deeply dejected, and a gloom hung over his countenance, which plainly proved that his heart was far from being at ease. And indeed he did not attempt to conceal from his young friend the aversion which he felt to his lady; nor did he refrain from confessing, that he had, by the commission of some inexcusable follies in the earlier part of his life, deserved all the uneasiness which he endured. "But what can you have done, Percy (said he, one day to him)?—You do not seem to be capable of those violent passions that have occasioned my disquiet; a disquiet to which I am condemned for life."

Percy answered with a heavy sigh, and a fervent wish, that it was in his power to alleviate alleviate the sorrows of a man, whom he both revered and loved.

"Little reason have you to revere me, (said the general) as I am the most despicable of men!"

The tone in which he spoke these words, roused Percy's curiosity. He therefore, though not insensible of the respect due to his superior, ventured to hint a wish, to have what he uttered in the fullness of his heart explained. The general, who had longed for an opportunity to vent his affliction, which, from its confinement to his own bosom, became doubly oppressive, gladly complied with Percy's desires, and began in the following terms:

"Born of a good family, and heir to a large fortune, I was indulged in every pleasurable pursuit; and foolishly thought, that with youth, health, and money, no man could possibly be unhappy. What an absurdity is there in this mode of thinking! I was soon forced to feel my mistake. Being out one day upon a hunting party, I was accidentally in the evening separated from my companions, and rode on till it grew dark. Finding that I had missed my way, I was at last directed, by the glimmering of a distant light, to a cottage. I knocked at the door, and a boy appeared; of him I enquired my nearest way to the village I had left in the morning: he replied, that he would ask his mother. An old man then came out, who had all the appearance of having been accustomed to a very different kind of life. With a politeness which would have done honour to a court, he invited me in; telling me at the same time, that as I was very far from the place I had named, he was apprehensive I should not be able to reach it that evening, in consequence of the increasing darkness. After this introduction he offered me a bed, and I accepted of it, merely from necessity; though I had no reason, when I retired to the chamber allotted me, to be dissatisfied with my accommodations. On my entering the room from which the old man advanced to me, a beautiful young girl, about seventeen, rose from the table on which she was drawing, and received me with a simplicity in her manner as elegant as it was attractive. "My dear Cecilia, (said her father) this gentleman has lost his way, and will be our guest to-night; go, and order some refreshments for him." She left the room immediately; and I could not help complimenting her father on his having so amiable a child, whom I was indeed the more surprised to find in a dwelling so far removed from the world. "Why, Sir, (replied he) I was some years ago driven into retirement by a series of misfor-

"tunes; and having nothing left me but this one child, my whole time has been spent in making her as accomplished as a young woman ought to be." I assured him, that he had been a successful preceptor; and the compliments which I paid the lovely Cecilia on her return to us, produced a confirmation of that assertion: the glow of modesty which overspread her face not only heightened her beauty, but convinced me that her sensibility was exquisite; and before the time for my departure arrived, I was assured by the naïvete of her whole behaviour, that I was far from being disagreeable to her. I could not, however, at that juncture, stay any longer where my heart prompted me to rest for ever. I took leave of Mr. West, my kind host, in the morning, pressed his Cecilia's hand tenderly, and promised to come again, and repeat my grateful effusions. I did, indeed, return—but for what an infamous purpose! Finding that I could think of nothing except my Cecilia, and well knowing that my father would never give his consent to so unequal an alliance, I shamefully took advantage of Mr. West's unsuspecting temper, and his daughter's inexperience; I gained without difficulty the affections of the latter, as well as the esteem of the former: but supposing it impossible to prevail on my Cecilia to go off with me, I stole into her apartment one night after she was in bed, and strove by all the seducing arts I could adopt upon the dishonourable occasion, to persuade her to yield to my wishes. Her love was great, but her virtue was still greater; and they both operated together with such violence, that they threw her into a fainting-fit. Would you believe it, Percy? I was villain enough to avail myself of her helpless situation; and she recovered, only to be acutely sensible of her disgrace, by the loss of her honour; a loss which she deplored in the strongest, the most pathetic terms. Dreading the reproaches, the just reproaches of her much-abused father, I returned home, where my father waited for me to insist upon my marrying the lady he had chosen for me; threatening me at the same time with the forfeiture of my inheritance, if I disobeyed his will. In vain did I endeavour to change his determination by a free confession, accompanied with the sincerest marks of penitence, of my criminal conduct. He laughed at my folly, and told me, that such crimes were of no consequence; adding, that nobody who knew the world paid any attention to them, and that a sum of money might make all things easy. Overpowered by this reply, I committed a new crime—I basely abandoned the woman on whom my heart doated, and married the woman whom my soul abhorred. The moment I had tied the indissoluble knot, I dispatched a messenger with a letter to Cecilia, in which I tried to break my marriage to her in the gentlest manner, and concluded with the strongest assurances of my unabating love. What were my feelings when the messenger returned ! The cottage was shut up, and nobody could be found who could give the smallest intelligence of its inhabitants. From that moment to this, my life has been a burthen to me. The remembrance of my unjustifiable conduct is attended with the most painful reflections; and when imagination places my dearest Cecilia before me, blooming in all her charms, the idea of having blasted that virtue which threw the brightest lustre over them, almost drives me to distraction."

Here the general ceased speaking.—As soon as he had recovered himself a little, he applied to his young friend for the cause of his dejection.

Percy in answer told him, that it arose from his being enamoured with a young lady greatly his superior in point of fortune, as he had nothing but his pay for his own subsistence and the support of a mother, who deserved all he could possibly do for her, as she had ever shewn herself the most affectionate of parents, and had taken the greatest care of his education, his father having died when he was an infant. "How different is your situation from mine ! (exclaimed the general) You are virtuous, and must be happy ; I, guilty of a most atrocious deed, do not deserve, and consequently cannot expect felicity. But let me see your mother—Perhaps it may be in my power to make her condition more easy, and to serve you into the bargain."

Percy, having made proper acknowledgments, fixed upon that very afternoon for the general's visit to his mother. When he had introduced him, with an apology also to her, as a friend, though a stranger, he again apologized for the meanness of the apartment. Scarce had he got out his words, when Mrs. Percy shrieked, and fainted.

The general, who had stood in a fixed attitude from the moment he entered the room, flew to her assistance. His nearer approach confirmed his first conjecture ; and he was assured, transportingly assured, that in Mrs. West he beheld his long lost, much-injured Cecilia. She recovered in his arms, but withdrew herself.—She withdrew herself, however, only to tell him, that he had owed his life to—his son. At this instant Percy fell at the feet of his father, who, after having with the highest parental delight pronounced him his son, implored forgiveness of his cruelly deserted mother ; telling her repeatedly, in very affectionate as well as emphatic language, that if it ever should be in his power to repair the injury he had done her, he would that instant offer her his hand, and all belonging to him ; adding, that in his then situation, he would not only publicly own him for his son, but settle a fortune on him sufficient to authorize his addresses to the mistress of his heart.

Mrs. Percy was too much agitated to make any reply ; she even reproached herself for encouraging an interview with the man who had left her in so dishonourable a manner.

While the general was thus affectingly situated, a messenger, who had been for some time in search of him, brought him a packet of letters. He broke it open hastily ; and soon finding his wife was dead, threw himself a second time at his Cecilia's feet, who, for her son's sake, promised to pardon him. He dreaded at that joyful instant to mention her father—but his curiosity was soon gratified.—"As soon as I acquainted my father (said Cecilia) with what had passed between us, he carried me to London ; there we lived concealed till the birth of my son. My father soon afterwards died, in consequence of a severe illness which his grief, arising from my weakness had occasioned ; but he had, upon our arrival in town, called himself Percy, in order to prevent my exposure as much as he could. The little he left me I spent in the education of my son, and in purchasing a commission for him. On his being ordered to America, I desired to follow him—having nothing else worthy of my care and attention in a world in which I had met with so much affliction."

In a few days after this most interesting interview, the general not only publicly married his Cecilia, but prevailed on the father of the young lady on whom his son had fixed his affections, to make him happy also ; as he was now his adopted heir, and thoroughly merited the felicity he was going to enjoy, as a reward for his courage and virtue,

— A Journey from Paris to Lyons.

"THE coach we found had its full complement : for no less than ten were crammed into its enormous carcase. I fancy I hear you say—ten in one coach ! Yes—and ten is but a trifling number, compared with that, which some diligences about Paris carry. The interior of this machine is about seven feet by five : and the passengers sit around the sides, fronting each other. When I found myself cased in it with so many, I confess I had some apprehensions, that we should, on the first jolt, all break to the ground. But I had not observed its exterior strength; which I thought afterwards, when I examined the massy wheels, axle, &c. was calculated to transport, upon occasion, a tower from one town to another.

"We soon perceived that we had fallen into agreeable company, and had some prospect of spending our time comfortably in the coach, whatever we might in the Auberges. Many a time have I travelled in diligences; but never yet was witness to a conversation in one, so quickly circulated. Every tongue though it was dark, was busy, the moment the horses were put in motion: and the difference between a coachful of Frenchmen and a coachful of Englishmen, could not but strike me very forcibly. In the one a profound silence reigns throughout; or the first that breaks it is he that is soonest asleep. Every one furlily takes the place to which he thinks he has a right: for the offer of a seat, which is looked upon to be the best, is a strain their politeness seldom reaches. Then, not a soul dares to speak till the morning dawns, except some honest doer, who having been at loggerheads with his neighbour, rouses up to ask pardon. When the light permits, every one examines the company with circumspection; and bold is the man, who ventures to draw his watch, and declare the hour to the rest. One would imagine, in this respect, that England, instead of France, was the arbitrary government, and that people were afraid of opening their mouths in the dark, lest there should be some spy who might misinterpret their words into disaffection. In the other, the behaviour is directly the reverse; and the conversation seems like a repast, to which a number of hungry men are introduced, who not doubting their welcome, fall to eating their fill, without invitation or ceremony.

"Until the day broke upon us; we were entertained by a person, whom we found afterwards to be a knight of Malta, with an account of the coronation, at which he had been present. He was plied with questions on all sides, by persons whose phizzes he could not discover; and directed his answers to the quarter from whence the voices came. Before the company could well view each others faces, we were acquainted with the profession, and business of half our fellow-travellers. As soon as we were discovered to be Englishmen, had we had a hundred tongues, inquisitiveness would have found employment for them all. We parried their questions as we could, and entitled ourselves to push again in our turn: in short, we were as well acquainted with each other, before breakfast, as if we had been cooped up together for a month.

"The shining characters of our company were, a Surgeon, a Dieppe and a Paris mercer, the officer of Malta, and a lady of about seven or eight and twenty, whose pleasure was a law to all. The surgeon, to whom we were indebted for the principal part of our mirthful entertainment, gave us, between his stories, an account of extraordinary cases that had come within the sphere of his practice, and of a cradle which he had invented for a fractured leg, and for which he had received the prize of a silver medal. Your friend ——— and I have often stared upon one another, as his anatomical lectures were such, as we did not imagine well calculated for the ears of the young lady, who was one of the audience, and equally a stranger to every one in the coach, as to us. But we were much more surprized to hear her join in the conversation, on the dissection of a reputed hermaphrodite, with as much ease and freedom, as if it had been on fashions. But it is not the first mistake I have made in judging what female delicacy is capable of bearing here. However, notwithstanding all his indelicate dissections, our surgeon was the superior wit of all, and I feel a concern whilst I am writing, to think I may never again see a man, who was able to diffuse so much good humour, and cheerfulness around him.

"After dinner, as if the Burgundy had made their bosoms lord sit lightly on his throne, they generally drowned the noise of the wheels in singing. We found they were very desirous of hearing an English song; and as you know we are both thrummers on the harpsichord, we sung a duet of Handel's: with which their national politeness would not suffer them, to express themselves any otherwise than pleased. But I am afraid, if I go on in this manner, to tell you every thing we did and said in the diligence, you will be tired, though we were not, before you get to Lyons.

"Our rate of travelling was no more than sixty miles a day, though we got up at two or three o'clock in the morning: but the tediousness was amply overbalanced, by the mirth and good humour of the company. Before we approached any town or village, we had full information of every thing there worth curiosity: and by means of the relais, and the good-nature of our fellow travellers, had generally leisure, and conductors enough in our rambles. Our number after the first day increased considerably; for several had taken possession of the outside of the coach, among whom was a young abbé, and an officer. These two sometimes exchanged places with those on the inside: and seemed to relieve those, whose tongues had already done sufficient duty.

"I shall not easily forget the chearful countenances of the diligence; though good-humour was by no means wanting, when we were shut up together; yet at dinner and supper, as though cramped before, it expanded itself, and spread on every face additional risibility. Some Mendicant monks generally attended the dessert with a plate, to collect alms for their convent; and I could not but wonder, at the little success they met with, from people, whose behaviour seemed to promise universal benevolence. Their petitions were commonly answered with a wave of the head; and seldom did I see any one prevailed on, to drop a sou for charity. Once, indeed, when a young jolly monk entered, whose face showed little penance or mortification, the young lady of our company, to whom he applied, promised to make a collection for him, if he would salute her. The Franciscan pressed his hand to his breast, shook his head, and by his looks seemed to tell her he dared not. The whole circle of our company then displayed a large contribution, which they promised to give, if he would comply with the conditions: but either his monastic vow, or the discipline of his convent had too great weight with him, to be overbalanced by the temptation. I felt some kind of indignation at seeing him an object of ridicule, which he had not deserved. However he did not appear to be sensible of any indignity offered him, but took it as a badinage, to which he had been accustomed. The fille, who waited on us, joining in the laugh, was offered the collection, if she would kiss him: but he retired with precipitation.

"I know not what induced our fair fellow-traveller, to be so severe on those ecclesiasticks, that happened to fall in her company: but she seldom missed an opportunity, of attempting to turn them into ridicule. Perhaps it might be that the monastick orders seem to defy, and declare war against her sex; for she treated every religieux as an enemy, and his continence and sanctity as grimace. The quartermen might expect to meet from men, would, I believe, be but little better; and they would not often escape, were they permitted to walk without the convents, the jeers of those, who consider them as less man-haters in reality, than in profession. The young abbé, I mentioned, was a little unfortunate, in paying his devoirs to one, who showed no mercy for the fraternity. Mademoiselle had employed some time, to make him believe, that she was struck with his figure, and had conceived a tendresse for him. He swallowed the bait, and made serious proposals to her, of quitting his habit, and decamping en poste: but the flinty-hearted damsel published his offers, to his great mortification, and the diversion of the company.

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed: or Memoirs of Capt. Bobadil and Mrs. Bellamy.

THE hero of our present memoirs will, from the title given him, clearly appear to be in the dramatic line, and may in the character we have delineated, be stiled excellent, having never yet had a rival in that part.

Capt. Bobadil was designed for trade, and, if we are not misinformed, was apprenticed to a tallow chandler. At the expiration of his time he found that business was no way calculated for his genius, and soon after engaged with Mr. Rich, the patentee of Covent Garden theatre, who was then considered as the best Harlequin in England. Under his tuition the Captain acquired a great degree of merit in this walk; but his comic powers were soon called into play, and he met with uncommon applause in many capital characters, and was pronounced to be the best fop since the time of Colley Cibber. Having a great command of countenance, and uncommon expression, he surpassed all his competitors in most of the parts which he attempted. His Bobadil we have already mentioned, to which may be added Lord Foppington, the Fine Gentleman in Lethe, Captain Brazen, Marplot, &c. &c. in which, and many more characters, he has had no rival for a succession of years, and although he is, at this period, upwards of sixty, he plays them with as much ease and agility as he did at five and twenty.

He was engaged with Mr. Garrick at Drury-lane for several seasons, and here he appeared in the double capacity of author and actor. If his pantomimes, several of which he produced, cannot justly entitle him to be enlisted under the banner of writers, a petite piece which he produced will certainly qualify him. In this piece the late Doctor Hill, who then wrote a paper called the Inspector, was severely satyriized. It seems the doctor had in that production taken some liberties with Bobadil, which drew from our hero a very smart letter, that was published; and the doctor's disgrace at Ranelagh, where Mr. Brown knocked his wig about his face, gave rise to the farce, which was performed only one night for the Captain's benefit.

Some time after this he went over to Dublin, and commenced manager: but his success was very unequal to his expectations, and he had prudence enough to return to England before his affairs were desperate; though it is said he lost a considerable sum in the enterprise. Since that period he has contented himself with acting upon a very handsome salary, and giving up all ambitious thoughts of being a king of the boards.

With respect to amours, notwithstanding he has been upwards of thirty years upon the stage, the annals of the Green Room do not record any extraordinary connexions he has framed in the dramatic way. Indeed our hero is naturally of a constant disposition; and though we may suppose in his juvenile years he was often captivated with scenic beauty, he was either so prudent in his connections, or so honourable in his secrecy, that few of these alliances have transpired. A report prevailed that he and a celebrated Columbine were sometimes tete-a-tete off the stage, and Mrs. Woffington is said to have had a very peculiar predilection for him. This lady seemed to imitate the celebrated Ninon de L'Enclos in her amours: her passions and affections were transient, and she made no secret of a succeeding rival the moment she met with one to her taste. A certain captain, who was remarked for the elegance of his person, and his uncommon politeness and address, made her some very handsome presents, in hopes of obtaining her favours. At length she agreed to grant him the liberty of being her lodger for one night: in the morning, she produced all the trinkets he had given her, saying, "there, captain, take back those baubles, you are too fine a fellow for me—a very handsome man is in my opinion the most disgusting being in the world—he expects so many attentions and assiduities to his sweet person, that he must be courted instead of the woman. Give me little Bob F—with his rough face, and his blunt behaviour; I shall go with him to Richmond this afternoon: so, Captain, you need not lose your time in repeating your visits." Saying this, she ordered her chair for a rehearsal at the house.

As prudence has, in general, dictated Bobadil's conduct, we may reasonably suppose that in these transient connexions, he was not guilty of any extravagance that might involve him in difficulties. He has no relish for play, which has been so fatal to many buxkin heroes, and he is remarkable for sobriety. These good qualities have carried him thus far through life with reputation, and always enabled him to be ignorant of distress.

We now approach the time when he formed his present alliance with Mrs. Bellamy. This lady's origin appears to be doubtful. It is certain that her mother was a Mrs. Waters, who had lived in very genteel life, and was the complete gentlewoman; she had a fine understanding, happily cultivated with a polite education. Some have positively asserted that Miss Bellamy was the daughter of the late Mr. Rich, patentee of Covent Garden; but the most general opinion is that she is descended from lord T——y. There is but one point that renders this dubious, which is that he has handsomely provided for all his sons, and they all bear his name. Be this as it may, she was educated in a manner suitable to such a descent, and soon discovered marks of an uncommon understanding. After having received all the necessary instructions of her respective masters, she might be considered as superior to the generality of her sex, as well for politeness, as taste, and even learning. Mr. Rich engaged her as a performer, when she was still a child, and as she advanced towards maturity, she filled many capital parts. She became peculiarly conspicuous in tragedy, and acquitted herself beyond any performer on the stage, except Mrs. Cibber and Mrs. Pritchard. If Miss Bellamy was not equal to the former as an actress, she surpassed her in person, and was more suited to many parts than Mrs. Pritchard on account of the impropriety of her figure. Mrs. Bellamy was the first female performer at Covent Garden for several years, where she not only met with the most extravagant applause as an actress, but made many conquests as a prevailing toast. A certain well-known baronet carried her off by force one night as she was stepping to her coach after the play. He had prepared a lodging in Hatton Garden for the purpose, whither he carried her, and confined her for several days. She was to have played on the very succeeding night; but as she could not be found, her place was supplied by an inferior performer. At length she was discovered by an acquaintance, who saw her at the window, and he found means to restore her to her friends. The baronet being threatened with a prosecution for a rape, he fled abroad: in the mean time, he employed an agent to compromise matters; and upon paying a considerable sum of money, the action was dropped.

Soon after this event, the late Mr. Calcraft became deeply enamoured with our heroine. He was then the most capital army agent in England. He offered her such such proposals, as she thought it was prudent to accept, and they soon lived together with mutual satisfaction; he adulating Miss Bellamy to excess, and she taking every possible means to make herself as agreeable as possible. A succession of years rolled on in this situation, without the least alloy; during which time she bore him two children, a son and a daughter, who were uncommonly beautiful, and of whom their father was remarkably fond.

The fatal itch for play now seized our heroine; and having made acquaintance with some second-hand women of quality, they fleeced her unmercifully: as they imagined Mr. Calcraft was so fond of Mrs. Bellamy, that she could command any sum, they had no sort of remorse at winning hundreds after hundreds of her; whilst she imagining that women of quality must certainly be women of honour, never suspected there could be any foul play with people of their rank, and readily paid all she lost with great punctuality. These payments draining her of all the ready cash she could raise, and being unwilling to alarm Mr. Calcraft with her indiscretion, she had recourse to an expedient to raise money unknown to him. This was by purchasing jewels to a considerable amount, which she disposed of to a great loss. When the bills were brought in, he was much astonished, especially as he had never seen her wear any of the articles mentioned. He interrogated her upon this head, when she acknowledged her error, but promised never again to be guilty of it; upon which he forgave her, and paid the demand. However, so insatiable is good company and play, that she found herself soon in the same dilemma, and driven to the same shifts and expedients. The debt she had now created with her jeweller was far greater than the former: she took every possible means to dissuade him from laying it before Mr. Calcraft; but at length pleading necessity, it was delivered in. Mr. Calcraft was so enraged at this second act of indiscretion, and foreseeing that no fortune, however great, could support her in the pursuit of such folly and extravagance, a rupture ensued, and from this period they were never after upon good terms. By this imprudence she not only lost a very considerable fortune, which Mr. Calcraft had bequeathed her by his will (from whence her name was erased); but she soon found herself in very distressed circumstances for want of her usual support. Her former noble acquaintance no longer courted her company; and so far from affording her any relief, only laughed at her, for her folly. Her creditors now became clamorous, and she found it necessary to make application to a certain minister for his protection, which she obtained.

Mrs. Bellamy now returned to the stage, which afforded her a genteel support, as her theatrical abilities were no way impaired, and she was still in her prime.

At this period it was our hero made his first advances to Mrs. Bellamy, who was not such a prude as to slight them. Accordingly we find them soon after connected in a very agreeable manner: Mrs. Bellamy highly esteeming the Captain for his many amiable qualities; and he finding in her a very entertaining companion, in a sensible well bred woman.

This alliance has now continued for some years, and seems still to be very permanent.

When there was a revolution in the theatrical cabinet, and new managers took up the reins of government; many actors and actresses were dismissed, and amongst others Mrs. Bellamy, though we think she was at that time equal to any actress upon the stage, Mrs. Barry and Mrs. Yates excepted. But as youth and beauty will prevail, even when unaccompanied with dramatic excellence, so we find that Mrs. Hartley bears the belle over Mrs. Bellamy, though their theatrical merits are very unequal.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

Mr. Editor,

I Have in my late travels seen a Phoenix! or something almost as rare; a being as often mentioned by the Poets as the Arabian bird, and almost as seldom to be found amongst the haunts of men! I have seen a youth who died for love!—If you admit this fact, which I aver from my own personal knowledge, I think you will not be at a loss in what rank of like to place this rara avis. His plumage was not of the scarlet dye, no gorget glittered on his gentle breast, nor golden epaulet adorned his shoulder—of course he was not of the military race. The peacock's gaudy tints were none of his; no spangled vest or gay embroidered coat had marked him of the anomalous breed ycleped Macaronies.

The linnet's russet-brown was all the colour that ever decked his form; yet manly grace and natural elegance appeared in every motion of his limbs; his sun-burnt cheek gave lustre to his dark blue eyes, while they spoke all the language of his heart, and beamed forth sensibility. Such was the figure of our farmer's son, the gentle Richard Wilson.

In a cottage, separated only by a few fields from his father's house, there dwelt a maid of a still lower rank than even the humble humble hero of my tale; her mother was a widow, left with three children, and without support, but what she could procure from her own industry. Richard's humanity at first attached him to this helpless family; he used to till their little garden, and furnish them with every small assistance which his not affluent means afforded.—But as the elder daughter of this lowly hut, the fair Eliza, grew towards womanhood, her opening charms made deep impressions upon Richard's heart, and quickly taught him that

“Pity is allied to Love.”

Nature and Fortune often are at strife, and rarely do we find their gifts united in a single object. Their quarrel now seemed risen to the height; Eliza was the subject of contention; and while deprived by one of every good within her power to give, the other lavishly poured forth her store to deck the blooming maid.

I think it is hardly necessary to say, that Eliza's heart soon became sensible of Richard's worth, and that their love was mutual.—The day, the hour was fixed to make them one; their names had twice been called together in the church, no envious tongue forbidden, when, O sad state of sublunary bliss! Eliza felt the pangs of sickness seize on all her frame, and the most fatal symptoms of the small-pox, that tyrant to beauty, soon appeared. Though he had never had this foul disorder himself, no power could force her faithful Richard from the bed-side, where changed, disfigured, his Eliza lay.—She felt the King of Terrors' near approach, and grasping Richard's hand in her's, implored that he would cease to grieve for her, but live to be a comfort to her aged mother. “She shall be mine, my mother (he replied), but I must follow you.”

Eliza's spotless soul was fled, ere Richard's speech was ended.—I saw him lead her drooping mother to Eliza's grave, and all the village youths and damsels mourn her loss, and her cold clay laid decent in the earth.

Each morn and eve was Richard found near his Eliza's grave; nor could Time's lenient power abate his grief; his cheek grew wan, his eyes were dimmed with tears, and he scarce seemed the shadow of himself.

Compassion prompted me to seek the youth, and try to reason down his fruitless grief.—I told him, if he persisted in indulging it, it would destroy his life, and frustrate the promise he had made to her he loved.—He calmly answered in the following words:

“You are mistaken, Sir, I will not die till I have fulfilled my promise; but when that happy hour shall come, no power on earth shall force me to stay longer here.—I thank you for your kindness, but my fate is fixed.”

I did not comprehend the meaning of these words; but thought his mind disturbed by constant grief, which I, however, had no doubt but time would conquer.—This happened in the latter end of June, and some days after I went into Devonshire.

On my return to Somersetshire last August, I enquired what was become of Richard. My friend, at whose house I then was, told me, that he had pursued exactly the same course of daily visiting Eliza's grave, till he was become quite emaciated with grief and fasting.

On the second of August Richard became of age, and went that day dressed in his best attire to the next town, where he, in all due form, bequeathed his worldly wealth, his father being dead, to Eliza's mother; he then returned to the sad spot where all his treasure lay, bedewed it with his tears, and within a few days after expired.

If I had a talent for poetry, I should think these lovers, particularly the young man, as proper a subject for an elegant epitaph, as those less unhappy ones, whom Mr. Gay has immortalized from their being killed together by lightning; but as I am not blessed with such talents as his, I shall content myself with sincerely regretting the hapless fate of this amiable pair.

Anecdote of Lord Townshend.

LORD Harcourt, the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, arriving late in the evening in Dublin harbour, and meeting no fit accommodation for him and his suite at his landing-place, set off, after refreshing themselves, for the Castle, where they did not arrive till midnight. Lord Townshend, who only staid in Ireland to receive him, was, at this period, with half a dozen convivial friends, over a bottle, which Lord Harcourt being informed of, without any ceremony walked up stairs. His sudden appearance threw the whole company into some little confusion, except Lord Townshend, who, after congratulating him on his safe arrival, bid him sit down and do as he did; observing, at the same time, “that though he did come at the twelfth hour, he had not found him napping.”

The Life of Dr. Thomas Arundel.

ARUNDEL (THOMAS) archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Richard II. Henry IV. and Henry V. was the second son of Robert Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel and Warren. At twenty-two years of age, from being archdeacon of Taunton, he was advanced to the bishopric of Ely, the 6th of April, 1375, in the reign of Edward III. In 1386, he was appointed lord chancellor of England; two years after he was translated to the see of York; and, in 1396, was advanced to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury, when he resigned the chancellorship. In the second year of his translation, he was impeached by the commons, together with his brother the earl of Arundel, and the duke of Gloucester, of high treason. The chief article of the charge was, that, being bishop of Ely, and lord chancellor, he was traitorously aiding, procuring, and advising, in making a commission, directed to Thomas duke of Gloucester, Richard earl of Arundel, and others; and procured himself, as one of the chief ministers of state, to be put into the said commission; which commission was apparently prejudicial to the king's prerogative and dignity; and that the said Thomas put the said commission in execution. The commons petitioned that the king would orler the archbishop to be taken into safe custody. The prelate acknowledged in the king's presence that he had been mistaken, and erred in his conduct relating to that commission, and therefore submitted to his majesty's mercy. He was declared a traitor, and condemned to perpetual banishment; his temporalities were seized, his goods and chattels forfeited, and himself was ordered to quit the kingdom in six weeks after the sentence was pronounced.

He retired first to France, and then to the court of Rome, where he was kindly received by pope Boniface IX. who wrote a letter to king Richard in his favour; but this having no effect, his holiness resolved to interpose his authority: he accordingly nominated Arundel to the bishopric of St. Andrew's, and declared his intention of giving him several preferments in England.

Henry, duke of Lancaster, had been banished by king Richard, and was in France when the nobility and others, tired with the oppressions of Richard, solicited him to take the crown: this request they drew up in a letter, and sent it over by faithful messengers to archbishop Arundel, who was then in Britany, desiring him to be their advocate on this occasion with the duke. The archbishop being a fellow-sufferer, gladly accepted the office, and went with the messengers to the duke, at Paris, where they delivered the letters from the nobles and commons of England, and the archbishop seconded them with the best arguments he could invent.

In the year 1399, Arundel returned to England with the duke of Lancaster; upon whose accession to the throne, by the name of Henry IV. the pope restored Arundel to his see. In the first year of king Henry's reign, Arundel summoned a synod, which sat at St. Paul's. In 1408, he began to exert himself against the Lollards, or Wickliffites; and summoned the bishops and clergy at Oxford, in order to stop the progress of this new sect, and prevent the university's being further tinctured with their opinions. In 1411, being informed that this doctrine gained ground, notwithstanding it had been condemned in a full congregation, at Oxford, he sent delegates to the university, and appointed a committee to examine all heretical books, particularly those of Wickliff. This committee having censured some passages extracted from his books, sent an account of their proceedings to the archbishop, who confirmed their censures, and sent an authority, in writing, to some eminent members of the university, to inquire into persons suspected of heterodoxy, and oblige them to declare their opinions. These rigorous proceedings rendered Arundel extremely odious to the Wickliffites; and his zeal for suppressing that sect carried him, perhaps, to several unjustifiable severities against the heads of it, particularly against Sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham.

Arundel died at Canterbury, on the 20th of February, 1414, having held the archiepiscopal see upwards of seventeen years. He was interred in the cathedral church of Canterbury, under a monument erected by himself in his life-time.

The Life of Mr. Roger Ascham.

Ascham (Roger) was born at Kirkby-Wiske, near Northallerton, in Yorkshire, about the year 1515. He was taken into the family of the Wingfields, being educated at the expence of Sir Anthony Wingfield, with his two sons, under the care of Mr. Bond. He shewed an early disposition for learning, which was encouraged by his generous patron, who, after he had attained the elements of the learned languages, ſent him, in 1530, to St. John's college, in Cambridge, where, by his affiduity and application, he ſoon made a great progreſs in polite literature. He took his degree of batchelor of arts the 28th of February, 1534, when he was but eighteen years of age; and on the 23d of March following, was elected fellow of his college. He applied himſelf particularly to the Greek language, and read it publicly in his college, with univerſal applauſe. In 1536, he was made maſter of arts, being then twenty-one years of age. Soon after he was appointed by the univerſity to teach the Greek language publicly in the ſchools, and had a handſome ſalary allowed him for this purpoſe.

Mr. Aſham, among other accompliſhments, was remarkable for writing a fine hand, on which account he was employed to teach that art to prince Edward, the lady Elizabeth, and the two brothers Henry and Charles, dukes of Suffolk. In 1544 he was appointed univerſity orator, an office particularly ſuited to his genius and inclination, as it furniſhed him with an opportunity of diſplaying his ſuperior eloquence in the Greek and Latin tongues. In February, 1548, he was ſent for to court, to inſtruct the lady Elizabeth in the learned languages. She received his leſſons with ſo much pleaſure, that it is difficult to ſay whether the maſter or the ſcholar had the greater ſatisfaction. He read with her moſt of Cicero's works, great part of Livy, ſelect orations of Iſocrates, the tragedies of Sophocles, the Greek Teſtament, &c. He had the honour of aſſiſting this lady in her ſtudies for two years, after which he deſired leave to return to Cambridge, where he reſumed his office of public orator; and, among other encouragements, he enjoyed a penſion ſettled upon him by king Edward VI. In the ſummer of the year 1550, being upon a viſit to his relations in Yorkſhire, he received a letter of invitation to attend Sir Richard Moryſine in his embaſſy to the emperor Charles V. In his journey to London, he viſited the lady Jane Grey, at her father's houſe at Broadgate, in Leiceſterſhire; and it was on this occaſion, as he himſelf tells us in one of his Epiſtles, that he ſurprized her reading Plato's Phædo in Greek, in the abſence of her tutor, while the reſt of the family were engaged in hunting and diverſion. In September following he embarked with the ambaffador for Germany, where he remained three years; during which time he contracted a friendſhip with all the men of letters in that country. He was not only of great ſervice to the ambaffador in his public concerns, but alſo aſſiſted him in his private ſtudies, reading with him Herodotus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Demotheſenes, three days in the week; the reſt of his time he employed in writing the letters which Sir Richard ſent to England.

While he was thus engaged, his friends procured him the poſt of Latin ſecretary to king Edward. But he did not long enjoy this honour, being recalled on account of the king's death. Some time after he was appointed Latin ſecretary to queen Mary. He was alſo in great eſteem with cardinal Pole, who, though he was a perfect maſter of the Latin tongue, yet ſometimes preferred Mr. Aſham's pen to his own, particularly in tranſlating into Latin the ſpeech which he had ſpoken in Engliſh to the parliament, as legate from the pope; which tranſlation was ſent to his holineſs by the cardinal.

On the firſt of June, 1554, Mr. Aſham married Mrs. Margaret Howe, with whom he had a conſiderable fortune. Upon the death of queen Mary, he was much taken notice of by queen Elizabeth, who made him her ſecretary for the Latin tongue, and her tutor in the learned languages.—His intereſt at court was now very conſiderable; but ſuch was his modeſty, that he ſcarce ever ſolicited any favours, though he received ſeveral without aſking, particularly the prebend of Weſtwang in the church of York. Mr. Aſham being one day in company with ſeveral perſons of the firſt diſtinction, ſome diſputes aroſe about the different methods of education; this gave riſe to his treatiſe on that ſubject, which he undertook at the requeſt of Sir Richard Sackville. This work, entitled the School-maſter, is in high eſteem among the beſt judges. Mr. Aſham died on the 4th of January, 1569, univerſally lamented, particularly by the queen herſelf; who ſaid, ſhe had rather have loſt ten thouſand pounds than her tutor Aſham.

The Life of Mr. John Aſgill.

Aſgill (John) an ingenious Engliſh writer and eminent lawyer, lived at the end of the laſt, and beginning of the preſent century. He was entered of the ſociety of Lincoln's-inn, ſpeedily acquired a competent knowledge of the laws, and was ſoon taken notice of as a riſing man in his profeſſion. He was endowed with an uncommon vein of wit and humour, of which he gave the world ſufficient evidence in two pamphlets, the one intitled, Several Aſſertions proved, in order to create another Species of Money than Gold and Silver; the other, An Eſſay on a Registry for Titles of Lands. In 1698, he published a treatiſe a treatise on the possibility of avoiding death. It is scarce to be conceived what a clamour it raised, and how great an outcry was made against the author. Dr. Sacheverell mentioned it among other blasphemous writings, which induced him to think the church was in danger. In 1699, an act being passed for refusing forfeited estates in Ireland, commissioners were appointed to settle claims; and Mr. Asgill resolved to go over to Ireland. On his arrival there, the favour of the commissioners, and his own merit, procured him much practice, almost the whole nation being then engaged in law-suits, and among these there were few considerable in which Mr. Asgill was not retained on one side or other; so that, in a very short time, he acquired a competent fortune. He purchased a large estate in Ireland; and the influence this purchase gave him, occasioned his being elected a member of the house of commons in that kingdom. He was in Munster when the sessions began; and before he could reach Dublin, he was informed, that, upon a complaint, the house had voted the last-mentioned book of his to be a blasphemous libel, and had ordered it to be burnt; however, he took his seat in the house, where he sat just four days, when he was expelled for this performance. Being involved in a number of law-suits, his affairs soon grew much embarrassed in Ireland, on which account he resolved to leave that kingdom. In 1705 he returned to England, where he was chosen member for the borough of Bramber, in Sussex; but in the interval of privilege in the year 1707, being taken in execution at the suit of Mr. Holland, he was committed to the Fleet. The houses meeting in November, Mr. Asgill applied, and on the 16th of December was demanded out of custody by a serjeant at arms with the mace, and the next day took his seat in the house. Between his application and discharge, complaint was made to the house of the treatise for which he had been expelled in Ireland, and a committee was appointed to examine it: of this committee Edward Harley, Esq; was chairman, who made a report, that the book contained several blasphemous expressions, and seemed intended to ridicule the Scriptures. Mr. Asgill made his defence with great wit and spirit; but as he still continued to maintain the assertions he had laid down in that treatise, he was expelled. After this he remained thirty years a prisoner in the Mint, Fleet, and King's-Bench, during which time he published a multitude of small political pamphlets, most of which were well received. He also drew bills and answers, and did other business in his profession till his death, which happened in November, 1738, when he was upwards of eighty years of age.

The Life of Mr. Elias Ashmole.

Ashmole, or Asmole, (Elias) a celebrated philosopher, chemist, and antiquary, founder of the Ashmolean Museum, was born at Litchfield, the 23d of May, 1617. He was educated at the grammar-school there; and having a genius for music, was instructed therein, and admitted a chorister of that cathedral. At the age of sixteen, being sent to London, he was taken into the family of James Paget, Esq; baron of the Exchequer. In June, 1634, he lost his father.

Mr. Ashmole continued for some years in the Paget family, during which time he applied to the law with great assiduity. In 1638, he became a solicitor in chancery; and on the 11th of February, 1641, was sworn an attorney in the court of Common-pleas. In August, 1642, the city of London being then in great confusion, he retired to Cheshire; and towards the end of the year 1644, he went to Oxford, the chief residence of the king at that time, where he entered himself of Brazen-nose college, and applied with great vigour to the study of natural philosophy, mathematics, and astronomy.— On the 9th of May, 1645, he became one of the gentlemen of the ordnance in the garrison at Oxford; from whence he removed to Worcester, where he was commissioner, receiver, and register of the excise; and soon after captain in lord Ashley's regiment, as well as comptroller of the ordnance. On the 16th of October, 1646, he was elected a brother of the free and accepted masons; and in some of his manuscripts there are said to be many curious particulars relating to the history of that society. After the surrender of the garrison of Worcester, he again retired to Cheshire, where he continued till October, and then returned to London. On his arrival in this metropolis, he became acquainted with the great astrologers Sir Jonas Moore, Mr. Lilly, and Mr. Booker, who received him into their fraternity, and appointed him steward of their annual feast. In 1647, he retired to the pleasant village of Englefield, in Berkshire, where he amused himself with botany. It was here that he became acquainted with the lady Mainwaring, to whom he was married on the 16th of November, 1649. Soon after his marriage he settled in London, where his house was frequented by all the learned and ingenious men of that time. Mr. Ashmole was a diligent and curious collector of manuscripts. In 1650, he published a treatise written by Dr. Arthur Dee, relating to the philosopher's stone; together with another tract on the same subject, by an unknown author. About the same time he was busied in preparing for the press a complete collection of the works of such English chemists as had till then remained in manuscript. This undertaking cost him great labour and expence, and at length the work appeared towards the close of the year 1652. It was entitled, "Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum, containing several poetic pieces of our famous English philosophers, who have written the Hermetic Mysteries in their own ancient language: faithfully collected into one volume, with Annotations thereon, by Elias Ashmole, Esq." He proposed at first to have carried it on to several volumes, but he afterwards dropped this design.

In the year 1658, Mr. Ashmole began to collect materials for his History of the Order of the Garter, which he lived to finish. In September following he made a journey to Oxford, where he set about giving a full and particular description of the coins given to the public library by archbishop Laud. Upon the Restoration he was introduced to his majesty, who received him very graciously, and on the 19th of June, 1660, bestowed on him the place of Windsor herald; and a few days after he appointed him to give a description of his medals, which were accordingly delivered into his possession, and king Henry VIIIth's closet was assigned for his use. On the 15th of February, Mr. Ashmole was admitted a fellow of the Royal Society; and on the 9th of February following, the king appointed him secretary of Surinam, in the West Indies. On the 19th of July, 1669, the university of Oxford, in consideration of the many favours they had received from Mr. Ashmole, created him doctor of physic by diploma, which was presented to him by Dr. Yates, principal of Brazen-nose college. He was also honoured in the inns of court with the title and degree of barrister of law; and king Charles II. made him comptroller of the excise. On the 8th of May, 1672, he presented his institution, laws, and ceremonies of the most noble order of the garter, to the king, who received it in a very gracious manner; and, as a mark of his approbation, granted him a privy seal for four hundred pounds, out of the custom of paper. Mr. Ashmole was complimented for this performance by his royal highness the duke of York, who, though then at sea against the Dutch, sent for his book by the earl of Peterborough. The rest of the knights companions of the most noble order, received him and his book with great civility and respect. Nor was it less esteemed abroad: it was repositied by the pope in the library of the Vatican. King Christiern of Denmark sent him, in 1674, by Thomas Henshaw, Esq; the English resident at Copenhagen, a gold chain and medal, which, with the king's permission, he wore on certain high festivals. Frederic William, elector of Brandenburg, sent him the like present, and ordered his book to be translated into High Dutch.

On the 26th of January, 1679, a fire broke out in the Middle Temple, in the next chamber to Mr. Ashmole's, by which he lost a valuable library, with a collection of nine thousand coins, ancient and modern, and a vast repository of seals, charters, and other antiquities and curiosities; but his manuscripts, and most valuable gold medals, were luckily at his house at Lambeth. In 1683, the university of Oxford having finished a magnificent repository near the Theatre, Mr. Ashmole sent thither his curious collection of rarities; which benefaction was considerably augmented by the addition of his manuscripts and library at his death, which happened at Lambeth, on the 18th of May, 1692, in the 76th year of his age. He was interred in the church of Great-Lambeth, in Surry, on the 26th of May; and a black marble stone was laid over his grave.

Besides the works of Mr. Ashmole already mentioned, he left several which were published after his decease, and some that remain still in manuscript.

The Life of Dr. William Afsheton.

Afsheton (William) doctor of divinity, was the son of Mr. Afsheton, rector of Middleton, in Lancashire. He was born in the year 1641, and after being instructed in grammar-learning at a private country school, was removed to Brazen-nose college, Oxford, on the 3d of July, 1658. In the year 1663, he was elected a fellow of his college. After having taken both his degrees in arts, he went into orders, became chaplain to the duke of Ormond, and was admitted doctor of divinity in January, 1673. In the following month he was nominated to the prebend of Knareborough, in the church of York, and obtained the living of St. Antholin. In 1676 he was presented to the rectory of Beckenham, in Kent. He was the first projector of the scheme for providing a maintenance for clergymen's widows and others, by a jointure payable by the Mercers company. He wrote several pieces against the papists and dissenters, and some practical and devotional tracts. A few years before his death, he was offered the headship

headship of his college, which he declined. He died at Beckenham, in September 1711, in the seventieth year of his age.

The Life of Mrs. Mary Astell.

Astell (Mary) one of the greatest ornaments of her sex and country, was the daughter of Mr. Astell, an opulent merchant at Newcastle-upon Tyne, where she was born about the year 1668. She was educated in a manner suitable to her station, and, among other accomplishments, was mistress of the French, and had some knowledge of the Latin tongue. Her uncle, who was a clergyman, observing in her some marks of a promising genius, took her under his tuition, and taught her mathematics, logic, and philosophy. She left the place of her nativity when she was about twenty years of age, and spent the remaining part of her life at London and Chelsea. Here she pursued her studies with uncommon assiduity, made great proficiency in the above-mentioned sciences, and acquired a complete knowledge of many classic authors. Her mind was generally calm and serene; and her conversation was innocently facetious, and highly entertaining. She would say, "The good Christian only hath reason, and he always ought to be cheerful;" and, "That dejected looks and melancholy airs were very unseemly in a Christian."

She was remarkably abstemious, and seemed to enjoy an uninterrupted state of health, till a few years before her death; when having one of her breasts cut off, it considerably impaired her constitution: she underwent this painful operation without discovering the least timidity or impatience, without a groan or a sigh; and shewed the same fortitude and resignation during her whole illness. When she was confined to her bed by a gradual decay, and the time of her dissolution drew near, she ordered her coffin and shroud to be made, and brought to her bed-side, and there to remain in her view, as a constant memento of her approaching fate, and to keep her mind fixed on proper contemplations. She died in 1731, in the 63d year of her age, and was buried at Chelsea.

Mary Astell wrote, 1. A serious Proposal to the Ladies, for the Advancement of their true and greatest Interest. 2. Letters concerning the Love of God. 3. An Essay in Defence of the Female Sex. 4. Reflections upon Marriage. 5. Moderation truly stated. 6. A fair Way with the Dissenters and their Patrons. 7. The Christian Religion, as professed by a Daughter of the Church of England. 8. An impartial Enquiry into the Causes of Rebellion and Civil War in this Kingdom.

Life of Sir John Astley.

Astley (John) a famous champion in the reigns of king Henry V. and king Henry VI. was descended of the ancient and noble family of Astley, in Warwickshire, and born about the beginning of the fifteenth century. In 1438 he fought on horseback, in the street of St. Antoine, in Paris, one Peter de Masse, a Frenchman, who had challenged all comers, in honour of his mistress; and this antagonist he easily overthrew. In 1442 he performed the like exploit, and with the like success, before king Henry VI. at his court, in Smithfield. This second combat was with one Sir Philip Boyle, an Arragonian knight, whom he encountered on foot, and whom he presently disarmed; upon which they were parted. As a reward for his bravery, he was dubbed a knight, and obtained an annuity of one hundred marks. He died at Patehall, in Staffordshire, and lies buried there under a handsome monument.

Life of Sir Arthur Aston.

Aston (Sir Arthur) or Ashton, an experienced officer in king Charles the First's army, was the son of Sir Arthur Aston, of Fulham, in Middlesex. After having made several campaigns in foreign countries, he returned into England about the beginning of the grand rebellion, with as many veteran soldiers as he could bring with him, and joined the king against the parliament. He commanded the dragoons at the battle of Edgehill, where he did his majesty considerable service. The king made him governor of the garrison of Reading, in Berkshire, and commissary general of the horse; in which post he three times repulsed the earl of Essex, who, at the head of the parliament army, laid siege to that place; but Sir Arthur being dangerously wounded, the command devolved on colonel Richard Fielding. Some time after, he was appointed governor of the garrison of Oxford. But having the misfortune to break his leg by a fall from his horse, he was obliged to have it cut off. After the king's death, he was employed in the service of king Charles II. and appointed governor of Drogheda, in Ireland: but Oliver Cromwell having taken the town in the year 1649, and put the inhabitants to the sword, Sir Arthur had his brains beat out with his own wooden leg.

The Life of Athelstan, King of England.

Athelstan, or Æthelstan, king of England, was the son of Edward, surnamed the Elder, by Edgina, a shepherd's daughter. His grandfather Alfred took great care of his education, recommending him in his infancy to the care of his daughter Ethelfleda, and afterwards to her husband Ethered, one of the greatest captains of his time. When Athelstan arrived at a proper age, he was introduced at court by Ethered; and Alfred was so pleased with the youth, that to use William of Malm-bury's words, "he blessed him for king, after his son Edward, by a kind of prophetic spirit," and then knighted him, giving him a purple robe, a belt set with jewels, and a Saxon sword in a golden scabbard. Edward the Elder dying in the year 925, Athelstan succeeded to the throne, and was crowned by Athelum, archbishop of Canterbury, at Kingston upon Thames. Soon after his accession, a dangerous conspiracy was formed against him by a nobleman called Alfred: The plot, however, was happily discovered, and the author apprehended, but he firmly denied all; whereupon the king sent him to Rome to purge himself by oath in presence of the pope: he accordingly took the oath at the altar, but was immediately seized with a violent fit, in which he expired. The pontiff refused his body Christian burial till he had acquainted king Athelstan, at whose request it was afterwards granted.

This disturbance was no sooner quelled, than commotions arose in another quarter. As the Danish inhabitants of England had been subjected by force, they resolved to assert their independence with the first favourable occasion; and looking upon this as a proper conjuncture, while Athelstan was hardly established on the throne, they took the field, under their kings Sithric and Inguald, who surprised York and Davenport. Athelstan, as soon as he was informed of this insurrection, began his march towards their country, in which he arrived with such expedition, that Sithric, having made no preparations for the reception of such a powerful antagonist, sued for peace, which was granted, on condition that he should embrace the Christian religion. Wishing to attach this prince to his interest, that his reign might not be disturbed by the continual incursions of the Danes, Athelstan not only pardoned his revolt, but gave him his sister Editha in marriage.

Sithric dying within a twelvemonth after his nuptials, was succeeded by Anlaf and Guthred, his sons by a former wife. These two princes, being zealots for their old religion, revolted from Athelstan, who soon expelled them from their dominions. Anlaf escaped into Ireland, and Guthred fled for protection to Constantine, king of the Scots. Athelstan immediately sent deputies to this prince, desiring him to deliver up Guthred into his hands, otherwise he would go in quest of him at the head of an army. Constantine, piqued at this insolent message, yet afraid of incurring the displeasure of such a warlike monarch, agreed to meet Athelstan at Daker, for which place he accordingly set out, accompanied by Owen, king of Cumberland; but, in the mean time, gave Guthred an opportunity to withdraw from his court. Athelstan admitted the excuses of the Scottish king, though not a little concerned at the escape of Guthred, who made an unsuccessful attempt upon the city of York, and then turned pirate on the high seas, till at length being weary of such a boisterous and infamously precarious life, he surrendered himself to the English king, who allowed him a pension for his subsistence. This he enjoyed for some time, but at last conceiving some disgust, he made his escape from the place of his residence, and was never heard of afterwards. Athelstan, at this conference with the two kings, is said to have exacted homage from them both; and notwithstanding the allegations of the Scottish writers, who so vehemently deny this act of submission, in all probability it was imposed upon Constantine, who seems to have retained an implacable resentment against the English monarch from this period. Be that as it may, such homage, extorted from a weak prince, by fear and compulsion, can never affect the independency and freedom of the nation.

Constantine returned to his own country, very much chagrined at the behaviour of Athelstan; while Anlaf repaired to his court from Ireland, and artfully inflamed his resentment and ambition, representing the practicability of conquering Northumberland, by means of the succours he should be able to bring from Ireland. The Scottish prince eagerly embraced his proposal, for the execution of which they began to make preparations without delay; and, in the mean time, prevailed upon Howel, king of Wales, to make a diversion in their favour. Athelstan disconcerted their measures by his diligence and activity; for as soon as he received intelligence of a commotion in Wales, he began his march for that country, and obtained a complete victory over Howel, whom he punished for his revolt, by augmenting the tribute which he annually paid to England. This war being happily terminated, he advanced into Scotland, in order to take vengeance upon Constantine, for having sent a body of auxiliaries to Howel. As Anlaf had not yet arrived with his reinforcement from Ireland, the Scottish king was in no condition to oppose the English army, which drove him from one end of the kingdom to the other; and at last compelled him him to deprecate the wrath of Athelstan with great humility. He obtained his request from the English monarch, who at the same time restored all the places he had taken in that kingdom, hoping, by this act of generosity, to conciliate the affection of Constantine, and detach him from the interest of the Danes. But all this indulgence seemed rather to inflame than mitigate the rancour of Constantine, who became more and more impatient to revenge this mortification, which his pride sustained from the triumph of Athelstan's generosity: that prince was no sooner returned to his own dominions, than he renewed his deliberations with Anlaf; and these confederates exerted all their industry and power in order to assemble an army of sufficient strength to invade the kingdom of Northumberland.

Mean while Athelstan began to be disquieted by jealous thoughts, arising from the popularity of his brother Edwin, who was accused by a certain nobleman of having been concerned in the conspiracy of Alfred. Though the unhappy youth protested, with all the appearance of truth and candour, that he was entirely innocent of the crime laid to his charge, he was convicted on the testimony of this corrupt evidence; and Athelstan, being afraid to take away his life by a public execution, ordered this unfortunate young prince to be turned adrift with one servant, in a crazy vessel, without sails, oars, and provision. Edwin, on seeing himself thus exposed to the dangers of the deep and horrors of famine, leaped into the sea, and was drowned. No sooner was this cruel sentence executed, and the king's jealous fears removed, than he reviewed the character of Edwin in the light of an amiable brother, and detested the wretch on whose evidence that young prince had been exposed to a terrible death. This perfidious nobleman, who was an officer of the household, one day stumbled in presenting the cup to Athelstan, but instantly recovering a firm footing, by means of his other leg, "See, said he, how one brother assists another." This remark was construed into raillery or reproach by Athelstan, who forthwith ordered him to be put to death, as a sacrifice to the manes of Edwin; and endeavoured to expiate his own guilt by severe penance and benefactions to the church.

During these transactions, Constantine and Anlaf were busily employed in making preparations for the execution of their project; they formed a confederacy with the Irish, Welsh, and Northumbrian Danes, and conducted their motions with such secrecy, that Anlaf had entered the Humber with a fleet of six hundred sail, and overspread the whole country, before Athelstan received the least intimation of his design. That prince assembling his forces, marched against the enemy with incredible dispatch, and the two armies came in sight of each other at a place called Bruneford. A battle, however, did not immediately ensue, because both armies were so formidable and so advantageously posted, that neither chose to hazard an attack, until the inattention or misconduct of either side should afford an opportunity. During this pause Anlaf entered the English camp in the habit of a minstrel, and performed so ravishingly as to attract the notice of Athelstan, who ordered him to perform in the royal tent, and rewarded him with a liberal present. In his retreat he was known by a common soldier, who permitted him to pass, and then informed the king of the discovery he had made. Athelstan reprimanded him for suffering him to retire, but applauded the man's fidelity, when he told him, he had once taken the oath of allegiance to that prince, and therefore would never be concerned in any particular attempt against his person. The king shifted his quarters that very day, and the same spot of ground was occupied by a bishop newly come to the camp, who lost his life in consequence of choosing that situation; for, in the middle of the night, Anlaf, at the head of a chosen band, attacked the English encampment, and penetrating to this place, slew the prelate and all his attendants, on the supposition that the king still resided in that quarter. At day-break the two armies were fairly engaged, and fought all day with equal bravery on both sides; till at length the chancellor Turketul, at the head of a select band of Londoners, bore down all before him, and unhorsed the Scottish king, who was wounded and taken prisoner. The fate of this prince was no sooner made known to the rest of the confederates, than they gave way, and a terrible carnage ensued. Besides Constantine, who died of his wounds, six kings of Ireland and Wales, and many generals and counts, lost their lives in this engagement. Athelstan, after this complete victory, met with no opposition in reducing the Scots, the Danes of Northumberland, and the Welsh. He also expelled the Britons who had hitherto dwelt about Excester, or Exeter, and forced them to retire into Cornwall.

After these successes Athelstan enjoyed his crown in tranquility, and is considered as one of the ablest Saxon princes both in war and peace. He added new laws to those which had been published by his grandfather Alfred; took the most effectual al measures for securing the peace of his country, both by fortifying it against the attempts of foreign enemies, and preventing domestic disturbances, by a gentle sway and equal administration of justice. He employed learned men to finish a translation of the bible into the Saxon language. He died at Gloucester, in the year 941, or, according to Brompton, in 942, and was succeeded by his brother Edmund.

The Life of John Atherton, Bishop of Waterford and Lismore.

Atherton (John) bp. of Waterford and Lismore, in Ireland, was born in the year 1598, at Bawdrip, near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire, of which parish his father was then rector. In 1614, he was sent to Gloucester-hall, in Oxford, where he commenced bachelor of arts. Being afterwards transplanted to Lincoln college, he there took the degree of master; and entering into holy orders, was inducted to the rectory of Huish-Combsflower, in Somersetshire. He married, while young, a most agreeable woman; nevertheless, it is affirmed, that he committed incest with her sister: upon the discovery of this unlawful commerce, he was forced to sue for his pardon, which being procured, he went to Ireland, and, either by the recommendations he carried with him, or by his assiduous address, obtained the parsonage of St. John's church, Dublin, and became chaplain to Adam Loftus, viscount Lisle, lord chancellor; by whose favour he was likewise made a dignitary of Christ-church. He ungratefully betrayed this indulgent patron into disgrace with the earl of Strafford, lord-deputy of Ireland; between whom and the chancellor there being an open contention, Atherton changed his side after he had got what he could from the latter, and insinuating himself into the lord-deputy's good graces, was by that nobleman, in consideration of his knowledge in the canon law and ecclesiastical matters, made a prebendary of Christ-church; and afterwards, in 1636, advanced to the bishopric of Waterford and Lismore, being then doctor in divinity.

Some years after his advancement to the bishopric, he had a long and dangerous sickness; during which, from a conviction of his total neglect of his pastoral charge, he made a solemn vow, that if God would be pleased to restore him to health, he would constantly preach and catechise every Sunday. After his recovery, it happened, that the first time he went to church to preach, the judges of assize were at Waterford; and a thought arising within him, that if he should now enter upon that practice for the first time, it would be imagined he did it through fear of them, he deferred it for that day, and never performed it afterwards. He gave himself up to the most unnatural abominations. The number of his concubines amounted to no less than sixty-four. This impious wretch became at last an advocate for his iniquity, and endeavoured to shew that it was expedient and salutary.

It is positively affirmed, that he was admonished to leave his profligate course of life, in a very solemn manner, by his own sister, the wife of one Mr. Leackie, whose mother being dead, and having been no stranger to the bishop's enormous debaucheries, her ghost appeared often to this sister, charging her to go over and warn him, that if he did not speedily reform his wicked life, it would assuredly be cut-off at the gallows. Whether this was a mere fancy, the effect of a dream, or a device to give weight to her arguments with her brother, she actually went to Ireland, and enforced her earnest persuasions, by relating to him what she said had been revealed to her. His answer was, "What must be, shall be; marriage and hanging go by destiny." So he sent her back as a weak woman, and went forward himself, still mending his pace, but altering his path to perdition, for after this he fell into the commission of bestiality. At length, in the midst of his foul career, the man who had been the corrupter of his youth, and whom he had not seen during twenty years, coming casually to Ireland, the sight of him struck him with horror, and his conscience made him dread that he was a presage of a speedy vengeance. In fact, about three weeks after, a bill of complaint was preferred against the bishop in the parliament of Ireland, whereupon he was suddenly seized and imprisoned; and afterwards, being tried for bestiality, he was found guilty, and received sentence of death. Dr. Bernard attended Atherton in Dublin castle, who was allowed seven days to prepare himself for his dissolution. Atherton became extremely penitent, and with abundance of tears and groans lamented the sins of his past life. He was hanged on Gallows-green, at Dublin, the 5th of December 1640, aged forty-two years.

The Life of Sir Robert Atkins.

Atkins (Sir Robert) lord chief-baron of the Exchequer, was descended of a very ancient family in Gloucestershire, and was son of Sir Edward Atkins, one of the barons of the Exchequer, by Ursula, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres of Chefhunt, in Hertfordshire. He was born in 1621, and after being instructed in grammar-learning at his father's house, was sent to Baliol-college, college, Oxford. Removing thence to one of the inns of court, he applied himself very closely to the study of the law. In April, 1661, at the coronation of king Charles II. he was made knight of the bath, with many other persons of the first distinction. On the 28th of September he was created master of arts, in full convocation, at Oxford. In 1671, he was appointed one of the king's sergeants at law; and, the next year, one of the judges of the court of Common-pleas, in which honourable station he continued till 1679, when, foreseeing the troubles that soon after ensued, he thought fit to resign, and retire into the country.

At the Revolution, to promote which Sir Robert Atkins did all that could be expected from him, he was received with great marks of distinction by king William, who in the month of May, 1689, made him lord chief baron of the Exchequer. On the 19th of October following, the marquis of Halifax, whom the lords had chosen for their speaker, desired to be excused from discharging that office any longer, the lord chief baron Atkins was immediately elected in his room, and so continued till the great seal was given to Sir John Somers, in the beginning of the year 1693. In June, 1695, being then in the seventy-fourth year of his age, Sir Robert resigned his office of chief baron, and retired to his seat at Saperton-hall, in Gloucestershire, where he spent the last fourteen years of his life in ease and tranquillity. He died in the year 1709, aged eighty-eight. He was a man of great probity, as well as uncommon skill in his profession, and a warm friend to the constitution. He was twice married, first to Mary, daughter of Sir George Clerk, of Walford, in Northamptonshire, and afterwards to Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres.

Sir Robert Atkins, son of the former, was the author of the History of Gloucestershire. He was born in 1646, and educated with great care under the eye of his father. He became very early a great lover of the laws and history of his country, and was chosen to represent his county in parliament as often as he would accept that honour. He was eminent for all the virtues that could adorn an English gentleman. Dr. Parsons, chancellor of the diocese of Gloucester, had, with great labour, collected materials for the history of the county of Gloucester, but his ill state of health preventing the completion of his design, Sir Robert Atkins, sensible of the use and value of such a history, thought himself obliged to execute the doctor's plan, in return for the great affection shewn him by the inhabitants of that county for his family and himself. He died in 1711, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

The Life of Dr. Lewis Atterbury.

Atterbury (Lewis) father of the celebrated Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, was born about the year 1631. He was the son of Francis Atterbury, rector of Middleton Malser, or Milton, in Northamptonshire, who, among other ministers, subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, in 1648. Lewis was entered a student of Christ-church, Oxford, in 1647, and took the degree of bachelor of arts on the 22d of February, 1649. He was created master of arts by virtue of a dispensation from Oliver Cromwell, the 1st of March, 1651. He had been one of those who submitted to the authority of the visitors appointed by the parliament. In 1654, he became rector of Great or Broad Refington, in Gloucestershire, and after the Restoration, took a presentation for that benefice under the great seal, and was instituted again to confirm his title to it. On the 11th of September, 1657, he was admitted rector of Milton, or Middleton-Keynes, in Buckinghamshire; and at the return of Charles II. took the same prudent method to corroborate his title to this living. On the 25th of July, 1660, he was made chaplain extraordinary to Henry duke of Gloucester; and in December, the same year, took the degree of doctor in divinity. Returning from London, he had the misfortune to be drowned near his own house, in the beginning of December, 1693. He published three occasional sermons.

The Life of Dr. Lewis Atterbury.

Atterbury (Lewis) son of the preceding, and elder brother of Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, was born at Caldecot, in the parish of Newport-Pagnel, Bucks, on the 2d of May, 1656. He received his education at Westminster-school, under Dr. Busby, from whence he was removed to Christ-church college, Oxford. He was ordained deacon in September, 1679, being then bachelor of arts; and commenced master of arts July 5, 1680. The year following he was ordained priest. In 1683, he served the office of chaplain to Sir William Pritchard, lord mayor of London. In February, 1684, he was instituted rector of Symel, in Northamptonshire, which living he afterwards resigned upon his accepting of other preferments. On the 8th of July, 1687, he accumulated the degrees of bachelor and doctor of civil law. In 1691, we find him lecturer of St. Mary Hill, in London. Soon after his marriage he settled at Highgate, where he supplied the pulpit of the Rev. Mr. Lathom, who was very old and infirm, and had lost his sight. Upon the death of this gentleman, Dr. Lewis Atterbury was, in June 1695, unanimously elected by the trustees of Highgate chapel to be their preacher. Not long before this he had been appointed one of the six preaching chaplains to the princess Anne of Denmark at Whitehall and St. James's, which place he continued to supply after her accession to the throne. When he first resided at Highgate, observing what difficulties the poor in the neighbourhood underwent for want of a good physician or apothecary, he applied himself to the study of physic, and after acquiring considerable skill, practised it gratis occasionally among his poor neighbours. In 1707, queen Anne presented him to the rectory of Shepperton, in Middlesex; and in March 1719, the bishop of London collated him to the rectory of Hornsey.

Dr. Lewis Atterbury wrote an Answer to a popish book, entitled, A true and modest Account of the chief Points in Controversy between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants; translated from the French the Penitent Lady, by Madam La Valliere; and published several volumes of Sermons.

He died at Bath on the 20th of October, 1731.

The Life of Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester.

Atterbury (Francis) bishop of Rochester, was the son of Dr. Lewis Atterbury, rector of Middleton, or Milton-Keynes, near Newport-Pagnel, in Bucks, and was born at that place on the 6th of March, 1662. He was educated in grammar learning at Westminster-school, and in 1680 was elected a student of Christchurch-college, Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself by his fine genius, and his inclination for polite literature.—He gave early proofs of his poetical talents in a Latin version of Mr. Dryden's Abdolon and Achitophel, in an English epigram on a lady's fan, and a translation of two odes of Horace. He commenced bachelor of arts June 13, 1684; and master, April 20, 1687. This year he exerted himself in the controversy with the papists by a defence of Luther, under the title of an Answer to some Considerations on the Spirit of Martin Luther, and the Original of the Reformation. This vindication of that great reformer was written with uncommon spirit and vivacity, and induced bishop Burnet to rank the author among those divines who had distinguished themselves by their admirable defences of the protestant religion. At the same time he is supposed to have had a share in the controversy between Mr. Charles Boyle and Dr. Bentley, concerning the genuineness of Phalaris's Epistles. Upon the death of his father, in 1693, he applied to the earl of Nottingham to succeed him in the rectory of Milton, which he called the height of his ambition and wishes, as being the place of his birth. This application proving unsuccessful, he resolved to quit the university, and accordingly came up to London, where he so much distinguished himself by his eloquence, that he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to king William and queen Mary, and elected preacher at Bridewell, and lecturer at St. Bride's, which last office he resigned in 1698. In 1700, Mr. Atterbury entered into the controversy concerning the convocation, and published, without his name, The Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an English Convocation stated and vindicated, in answer to a book of Dr. Wake's, entitled, The Authority of Christian Princes, &c. and several other pieces.—The year following a second edition appeared with his name prefixed, and very considerable additions, which were printed separately for the use of the purchasers of the first edition. Mr. Atterbury having in this performance occasionally remarked upon bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, as too free in censuring the manners of the clergy, though capable of this excuse, that the author, being a stranger, might not then have thoroughly acquainted himself with the state of our church, or the character of its members, the bishop wrote a piece against him, under the title of Reflections on a book, entitled Rights, &c. wherein he observes, that the author of Rights, &c. "had so entirely laid aside the spirit of Christ, and the character of a Christian, that without large allowances of charity, one can hardly think that he did once reflect on the obligations he lay under to follow the humility, the meekness, and the gentleness of Christ. So far from that, he seems to have forgot the common decencies of a man or of a scholar." In 1701, Dr. White Kennet, afterwards bishop of Peterborough, undertook a particular reply to Mr. Atterbury's book, in his Ecclesiastical Synods and Parliamentary Convocations in the church of England, historically stated and justly vindicated from the misrepresentations of Mr. Atterbury.

The same year came out a pamphlet in quarto, said to be written by Dr. Gibson (afterwards bishop of London) entitled, a Letter to a Friend in the Country concern- ing the Proceedings of the present Convocation; in which the author vindicates the archbishop's right to prorogue the lower house of convocation as well as the upper. This piece was soon answered by a pamphlet ascribed to Mr. Atterbury, entitled, The Power of the Lower House of Convocation to adjourn itself, vindicated from the misrepresentations of a late Paper, &c. Not long after there appeared another piece, also said to be written by Mr. Atterbury, entitled, A Letter to a Clergyman in the Country concerning the Choice of Members, and the Execution of a Parliament writ, for the ensuing Convocation; wherein the writer recommends a more than ordinary care in the choice of members. This letter was followed by a second upon the same subject, dated December 10, 1701. In answer to some pieces against these two Letters, there appeared a Third Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, &c. in defence of the two former, written by the same hand.

In 1702, came out Mr. Atterbury's Cafe of the Schedule stated, wherein is given an account of the rise and design of that instrument, and of the influence it hath on the adjournments of the lower house of Convocation; and all the authorities urged in behalf of the bishops sole power to prorogue the whole Convocation are occasionally examined: by a Member of the Lower House of Convocation.—The next year Dr. Wake, Mr. Atterbury's original antagonist in this controversy, published his large work, entitled, The State of the Church and Clergy of England in their Councils, Synods, Convocations, Conventions, and other public Assemblies, historically deduced from the conversion of the Saxons to the present time; occasioned by a book, entitled, The Rights, Powers, and Privileges, &c.

As Mr. Atterbury made no reply to Dr. Wake's book, the convocation dispute ended for the present, there being little of any importance written after this on the subject till the year 1708, when Mr. Atterbury published, but without his name, Some Proceedings in the Convocation, A. D. 1705, faithfully represented, &c.—The lower house of convocation voted Mr. Atterbury their thanks for asserting their rights; and in consequence of this vote, a letter was sent to the university of Oxford, expressing that "whereas Mr. Francis Atterbury, late of Christ-church, had so happily asserted the rights and privileges of an English convocation, as to merit the solemn thanks of the lower house of it for his learned pains upon that subject; it might be hoped, that the university would be no less forward in taking some public notice of so great a piece of service to the church: and that the most proper and seasonable mark of respect to him would be to confer upon him the degree of doctor in divinity by diploma, without doing exercise, or paying fees." The university accordingly created him doctor in divinity.

In January 1700, Dr. Atterbury was made archdeacon of Totnes. The same year he was engaged with some other learned divines in revising an intended edition of the Greek Testament with Greek Scholia, collected chiefly from the fathers by Mr. archdeacon Gregory. Upon the accession of queen Anne in 1702, he was appointed one of her majesty's chaplains; and in October 1704, was advanced to the deanery of Carlisle. In 1706, a passage in Dr. Atterbury's sermon preached at the funeral of Mr. Bennet, a bookseller, engaged him in a dispute with Mr. Hoadly, afterwards bishop of Winchester, concerning the advantages of virtue with regard to the present life. In 1707, he was appointed one of the canons residentiary of Exeter; and, in 1709, made preacher of the Rolls chapel by Sir John Trevor.—This year his Latin sermon, entitled, Concio ad Clerum Londinensium habita in Ecclesia S. Elphegi, engaged him in a fresh dispute with Mr. Hoadly concerning passive obedience. In 1710, he is said to have assisted the famous Dr. Sacheverell in drawing up his answer to the charge brought against him. The same year he was unanimously chosen prolocutor of the lower house of convocation, and had the chief management of affairs in that house. He was one of the committee nominated by the convocation in May 1711, for comparing Mr. Whiston's doctrines with those of the church of England. In 1712, he was made dean of Christ-church, notwithstanding the strong interest, and warm applications, of several great men in behalf of his competitor Dr. Smalbridge. In June 1713, the queen, at the recommendation of the earl of Oxford, promoted him to the bishopric of Rochester, and deanery of Westminster. His credit with her majesty and the ministry at this time was so considerable, that he would probably have been raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury upon a vacancy, had not the death of that princess intervened in August 1714. He officiated at the coronation of George I. as dean of Westminster; and it is said, that when the ceremony was over, he offered to present the king with the chair of state and royal canopy, which were his perquisites as dean; but that the offer was rejected with some marks of personal dislike.

During the rebellion which broke out in the first year of king George the First's reign, when the pretender's declaration was fixed up in most market towns, and in some places his title proclaimed, it was thought proper by most bodies of men to give the government all possible assurance of their fidelity and allegiance; and accordingly there was published, A Declaration of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops in and near London, testifying their abhorrence of the present Rebellion; and an Exhortation to the Clergy and People under their care, to be zealous in the discharge of their duties to his Majesty King George. This paper the bishop of Rochester, and by his instigation, bishop Smalridge, refused to sign, on pretence of a just offence taken at some unbecoming reflections cast on a party not inferior to any (they said) in point of loyalty. The words objected to were these: "We are the more concerned that both the clergy and people of our communion should shew themselves hearty friends to the government upon this occasion, to vindicate the honour of the church of England, because the chief hopes of our enemies seem to arise from discontents artificially raised among us; and because some, who have valued themselves, and have been too much valued by others, for a pretended zeal for the church, have joined with papists in these wicked attempts; which, as they must ruin the church if they succeed, so they cannot well end without great reproach to it, if the rest of us do not clearly and heartily declare our detestation of such practices." When the Dutch troops, which came over to quell this rebellion, were quartered at Gravesend in Kent, the officers requested of Mr. Gibbin, the curate of that place, the use of his church one Sunday morning, for their chaplain to preach to their soldiers, alledging, that the like favour had been granted them in every parish in England where they had been quartered on Sundays, and promising that their chaplain should begin at six in the morning, that their service might not interfere with that of the town. The request was granted, the chaplain preached, and his congregation was dismissed before nine o'clock. But Dr. Atterbury was so incensed at this profanation (as he styled it) of the church by the Dutch presbyterian worship, that he immediately suspended Mr. Gibbin. This suspension, was, however, deemed so injurious by the town of Gravesend, that they subscribed a sum to Mr. Gibbin more than double the income of his church; and the fact being represented to the king, his majesty gave him the rectory of Northfleet, in Kent; which living Mr. Gibbin afterwards exchanged for that of Birch, in Essex, where he died on the 29th July, 1752.

Dr. Atterbury constantly opposed the measures of the court in the house of Lords, and drew up some of the most violent protests with his own hand. On the 24th of August, 1722, he was, on suspicion of being concerned in a plot in favour of the pretender, apprehended at his house in Westminster, and carried before a committee of the privy council, who sent him prisoner to the Tower. On the 23d of March, 1722-3, a bill was brought into the house of commons, "for inflicting certain pains and penalties on Francis lord bishop of Rochester;" and on the 9th of April it was sent up to the house of lords for their concurrence. On the 6th of May, being the day appointed for the first reading of it, bishop Atterbury was brought to Westminster to make his defence. The first day he was disturbed in his passage thither, by the clamours and insults of the mob; but upon his application to the house of lords for safety and protection, strict orders were given to seize and secure all who should be guilty of such inhumanity, and a guard appointed to defend his person; so that all the week after he passed along the streets very quietly and without molestation, being pitied rather than reviled. His counsel were Sir Constantine Phipps, and William Wynne, Esq; and those for the king Mr. Reeve and Mr. Wearg. The proceedings continued above a week; and on Saturday, the 11th of May, the bishop was permitted to plead for himself, which he did in the following eloquent speech:

"My Lords,

"I have been under a very long and close confinement, and have been treated with such severity, and so great indignity, as, I believe, no prisoner in the Tower, of my age and function, and rank, ever was. By which means, what strength and use of my limbs I had when I was first committed in August last, is now so far declined, that I am very unfit to make my defence against a bill of such an extraordinary nature. The great weakness of body and mind, under which I labour, such usage, such hardships, such insults, as I have undergone, might have broke a more resolute spirit, and much stronger constitution, than falls to my share.—Your lordships were pleased to permit me to appear before the house of commons, if I thought fit, lest my silence should be turned to my disadvantage, as in fact the counsel for the bill have done their utmost towards towards it. I should not have thought to decline any occasion of justifying myself; but I crave leave to tell your lordships some reasons why I did not appear there, and make use of the leave your lordships gave me.

“After seven months of close imprisonment, I was not a little surprised when I heard, that on the 11th of March, by the house of commons it was thus resolved, ‘That it appears to this house, that Francis, lord bishop of Rochester, was principally concerned in forming, directing, and carrying on a detestable conspiracy, &c.’ Upon duly weighing which resolution, and the copy of the bill, I found not any thing charged in the bill, but what was fully contained, and previously resolved in this vote; and therefore whatsoever should have been offered in my behalf to that house, would have been an express contradiction to it. And what hopes I could have of success in such an attempt, I need not say: what they sent me was the preamble of the bill only, which they could not alter, consistent with what they had resolved. The bill itself was to inflict pains and penalties, which followed; but there was no room to object against any of those which they had not then declared; they have since been added, and sent up to your lordships in like manner, without any oath made, or any criminal act proved against me by any living witness. And is a person, thus sentenced below, to be deprived of all his preferments, and his very function, and to be a perpetual exile, and to be rendered incapable of any office or employment; to be one whom no man must correspond with by letters, messages, or otherwise? and, my lords, one who is a bishop of the church of England, and a lord of parliament? It is the first instance wherein a member of this house hath been so treated and prejudged, and, (as I have once before said to your lordships) I pray God it may be the last, and that such precedents in this kingdom may not be multiplied in after-times. My counsel have amply done their part, by arguing the points of law, by explaining and enforcing the evidence, and shewing the little colour, appearance, and shadow of proofs against me (permit me to call them so) by answering what hath been offered against me, and by setting out the consequence which such a bill, founded and carried on in such a manner, and which enacts such severe penalties, must and will be attended with. Yet it becomes me to say something for myself, lest my silence be construed consciousness of guilt, or at least an unwillingness to enter into matters of so dark and perplexed, so nice, and tender a nature, as if I was not able, or did not care, to clear and explain myself, and rather chose to leave it to the management of others: I thank God, I am under no such restraint, and can speak to your lordships on this subject with great freedom and plainness.

“But before I proceed, I beg leave, that I may represent to your lordships some particular hardships under which I have laboured.

“The first is, reading extracts of anonymous letters, without suffering any other parts of the same letters, though relating to the same subject, to be read. Another is, excusing the decyphers from answering questions asked by me, and which I thought necessary for my defence, lest they should reveal their art. The next is, not suffering me to be answered by the clerks of the post-office, lest the secrets of that office should be discovered. Another was, not suffering a person, who had been at least ten years out of the secretary’s office, to answer any questions which came to his knowledge by being some years in that office. Another is, reading examinations, neither dated, signed, nor sworn to. Another is, reading letters supposed to be criminal, writ in another man’s hand, and supposed to be dictated by me, without offering any proof that I either dictated them, or was privy to them. Another is, not allowing me copies of the decyphered letters, though petitioned for, till the trial was so far advanced, and I so employed and weakened by it, that I had not sufficient time to consider them. Another is, not allowing me to read out of the collection of papers before the house, or any part of them, in order to discharge myself, but what hath been read by clerks. And all this in a proceeding where the counsel for the bill profess they have no legal evidence, and that they are not to be confined to the rules of any court of law or equity, though as often as it is for their service they constantly shelter themselves under it.”

He then proceeds to confute the charge against him from the want of evidence to support it, from the inconsistency of some parts of it, and its improbability.

On Monday the 13th of May, the king’s counsel replied to his defence. On the 14th the bill was read the third time; and the next day, after a very long and warm debate, it passed by a majority of eighty-three to forty-three. On the 27th it received the royal assent. It is said, the king signed this bill with regret, being much concerned, as he expressed it, that there should be just cause of dooming to perpetual perpetual banishment a bishop of the church of England, of such eminent parts and learning. To mitigate, however, the severity of the sentence, the bishop's daughter was permitted to attend him in his exile; and his son-in-law, William Morrice, Esq; by virtue of his majesty's sign manual, had leave to correspond with him by letter. On the 18th of June, 1723, he embarked on board a man of war, and landed at Calais; where being informed that lord Bolingbroke, who had obtained his pardon, was just arrived on his return to England, he said pleasantly, "Then I am exchanged." He softened the rigours of exile by study, and the conversation of learned men; and died at Paris on the 15th of February, 1731. His body being brought over to England, was interred in Westminster-abbey. Upon the urn, which contained his bowels, was inscribed, "In hac urna depositi sunt cineres Francisci Atterbury, episcopi Roffensis."

Some time before his death, he published a vindication of himself, bishop Smalridge, and Dr. Aldrich, from a charge brought against them by Mr. Oldmixon, of altering and interpolating the lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion. Bishop Atterbury's Sermons are extant in four volumes, octavo. His letters to Mr. Pope are printed with that poet's works. However the world may be divided about his moral and political character, it is universally agreed, that he was a man of uncommon learning and abilities, perfectly skilled in polite literature, and a fine writer. His extraordinary talent as a preacher will appear to the greatest advantage from the just encomium bestowed on him by the author of the Tatler; who, having observed that the English clergy too much neglect the art of speaking, makes a particular exception with regard to our prelate, who, says he, "has so particular a regard to his congregation, that he commits to his memory what he has to say to them; and has so soft and graceful a behaviour, that it must attract your attention. His person, it is to be confessed, is no small recommendation; but he is to be highly commended for not losing that advantage, and adding to the propriety of speech, which might pass the criticism of Longinus, an action which would have been approved by Demosthenes. He has a peculiar force in his way, and has many of his audience, who could not be intelligent hearers of his discourse, were there not explanation as well as grace in his action. This art of his is used with the most exact and honest skill. He never attempts your passions till he has convinced your reason. All the objections which you can form are laid open and dispersed, before he uses the least vehemence in his sermon; but when he thinks he has your head, he very soon wins your heart, and never pretends to shew the beauty of holiness, till he has convinced you of the truth of it."

THE Americans on the frontiers of Virginia, according to those who have lived among them, are of a middling stature, strait and well proportioned, with the finest limbs in the world; nor is there a dwarf or mishapen person among them. Their colour is that of copper rendered darker by greasing themselves, and being exposed to the weather. They have black eyes, and their hair is coal-black, which the men cut into several shapes, and both men and women grease so that it shines. The better sort wear a kind of coronet four or five inches broad, and open at top, composed of a sort of beads, and some a wreath of dried furs; they have also bracelets on their necks and arms; but the common people go bare-headed, only they stick large shining feathers in their hair. Their cloaths are a large mantle, carelessly wrapped round their bodies, and sometimes girt closely with a girdle. The common sort only pass a piece of cloth or string round their middles, and put a piece of cloth or skin between their thighs, which turn over the string at each end. Their shoes, when they wear any, are made of an entire piece of buckskin. The dress of the women differs little from that of the men, only the better sort have more beads and bracelets. They commonly go naked as far as the navel downwards, and upwards to the middle of the thigh; their breasts are round and small, and never hang down as those of the black women on the coast of Guinea. Instead of keeping their children warm they dip them over head and ears in cold water, and afterwards tie them to a board, covered with something that is soft, having a hole in it, through which they discharge their excrements: they keep them several months in this posture, till the limbs begin to grow strong; when they suffer the child to crawl about as well as it can. They worship the devil, pretending, if they did not pacify him, he would destroy their health, peace, and plenty. Their priests are highly revered by them, and are great pretenders to pawawing, or conjuring. The Indians always consult them, before they go on any enterprize. They

They reckon their years by winters; and divide them into five seasons, the budding time, the earing of the corn, the summer, the harvest, and the winter. The months they count by the moon. They divide the days into three parts; the rise, power, and lowering of the sun. They keep their accounts by knots on a string, or notches on a stick. Their food is Indian corn, soaked and boiled in water, beavers, turtle, several kinds of snakes, broth made of deers humbles, pease, beans, &c. When the English first came among them, they had no iron tools; their knives were sharpened reeds or shells, and their axes sharp stones. They felled trees by laying fire to their roots; and by fire they also hollowed them, and made canoes of them. Their way of producing fire was, by rubbing one stick against another that was softer.

Virginia is divided into thirty-five counties, in which are above fifty parishes; but the only places that deserve the name of towns, and are worth mentioning, are Williamsburgh, and James Town. The former stands in James County, between James and York Rivers, and is the seat of the government, assembly, and chief courts. Here is also a college, called William and Mary College, having been founded by king William, who gave two thousand pounds towards it, and twenty thousand acres of land, with power to purchase and hold lands to the value of two thousand pounds a year, and a duty of one penny per pound on all tobacco exported to the other plantations. There is a president, six masters or professors, and other officers, who are named by the governors or visitors. The college has now a pretty good income, and makes no contemptible figure. The Hon. Mr. Boyle made a very large donation to the colleges for the education of Indian children. Besides the college, there are some other handsome edifices here; as the state-house or capitol, the church, a magazine for arms and ammunition, a public prison, a fort, a play-house, &c. There is also a large square for a market-place, with a bowling-green near it.

James Town stands about twenty fix miles above the mouth of the river of that name, on the north side, in a peninsula; but is little better than a village.

North and South Carolina.

The North and South Carolinas are bounded by Virginia on the north; by Georgia on the south; by the Atlantic ocean on the east; and by the Apalachian mountains on the west; containing all that part of North America lying between 31 and 36 degrees of north latitude; and extending along the coast about three hundred and fifty miles, and from two hundred to two hundred and sixty backwards.

The face of these countries is low and level, for about one hundred miles west of the coast; hence they rise gradually to the Apalachian mountains, which are about one hundred and fifty miles distant from the Atlantic Ocean.

The situation of the Carolinas is such, that neither the heats in summer nor the colds in winter, are very violent; yet the former is rather more troublesome than the latter. They have sometimes very heavy rains, both in summer and winter, with high winds, or rather hurricanes; but it is not often that they do much mischief. The north-west wind, even in summer, blows exceeding sharp, and is apt to bring distempers on those who do not take care to guard against it; but such as expose not themselves unnecessarily to these, or the cold breezes of the evening and night after a hot day, and live regularly, for the most part enjoy a good state of health; for the weather is generally clear, serene, and pleasant.

The soil of these provinces is so fertile, that vegetables of all sorts either grow there, or would grow, if properly cultivated; particularly vines, wheat, rice, Indian corn, barley, oats, pease, beans, hemp, flax, cotton, tobacco, indigo, olives; orange, citron, cypress, sassafras, oak, walnut, cassia, and pine trees, and white mulberry trees, for feeding silk worms; sarsaparilla; and pines, which yield turpentine, rosin, tar and pitch. There is a kind of tree, from which runs an oil of extraordinary virtue for curing wounds, and another, which yield a balm thought to be little inferior to that of Mecca. There are other trees, besides these, that yield gums. The Carolinas produce likewise prodigious quantities of honey, of which they make excellent spirits, and mead as good as Malaga sack. About eighty thousand barrels of rice, at a medium, are produced yearly in the Carolinas, each weighing four hundred pounds; of which the greater part is exported. Besides rice, the Carolinians cultivate some tobacco; but their chief trade lies in provisions; for they supplied till lately, Jamaica, Barbadoes, and the Leeward Islands, with beef, pork, grain, pease, butter, suet, raw hides and leather. They likewise sent to the same islands tar, turpentine, timber, masts, and furs; but the last are of an inferior kind. Maize, or Indian corn, thrives here exceedingly, but, in some other respects, the product has not been answerable to the the expectation from the soil and climate. Though many parts of Carolina, especially on the sea coast, abound with vines; yet no progress worth mentioning has been made in producing wine. Their manufactures of silk, notwithstanding the great quantities of mulberry-trees they have, are not yet considerable; but, from some samples that have been brought over, it appears equal in quality to any we purchase from foreigners. Though cochineal is said to be found here, the inhabitants seem to neglect the profits arising from that insect; and for some years their attention has been chiefly turned toward making indigo.

The Carolinians took from Great-Britain all kinds of woollen and linen drape-ry, hardware, strong beer, cyder, raisins, potters-earth, tobacco-pipes, paper, coverlids, matresses, hats, stockings, gloves, tin-ware, powder and shot, gun-flints, cordage, looking-glasses and glass-ware, thread, haberdashery, and small wares. From Jamaica, Barbadoes, and the Leeward Islands, they had sugar, rum, molasses, cotton, chocolate, negroes, and silver. From New-England, New-York, and Pennsylvania, wheat flour, wheat being very backward in the Carolinas; and hardwares and wines from Madeira, and the other islands in the Western Ocean. Some years ago, the paper currency of South-Carolina amounted to two hundred and fifty thousands pounds sterling, and that of North to fifty-two thousand.—The British money that circulates among the Carolinians, is very inconsiderable; but they have French and Spanish money, in dollars and pieces of eight.

The English traffic here with the natives for deer, bear, and buffalo skins; for which they give them guns, powder, knives, scissars, looking-glasses, beads, some coarse cloth, and duffils. These are carried on pack-horses five or six hundred miles into the country west of Charles Town; but most of the trade is confined within the limits of the Creek and Cherokee nations, which do not lie above three hundred miles from the coast.

The native animals here are nearly the same as those of Mexico and Florida, which we shall soon have occasion to mention; in particular, they have the urus, which the English improperly call a buffalo. The European cattle are vastly increased in this, as in the other plantations: the wool of their sheep is not inferior to the English. There is a great plenty of poultry, and other fowls; but manual labour is remarkably dear in this country.

The chief rivers of the Carolinas are, Albemarle River, Pentague, Nense, Cape Fear, or Clarendon river, Wateree, Santee, Ashley River, Cooper River, Colleton, Cambahee, and Savannah, which separates South Carolina from Georgia. The ocean is so shallow near the coast, that a ship of any great burden cannot approach it, except in some few places. There has not been yet found one good harbour in North Carolina; the best are those of Roanoke, at the mouth of Albemarle River, and Pimlico. In South Carolina are the harbours of Winyaw, or George Town, Charles Town, and Port Royal. The chief capes are, Cape Hatteras, Cape Fear, and Cape Carteret.

The method of settling in this pleasant country has hitherto been, to pitch upon a void piece of ground, and either to purchase it at the rate of twenty pounds for one thousand acres, and one shilling quit-rent for every hundred acres, or else pay a penny an acre quit-rent yearly to the proprietors, without purchase money; the former method is the most common, and the tenure a freehold. The land being laid out, the purchaser builds upon it, raises stock, plants orchards, and makes such commodities as when sold, procure him slaves, household-goods, and other conveniences; and after this is done, he may yearly increase his capital, and by industry become rich.

Among the Indian nations behind the Carolinas, the most considerable are the Creeks and Cherokees, of whom the men are generally tall, but the women little: they anoint their bodies with oil, and expose them to the sun, which occasions their skins to be of a dark brown: the men paint themselves of various colours, red, blue, yellow, and black; they wear generally a girdle, with a piece of cloth drawn between their legs, and turned over the girdle, both before and behind, which looks something like breeches. The women wear a kind of petticoat to their knees: both men and women in the winter wear mantles two yards square, which they wrap round their bodies, as the Romans did their toga, generally keeping their arms bare. They are very healthful, and have hardly any diseases, except those occasioned by drinking rum, and the small-pox; those who do not drink are exceeding long lived. Their food, instead of bread, is Indian corn, boiled and seasoned, like hasty-pudding; and this is called hommony: they also boil venison, and make broth of it, and eat all manner of flesh. They are a generous, good-natured people, and very humane to strangers; patient in want and pain, slow to anger, and not easily provoked; but when they are thoroughly incensed, incensed, they are implacable; very quick of apprehension, and gay of temper; their public conferences shew them to be men of genius, and they have a natural eloquence.

Carolina was the last country in America planted by the English, after Sir Walter Raleigh's unfortunate attempt to settle colonies there in the reign of queen Elizabeth. It seems to have been entirely overlooked till the restoration of Charles II. The ministry being informed, that Carolina would produce wine, oil, and silk, and almost every thing that England wanted, procured a patent or grant to themselves, dated the 24th March, 1663, of great part of this coast; the grantees being Edward earl of Clarendon, lord-chancellor; George, duke of Albemarle, the general; William, lord Craven; John, lord Berkley; the lord Anthony Ashley Cooper; Sir George Carteret; Sir William Colleton, and their heirs. These proprietors, however, did little towards planting it, until the year 1670, when lord Ashley struck out a whimsical kind of government for the colony, erecting a palatine or sovereign, with a council to be a check upon him; which involved them in perpetual quarrels, and almost destroyed the plantation as soon as it was settled; to prevent which, they were at length obliged to sell their shares to the crown; and it is now a royal government, only the ancestor of the earl of Granville thought fit to retain his seventh share.

Both North and South Carolina are divided into counties, and these again into parishes or town-ships.

The first planters in Albemarle county, were towards the north, upon what is called Albemarle River: but most of them afterwards removed, for conveniency, to Ashley River. This county is intersected with rivers, on the banks of which dwell many Indians. South of Albemarle is Clarendon county, the Indians of which are the most barbarous of any in the province. These two counties form what is properly called the government of North-Carolina; and are in a way at present of being greatly improved, and of rivalling, if not exceeding, South-Carolina. The tobacco which North-Carolina produces is by the inhabitants sold to the Virginians, who send it to England.

Craven county is inhabited, besides English, by a considerable number of French families. It lies upon the borders of Congaree or Santee River, which divides South from North-Carolina, and sends ten members to the assembly.

South of this lies Berkley county, containing the two fine rivers of Cooper and Ashley. Upon a neck of land, between these two rivers, stands Charles Town, the capital of the province. Ashley River is navigable for ships twenty miles above the town, and for near forty for boats and pettiaguers, or large canoes. Charles Town is the great mart of the province; but no ships of above two hundred tons can pass its bar. Its neighbourhood may vie for beauty with any country in the world; and a little expence would make its fortifications strong, ornamental, and useful. Some of its houses are brick, others of wood, but all of them handsome and elegant; and the church is the most magnificent of any protestant one on the continent of America. The French, the presbyterians, and the quakers, have all their several places of worship.—Here the governor resides, the assembly sits, the courts of judicature are held, and the business of the province is transacted. Dorchester is another thriving town in this district.

South of Berkley county lies that of Colliton, the north-east parts of which are full of Indians. The two chief rivers of this county are North-Edistow and South-Edistow, the banks of which are full of thriving plantations; and on those of North-Edistow lies Wilton, or New-London, built under the direction of a Swiss gentleman, called Luberuller.

Granville county is the most southerly of any in Carolina, and lies along the river Savannah. In this county is a Swiss settlement called Purrysburgh, and the river and harbour of Port-Royal, which is one of the finest in all America. Tho' it was the latest settled, on account of its neighbourhood to the Spaniards, it is now the most promising of any in South-Carolina. The Vaudois, at Purrysburgh, apply themselves, with great diligence and success, to the culture of silk.

An Account of the Life and Writings of the late David Hume, Esq.

THE lives of literary men seldom abound with incidents. That leisure, which is necessary for the acquisition of knowledge, excludes them in some measure from the busy world, and intense study seems generally to subdue in them the spirit of enterprise. Few men, even among the learned, had ever less of that spirit than the honest, easy, indolent, but philosophic Hume. His life, consequently, affords few of those occurrences which are commonly supposed to give interest to a biographical narration. But there is a pleasure in tracing the progress of genius, and in observing its various obstructions and encouragements, in the road to fame, which has made the lives of authors, tho' less diversified by circumstances, more universally acceptable than those perhaps of any other class of men. No apology need therefore be made for an attempt to trace the progress of a writer unequalled in his age, or in his province, one of the most eminent and extensive in the empire of science.

David Hume, so well known to the world of late, both as a philosopher and historian, was born about the year 1712, in that part of Scotland which lies between Edinburgh and Berwick. His father was a country gentleman, or Laird, of good family, but small fortune, and David was unfortunately a younger son. In his early years, he was by no means distinguished as a scholar, or by any of those accomplishments which are supposed to qualify youth for the liberal professions; but as the pride of the Scottish gentry then prevented them from breeding any of their children to mechanical or mercantile employments, and as the church, in that country, can only be the object of the lower class of people, the best Kirks affording no more than a decent maintenance, there was a necessity for every younger son of a genteel family being bred either a soldier, a lawyer, or a physician.—David was destined for the bar; not so much as being adapted to his genius, as the line in which his relations could most effectually serve him. After passing through his academical courses at the university of Edinburgh, he therefore devoted himself to the study of the Scotch laws, in which he made considerable progress; but whether from that natural modesty, almost inseparably connected with great merit, a consciousness of his deficiency in elocution, the happy indolence of his temper, little fitted for the contentious bar, or any other secret cause, he never put on the gown, nor even took the introductory steps necessary for that purpose. Other studies attracted him.

The metaphysical writings of Locke and Berkeley, had turned all inquisitive men towards intellectual objects. The human mind spent its force in contemplating itself; as if a man had been born for thinking, not acting; as if ideas had, in fact, only been real; and the material world, as conjectured by the bishop of Cloyne, but a gay vision. Mr. Hume had early applied to metaphysical inquiries: he saw, or seemed to see, the defects of the former systems, and published, in 1739, the two first volumes of his Trea- tise of Human Nature, and the third the following year.

This work, though not inferior to any thing of the moral or metaphysical kind in any language, was entirely overlooked, or decrised at the time of its publication, except by a few liberal-minded men, who had courage to throw aside their popular and literary prejudices, and to follow sound reasoning, without being afraid of any dangerous conclusion, or fatal discovery; of seeing errors unveiled, however sanctified by years, or supported by authorities; and the author made sensible, to the severe disappointment of his youthful hopes, that the taste for systematical writing was on the decline, divided his treatise into separate essays, and dissertations, which he published, with improvements, alterations, and additions at different periods of his life. His enemies, however, or men desirous of raising a reputation by exposing the mistakes of a great genius, have levelled all their arguments against this juvenile production, though never dignified with the author's name; and Dr. Beattie in particular, more than thirty years after the publication of that sceptical system, has been so successful as to obtain a pension by his Essay on the Immutability of Truth, in which he discovers all the violence of a sectary, and all the illiberality of a pedant, and rather abuses than confutes Mr. Hume.

As the Treatise of Human Nature is now very scarce, some account of it may be agreeable to many readers. The author's purpose, in that work, as he himself informs us, was "to introduce the experimental method of reasoning into moral subjects." The ability with which he has executed his design, can only be fully discovered by an examination of the treatise itself; which, as a composition, is admirable. The first volume treats of the understanding, the second of the passions, the third of morals. Criticism and politics, were still necessary to complete his plan, and would have been added systematically, if the success had, in any degree, been answerable to the merit of the work. He thus speaks of the sciences that he meant to examine: "The sole end of logic is to explain the principles and operations of our reasoning faculty, and the nature of our ideas: morals and criticism regard our tastes and sentiments; and politics consider men as united in society, and dependant on each other. In these four sciences, logic, morals, criticism, and politics, is comprehended almost every thing, which it can any way import us to be acquainted with, or which can tend either to the improvement or ornement of the human mind." So early, and when he was thought little able to give a new direction to science, had this great man digested that ingenious system of philosophy, which has changed metaphysics from a frivolous to an useful study; and given a stability to morals, criticism, and politics, unknown in former ages!—But, what is still more extraordinary, the stile and method of this first production are not less correct and happy, than those of his most admired performances, written after his taste and judgment were matured by years and experience. A single quotation will be sufficient to support this assertion, and also to exemplify his method of reasoning experimentally on moral subjects.

Speaking of that modesty and chastity which belong to women, "there are some philosophers," he observes, "who attack the female virtues with great vehemence, and fancy they have gone very far in detecting popular errors, when they can shew, that there is no foundation in nature for all that exterior modesty, which we require in the expressions, dress, and behaviour of the fair sex." And he proceeds to examine the origin of such notions, and their connexion with the interests of society.

"Whoever considers," says he, "the length and feebleness of human infancy, with the concern which both sexes naturally have for their offspring, will easily perceive that there must be an union of male and female for the education of the young, and that this union must be of considerable duration. But in order to induce the men to impose on themselves this restraint, and undergo cheerfully all the fatigues and expences to which it subjects them, they must believe that the children are their own, that their natural instinct is not directed to a wrong object, when they give a loose to love and tenderness."

"Now," adds he, with equal justice and ingenuity, "if we examine the structure of the human body, we shall find, that this security is very difficult to be attained on our part; and that since, in the copulation of the sexes, the principle of generation goes from the man to the woman, an error may take place on the side of the former, though it be utterly impossible on the side of the latter. In order therefore to impose a due restraint on the female sex, we must attach a peculiar degree of shame to their infidelity, above what arises merely from its injustice, and must bestow proportionable praises on their chastity. But as human creatures, especially of the female kind, are apt to overlook remote consequences, while under the influence of any present temptation, it is necessary, beside the infamy attending such licences, that there should be some preceding backwardness or dread, which may prevent their first approaches, and give the female sex a repugnance to all expressions, and postures, and liberties, that have an immediate relation to that enjoyment." So much good sense and sound reasoning was never perhaps delivered in so few words, on the subject of female virtue, by any writer ancient or modern: yet this is an extract from the treatise, whose confutation has been impudently attempted, more than once, by mere common sense, and childish declamation!

In the year 1742, Mr. Hume published two small volumes, consisting of essays, moral, political, and literary. These were better received than his former publication, but contributed little to his general reputation as an author, and still less to his profit; and his small patrimony being now almost spent, he was glad to accept of the office of library-keeper to the faculty of advocates. The salary annexed to this place is only fifty pounds per annum; but the opportunity which it afforded him of consulting, at his leisure, all the choice authors and valuable papers in one of the best libraries in Europe, may be considered as no inconsiderable circumstance in favour of Mr. Hume's literary character.

In 1746, he stood candidate for the chair of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, then vacant by the resignation of the present Sir John Pringle, appointed physician to the army. Every one was convinced of Mr. Hume's abilities, and his interest was warmly supported by the nobility and gentry; but the presbytery of Edinburgh, having a right to object to one out of three candidates named by the town council, they put their negative upon honest David, whose sentiments were too liberal for their narrow minds.

Thus baffled in his attempt to obtain an office for which he was eminently qualified, and in which perhaps he could have been of more service to his country than in any other, Mr. Hume devoted himself entirely to study, and rested all his hopes of fame and fortune on his merit as an author.—He published in the years 1743 and nine his Metaphysical Essays nearly as they now stand; a Dissertation on the Passions, also extracted from his Treatise of Human Nature; his System of Morals, much altered and improved; and along with these several new moral, critical, and political essays.

From politics, in which he had now made considerable progress, Mr. Hume turned his inquiries towards history, and completed in 1752, the History of Britain under the House of Stuart. The first volume of this work had been published two years before, but was little noticed, and the success of the second was by no means considerable; yet these two volumes are allowed to be equal to any part of his now justly admired History of England, or rather of Britain; for he all along connects the story of the two kingdoms.

So singular an instance of public neglect cannot be well accounted for; especially as the style is remarkably elegant, the period interesting, and the work full of new and important matter, anecdotes, and observations. The public, however, has since amply repaid Mr. Hume for its ingratitude. His History of the House of Stuart requires only to be read to be admired; and it no sooner fell into the hands of Mr. Millar, then at the head of the London booksellers, than it became a favourite performance among the higher class of people.

But Mr. Hume's reputation as an historian was not complete, till the publication of his History of the House of Tudor, in 1758. About the same time was published Dr. Robertson's History of the Reign of Mary Queen of Scots, and her son James, till his Accession to the Throne of England; a work which was admired, even to enthusiasm, by persons of all ranks. Many of the same subjects are treated by both writers, and at equal length. A comparison necessarily followed; and all intelligent men became sensible, after the most critical examination, that the philosophic dignity, the logical disposition, the force of diction, the just concatenation of circumstances, the lively pictures of manners, the comprehensive, yet distinct view of the interest of nations, and the intrigues of courts, independent of the many valuable disquisitions which so eminently distinguish Mr. Hume's work, were at least a balance for the classical purity of style, the happy selection of incidents, the keen discernment of motives, and the fine delineation of character no less conspicuous in the other, and which render the History of Mary one of the most captivating books in our language.

Thus encouraged by the public approbation, Mr. Hume prepared for the press, with all expedition, the more early part of his History of England, from the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the accession of the House of Tudor; which, with the volumes formerly published, bring down the progress of the English constitution, and the civil and military transactions of Britain to the Revolution in 1688, an æra when the government of this country was fixed on the basis, where it continues to rest. Yet it is to be lamented that Mr. Hume did not bring down his history to the death of queen Anne, when the manners, the literature, and the military reputation of England, and of Europe, were at an height, and when the accession of a new family gave a new direction to British policy. But such as it is, taken as a whole, it may be considered as one of the most excellent productions of human genius, and is certainly the greatest historical work of modern times.

Mr. Hume's reputation was now complete. He was considered as the greatest writer of the age; his most insignificant performances were sought after with avidity; and lord Bute, who, whatever errors he may have been guilty of as a politician, will ever be honoured as a patron of letters, procured for Mr. Hume a considerable pension.—But it was not enough that the philosophic David should be enabled, in his latter years, to eat the bread of idleness, as the reward of his many laborious researches: his political writings affording reason to believe, that he might be of use to the state, he was appointed secretary to lord Hertford, ambassador at the court of France, and afterwards resident in the absence of that nobleman.

In France, Mr. Hume's writings had long been known and admired; so that he there found himself of still more consequence by his character than his office. He was universally caressed. Even the ladies are said to have loaded him with their favours. But of all Mr. Hume's adventures, during his residence in France, or in his own country, there is none so remarkable as that which took its rise from his acquaintance with the celebrated John James Rousseau, whom he brought over to England with him in 1766, and for whom he procured the offer of a pension from his majesty.

The particulars of that affair have been already published, and are too numerous and complicated to enter into such a sketch as the present: it will therefore be sufficient here to observe, that Mr. Hume, understanding that M. Rousseau, persecuted every where on the continent, meant to take refuge in England, generously conducted him over, procured him a commodious retreat, and afterwards the offer of a pension; but that the jealous and peevish peevish temper of Rousseau, led him to reject the last, abandon the first, and abuse Mr. Hume as a person who had conspired the ruin of his character, under an appearance of serving him; though every precaution, which the most refined delicacy could suggest, had been taken in order to spare the pride of that singular man, by the manner of conferring those obligations.

An anecdote or two will sufficiently shew the jealous and even suspicious temper of M. Rousseau, and the generosity and candour of Mr. Hume. On their journey to England, they happened one night to lie in the same chamber; and during the season devoted to sleep, M. Rousseau heard, or imagined he heard, Mr. Hume cry several times, with great vehemence—"Rousseau, I have you!" These words, though in themselves equivocal, and tho' M. Rousseau owns he does not know whether Mr. Hume uttered when asleep or awake, roused his suspicions, which it appears were never afterwards entirely laid. The question which honest David asks on this occasion is equally pertinent and candid: "As M. Rousseau is not certain whether Mr. Hume was asleep or awake, is he sure that he was awake himself?"

M. Rousseau's suspicions of Mr. Hume's treachery rose in proportion to the benefits conferred upon him, and at last broke out in perfect peevishness on the slightest occasion imaginable. Mr. Davenport, a gentleman distinguished by his birth, his fortune, and his merit, had granted to M. Rousseau and his governante, the use of his house called Wooton, in Derbyshire, (where he seldom resided,) with all other things necessary for a livelihood; but, in order to prevent Rousseau's pride from being hurt by such a benefit, he agreed to receive, in return, a trifling sum annually. He also generously pretended, as he had reason to think Mr. Rousseau's finances were not very high, that he found a post-chaise, on its return to Wooton, which would carry the philosopher safely, and at small expence to his retreat. Rousseau suspected the benevolent artifice, and accused Mr. Hume of being an accomplice in it. Mr. Hume protested his innocence, and endeavoured to shift the subject. After a sarcastical reply, Rousseau sat for some time in seeming melancholy, then sprung up, walked two or three times across the room, and at last threw his arms about the neck of his brother philosopher, bathed the astonished David's face with tears, and crying like a child. "My dear friend," said he, as soon as he was able to speak, "will you ever forgive me this extravagance? After all the pains which you have taken to serve me, after the numberless proofs of your friendship, is it possible that I can thus repay your kindness with spleen and abuse? But in pardoning me you will give me a new mark of your regard, and I hope, when you know me better, you will find that I am not unworthy of it."

This reconciliation, however, was but of short duration. Still a prey to his former suspicions, his delicacies, and his scruples, Rousseau soon broke entirely with his benefactor, and left England.

Mr. Hume, who after his return from France, had been appointed under secretary of state, retired to Scotland, on the resignation of Gen. Conway, and spent the remainder of his years at Edinburgh, among the companions of his youth, equally admired and respected; beloved as a friend, and honoured over Europe as a scholar, a gentleman, and a man of genius. He died, after a lingering illness, on the 25th of September.

The English Theatre.

DRURY-LANE theatre opened on Saturday evening, September 21st, with a prelude, written for the purpose, by Mr. Colman, and called NEW BROOMS!

The characters of it were thus represented:

Crotchbet,	-	-	Mr. Dodd.
Cateall,	-	-	Mr. Palmer.
Mezzetin,	-	-	Mr. Baddeley.
Sir Dulcimer Dunder,	-	-	Mr. Parsons.
Phelim,	-	-	Mr. Moody.
Mr. Dripping,	-	-	Mr. Griffith.
Farmer Furrow,	-	-	Mr. Wrighten.
Sailor,	-	-	Mr. Bannister.
Sprightly,	-	-	Mr. King.
Mrs. Dripping,	-	-	Mrs. Bradshaw.
Mrs. Furrow,	-	-	Mrs. Love.
Miss Quaver,	-	-	Mrs. Wrighten.

The business of this prelude is thus conducted.—The curtain rises and discovers the front of Drury-lane theatre, with a croud of persons hastening to see the play. Among others, Mrs. Dripping, her husband, and child, from Candle-wick-ward; the lady, like the rest of her rank, is in a pucker for fear they should be disappointed of the first row of the two shilling gallery, and therefore as soon as she has settled the disorder of the young lady's frock and hair, hurries into the theatre. They are succeeded by an honest tar and his doxy. The sailor tells Moll that they are now along-side the Royal Drury; that the ship has lost her old gallant commander Little Davy; that the post of captain is divided among a number of new officers, and that the vessel may be compared to an egg, of which the old captain has got the meat, and left his successors to put to sea in an egg-shell ; the sailor wishes the new crew fair wind and weather, but confesses his partiality for the old commander, and goes off, roaring out, " Davy for ever ! Davy for ever ! " To this couple succeed Farmer Furrow and his spouse. The good woman asks her husband if they shall see their old acquaintances among the actors, the young gentleman who in the summer played Hamlet in the barn at the end of their town, and the lady who figured away in Ophelia. The farmer, in reply, tells her, that a player's consequence depends much on time and place, and that when there is an R in the month, those mouths are almost entirely shut, both in the theatre and the senate, which have, during the course of the summer, made a noise in country barns, inns, and ale-houses, after a theatrical concert, and at a county meeting ; that in all probability they would now see their old friend Romeo snuff the candles, Juliet sweep the stage, and Alexander shift the scenes. As soon as Mrs. Furrow is satisfied as to her questions, Catcall seeing Phelim about to enter the theatre, calls him, and joins in a conversation, in which Phelim declares his intention of commencing actor, observing, that there's room for Janus, now Roscus has quitted the scene, but that before, the little great man filled the stage so entirely, that faith there was hardly room for any other actor. Catcall objects to his brogue, and his age. Phelim replies, " Arrah, don't you know that nobody spakes better English than an Irishman, except indeed it be a Scotchman ; and then as to age, don't we daily see the old actors play all the young parts ? " Catcall represents the impediments to his success likely to arise from the late revolution in stage affairs ; laments that Nature and Roscus are gone together, and fears that now we shall have nothing but music and dance, pageantry, and pantomime. Phelim, like a true Irishman, sticks to his design, reads the following lines from Shakespeare's Richard the Second,

As in a theatre the eyes of men,
After a well-grac'd actor leaves the stage,
Are idly bent on him that enters next.

and flatters himself he shall shew the town the difference, now Roscus is away. Catcall seeing his friend obstinate, informs him of his own importance, derived from his holding a critical pen ; points out to him some proofs of his abilities, as a theatrical observer, promises him his assistance both before and behind the curtain, and retires with Phelim, in order to introduce him to his friend Mr. Crotchet, the new manager.

The scene now changes to an apartment in which Crotchet is discovered at his piano forte, with Miss Quaver, practising a song, intended for his new opera. As soon as the young lady has sung her air, Phelim and Catcall enter, and the latter informs Crotchet of his friend's intention. The musical Bayes smiles at the Irishman's design, and tells him, that plays and playing are now no more, that music alone will suit the taste of the present age ; as a proof of this he instances the immense sums gained last season, at one of our theatres, merely by the two old airs of The Highland Laddie and Gramochree Molly, and asks the Irishman if he can sing, as in that case he'd write him a character in his new opera. Phelim laughs heartily at the thought of an Irishman in an opera ; but as a specimen of his vocal abilities, roars out a Teague's song. Crotchet then descants on the pleasing effects of speaking in recitative, and the agreeable circumstance of warbling out the most trifling occurrence in an air ; tells Catcall he has the finest un-natural idea for an opera that can possibly be conceived ; and after some prefatory conversation, informs him that his new opera is to be called Topsy Turvy, and is to be the very reverse of nature, the women characters to be predominant, and the men all effeminacy and submission. The arrival of Sir Dulcimer Dunder is now announced ; Crotchet informs Catcall, that Sir Dulcimer, though deaf as a post, is a great admirer of music ; the Irishman says, ' A deaf man a judge of music ! by my soul it is a pity he is not blind, for then he might be a connoisseur in pictures ! ' Sir Dulcimer enters, and after pulling out a tin ear-pipe, has some laughable conversation with Phelim on his defective sense ; upon his declaring that, though he is totally deaf to common noises, he they ever so violent, yet he hears most distinctly the smallest note in music, Phelim advises him always, " to set with a barrel of music before him, to lodge in an organ loft, and sleep in a bass-viol." Sir Dulcimer asks if Miss Quaver is perfect in the air of his composition. Crotchet replies in the affirmative, and desires the lady to sing it. She objects, on account of the horridness of the tune, but says the words will go well enough to another, and as Sir Dulcimer is quite deaf, she'll sing it to that. Sir Dulcimer appears to be in raptures while she is singing ; but when she has ended, addresses the orchestra, and desires them to play some parts more forte and others more piano. One of the music tells him, it was not his tune :

tune : This is obliged to be twice roared out before he can comprehend it ; when he does understand what is said he flies into a violent passion, and leaves the room, execrating Crotchet's behaviour, and the impertinence of the band and Miss Quaver. Mezzetin next enters, and complains of having hurt his left leg in writing a new grand ballet for the ensuing season. The Irishman asks, "Arrah, do you write with your leg, I never heard of such a thing before, but when I saw the man at Charing-Cross, who, because he had no arms, was forced to write a good band with his feet !" A conversation here ensues upon the necessity of ornamenting stage exhibitions with dance and song. As a proof of this, the Frenchman triumphantly says, "Is dere not your triste Shak-es-pear, did he ever bring so much money as when he was altered into a pantomime, and brought out three years ago under the title of the Jubilee ? Sir, there is nothing to be done without de dance and de musique." At length Sprightly enters, and assures Catcall that the new managers have no intention of sacrificing sense to sound and shew ; that on the contrary they mean to present the best plays of the most esteemed authors in the best manner the situation of their company will allow. That song, dance, and pantomime, will occasionally be suffered to make a part of the public entertainment in order to give it variety, but that the conduct of the theatre will ever be regulated in conformity to the good sense, taste, and approbation of the town.

As a proof of the managers inclination to encourage young authors, Sprightly declares they have already received a comedy of his writing, and that he has prepared a prologue for the opening of the theatre, which he'll then speak, if they'll be kind enough to suppose the audience present.

The prelude closes with the prologue, which is not only exceedingly laughable, but peculiarly apposite to the occasion.—After some few complimentary remarks on the secession of Roscius, the theatre is compared to a stage coach, driven by a new coachman, who has purchased the machine, and promises every possible accommodation to his customers, although, he laments, like his other brethren of the road, he can't ensure their watches and their purses.

The words of one of the airs is an alteration from Sir John Suckling ; the music Piccini's. The music of another is the composition of Mr. Linley, and does that master great credit.

Garden commenced with a new occasional prelude called NEWS FROM PARNASSUS :

The characters are,

Fitzfrolie,	—	Mr. Woodward.
Boccalini,	—	Mr. Hull.
Vellum,	—	Mr. Wilson.
Ranter,	—	Mr. Lee Lewis.
Sneer the Critic,	—	Mr. Whitfield.
La Parolle,	—	Mr. Weiwitzer.
Rebus,	—	Mr. Quick.

The scene lies in the house of Signor Boccalini, who pronounces the oracles of Apollo.

The curtain rises, discovering a French servant in an indolent posture, and a knocking being heard at the door, he goes reluctantly to the side of the stage, observing that English liberty is the liberty of doing as people please, and then introduces Rantwell, an actor, and Vellum, a bookseller, who desire an audience with Signor Boccalini, to whom the former complains of the insolence of printers in attacking the characters of persons whose profession it is to please the public, and solicits that Apollo will pass an edict to render theatrical performers, either in their public or private characters, sacred from future investigation. Vellum says, he is publisher of a news-paper, and petitions Signor Boccalini to favour him with the news from Parnassus, telling him, that he may murder characters in every paragraph with the greatest safety, as he laughs at prosecutions, having already stood in the pillory, when the populace huzzaed him like the Portuguese at the burning of a Jew ; he says, that if a man has a virtuous wife or daughter, or any character is exemplary for good qualities, he reverses the scene, and the public avidity for calumny amply rewards him, by eagerly purchasing his paper. They are dismissed into an adjacent apartment, and promised that they shall be called to hear their answer from Parnassus.

Mr. Rebus, a comic poet, now enters, and entreats the patronage of Apollo to a comedy he has "on the Stocks." The plot of it, he says, is the daughter of a poor man stealing a twopenny loaf for her father's subsistence, and being committed to prison, the old man is prosecuted as the receiver, when her lover employs counsel, whose eloquence, on the trial, set the jury a crying, and they acquitting the culprit, a marriage ensues : he adds, that the first act concludes with "Honour your parents ;" the second with "Love your neighbour ;" the third with "Do as you would be done by ;" the 4th, "Charity covers a multitude of sins ;" and the 5th with with "Honour the king;" and observes, that no audience can withstand such sentiments. The critic enters, and prays that he may be restored to his former privilege of going into the boxes, and behind the scenes, gratis, and recounts the mode of making the actors forget their parts, and the pleasures to be enjoyed in the consequent confusion. He is promised an answer, and retires.

Mr. Fitzfrolie is brought upon the stage in a sedan chair, and comes forward muffled in a long cloak, and tells Boccacini that he is a pantomime poet, and has invented a piece called Harlequin Colchos, in which he intends to introduce a reservoir of water, to be supplied by the New River Company, and in case of an accident, when he falls in search of the golden fleece, he will persuade the society for restoring persons apparently drowned, to sit in the front boxes.

Vellum and Rantwell now force in, and after threatening and driving Fitzfrolie, (who having thrown off his disguise, appears as Harlequin) about the stage, he leaps through the window, and the doors are secured to prevent his return.

Boccacini now addresses himself to the characters who are assembled, in a string of moral documents; and then advises Rebus to study nature in his writing; tells Vellum the newspapers may abuse whom they please—and the scene is here interrupted by a voice from the sedan chair which had remained on the stage, and presently it changes to a physical shop; Fitzfrolie being seated, and over his head the following inscription: "MEER-QUACK, doctor;" from beneath his seat an alligator appears, and having paraded the stage, retires; Vellum expresses a wish to have a print of it in his next magazine.

Mr. Woodward, rather in his own character than as Fitzfrolie, comes forward, and says, that for a series of years he has assisted in the entertainment of the public; and by sometimes depending on his head, and sometimes on his heels, he has shared their applause; adding, that he had reached the cheerful evening of life: and that if the smiles of his generous patrons were continued, they would cheer him on his road to the end. Boccacini now advises Rantwell to take the attention, assiduity, and, above all, dramatic zeal of Roscius for examples to become a favourite of the public; and being asked if Shakespeare is not angry at the retirement of Roscius, he answers in the negative; and says, Shakespeare received a wreath from Apollo when he retired to the banks of the Avon; and that a wreath had likewise been granted to Roscius on his retirement to the banks of the Thames, with the promise of an additional wreath, if he should again appear for the benefit of the theatrical fund, or on any other occasion. Boccacini concludes with observing that the managers should resemble the master of a warehouse; provide the best materials, and the most expert hands to display them to advantage, and the public approbation would amply reward their endeavours.

This piece, which was written by Mr. Murphy, met with great applause.

The orchestra at Covent-garden theatre is considerably enlarged; the band, of course, is greatly improved. Mr. Baumgarten is placed at the harpsichord, the instrument on which he is allowed to excel. Mr. Fisher leads the band.

The Fortune-teller. In a Letter to a Country Gentleman.

I Was lately upon a visit, while my own house was repairing, at a friend's in the City, who has a son and two very pretty daughters, all marriageable, but all unmarried. His wife is also a woman of elegance and beauty, though it is beauty in its farewell appearances. I had not been twenty minutes arrived at the house, before I found out that the whole family, from the master to the maid-servant, were, according to the common but emphatic phrase, eaten up with Superstition: the good folks described by the Spectator are nothing to them. I came into the house at tea-time. "Lord! I wish we had done tea, (said the mother of the family) that we might see what Destiny means to do with us now." "Yes, Mamma, (replied one of her daughters) but if Susan tells me as bad news as she told me last night, I shall be ready to hang myself." "Nay, but, child, (said the father) she must tell you what she sees, and she cannot make the leaves lie as she thinks proper; Fate, my dear, fate and fortune cannot be resisted." "Cannot they, father? (rejoined the young lady) Then Fate and Fortune are as cross as my grandmother, that's all I know about the matter."

As I observed the family wished to get things over as fast as possible, I was determined not to delay them on my part; and therefore poured out my tea with a trembling hand into my saucer, gave it a whiff or two with my breath, and swallowed it off smoking hot to shew my politeness; I carried this civility, indeed, as far as any visitor ever need to do; for I not only scalded my mouth and throat till they were both handsomely blistered, but I forbore to eat any bread and butter, lest I should get choked for my complaisance, and I laid the spoon across my cup after the second dish, which I drank long before the sugar was dissolved.

This dispatch soon brought on the expected crisis, and the son rang the bell. The eyes of the family were darted impatiently around, and the big look of expectation sat upon every feature. To confess the truth, I began to entertain some doubts as to the sanity of their intellectuals, and apprehended there might be an hereditary touch in the blood of the family. I was soon relieved, if it is any relief to see people play the fool, without having the apology of Lunacy for it. Up came Mrs. Susan, who was at once a servant and a soothsayer. She really had a sort of fortune-telling face; a keen black eye that appeared to penetrate, a set of meditating muscles, a brow that projected, and a nose that, figuratively speaking, looked forwards: add to this, her complexion was olive as that of an Egyptian, and the lines of thinking, though perhaps she never thought at all, were to be seen near her eye-brows. This long-sighted lady who could see so well in the dark, came glowing with all the graces of the kitchen, and, wiping her face with the corner of an apron very unlikely to clean it, she advanced to the table. Awful moment! Alarming preparation! She looked at the tea-pot, and desired every body to begin.

No sooner was this order given, than the family began to pour away and toss the tea-leaves, after which they turned down the cups, and left them to the discretion of the foreress Susan. She opened the business of the afternoon with the fortunes of the master, that were depicted in hieroglyphics, within the cup. After turning it round several times, and looking as if she really saw the events and circumstances developed, she began to show off.

"Here is a little trouble, Sir, (said she) at the bottom of your cup, which is not cast so clear as I could wish. There is a disappointment concerning the receipt of money."

"As sure as I am alive, (said Sir Credulous, that is his name) she means the cash I expect from the country—Heigho!—Well, go on, Susan, go on."

"There's a letter coming, Sir, to the house, and it will bring news of a death, and you will get a present by that death," says Mrs. Susan.

"Fifty to one (quoth Sir Credulous) but Sir Solomon, my uncle, is now upon his death-bed—I heard he was in a poor way last week, you know, Susan."

"I don't know for that, Sir, (replies Susan); but there is a coffin in your cup as plain as a pike-staff; and here is a little October, 1776.

vexation, but you'll get over it soon; and there is a marriage going to be in the family, and I can see the ring this minute—Look'e here, Sir."

"P'fackings, and so there is (said the knight, looking at the cup).—This is my Betsey and Mr. Danvers, I'd lay my life on't. Well, Susan, now tell my wife's."

Susan proceeded to inspect a second cup, and soon acquainted her mistress that company was coming to the house, and that she would go a long journey.

"Good God! (said Sir Credulous) only think of that—She means the rout you are to have on Christmas Eve, and your visit into Wales as soon as the spring rises.—Why, Susan, we shall burn you for a witch."

The oracle now examined the remainder of the cups, in every one of which she saw something that had happened, or something that from her knowledge of the family-circumstances might possibly come to pass. Yet, when this sagacious person observed that there would be, any thing that she had heard from their own mouths was to be, they paid innumerable compliments to her sagacity; and, in the course of a little time, when their own premeditated schemes were put into execution, they would cry out, that every thing Susan foretells was sure to happen.

While these sacred employments were on foot I remained only a spectator, silently astonished; but when Susan departed I ventured to remark, that their servant seemed to be a knowing woman, and that it was plain she had dealings with more persons than were good.

"Heaven knows (said the old lady, very gravely) who helps her, but she knows every thing; and, for my part, has told me such matters, not only of what is to come, but of what has been, long and long, before she came into the family, that the very flesh has sometimes crept upon my bones, my hair has lifted itself by the force of amazement upon my head, and I have at such times looked at her, till I verily thought the Devil himself was at her elbow."

All things were now quiet till after supper-time, when cards were proposed—not to play at any game with, but to tell fortunes, which, it seems, was constantly the custom of the family, before they went to rest.

Susan, therefore, made her second appearance, and spread the cards to her purpose. She began, as before, with Sir Credulous, and ended with the youngest daughter. More than two hours were misemployed in this mysterious manner, in the course of which time, all the cants and tricks of those who trade in these petty impositions were divertingly exhibited.

And yet the daily repetition of this palpable nonsense, so far from cloying, only whetted, and gave, as it were, a new edge to Sir Credulous and all his train. Among a thousand other absurd things that I forget, I remember what follows of Mrs. Susan's predictions, from the situation into which either accident or her contrivance had thrown the cards. She told Sir Credulous, that there was a great deal of sickness over his head, and that he would have words with a black man upon account of a black woman.—She informed lady Credulous, that the very journey and company, which were before in the tea leaves, were now upon the cards.—The eldest daughter was acquainted, that she would receive a letter, and with it a present; and that present would be the forerunner of a ring; and that ring would be put upon her finger by a fair man, with a very good heart, which he bore towards her.—She told the youngest daughter, not only what she did expect, but what she did not expect—what was coming to the house, and what was going from it.—She saw plainly in the cards that she (the young lady) was to be married; that she was to have two children, and then marry again: that there was a deal of trouble, but that she would get a great deal by a death; and there were two men and a woman, the one black, the other fair, at that moment talking about her; but that as there was a good heart for her, she would turn her back of all her troubles, and ride in her coach.

The girl's exultation at the circumstance of the coach is not to be described, and she went in high spirits into her bed-chamber; previous to which, however, there was a pleasant altercation amongst all parties in regard to their different prospects. The whole family were exceedingly disposed to quarrel with Destiny; and not being able to lay hands upon that, they drove her handmaid, Mrs. Susan, in a rage down stairs, who, by the bye, muttered as she descended, that she would be a match for them all when they next came under her hands; that is, being interpreted, she would unsay all she had said that was in any degree favourable, and make their future hopes as dark and dreadful as an enraged Oracle could possibly paint them.

The next morning I was presented with another specimen of their superstitious propensities. It seems they were too much interested in the events of to-morrow to enjoy to-day, and I found that they were endeavouring to make out a favourite enigma of fortune, even after they were folded in the arms of sleep. No sooner, therefore, were they all assembled at breakfast, even before the tea was put into the pot, than the prognosticating Susan was again summoned.—

She attended—and to what purpose dost thou think, my good reader? even to the task of interpreting dreams. Every individual of the family had dreamed a dream, and Mrs. Susan knew the meaning of dreams as well, and could expound the visions of the night with as much truth and accuracy, as she could foretell the events of Providence from criticising tea-cups, and from the mystic arrangements of a pack of cards. One lady imagined in her dream that she was stuck in the mud, and the more she attempted to extricate, the deeper she was involved in the mire; on her right hand was a poor bird caught on a lime twig; on her left, a ship tossing in a tempest. The Interpreter observed, with great signs of gravity in her face, “that it was as bad a dream as ever was dreamed; that mud was misfortune, which would stick upon her heart; that her attempting to get away from it, and not being able, was a plain signification, that the more she strove the worse she would be. She remarked, that the limed bird was an image of her distress; as the bird struggled, so would she struggle, and that it would be as easy for one to get clear of the lime, as for the other to get rid of the trouble. The ship (she said) denoted a poor creature in distress, buffeting the billows of affliction; and altogether it was such a dream, as might frighten any reasonable christian out of their senses.”

In this strain did our oracular Priestess proceed to decypher the fates that had been sporting in the visions of others; and by the time she had ended her explanations, the whole family were made thereby as gloomy and desolate, as if they were actually labouring in all the agonies that were predicted; although the Jade of a Fortune-teller fairly confessed, within an hour afterwards, that she made things out as bad as she could, for their ill-usage of her the night before.

This confession, so far from having the proper effect upon the family, only served to make every person belonging to it ten times more anxious than ever to have their dreams re-interpreted; they were all weak enough to bribe her into good-nature; one by the promise of a new ribbon, another by a shilling, another a pair of gloves, another a pair of garters.

What, my good friend, shall we say to these gross and egregious absurdities? Shall we pity, or shall we despise? When people ple can so far lose their rational faculties as to shut their eyes against conviction, and imagine the ways of Providence and of the Almighty are displayed in such insignificant things as painted pasteboard, the fumes of indigestion, and the leaves of a tree tossed about a cup, what idea can they entertain of the Deity—of a Deity who is so negligent as to lay open his secrets, and suffer them to be seen in ‘trifles, light as air?’—Yet, when these trifles are made ‘Confirmations strong as proofs of Holy Writ,’ it is impossible to help being sincerely affected at the folly and infirmity of mankind.

I am, dear Sir,
Your friend and humble servant,
M.

Admonitions from an old Soldier to a young One.

A Greecably to your wishes, my dear B——, I have procured for you the inclosed commission, and am happy to be the first to salute you upon the title it confers on you. The appellation of a soldier, even in the lowest ranks of the military, has for ages been esteemed an honourable one; but it is in the power of every man who bears a commission in the army to render it still more respectable, and of still greater utility. A brave man thinks well, thinks justly of himself, when he is destined to serve his country, and when he is capable of serving it as he ought. When a nation is attacked by its enemies at home, or when its distant possessions are invaded; its inhabitants, who have not been taught the use of arms, naturally turn their eyes to the foldiery for assistance, for their own private advantages, and for the glory of their country. They naturally look up, in time of national distress, to men who having been accustomed to a military life, are very well qualified to perform the military duties, for protection and defence. Such men, therefore, when they are so called up, have certainly the most flattering opportunities to distinguish themselves by their personal courage, and by their personal conduct.

The man who laudably aspires to the highest distinctions in the field, ought to be as capable of behaving with propriety after a battle, as when he is actually engaged. His judgment should be at least equal to his proffess: they are both, indeed, such requisite ingredients in the composition of a soldier, (in the most enlarged sense of the word) that they cannot be separated without leaving the character extremely imperfect. To render it complete, the true spirit of humanity (not that false tenderness which too often usurps its name) must be super-added. With these three indispensable requisites powerfully operating in conjunction, the soldier stands forth in a striking light, and is at once an object of admiration and regard.

In vain does a commander in chief himself hope to gain regard and admiration, who is not at the same time brave, judicious, and humane.

With respect to the behaviour due to an enemy, I need not, I think, tell you, that the behaviour which is most likely to convert him into a friend, is without hesitation to be adopted—especially if you are in a triumphant situation. The sword which is drawn in wantonness, is ever drawn in a manner which brings disgrace to its possessor.

To your prisoners be more than commonly polite; be particularly attentive to them.—If they are men with dispositions similar to your own, they will never forget your civilities, your kindnesses to them: if, on the other hand, they, from being naturally unsusceptible of grateful sensations, discover hearts more to be detested than praised; you will, notwithstanding, enjoy the exquisite satisfaction of having acted like a man of feeling, as well as a man of sense, and a man of fire.

You are now, my dear B——, destined to a service in which no small address, as well as courage, will be necessary, as you will find the Americans, considered in their militant states, very different men from any you have hitherto met with; and as the mode of fighting among the Indians will be quite new to you, an uncommon share of your attention will be demanded.—I am not in the least apprehensive of your being terrified at their martial appearance; but as many of their manœuvres are peculiar to themselves, and distinguish them from European warriors, I would have you make yourself master of them; and endeavour, indeed, upon all occasions, to bring the enemies of your country to reason, rather by political skill, than by mere dint of courage. A brave man, I grant, will readily expose his person to the greatest dangers, when such an exposure is required; but he will discover more temerity than genuine heroism, who promotes a needless slaughter, let his own achievements be ever so brilliant. You must consider, my dear B——, that the Americans having taken up arms against their Sovereign, from a thorough persuasion that their liberties are at stake, may be supposed to exert themselves in defence of them, with all that ardour with which men who have a just idea of freedom are generally animated when the chains of slavery are rattling in their ears:—but if you can convince them of their mistakes without any sanguinary proceedings, you will deserve a laurel crown, more than by driving them into a sense of their errors by the burning of their towns, or the commission of hostilities in any other way.—At all events, shew yourself a generous enemy; remembering, that many of those against whom you are going to fight—if the unhappy contest cannot be decided without bloodshed—may be called our countrymen; that many of them have friends, have relations in England, whose hearts must be deeply affected by the pictures, full of horrible expression, which fancy may present to their minds.—It is certainly needless for me to urge you to take care of the aged and the infirm; and equally so to succour the fair-sex, who may, in a defenceless situation, implore your protection.

By what I have wrote in this free, curious manner, you will, perhaps, think there is too much mildness in some of my admonitions: you may imagine also, that the character of a soldier cannot be sustained without a severity of deportment. I should not wonder at your entertaining such a supposition; it is too much encouraged by many young men in the Army:—but do not listen to it. Having seen, during the years I have served, a great number of young Officers exhibiting brutality for courage, and insolence for spirit; I wish, with the more earnestness, to find you keep clear of the imitation of such characters. I am satisfied that you are, with me, acquainted with several young fellows who wish to be thought soldiers, though they have only entered into the Army in order to strut up and down the Park in their regimentals, to wear cockades in their hats, and swords by their sides; peaceful swords, which they desire not to draw but upon feeble watchmen, or faucy waiters, or to make a flash with before a circle of females, who are too apt to measure a man's courage by the figure which he makes in their eyes.—I will not rank you among such men: had I not the highest opinion of your morals as well as your manners, of your head as well as of your heart, and of your internal as well as external accomplishments; I should not have recommended you as a proper person to bear his Majesty's commission: were you like them, I should have been the first to prevent any applications in your favour. However, though you go into the Army with the best propensities in the world, the bad examples are so numerous, that the pliancy of your temper, which has on some occasions been very serviceable to you, may, in your new sphere of life, lead you into dangerous temptations.—That you may guard yourself against such temptations, and even prove yourself truly heroic in every shape; that you may be as much applauded for your virtues as for your valour, is the sincere wish of, dear B—, Your ever affectionate friend,

W. H.

A Sermon; preached at the Spring Assizes for the County of Norfolk, at Tetsford, on the fourteenth of March, 1776. By the Rev. T. Prieſtley, of Caius College, Cambridge, and Vicar of Snettisham in Norfolk.

“Micah, chap. vi. v. 8. What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God.”

“THE order, in which the prophet here enjoins the performance of our moral and religious duty, in the practice of justice, mercy, and humility, directs us to the consideration of the mutual connections and reciprocal dependance of these virtues, as the fullest and clearest exposition of the text.

“What, O Man, doth the Lord require of thee?”—What! but to do justly.

“This is the first divine injunction to a moral duty, at once the most simple, comprehensive, and indispensable;—simple in that a sense of its obligation and the means of performing it, are obvious to every capacity.

"There requires no sublimity of genius, no profundity of knowledge, no refinement of intellect, or delicacy of sentiment, to make us sensible of the propriety, of being strictly just—It is a duty which all hearts can reach, all heads conceive.

"To do unto others, as we would have them do unto us, is a gospel maxim, in which is contained the essential spirit of the law and the prophets.—It is a maxim so forcibly inculcated by the voice of nature, so deeply impressed on the sense of every rational being, that it requires nothing more than simplicity of heart, and rectitude of disposition to induce us to obedience.

"This duty is comprehensive, in that it is incumbent on all men. It is not partially imposed on any rank, class, or body of men; but on the whole race of mankind. It is a duty obligatory on all, from the highest to the lowest; from the prince on his throne to the peasant in his cottage. For by the submission of the lowly are the high exalted, and by the industry of the poor are the rich supported in affluence. The labourer is worthy of his hire as the lord of his homage; and it equally behoves both, in their mutual interchange of benefits, to do justly.

"This duty is indispensable, as, without it, civil government would degenerate into despotism and tyranny, or into anarchy and confusion. Were the powerful at liberty to oppress the weak, the cunning to impose on the simple, and the indolent to prey upon the industrious, the bonds of society would be broken; liberty, property; and the whole train of social blessings dependent on subordination, would become precarious and uncertain.

"In requiring man to do justly, therefore, the Lord requireth only that he should promote his own interest and the common good of his fellow-creatures, in obeying the dictates of his conscience; that faithful monitor, whose impartial voice calls upon every man, in like manner, to do justly.

"Is the conscience of an individual, in a state of civilized society, not always sufficiently enlightened to discern its duty to others, standing in the same predicament, as members of the same community?—The laws of that community are his director; nor is it required of every one to speculate on the justice or equity of such laws; which may be founded on reasons and enacted on motives to which he is a stranger, and for the investigation of which neither his talents nor his experience have qualified him.

"Were not the laws of society the allowed criterion of justice between man and man, there might arise a variety of particular cases, in which neither the honesty of the heart, nor the capacity of the head would be competent to the decision. Let it suffice that the law of the land be not contrary to the law of God, and be every man obedient to that law; relying securely on that Divine Providence, which has made him a sojourner in the land, that in acting legally he will do justly.

"Were men, associated in civil society, to do otherwise, anarchy would universally ensue; while every man, following the dictates of his own conceit, would do that only which was right in his own eyes. Hence every man's hand would be lifted against his brother, and no man would be disposed to do justly. But there is a king in Israel, and be every soul obedient to the higher powers: for the powers that be, are given of God.

"Thou art inexcusable, therefore, O man, who, having the law of God written in thy heart, and the laws of society expounded to thy understanding, dost unjustly.

"While thou dost justice also, remember it is required of thee to love mercy. We are in another part of the sacred writings commanded to be merciful as our father in heaven is merciful; but we are here, as in most other places, rather persuaded than enjoined to this duty. Mercy is indeed of such a nature as to be incapable of compulsion.

'The quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as the gentle rain from Heaven
Upon the place beneath.—It is twice blest'd;

It blesses him that gives and him that takes.'

"Thus with men of sensibility and sympathy, their acts of mercy are deeds of kindness done to themselves. Such want no other incitement to mercy than self-gratification; but with those whose feelings are more under the subjection of reason, whose enlarged ideas enable them to feel for individuals in the general injuries done to the community; these are the less inclined to particular acts of mercy, as those acts often appear to militate against the general good of society. To the innocent and unfortunate they may extend their compassion, but on the criminal they will have no mercy.

"To these, let me observe, that misfortune, is often construed into guilt, and misery imputed to wickedness: that even, when

when it is otherwise, it is often a sufficient misfortune to be guilty, for the wicked are in general proportionably miserable.

“ Let me observe, that —we do pray for mercy—

And that same prayer doth teach us all to render

The deeds of mercy.—

‘ He that sheweth no mercy shall have judgment without mercy.’

Though justice be the plea then, pause on this

That in the course of justice none of us Should see salvation.

In the sight of God no man living can be justified. For, though as the Majesty of the Lord, so is his mercy, which shall be shewn unto merciful men, whose righteousness shall not be forgotten; yet, as his mercy is great, so is his correction also: for ‘ he judgeth every man according to his works.’

“ How powerful a consideration this, to induce us, to walk humbly with God; with that God, by whose abundant grace, through the merits of our Redeemer, we may be enabled to do that which is required of us; so that we may one day be made partakers of his kingdom and heirs of his salvation!

“ So indispensibly is it the duty, then, and so becoming the situation of man, on every occasion and in every circumstance of life, to do justice, and shew mercy to his fellow-creatures, under the profoundest humiliation to his Creator!—And, if this be his duty in his private and particular concerns with individuals, how much more is that duty obligatory, and those virtues becoming, on such public and general occasions, as that which is in contemplation this day: the administration and distribution of public justice! The duty of the man is, on this occasion transferred to the citizen; his probity becomes patriotism, his mercy humanity, his humanity pious humiliation.

“ The dispensers of justice, in our courts of judicature, may be called the guardians of civil society; assuming, in some degree, the attributes of the Deity, in sitting the hearts, and sitting in judgment on the children of men.

“ In the discharge of so solemn and awful a trust, therefore, it behoves them with peculiar humility to God, to do justice and shew mercy to man. For here also, let it be remembered that justice precedes mercy. The latter, amiable as it is, is but a secondary virtue; and, however proper to mitigate punishment, is itself criminal if it prevent conviction.

“ If we reflect how often mercy, shewn to one man, has proved injustice to thousands, how often lenity to the guilty has proved cruelty to the innocent, we shall be convinced, not only of the political expediency, but the moral necessity of doing justly, in bringing the accused to trial and the criminal to condemnation.

“ Let me, therefore, particularly and earnestly address those, on whose evidence the just or unjust determination of causes depends. For I will not presume that any of this assembly, by whom that determination may be more immediately directed, so ill-informed, or so inattentive to their duty to God or their neighbours, as to need my admonition.—According to the evidence before them, they will judge justly.

“ Whoever thou art that accusest another, remember the Lord requireth that thou also shouldst do justly. Remember that, at the bar of public justice, thou art not complaining of a private insult, which thou art at liberty to forget or forgive. The cause is not thine, but that of the community, to whom thou standest indebted for protection, and for whose safety only thou shouldst, therefore, seek redress for private wrongs.

“ Let not thy sensibility for the distressed, or compassion for the miserable, make thee wish to screen the guilty or withhold the sacrifice, that is due to offended justice.

“ Is thy breast replete with the milk of human kindness? Dost thou think the divine maxim, enjoining us ‘ to do unto others as we would have them do unto us’ doth not apply to the prosecution of public criminals?—Quite otherwise. It applies in no case so forcibly. He who wilfully violates the laws of society, gives up, voluntarily, his claim to the rights of the social union. He is declaredly no longer one of us, nor is entitled to reciprocal protection. A professed enemy to all, he has a claim to the mutual friendship and good offices of none. And, though as men and Christians, the individual is enjoined not only to love his neighbour as himself, but even to love his enemies, and do good to those that hate and despitefully use him,—yet, when his enemies become enemies to others; he must consider the interest of those others; and shall he prefer that of a single enemy to a thousand friends? Would this be doing to others as he would have them do unto him? Surely not! In the maxim in question, our duty is not confined to any one or a few others, but to any other indefinitely, and therefore generally to all others, others, or the whole of that community, of which we are a part.

"That the wicked should wish to escape punishment, is no wonder; but, however callous they may be to the stings of conscience, they are sensible of the propriety of her reproaches; while the guilty are the first by whom they stand convicted, and often not the last to own the justice of their sentence.

"Yet beware, that in bringing thy fellow-creature to justice, thou committest no injustice thyself. Beware how thou judgest, lest thou be judged: for by the same measure that thou metest to another, shall it be also measured to thee again. Let not rage or resentment have influence over thee, any more than favour or affection. Remember, though thou seekest redress for private wrongs, thou hast no greater right to punish than to pardon; thou art the instrument of public justice, not private revenge.

"Above all, therefore, in case of doubt, or even probability of mistake, forbear asseveration: so fallible is human observation, so subject to error the clearest conception, that the united testimony of both sense and reason should alone inspire that assurance, which tends to the conviction of the accused. Better is it that the guilty should go free, than that the innocent should suffer shame, or be subject to punishment.—In behalf even of the guilty it might be observed, that so powerful is passion, so open is the heart to temptation, that there is no man living can say, what he might not do, in circumstances, to which he is a stranger.

"Deplorable, indeed, is the state of that man, who, abandoned by divine grace, is subjected to the suggestions of Satan, the wilfulness of his own head, and the vanity of his own heart! Hence the wickedest man in the world is, perhaps, he whose lot is most to be lamented.

"On that plea may he hope for mercy from the Fountain of all mercy—but from thence only. At an earthly tribunal he has no claim to any thing but justice: for dreadful, indeed, would be the state of society, if enormity of guilt laid a superior claim to mercy, and if pity for misery might plead for plenitude of pardon. Do justly therefore, that every man may be rewarded according to his deeds.

"To this end, let nothing but the truth escape thy lips, and that, as thou wilt answer it at the great day of account, to Him, before whom all hearts are open, and by whom we shall be judged.

"If thou doubtest be silent, but if thou art confident of the truth, thou owest thy testimony to justice, to thyself, to thy country, and to that Being, who is the Fountain of truth, and is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity.

"That, thus assured also, thou mayest give thy testimony without reluctance, be it remembered that the legislature of this country hath wisely provided against the imperfection, to which all human laws are liable, the tendency of their severity to injustice, agreeable to that ancient adage, summum jus, summa injuria!

"In such case the love of mercy is still free to attempt justice;—while the extension of it is placed in such hands as, from liberality of education, distinguished abilities, extent of experience and eminence of character, it is confidently to be hoped, it will ever be properly directed.—It is impossible a liberal mind should not feel a satisfaction, a delight, elevating it almost above the sphere of humanity, at an opportunity of justifiably sparing the victim devoted to justice, from the execution of its awful decrees.

"In such a display of mercy the most exalted character is still more highly exalted. For mercy

'Is mightiest in the mightiest: it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown:

His sceptre shews the force of temporal power

The attribute to awe and majesty.

But mercy is above this scepter'd sway,

It is enthroned in the hearts of kings,

It is an attribute of God himself,

And earthly power doth then show likest God's

When mercy seasons justice.'

"What exultation then must fill the heart of the elevated dispenser of it? And yet, amidst that exultation, it is required of thee, O man, to walk humbly with thy God: and surely it is becoming in the most highly exalted of earthly characters to walk humbly with him 'by whom kings reign and princes decree justice.' For by him shall the princes of the earth and all who judge others be judged; by him, of whose judgment there is no arrest, from whose sentence there is no appeal; his irreversible decree condemning the despairing criminal to

'everlasting groans,

Unrepited, unpitied, unreprieved,
Ages of hopeless end!'

"That not a soul in this assembly may experience so hapless a state, may the influence of divine grace enable us all, as the Lord requires, to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God. Amen."

The above sermon is dedicated to Sir Edward Ashley, bart. who was foreman of the grand jury at the assizes at Thetford.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

S I R,

MR. Soame Jenyns, in his tract on the verity of the christian religion seems to give up the notion of the universal propagation of that religion, as predicted in the sacred writings. The learned have supposed, that some historic documents of very distant nations, tended to prove that christianity had been once taught in those countries, although the memory of the doctrine, through length of time, and other conspiring causes, had been effaced.

There is so much darkness brooding over remote antiquity, that, what are termed discoveries, seldom serve to enlighten us in the way of truth. There is a certain period beyond which all is conjecture. Little reliance is to be placed on coins, they are so often spurious. Little confidence is to be reposed in manuscripts, they are so frequently forged. Even stone monuments, when said to have been dug up in this or that country, scarcely deserve any credit. The hand of fraud is discernible even in the ravages of time.

I am led into this train of thought by reflecting on a certain monument, said to have been dug up in Sanxuen, a village of China. The story of that transaction is thus related by a very grave author.

A square stone of about ten spans long, and five broad, was discovered by some persons who were digging for another purpose than that of finding relics. At the upper part of this stone there was the figure of a cross. Under this cross there was an inscription in Sinitic characters, which rendered literally into Latin, was as follows:

*"Lapis, in Laudem et memoriam aeternam
Legis, Lucis, & Veritatus, portatæ
De Judea, et in China*

Promulgatæ, E R E C T U S."

In English thus:

*"This stone was erected
To the Praise and eternal Remembrance
Of*

*The Law of Light, and Truth Brought from Judea
And*

Promulgated in China."

This was only the title of the monument. The body of it contained a relation how the gospel of Christ Jesus was brought out of Judea by one Olopuen, and propagated in China. This transaction is supposed to have happened about six hundred years after the death of Christ. According to the history of this whole affair, Olopuen, the first promulgator of christianity in China, was introduced to the court of the Emperor. Here he underwent the necessary examination. The emperor was so satisfied both of the virtue of the man, and of the excellence of his doctrine, that he caused a proclamation to be issued in his favour. Olopuen, in that proclamation, is styled a "man of superlative virtue." The proclamation speaks of the doctrine taught by him in the following strain of panegyric:

"Cujus intentum docendi nos a fundamentis examinantes, invenimus, doctrinam ejus admodum excellentem, et sine strepitu exteriori, fundatam principaliter in creatione mundi."

That is,

"Having examined the very fundamental principles of his doctrine, we find it excellent beyond description. It stands not in need of any external bombast or bustle. It takes its rise even from the creation of the world."

The emperor thus publicly applauding the doctrine of Olopuen, it is scarcely necessary to say, that the subjects of China became the favourers of christianity. If the worship of the Devil was adopted by the prince, courtiers would despise the torments of hell, rather than not be in the fashion. As the Emperor of China became a friend to christianity, his people, we may be assured, followed his example. Olopuen was carested during his life time, but, after his demise, christianity so lost ground in China, as that the recollection it had ever existed there, would not have been preserved, but for the accident which caused the stone I have mentioned, to be dug up.

I have only one short observation to make, which is, that if the relation is genuine, and that such a story was ever acknowledged, as an authentic monument, by the Chinese historians, then it is plain, that the doctrines of christianity have been propagated in remoter regions than is generally supposed. If the stone, like many other relics of antiquity, is spurious, and the relation of its discovery, altogether fabulous, I do confess, it would give me much pleasure, to see this proved by some learned person of the age. You, Sir, would, I doubt not, appropriate a sufficient part of your magazine for the task. You would have my thanks; and, the gentleman, so obliging as to undertake the business, would be entitled to my gratitude.

March 12.

SIR Charles Whitworth reported the resolution of yesterday on the army extraordinaries.

Mr. Hartley lamented the state of this oppressed and almost ruined country. He observed, it was not that the war was unjust, cruel, and unnatural; that the country was left naked and defenceless; that the expences were already enormous; that the fund which was appropriated for the purpose of reducing the public debts, as a security to our public creditors in case of deficiencies, and as a dernier resource in case of an attack from our natural enemies, was already anticipated for many years to come; these matters, however terrible in their appearance, or dreadful in their consequences, were already known or foreseen: but it was the confidence with which ministers acted, and the ready compliance of Parliament to every requisition, without either examining the nature of the services for which the money was given, or afterwards enquiring into the expenditure, that astonished him. Such, in a great measure, was the nature of the account of extraordinaries now before them. He said, he should not enter into a minute examination of the several items which had swelled that very extraordinary account, but he would be obliged to the noble lord, [Lord North] if he would now rise and give the explanation he declined to give the other night in debate, though often pressed. He knew how little attention any thing he offered was entitled to from the noble lord and the gentlemen on that side the house. But how little soever he might deserve to be attended to on his own account, he hoped that some degree of attention was due to him on such an occasion, in the character of a representative giving away the money of his constituents. The matter he desired to have cleared up, was the requisition made by the commander in chief for an hundred thousand pounds, and the credit taken for that sum without being accompanied by a single voucher. He observed, that there were vouchers for the rest, stating to whom the payments were made, but not one of the actual expenditure. Before he sat down, he begged the noble lord would explain to the house the nature of the transaction; at present it bore a very strange appearance. He observed, that there was a circumstance attending money matters now, that was, he believed, before never known or practised even by the noble lord; that was, ministers refused to venture at a gross computation, what the expence of the extraordinaries of the succeeding campaign would amount to. He had heard it dropped in debate, that they would rise this year to the monstrous sum of four millions. Terrible as these tidings were, he should be glad to know the worst; not to come day after day to that house, and hear some new demand made, under a fresh pretence and another denomination, though all directed to the same service. If, therefore, the minister, as he must by this time know what his plan was, and the probable expences of carrying it into execution, would rise, and fairly and ingenuously, state the gross computation, the house would then know what they had to expect, what they were to grant on one side, and what they were to get in return on the other, and of course be enabled to balance the certain expence against the probable or possible benefits promised to accrue from the measures now pursuing.

October, 1776.

Lord North said, if the honourable gentleman alluded to any neglect shewn to the propositions which he had submitted to the house, he was himself conscious of not deserving any part of the imputation. He thought the honourable gentleman had acted a very commendable part, and presumed he was actuated by the purest motives; it was fulfilling his duty, and in that light he always received and treated any proposition which came from him. His lordship observed, that the honourable gentleman gave a credit and appellation to the papers on the table which they did not deserve, for they were not vouchers. The vouchers were yet to come, and would contain a precise and actual account of the expenditure, and then the house would have a full opportunity to examine them. As to the 100,000*l.* drawn by the commander in chief, for which no account of any kind appeared, that could be easily explained, for it was so much in advance to remain in his hands, and for which he must be accountable till he shews the particular services for which it was issued. The usual manner of conducting this business, was for the commander in chief to draw on the deputy paymaster-general; but it being found that it was much more advantageous to remit than draw, that mode was discontinued, and the present adopted in its stead, as it would be a considerable saving to the public. He said, the honourable gentleman was mistaken in asserting, that the permitting the commander in chief to draw was never known, for it was always the case in respect to extraordinaries. The very nature of the expence, and the manner it was incurred made it necessary. It was uncertain, a previous credit was necessary, and the amount could not be known, nor the balance struck, till the several articles were brought into account, accompanied by the proper vouchers; that this had not been the case formerly in America, for as there were no extraordinaries till since the late war, by way of establishment, no previous credit of this kind consequently subsisted.

Mr. Hartley did not seem satisfied with this explanation, and recurred to his former observation, that it was a matter unprecedented in the annals of parliament, to propose measures to them for their consideration, without even offering to guess at the expence. He said, he did not mean, by any thing that had fallen from him, to limit the commander in chief to any specific sum in the first instance, but only to have a faithful, accurate, and satisfactory account of the expenditure. To see that the money had been applied to the purposes for which it was granted.

Mr. Dempster spoke of the consequences arising from the contracts in general. He said, every country where such a system was permitted ted to prevail, must, in the end, be undone; and he had little doubt but that a very considerable part of the burthens we now labour under have been incurred through the means of jobs and contractors. He informed the house, that when he had the honour of being in the direction of a certain great company, the evil was felt, and he and some other gentlemen in the direction determined to provide some means of removing it. The court of directors at length agreed to advertise the contracts, and the consequence was, that they not only made a very considerable saving, but the articles were much better than were furnished in this way than before the contracts were laid open. He recommended this, or some other similar plan to the minister, and assured him that very singular advantages would accrue thereby to the public, as the articles would be both cheaper, and of superior quality. He concluded with observing, that jobbers and contractors were at once the disgrace and curse of this country, a well-authenticated instance of which happened during the late war, of a person whose contract amounted only to 1,300,000 l. but whose net profits were full 800,000 l.

Sir Joseph Mawbey bestowed almost every opprobrious epithet in the English language on the American war. He said it was cruel, unjust, villainous, and that he trusted God and man would unite in reprobating it. He was no less severe on its advisers and conductors. He observed that the noble lord who lately presided in the department to which American affairs more peculiarly belonged, was too honest and conscientious to persist in so bloody and so inhuman a business. He abhorred the thought of embruing his hands in the blood of his innocent unoffending fellow-subjects, and resigned his office sooner than co-operate in so flagitious a work. It is true, he was succeeded by a noble lord now sitting opposite, [Lord Germain] who, he presumed, imagined he was acting right, but whose schemes of unconditional submission, he hoped he would never be able to effect. He observed that the majorities who daily sanctioned the present measures would sorely repent of it; and he recommended to the country gentlemen to seriously reflect on the consequences, when the additional shilling on the land would not half defray the account of extraordinaries, which was at present the subject of consideration. If then such an enormous expence was incurred for the maintenance of 6000 men confined in Boston, would any person rise and say, that the whole of six shillings in the pound, instead of four, would defray even the extraordinaries of the army that was to be employed in the course of the ensuing campaign? It was plain it could not, for it was already confessed, that the extraordinaries would amount to four millions, and a land-tax of six shillings in the pound would be considerably short of three, perhaps not quite two and a half, after allowing for the deficiencies. Where then are the supplies to come from? You cannot devise a tax that will not cause a defalcation in some other. The excise and customs will not produce a single shilling more; and if they should, your trade, manufactures, and commerce will be ruined, if you attempt to lay on any new duties. He then addressed himself to Lord Howe and General Burgoyne, and after giving testimony to their personal worth, expressed his astonishment that such men would be concerned in so infamous and diabolical a business; and owned, that however he might esteem them as men, he wished they might not succeed; but that the cause of justice, humanity, freedom, and the constitution, might prevail. He said, administration might pride themselves in their great majorities; but he trusted the day was not far off, when they would be brought to a just and severe account for the ruin and destruction in which they were wantonly involving their country, in order to accomplish a detestable plan of despotism.

Governor Johnstone was very severe on contracts and contractors, particularly in relation to two articles in the account paid to Mr. A. Bacon for the hire of Negroes in the ceded islands. This, he said, was a most shameful squandering of public money. He observed, likewise, on an article of 4000 l. drawn by the superintendent of Indian affairs, upon the receiver-general of Canada.

Sir Grey Cooper said, this was the usual mode. The only difference it made, was, that instead of drawing on the treasury, where the account was audited, and sent back with an order to the receiver-general; in the present instance, the money was drawn immediately from the receiver-general, but the superintendent's account still lies open to inspection; and he remained still subject to be made accountable for the expenditure of any sums thus obtained.

Lord North answered Governor Johnstone, respecting the Negro contract. He said, this expence was incurred mostly in the ceded islands, and was near expiring, as the purposes for which the Negroes were employed, that of clearing the Crown lands, and opening communications from one part of the islands to the other, were nearly completed; consequently there would be no further occasion for them, and this expence would cease.

Mr. Pownall (secretary to the board of trade) gave a further explanation relative to the expence of the superintendent of Indian affairs. He said, that presents were made to several Indian tribes, to the six nations, and other western Indians; that the articles of which those presents consisted, were usually purchased here; that he was the person who formerly provided them, but on account of the present situation of affairs in America, it was thought more convenient to have them provided on the spot; and that was the true cause of that article making its appearance in the account. The presents commonly consisted of glass beads, cutlery, &c.

Mr. Vyner replied to the address made to the country gentlemen, and said, as being included in that number, he was much obliged to the honourable gentleman [Sir Joseph Mawbey] for his advice; but for his own part, though the land-tax next year should be six shillings in the pound, or double, that he was willing to contribute his share, as on a former occasion; for if the supremacy of this country was to be preserved fully in its constitutional extent, no means proper proper to effect it, ought to be neglected or left untried. As to the question, what did those gentlemen expect in return? He, for one, fairly and openly declared, that he expected America would be taxed for the purpose of raising a revenue, both to defray the expences of a war this country was wantonly forced into in the assertion of her own rights, and towards relieving us of the burdens incurred by protecting the colonies during the late war. He insisted besides, that the legislative power of this country, independent of the reasons now stated, could never be maintained, if the exercise of it was not to be coupled with a tax submitted to by America, as the clearest acknowledgment of the general controlling and governmental power of Great-Britain. Before he sat down, he begged leave to be understood, that his complaisance and unlimited confidence, however willing he might be to grant money for the purpose of carrying on the war, did not extend so far as the honourable gentleman who spoke first in this debate [Mr. Hartley] for he would never consent to give a commander in chief, or any other officer, an unlimited right to draw or make requisitions; for though he was willing to contribute largely, he still reserved to himself the power of judging and controlling the expenditure and application of the money thus granted.

Mr. Tuffnell spoke of several articles in the account: so much for four crout; so much for small beer; and several thousand pounds for pepper and vinegar alone. Such a waste of public money was to the last degree shameful; and it was no way wonderful that the minister should have the great majorities he had, when he had it in his power, by so many different means, to influence the representatives of the people. He then took a view of the intended operations, and shewed, that nothing decisive could possibly be effected in the course of the ensuing campaign, as the troops would not arrive at their respective places of destination till at the end of two, four, and perhaps six months. That posts must be secured, and communications opened; and that consequently the expence of the present year would be lost, or at least only lay a foundation for the operations of the succeeding. Then, taking the matter purely on the ground laid down by the promoters of the present measures, it would amount to this; that after the expence of this campaign, which was already allowed to be ten, though he had strong reason to believe it would be fifteen millions, we should commence operations in the year 1777 effectually; and supposing the success predicted should be the case, and that no one possible event should happen either from without or within, to interrupt our designs, that America should be reduced to the unconditional submission contended for by the noble Lord over the way, lately come into office [Lord G. Germain] the consequence would be, that we should incur a debt of between thirty and forty millions, a sum he prophesied, much more than ever we should be able to reimburse ourselves, by all the taxes we could ever expect to draw from that country. He doubted much therefore, whether the honourable gentleman's [Mr. Vyner] thirteen shillings, or more, in the pound, would be sufficient to bear the expence of such an undertaking; or if he would ever see a single shilling of the money he was now so ready to grant for the purpose of coercing America, return in any form whatever.

Lord Irnham said, it was really shameful that gentlemen, members of that House, should have the contracts that now appeared. He alluded in particular to that of the Negroes, and the four crout. He wished sincerely, that the account was printed, that the nation might see how they were plundered and fleeced, in order to gratify and enrich a set of mercenary and rapacious contractors, who were raising immense fortunes, drawn from the very vitals of the people; and that he was not surprised to hear a certain set of men, the preceding evening, express themselves so warm for coercive measures, and so eager to grant away the public money. He did not know by what appellation to describe them. They were not country gentlemen, nor placemen, nor pensioners, nor king's friends; but they were worse than all: they were at present the disgrace, and would in the end occasion the total ruin of this country.

Mr. Burke said a few words respecting the caution expressed by an honourable gentleman, who professed himself a country gentleman; and said he was surprised to hear him adopt the very language used by the people of America; that is, we will grant you aids or supplies, but we will reserve to ourselves a controul over the expensiture, and be the judges of the quantum to be granted, and the mode of application. He believed, therefore, the gentleman was very snug and secure in his offer of a thirteen shillings in the pound land-tax on this condition; for it amounted to just nothing, while he reserved to himself the power of refusing it whenever he thought proper. He said, as by the curious items in the account, he imagined the army in Boston had a sufficient supply of broccoloes, cabages, four-crout, and a few asparagus, there was no occasion for keeping open a begging subscription for the purpose of procuring those necessaries, when the nation had already made such ample provision. On this ground he should submit two resolutions to the consideration of the House, which would, he presumed, put this matter in a clear light. They were,

"That it appears to this House, that the extraordinary expences amounting to 845,165l. 14s. 8d. have been incurred, for the far greater part, for services within the town of Boston.

"That it appears to this House, that ample provision has been made by the public for the accommodation and comfort of the troops in Boston, which made the levying any further money, or begging any from the subject, on that pretence, unnecessary." They both passed in the negative, without a division.

March 13.] No debate.

March 14.] Order of the day, to go into a committee on the Scotch militia bill.

Mr. Grenville. He said that not having had an opportunity of delivering his sentiments on this bill, he would take this stage, and move an instruction which would at least obviate one of the many objections he had to it.

That he could not help thinking it incumbent on its supporters to evince the three subsequent propositions; First, That the present situation of the kingdom required an extraordinary force of 6000 men, (the number to be raised); Secondly, That this method to be adopted is the cheapest; and Thirdly, That Scotland is the place, where, from local circumstances, these troops should be raised: that as he could not agree to either of these three propositions, he should certainly combat every stage of the bill; and proceeded to shew the inexpediency of it on those three grounds. He concluded by stating the expence of the proposed corps; the estimate of which for twenty-eight days he stated to be 34,970*l.* and if embodied, the pay for thirteen months would be 104,440*l.* to be paid from a land-tax producing at 4*s.* in the pound, 47,954*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* In answer to some assertions relative to the revenue of Scotland, he begged leave to produce some original papers, by which he stated the gross revenue of that kingdom to be so reduced by mismanagement of every kind, as to produce on the average of ten years, the very inconsiderable sum of 94,945*l.* clear of the barons warrants, drawbacks, and charges of management, of which sum the land paid 47,954*l.* the malt 19,280*l.* the customs and excise 13,555*l.* the stamps, seizures, crown rents and other articles, 14,156*l.* He next stated the demands even on this trifling sum, before it could be remitted to the Exchequer, for the roads, fortifications, ordnance, staff and military establishment, all which were expences immediately incurred for that kingdom. He assured the House, that so far from undervaluing the Scotch revenue, he had, in many instances, even over-charged it, by taking it at the period at which it was the highest, and stating the land-tax, (which was the principal article) at 4*s.* in the pound. He concluded by calling on the justice, the honour, and the generosity of that kingdom, to consent to a proposition which would not draw one shilling from their country, and which (if the bill were to pass) would make the measure less obnoxious, and less invidious to England. He moved, That it be an instruction to the committee, that they do make provision in the said bill, for directing and enabling the commissioners to be named under the said bill, to raise and levy on their respective counties or places, such sums as shall be sufficient to defray the expences of the militia to be raised within the same, such cess or levy to be made in the same proportion as the land-tax has usually been levied in such county or place.

Right honourable T. Townshend seconded the motion. He said, the words of the motion contained almost every thing necessary to convince every person who had considered the subject. If Scotland is to be put on a footing with England, in respect of constitutional defence, why not take the institution with all its consequences of pay, as well as establishment? The English surely would deserve to be both pitied and condemned, should they be such dupes to consent to so monstrous and unreasonable a proposition.

Sir Adam Ferguson insisted, that Scotland had as good a right to have her militia paid out of the taxes, as England. That she pays in proportion to all the burdens with this part of the island in every one particular but the land-tax. That the duties, customs, and excises collected within Scotland, do not exhibit a true state of what that country really contributes. That great quantities of goods are taken by Scotland, and the duties paid by it, though they are collected here; the Scotch being the consumers. He instanced the articles particularly which are imported into this metropolis from the East-Indies; besides several other commodities, such as groceries, cottons, &c. On these accounts, as well as that a very considerable share of the whole landed property of that country was spent in this, he was astonished how any man could seriously propose to tax them locally, for the purpose of paying their own militia, when they had for so many years contributed towards the payment of the militia in this part of the kingdom, though partially deprived of such an establishment themselves.

Right honourable Sir Gilbert Elliot expressed his astonishment that gentlemen should think of making their militia a provincial affair; it was not intended a partial benefit to a particular part of this island, but as a plan of general utility, and a means of security to the nation at large. He agreed to the honourable gentleman's [Mr. Grenville] account of the Scotch revenue; but contended, that great sums were spent in England by Scotch gentlemen, whom he would call resident absentees, and by persons who resorted to London for amusement or on business. He observed, that great stress had been laid on the circumstance that Scotland did not contribute proportionably to the land-tax with England; for his part he had no objection to the removing that impediment, nor did he doubt, if an equal land-tax took place throughout every part of the united kingdom, that Scotland, instead of being a loser by such a regulation, would be a very considerable gainer.

Mr. Townshend replied, that the arguments of the right honourable gentleman, proved too much, or proved nothing; they proved that Ireland and America were taxed, because they purchased certain commodities in this country, nay, that every foreign nation in Europe, contributed to our burthens, because they are the consumers of some of our manufactures. In point of absentees and residents, the same argument held good; for he knew no part of the dominions of the British crown from which there were no persons constantly residing in London and other parts of England. He went further; he contended, that he did not know a county in England that might not urge the same plea with equal weight and plausibility. We pay duties, for we are the consumers. Our gentlemen of landed property are absent for nearly six months in the year; the produce of their estates is spent in Middlesex, therefore as we do not pay any thing like a proportionable share of the land-tax, give us a militia, but do not oblige us to contribute to its support. He then spoke to the propriety of the measure, independent of its equity. He insisted, that the militia would be better exercised, better disciplined, and in every respect more properly regulated, by making the tax local, as it would be a controul on the spot, and would thereby prevent those abuses which pass by unnoticed, when the support was to be drawn out of a general fund, in which no body of men could claim a distinct property. He spoke of the Highland independent companies, and observed what little service they were of; for at one time, when general Wade received them, they were found to be deficient at least one half, on which he reprimanded Lord Lovat, and complained to his Lordship by message, how very incomplete his corps in particular happened to be; to which Lovat replied, That signifies very little, I can have 1200 men to turn out upon any service, whenever I please.

Lord North against the motion. He said he never entertained an idea that a local tax would be proposed instead of a national one. He was of opinion that the proposed national establishment would be an additional safeguard and security to the united kingdom, and as such should be taken up and supported on the most liberal ground, and would answer every beneficial and salutary purpose of the English militia.

Mr. Vyner said, he was much puzzled before he came down, how to conduct himself, or whether to vote for or against the bill, and confessed his obligations to the honourable gentleman who framed the motion, for steering clear of the objection, which presented itself on either hand, that of rejecting the bill entirely, or agreeing to it upon terms that no man in his senses could possibly submit to or accept.

Sir Walter Blacket and Mr. Tuffnel spoke likewise in support of the motion.

The House divided; for the motion 54, against it 57.

The House went into the committee on the bill, and a clause being offered, that the eldest son of a peer should be qualified to serve as an officer, without what is in other instances deemed a legal qualification, this produced a debate, and the committee divided, ayes 41, noes 38. The main argument urged in favour of the clause was, that if it should be rejected, it would at once decide the fate of the bill, it would be the occasion of throwing it out in the House of Lords. The committee adjourned till to-morrow.

March 15.] Committee on the Scotch militia bill. Some of the clauses produced a debate, particularly respecting the number of men, the clause relating to substitutes, and in relation to qualifications. At length it was agreed to let the bill go through the committee, to report it immediately, and to take it into consideration on the 20th, previous to any motion for ordering it to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill for better supplying marines, to serve on board his Majesty's ships of war, and for the more speedy supply of seamen to serve on board trading vessels, was read a second time, and committed.

Adjourned to March 18.

March 18.] Mr. D Hartley pressed the necessity of laying before the House the real expence of the navy. He said, the accounts produced by way of estimate, seldom contained above two thirds of the expence; that under the title of the navy debt, and services not provided for, and of navy extraordinaries, a custom had been by degrees introduced, which gave ministers an absolute and unlimited possession and command over the public purse. The present was a season, he insisted, when parliament ought to take double care that this ministerial licence was not abused, as immense sums might be expended in this way, entirely unknown, and without the participation of the House. He was aware how inefficacious any application of this kind would prove, if the noble Lord on the opposite (the treasury) bench should think proper to set his face against it. He therefore exhorted his Lordship to bring forward an account of the expenditure of last year, for he assured him that it was a matter his Lordship's honour, and the credit of his administration, were equally concerned in. He said, that the transport service must have amounted to a very considerable sum, in the course of the last year, that no account of that particular service had yet been produced, that he intended to move for that, and an account of the navy debt; but he was convinced, that little purpose it would answer to frame any motion, should the noble Lord as usual seem averse to it.

Lord North said, it was not the wish of administration to conceal any thing from the House, nor was it in their power, were they desirous of so doing. As to incurring expences, the exact amount of which could not be ascertained at the time; it was the constant usage of office at all times, and was not peculiar to the present administration. It arose from the nature of the service: for how was it possible to state what the extraordinaries in any given year would amount to, till they were first known? They might be more, they might be less; and as to the power vested in administration he could see no possible abuse that could be made of it. It was impossible that the money expended could be known to Parliament at the very time it was issuing, nor the exact amount of the debt incurred, but still the House retained the efficient controul; for if the debt was improperly incurred in the first instance, or if there appeared any abuse or malversation when the accounts came to be inspected, those who had abused the trust necessarily reposed in them, were liable to be severely punished, and to suffer under the displeasure of that House. His Lordship added, that for his part he had no objection to give the honourable gentleman every information he desired; but he believed that several of the accounts were not yet closed or complete; such as were, he was very ready to comply with the honourable gentleman's requisition.

Mr. Hartley then moved, that an account of navy, victualling, and transport bills, that were made out on or before the 29th of February, 1776, be laid before this House. And that an account of the increase of the debt of the navy, between the 31st of December, 1774, and the 31st of December, 1775, be laid before this House; together with the specification of the respective services for which said debt was incurred, incurred, as far as the same can be made up; which was accordingly done.

March 19.] Hindon incapacitating bill.

March 20.] Order of the day to take into consideration the report of the Scotch militia bill.

Right honourable T. Townshend moved to put it off to this day four months. He said, it was to the last degree unreasonable to expect that England should bear the expence of a land-tax in so monstrous a disproportion, and it was an attempt of the first impression to add to this inequitable mode of raising that tax, the burden of paying their militia. If Scotland wants a militia, in God's name let her have it, but let her pay for it. If she shuns the expence, either by way of a county rate, or contributing proportionably with this part of the united kingdom, to the very tax which is particularly appropriated to defraying the charge of the militia, what is that but in other words telling us, we want such an establishment, but we have the modesty to expect that you will agree to be at the expence?

Mr. Bowys seconded the motion, and observed, that North Britain does not pay above the one-fortieth part of the land-tax, though the value of the lands is about $\frac{1}{3}$ -sixth. The present bill, he observed, kept the last proportion in view, but made no provision for the maintenance and support of the militia. Scotland should have the option of contributing her full share to the land-tax, and to have a militia according to that proportion, or of paying the militia by a local tax. If she refused to consent to either of those propositions, he trusted there was not one Englishman in that House, who could so far forget the duty he owed to his constituents, or the interests and honour of his country, as to vote for the bill; or if any such could be found, he trusted he would find himself in a majority.

Lord Mountstuart, who brought in the bill, supported it. He said, a national militia was the great constitutional bulwark of this kingdom, and why exclude any part of the united kingdom from contributing to the general security? He observed, that the people of England were trained to the use of arms, while Scotland was left weak and defenceless; that the land-tax was no fair criterion of what Scotland really contributed towards the common support, for her consumption of commodities, which paid duties here, was very considerable, and one half of the produce of the lands of that country, he believed, was expended in this. As a proof of the weakness of government there, he said a smuggling cutter with a few guns and twenty men, had last year come into the Firth of Forth, and landed her cargo in the middle of the day; that the excise officers applied for a serjeant and twelve men, but none were to be had, but such as were at so great a distance, that the smugglers had time to dispose of their cargo, and to retire unmolested, before the detachment arrived.

Sir Philip Jennings Clerke against the bill; said he could not imagine, however confident of their great power and influence the Scotch nation might be, how they could possibly expect, that besides the paying their land-tax for them, we should likewise be at the expence of paying their militia.

Mr. W. H. Hartley declared his disapprobation of the bill. He insisted the whole matter lay within a narrow compass. Is Scotland willing to support her own militia by a local tax, or by contributing proportionably to the land-tax; or is she not? If she be, I see no reason why she should be debarred that privilege. If she be not, I take it, she is not really in earnest, or she thinks that England is as forgetful of her own honour as she is blind to her interests, by even listening to such a proposition.

Mr. Turner replied to some of the arguments used by Lord Mountstuart, particularly as a militia might prevent smuggling; said he lived near the sea, and had always observed that the militia were the greatest smugglers in the whole country, except another description of men the noble lord mentioned, the custom-house officers, and such as they secretly permitted, who were sharers in the profits.

Mr. Stanhope against the bill; he condemned it throughout. He spoke of the expence, and the poverty of the nation, of the complexion of the bill, and the unconstitutional power it would put into the king's hands, of disarming the militia at his pleasure, perhaps when their aid was most wanted. Is it possible that the noble lord on the treasury-bench can come into this house, and give this bill his countenance and support, by which such an expence is to be incurred, and at the same time, assure his Majesty that we could not pay a civil list debt of 500,000l.? Or does his lordship think that the clause where the three guineas per man may be given, will recruit the army, and save the trouble and expence of sending a body of foreign mercenaries to America, to cut the throats of our fellow-subjects in that country? He then enumerated several of the expences incurred last year, and predicted that we must either lay on new taxes, or submit to pay a premium of 50 per cent. on our contracts, to the whole tribe of money jobbers, contractors, &c.

The Lord Mayor [Mr. Sawbridge] condemned militias in general. He said they could be no longer deemed a constitutional defence, under the immediate controul and direction of the people; for by the bill passed before Christmas, they were rendered a standing army to all intents and purposes whatever, as much as the body of men which passed under that name; the king having it in his power to call them out on the most frivolous occasions, and when they were embodied, of employing them in any service, and for what purpose he pleased. He said he knew many of the gentlemen of Scotland, who were as warm assertors of freedom as any in that house; but the body of the people were in general tainted with notions of despotism; their laws and education inclined them that way; he should therefore be unwilling to trust them with such an establishment; for when they once got arms in their hands, their dispositions uniting with their interests, might render them fit instruments in the hand of a treacherous, tyrannic and unprincipled administration. He instanced this in the spirit shewn in the addresses which came from that country, where, though they they did not say that they were ready to cut the throats of every man in America, they hinted pretty roundly that they were ready and willing, whenever his Majesty thought proper, to cut the throats of their fellow-subjects at home. He observed likewise, that the exception he made in favour of individuals, did not contradict his general assertions, for there were worthy valuable men in the most despotic countries; and that he believed more addresses were presented from Scotland, than there were towns, villages, and hamlets in the whole kingdom.

Lord North supported the bill on the ground of constitutional defence. He said he could not agree in the construction put by the honourable magistrate on the Scotch addresses. He had read them, and, for his part, he could see nothing contained in them which would admit of such an interpretation. He imagined the honourable gentleman read and run, or otherwise he could not have possibly hit on such a construction as that they offered to cut the throats of their fellow-subjects, either at home or in America.

The House divided; for Mr. Townshend's motion 112, against it, 95. So the bill was lost.

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonists, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. (Continued from p. 635.)

SINCE the late miscarriage at Sullivan's Island, in South-Carolina, no advices have been published by authority respecting the proceedings of our Commanders in Chief in America. But the public papers have not been the less sparing of their private intelligence on that account; among which, though innumerable falsehoods have been propagated, yet some truths have occasionally circulated, which we shall not be wanting in our endeavours to select.

Letters, seemingly authentic, inform, that the 4th of July was set apart, throughout the Colonies, by order of the American Congress, as a day of fasting and prayer, preparatory to their dedicating their country to God. This is the more probable, as they have all along prefaced their operations with an appeal to the Divine Being; but the account of the ceremony of laying a Crown on the Bible, and dividing it into 13 parts, wants confirmation.

The report that Silas Deane, a gentleman of considerable property in Connecticut, with other gentlemen, are now in France, on a scheme of negotiation, is probably true; but it may be presumed that the business of their negotiation reaches no higher than a contract to supply the Farmers-General of that kingdom with tobacco, provided they (the Farmers) can obtain permission from their court for the Americans to import it.

As a confirmation of this fact, and, at the same time, as a proof of their success, two ships have actually sailed from the Colonies, laden with tobacco, for France, for the interception of which Admiral Shuldham dispatched the Boreas frigate, but, it is believed, too late to overtake them.

The Provincial army under Brigadier-General

Arnold have abandoned their post on the Isle of Noix, on Lake Champlain, and are throwing up intrenchments, and fortifying Crown-Point, in which they are assisted by a German engineer, whose name, however, we are yet to learn.

The death of Lieut.-Col. Gordon, who is said to have been shot by the Provincials in the neighbourhood of Chamblé, remains at present a mystery. He could not be shot by the Provincials in that neighbourhood, as our troops have long been in possession of that fort and all the adjacent country; but he may have been shot by them in reconnoitring some of their outposts.

The Provincial Congress of Virginia have issued a proclamation requiring all persons of property who have fled from that colony, to return within a limited time, under pain of sequestration; and Patrick Henry, Esq; a proscribed rebel*, has been chosen Governor.

The following are the appointments under the new plan of government.

GOD save the Commonwealth!

On Wednesday last, the declaration of independence was read at the head of each brigade of the Continental army, posted at and near New York, and every where received with loud huzzas, and the utmost demonstrations of joy.

Trenton, (New Jersey), July 8. The declaration of independence was proclaimed here, together with the constitution of the colony, of late established, and the resolve of the Provincial Congress, for continuing the administration of justice during the interim.

Princetown, New Jersey, July 10.

"Last night Nassau Hall was grandly illuminated, and Independency proclaimed under a triple volley of musquetry, and universal acclamations for the prosperity of the United Colonies. The ceremony was conducted with the greatest decorum."

That the General Congress have established a regular Post throughout the thirteen United Provinces, there is no reason to doubt; nor that Philadelphia, on account of its situation, is made choice of as the seat of the central office for the conduct of the whole, the profits resulting from that office being appropriated without deduction to the uses of the common cause.

It may, perhaps, be of use to many individuals to be informed of some particulars which

N O T E.

* See Lord Dunmore's Proclamation, in which he is excepted.

are unquestionably true; among others, that at a place called the Narrows, on Piscataqua river, there are two forts lately built, each mounting 14 guns, nine and twelve pounders; that there is a boom and chain fixed slantways from shore to shore, on which if a ship strikes, she sheers on the rocks, and must infallibly be lost; and that by the inhabitants of Piscataqua town a number of privateers have been fitted out, mounting from 8 to 16 guns, some of which are already at sea; that the small harbours of Salem and Marblehead are well fortified; and that Boston is now so surrounded with works, that the town is rendered impracticable by sea till the lines are first of all forced by land.

It is true, that even in New-Jersey, where the opposition was thought less violent than in any other province, the inhabitants have at length seized their Governor, and put him under confinement.

That Governor Eden has been forced from his government of Maryland; and that Lord Dunmore, after subjecting himself and his followers to great hardships by water when he had lost his authority on shore, has at length been driven from that asylum, are facts that are to be lamented, as by the immoderate zeal of this latter gentleman, the friends of government, as well as its enemies, have been irreparable sufferers †.

The rapid progress that attended the relief of Quebec has all at once been checked by difficulties that were, or might have been, foreseen. The vessels that were framed here, and carried with the troops to convey them through the Rapids, were found utterly unfit for the purpose for which they were designed.

Other vessels were to be built upon the spot, and carpenters were wanting to perform the work. Three hundred were required from hence, and one half of that number, it is said, were sent. Is it to be wondered, then, that we hear of nothing undertaken in that quarter, when it is known that the vessels proper to navigate the lakes, and to encounter those of the Provincials, already triumphantly riding there, are yet to be dragged 12 miles by land before they can be launched? Were it as easy to execute measures in the field as it is to plan them in the cabinet, America must have been subdued without a blow; but hard is that brave man's case who must either put all to the hazard to preserve his character, or risque his fame by the preservation of his men. Had a late brave officer declined the attack, when he perceived it hopeless, what would have been said of his courage! Would not the case of Byng have been recalled to the memory of every ablehouse politician? Now that he fought (may not we say desperately!), and sacrificed half his men, why did he not seize the fort, when it was abandoned, is the common cry? Why, when his men were dead, or dying, did he not fetch them to life to perform that service?

N O T E.

† By his offering freedom to the slaves who should lift under the banner of Government, all indiscriminately repaired to the Royal Standard, and out of 1300, it is said, not above 80 are now alive.

But why did not the General act in concert? No doubt, for a very good reason, because he found it impracticable, and was unwilling to make a similar sacrifice.

From the bare recital of these facts the reader will feel for the gallant men who have bled and are bleeding in this unnatural business.

Every thing at present wears a gloomy appearance; and should the summer be suffered to elapse without a change of circumstances, little good can be expected from a winter's campaign in that country, where the severity of the weather, and the want of the comforts of necessary refreshment, will cut off more men than the destroying sword.

But much is yet to be expected from the formidable force of Gen. Howe, when aided by the fleet commanded by his brother! Be it so; yet the undertaking is confessedly desperate, and consequently the success doubtful; and should it miscarry, what a carnage! what confusion! what consternation will it not spread, not among the troops only, the immediate sufferers, but through the whole extent of this insatuated nation! What exultation to our enemies abroad, and what humiliation to our friends! In this critical moment of national danger, when our All is at hazard, is it criminal to utter the word reconciliation? Must he be marked as an enemy to his Sovereign, and his country, who wishes to unite the hearts and affections of a brave and loyal people in one common cause! RECONCILIATION! How is that to be effected? The answer is (negatively), Not by the sword, for that will never effect it. The people who have been represented without courage, without discipline, without experience, without commanders, without engineers, and without the means of defence, have, upon trial, been found possessed of all these advantages. The country that was to have been ransacked from one end to the other with 5000 veterans, is already hardly accessible in any part to 50,000 of the best troops the world can produce, headed by Generals, who should they fall, where are their equals to supply their loss? Where then is the hope of reduction by force? But the dignity of the nation! — Has not that suffered already? and will it suffer less by entering into a treaty before a battle than after a defeat? May we not frankly shake hands now we are in full vigour, with as much dignity as when both parties are reduced to the last gasp? We have tried the metal of the Americans, and have found it sterling; Does that lessen the dignity of the Imperial Crown of Great-Britain? Is it not the glory of a Monarch to rule over subjects equally brave in every part of the globe? And is it not his true interest to cherish that congenial spirit by which he is firmly established on his throne, and enabled to give law to his most formidable foreign enemies? But of this enough, perhaps too much. Let us turn our eyes to another part of the Western world, and at least commiserate, if we cannot relieve, their distress.

The Assembly of Barbadoes have pathetically described it in a second Address to the King, in which they represent the difficulty with which which their numerous poor white inhabitants support themselves and families; and withal the hardships of many of the proprietors of plantations, more especially in those parts of the island that have always depended upon the grain of North-America for their subsistence, to keep their slaves from perishing for want of the accustomed food; and conclude in the following words: "Your Majesty's unfortunate subjects are still left to the uncertain scanty supplies that have been for some time past imported into the island; and as the prices of these, especially in the essential article of food for our slaves, still keeps rising upon us, we are also left with little or no hope of any more plentiful resource, but on the contrary have every cause to fear a most intolerable scarcity. Under these afflicting circumstances, then, too awful in their nature for us to dissemble with; for us, indeed, on whom your Majesty has conferred the honour of that endearing appellation of good subjects; an honour which we have had the happiness to attain, so shall it be our highest ambition to preserve; we look up, even upon the ground of this most gracious condescension, with a renewed confidence to your Majesty, for some speedy and effectual interposition in our favour; humbly beseeching your Majesty, the father of your people, to avert those evils which hang over us; and which, in their least formidable appearance, threaten us with the ruin of our private fortunes; but when reflected upon thro' all their horrible, and not unnatural consequences, denounce no less than the destruction of our colony."

POSTSCRIPT.

By the latest advices (authenticated by the General Congress), a flag from Lord Howe was met by the Adjutant-General of the army at New-York, on the 14th of July; but as the letter which was presented was directed for George Washington, Esq; the Adjutant could not receive it. The Congress afterwards, on the 19th, resolved, that General Washington, in refusing to receive said letter, acted with a dignity becoming his station; and directed, that no letter or message should be received from the enemy, by any of their Commanders, but such as are addressed to them in the characters they respectively sustain*.

N O T E.

* We have only to remark on this intelligence, that, as Lord Howe joined the army so long ago as the 13th of July, and his letters were rejected on the 14th; that, as nothing had been attempted on the 12th of August, nor any preparations for an attack on the 14th, so that a whole month had elapsed without action, Lord Howe in that time must have sent dispatches for fresh instructions; which instructions cannot yet have reached him; and till they do, there is no reason to believe that he will sacrifice the lives of gallant men wantonly. Add to this, that about the middle of August last a report prevailed that some disagreeable news had been received from Lord Howe, which though contradicted, expresses were soon after sent to Portsmouth, Plymouth, &c. with orders for the men of war and all the transports to sail immediately; and that about the latter end of October, 1776.

The Congress resolved, likewise, That the circular letters to the late Governors, and the Declarations they inclosed from Lord Howe, sent by a flag to Amboy, and forwarded to the Congress by General Washington, be published in the several Gazettes throughout the Provinces, that the good people of the Provinces may be informed of what nature are the Commissioners, and what the terms, with the expectation of which the Court of Great-Britain has endeavoured to amuse and disarm them; and that the few who still remain suspended by a hope founded either on the justice or moderation of a Great Person, may now at length be convinced, that the valour alone of their country is to save its liberties.

Lord Howe's letter, alluded to above, is dated on board the Eagle, off the coast of Massachusetts, June 20, and informs the respective Governors of his arrival, and of the powers with which himself, in conjunction with the General his brother, are invested, requesting, at the same time, their assistance in every measure for the speedy and effectual restoration of the public tranquillity, and inclosing a Declaration, to be by them promulgated, in such manner, and at such places, as will render the same of the most public notoriety.

This Declaration, after reciting the several clauses of the late act to prohibit all trade, &c. with the Colonies, which authorizes Commissioners appointed by his Majesty to grant pardons, &c. goes on to state the manner and form of his Lordship's nomination, and that of his brother, to be his Majesty's Commissioner and Commissioners, for granting their free and general pardon to all those who, in the tumult and disaster of the times, may have deviated from their just allegiance, and who are willing, by a speedy return to their duty, to reap the benefits of the Royal favour; and also for declaring, in his Majesty's name, any colony, province, county, town, port, district, or place, to be at the peace of his Majesty: I do therefore, says his Lordship, declare, that due consideration shall be had to the meritorious services of all persons who shall aid and assist in restoring the public tranquillity in the said Colonies, or in any part or parts thereof; that pardons shall be granted, dutiful representations received, and every suitable encouragement given, for promoting such measures as shall be conducive to the establishment of legal government and peace, in pursuance of his Majesty's most gracious purposes aforesaid.

August some fresh dispatches were sent to Plymouth from Lord Geo. Germaine's office, to be forwarded to Gen. Howe, Lloyd's-Evening-Post confirms.

An authentic Journal of Occurrences which happened within the Circle of Major Meigs's Observations, in the Detachment commanded by Col. (now General) Benedict Arnold, consisting of two Battalions which were detached from the Provincial Army at Cambridge against Quebec. By the Major.

The Field Officers Names, of the Battalions.

Col. Christopher Green, Col. Roger Enos, Major Return Jonathan Meigs, Major Timothy Bigelow.

SEPT. 9, 1775. I marched from Roxbury (where I had been stationed during the summer) to Cambridge.

10, 11, 12. At Cambridge preparing for our march.—13th in the evening marched to Mytlick—and the 14th, continued our march, through the towns of Malden, Lypen, and Salem, and encamped at Danvers.

15. In the morning continued our march thro' the towns of Beverly, and Wenham, and encamped at Royley.

16. In the morning we continued our march; at 10 A. M. arrived at Newbury Port, and there encamped.

17. Being Sunday, attended divine service at the Rev. Mr. Parsons's meeting at Newbury Port, dined at Mr. Nathaniel Tracey's. Weather fine.

18. Preparing to embark, dined at Mr. Dalton's. W. E. fine.

19. Embarked our whole detachment, consisting of 10 companies of musket men and 3 companies of rifle-men amounting to 1100 men, on aboard 10 transports—I went on board the sloop Britannia. The fleet sailed at 10 A. M. came out of the harbour and lay to, till 1 o'clock P. M. when we received orders to sail for the River Kenebec, 50 leagues from Newbury Port.

Received with our sailing orders the following signals, viz.

1st signal, for speaking with the whole fleet. Ensign at the main-top-mast head.

2d signal, for chasing a sail. Ensign at the fore-top-mast head.

3d signal, for heaving to. The lantern at the main-top-mast head, and 2 guns, if head on shore; and 3 if off shore.

4th signal, for making sail in the night. The lantern at the main-top-mast head and 4 guns—In the day, jack at the fore-top-mast head.

5th signal, for dispersing and every vessel making the nearest harbour. Ensign at the main-peak.

6th signal, for boarding any vessel. A jack at the main-top-mast-head and the whole fleet draw up in a line, as near as possible. The weather was fair, and very fresh, but I was very sea-sick.

20. In the morning we made the mouth of Kenebec, right a-head, which we soon entered. The mouth of the river is narrow. We were hailed from the shore by a number of men under arms who were there stationed; they were answered "we were Continental troops, and that we wanted a pilot," whom they immediately sent on board. The wind and tide favoured us as we proceeded up the river. Five miles from the mouth lies an island called Poussack; upon this were a meeting-house, and some very good dwelling houses; the river to this island is very unequal, and the shores generally rocky. Ten miles from the mouth are elegant buildings, at a place called George Town; 20 miles from the mouth, is a very large bay, called Merry Meeting Bay; 25 miles from the mouth is Swan Island; and a little above this island opposite to Pownalborough, where is a block house, we came to an anchor. I cannot help remarking our dispatch, that this day makes 14 only since the orders were first given for building 200 batteaux, for collecting provisions, and for levying 1100 men and conducting them to this place (Gardiner's Town).

21. All day at Gardiner's Town. W. E. fine.

22. Embarked on board the batteaux—proceeded up the river—and towards evening I put up at the house of Mr. North, and was very agreeably entertained.

23. In the morning proceeded up the river about six miles to Port Western where an unhappy incident fell out in the evening; a number of soldiers being in a private house, some words produced a quarrel, and Mr. Connick being turned out, immediately discharged his gun into the house, and shot a man through the body, of which he soon expired. Mr. Connick was tried by a court Martial and received sentence of death, but denied the crime till he was brought to the place of execution, when he confessed himself guilty, but for some reasons he was reprieved until the pleasure of General Washington could be known.

24. At Fort Western preparing for our march to Quebec; this fort stands on the east side of the river Kenebec, and consists of two block-houses, and a large house 100 feet* long, which were inclosed with pickets; this house is the property of — Howard, Esq; where we were exceedingly well entertained.

25. Some men embarked in batteaux with orders to proceed with all expedition to the great carrying place, and clear the road, while the other division came up.

26. Col. Green embarked on board the batteaux three companies of musket men, with whom went Major Bigelow on their tour to Canada.

27. At three o'clock P. M. I embarked on board some batteaux with the third division of the army, consisting of four companies of musket-men with 45 days provisions, and proceeded up the river, hoping for the protection of a kind providence. We encamped in the evening 4 miles from Fort Western.

I had forgot to mention that the navigation for vessels is good to Fort Western, which is 30 miles from the river's mouth; the water some part of the way rapid.

28. Proceeded up the river, the stream very rapid, and the bottom and shores rocky.

29. In the morning continued our route up the river; at 11, A. M. arrived at Fort Hallifax, which stands on a point of land between the river Kenebec and the river Sebastecook. This Fort consists of two large block-houses, and a large barrack which is inclosed with a picket fort. I tarried half an hour at the fort, then crossed the river to a carrying place which is 97 rods carriage, then proceeded up the river (which falls very rapidly over a rocky bottom) 5 miles, and encamped. The above falls are called Toconck.

30. Proceeded up the river 9 miles and encamped; camped; the land we passed this day was generally very good. Colonel Arnold joined at night and encamped with us.

O&T. 1. Fine W. E. Woods abound in these parts with butternut, beach, hemlock, white pine, red cedar, &c.

2. In the morning proceeded up the river—at 10 o'clock, arrived at Schohegin falls, where is a carrying place of 250 paces, which lies across a small island in the river. Here I waited for my division to come up, and encamped on the west side the river opposite the island with Capt. Goodrick. Had much rain in the night; I turned out, put on my clothes, lay down again, and slept well till morning. Our course in general from the mouth of the river to this place has been from North to North East.

3. Proceeded up the river to Norridgewalk; on my way I called at a house where I saw a child 14 months old, which is the first white child born here. After seven o'clock in the evening a little below Norridgewalk, my bateau filled with water going up the falls; I lost my kettle, butter, and fugar, a loss not to be replaced here. At Norridgewalk is to be seen the vestige of an Indian fort, chapel, and a priest's grave; there appear to have been some entrenchments on the covered way through the bank of the river for the convenience of getting water.—This must have been a considerable seat of the natives, as there are large Indian fields cleared—I here wrote to Mrs. Meigs, &c.

4. I proceeded up the river about 1 mile, and crossed the river at a carrying place of 1 mile and a quarter. Here I came up with a second division commanded by Col. Green.

5. All day at the carrying place; at evening moved one company up the river 1 mile, where they encamped, waiting for the other companies of my division.

6. Still at the carrying place, getting boats and provisions: at 4 P. M. I proceeded up the river 5 miles, and encamped.

7. Continued our march up the river, and at 12 o'clock tarried at Carratoneas carrying place. Here the river is confined between two rocks, not more than 40 rods wide, which lie in piles 40 rods in length on each side the river. These rocks are polished in some places by the swift running of the water. The carrying-place is here 433 paces in length.

8. All day at the carrying-place at Carratoneas; rainy W. E. Capt. Darbern's company passed the carrying place this day at 3 P. M.

9. Capt. Ward's company passed the carrying-place this day at 12 o'clock. At 1 P. M. I left the carrying-place and proceeded up the river about 4 miles and encamped. The stream for 4 miles very rapid, and in some places very shallow, being divided by a number of islands which appear to be fine land: from this encampment some high mountains rise to our view to the Northward.

10. Proceeded up the river, which continues its course N. W. between two high mountains, and encamped at the great carrying-place, which is 12 miles and a half across, including 3 ponds which we were obliged to pass.

11. I crossed the great place as far as the third pond; there I had the pleasure of discovering Lieut. Steel and party, who had been sent forwards on a reconnoitring command as far as Chaudiere pond: they discovered nothing with regard to the enemy. I returned back, and lodged with Col. Green.

12. In the morning repassed the second pond, and went to the river, and gave orders which I received from Col. Arnold for building a block-house, and then returned and crossed the first pond, and encamped this day at the great carrying-place with the 4th division of the army, consisting of three companies of musket-men.

13. Employed in carrying our boats and provisions across the first pond and the second portage. I went myself across the third portage and returned back by the East side of the second portage and encamped with Col. Arnold. The wind so high, the boats could not cross the third pond. About this time we killed 4 moose, which is excellent meat.

14. At 11 o'clock I repassed the first pond to see Capt. Darbern's and Capt. Ward's companies over. Last night a tree blown down by the wind, fell on one of our men and bruised him in such a manner that his life is despaired of. In the evening I returned back to the second portage, and encamped with Capt. Ward.

15. This morning orders were given that the allowance should be $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of pork and $\frac{3}{4}$ of flour per man per diem. At 2 o'clock I crossed the third pond and encamped in a cedar swamp. This pond is about 9 miles in circumference and surrounded with cedar timber. This last pond is much larger than the other two.

16. In the morning I set out with Capt. Hanchet to reconnoitre a very high mountain about ten miles from our encampment, but we were too late in the day, and returned towards evening without being able to ascend the mountain.

17. In the morning I went to the Dead river and took part of Capt. Goodrick's company, and returned to the third pond, where I met with Capt. Ward's company. At evening returned to Dead river; marched one mile up and encamped with Capt. Hanchet.

18. In the morning ordered 3 men to kill 2 oxen (which we had driven with great difficulty to this place) and to bring 5 quarters to the detachment, and to leave 3 quarters under a guard for Col. Enos's division. Then I proceeded up the river with my division with the greatest expedition to Chaudiere, in order there to make up our cartridges, and wait for the rear division, and to furnish a number of pioneers, under Mr. Ayres to clear the carrying-place.

19. Col. Arnold joined us, and Col. Green's division. The land we passed this day was very fine, thinly timbered, and mostly covered with high grass.

20. Proceeded up the river, passed several falls, and one portage only three rods across, and encamped at evening; rainy W. E. all day.

21. In the morning proceeded up the river about three miles to a carrying-place 35 perches across; then continued our route up the river about two miles to a portage 30 perches across, where we encamped.

22. Continued our route up the river about 3 miles:

3 miles: in our way we passed two portages, or carrying-places, each 74 perches. Our course this day is only three miles, owing to the extraordinary rise of the river. The last night in some parts of the river the water rose 8 feet perpendicular, and in many places overflowed its banks and filled the country with water, which made it very difficult for our men on shore, to march.

23. In the morning continued our march, though very slow, owing to the rapidity of the stream. A number of our men who marched on the shore, coursed a river that came in from the westward, mistaking it for the main river, which as soon as we discovered, we dispatched some boats after them. The river now falls fast. Encamped this evening, at a carrying-place 15 perches across. Here a council was held, in which it was resolved that 50 men should march with all dispatch by land to Chaudiere pond; and that the sick of my division, and Capt. Morgan's, should return back to Cambridge.

24. At this place the stream was very rapid: in our way we passed three carrying-places, 2 of them 4 roods each, in passing which 6 bateaux filled and overfet, by which we lost several barrels of provisions, a number of guns, some clothes, and cash.

25. Proceeded up the river, though with great fatigue, the water being very rapid. Our whole course this day was only 4 miles, when we encamped. Wrote to Mrs. Meig's by the officer that returned with the sick.

26. Continued our route up the river about six miles, the stream very rapid.

27. Continued our route, and soon entered a sound about 2 miles across, and passed thro' a narrow streight only two perches and an half wide, and about 4 roods long; then entered another small pond about 1 mile, and then through a narrow straight about a mile and a half over to a third pond 3 miles, then passed through a narrow straight, and entered a fourth pond 2 quarter of a mile wide, and then entered a crooked river about three miles in length to a carrying-place 15 perches across to a pond 100 perches across, and encamped on the North West side upon a high hill which is a carrying-place. The ponds are surrounded with mountains.

28. In the morning continued our route across the carrying-place 44 perches long, to a pond about 2 miles, to a carrying-place 4 miles and 60 perches. This carrying-place lies across the height of land, and is about 2 miles from the last mentioned pond to the height, when all the streams run the reverse of the rivers we came up. We encamped this evening on the height of land.

29. In the morning crossed the heights to Chaudiere river; made a division of our provisions and ammunition, and marched back upon the heights and encamped. Here I distributed the following sums of money, to the following persons; viz. To Col. Green 500 dollars, to Major Bigelow 50; and paid Mr. Gatchel 44—paid Mr. Berry 41. 5s. lawful money.

30. Continued our march by land towards Quebec. At 1 P. M. came to Nepish lake, which we supposed to be Ammeguntick lake: we continued our march till night, and encamped on the banks of the lake, where there had been an Indian camp.

Nov. 1. Marched through the woods 15 miles, and encamped near the North end of Ammeguntick lake.

2. Continued our march through the woods; the marching this day was exceedingly bad. I passed a number of soldiers who had no provisions and were somewhat sick. It was not in my power to help or relieve them. Two dogs were killed, which the distressed soldiers eat with good appetite, even the feet and skin. This day in our march upon the banks of the Chaudiere we saw several boats that were split upon the rocks, and one of Capt. Morgan's men was drowned. The travelling this day, as yesterday, very bad, over mountains and morasses.

3. In the morning continued our march on the banks of the Chaudiere. The marching this day better than we have lately had. The river grows wider and runs very quick, and in some places very shallow. We passed this day several small islands. The weather exceeding fine, and as warm as ever I felt it at this season in New-England.

4. Continued our march on the banks of the Chaudiere: at 12 o'clock we met with provisions, to the inexpressible joy of the soldiers who were near starving. After refreshing ourselves, we marched a few miles and encamped.

5. In the morning continued our march. At 11 o'clock arrived at a French house, and were hospitably used: this is the first house I saw for 31 days, having been all that time in a rough, barren, and uninhabited wilderness, where we never saw a human being except our own men. Immediately after our arrival, we were supplied with fresh beef, fowls, butter, pheasants, and vegetables. This settlement is called Sertigan: it lies 25 leagues from Quebec.

6. Marched down to the parish of St. Mary's; the country thinly settled; the people kindly supplied us with plenty of provisions.

7, 8, 9, 10. I was on business up and down the country on each side the river; the inhabitants very hospitable. Our men that were gone forward to Point Levi, made prisoner Mr. McKenzie, a midshipman of the Hunter sloop of war. This night I lodged at St. Henry's.

11. I marched down to Point Levi, and joined the detachment.

12, 13. I was at Point Levi; nothing extraordinary happened except a deserter came in to us from Quebec, by whom we were informed Col. McClean had arrived from Sorel with his regiment. The Lizard frigate also arrived a few days before us. On the evening of this day at 9 o'clock, we began to embark our men on board 35 canoes. At 4 P. M. we got over and landed 500 men, entirely undiscovered, although two men of war were stationed to prevent us. We landed at the same place Gen. Wolfe did, in a small cove which is now called Wolfe's cove.

Soon after our landing, a barge from the Lizard frigate came rowing up the river: we hailed hailed her, and ordered her to come on shore; they refusing, we fired upon them—they pushed off shore and cried out. After parading our men on the heights of Abraham, and sending out a reconnoitring party towards the city, and placing centinels, we marched across the plain, and took possession of a large house which was formerly owned by Gen. Murray, and other houses adjacent, which were fine accommodations for our troops.

14. This morning employed in placing proper guards on the different roads to cut off the communication between the city and country. At 12 o'clock the enemy surprised one of our advanced centres, and made him prisoner; the guard soon perceived the enemy and pursued, but were not able to overtake them; we rallied the main body, and marched up the heights near the city, gave them three huzzas and marched our men fairly in their view.

It is said Quebec might have been taken had we then made an assault: they did not choose to come out to us, but gave us a few shot from the ramparts, and we then returned to our camp. This afternoon they set fire to the suburbs and burnt several houses. This evening Col. Arnold sent a flag of truce with a demand of the garrison in the name and behalf of the United Colonies—as the flag approached the walls it was fired upon, contrary to all rule and custom on such occasions. We constantly lay on our arms to prevent surprise; for we were informed by a gentleman from Quebec, that we might expect an attack very soon from the city.

15. The commanding officer this day sent into the town a flag concluding that the firing on our flag yesterday was through mistake, but it was treated in the same manner as before; on which it returned. An express went off to Gen. Montgomery this morning. About 12 o'clock we were alarmed with a report, that the troops in town were coming out to attack us. We turned out to meet them, but it proved false.

16. This morning it is reported Montreal surrendered to Gen. Montgomery the last Sabbath, and that the shipping were taken. One of our men, a serjeant in the rifled company, received a shot from a cannon, which shattered one of his legs in such a manner that amputation was necessary. This day we sent a company of our men and took possession of the general hospital; the Canadians are continually coming in, to express their satisfaction at our coming into this country.

17. The serjeant that was wounded yesterday, died this morning with great composure and resignation. This day we had a confirmation of the surrender of Montreal to Gen. Montgomery. A soldier came in to us from Quebec, but no intelligence extraordinary from him. A party of our men went over to Point Levi, with boats to bring a party of our detachment that were left there with provisions. Weather pleasant.

18. We have orders to parade at 3 o'clock to-morrow morning.

* * The length of the Journal obliges us to reserve the remainder for next month; which contains a particular account of the junction of those troops with Gen. Montgomery's, and a very minute account of the operations of the Provincials against Quebec, including the storm of the place, when the General was killed, and the Major taken prisoner.

Character of James I. from various Authors.

OF all the qualities which marked the character of James I. king of England, there was none more contemptible than a pedantic disposition which he had obtained from a narrow though laborious education. Some school learning he had, the fruits of that unwearied application which is often united to mean parts; of that learning he was ridiculously vain. His vanity was much heightened by the flattery he had met with from the minions of his English court. He was eager for an opportunity of displaying it to the whole nation. The opportunity was offered him by a petition from the Puritans, for a reformation of sundry articles of the established church. James gave them hopes of an impartial debate, though he mortally hated all the reformers, for the restraints they had laid upon him in his Scotch government.

In this debate James was to preside as judge, and an assembly of churchmen and ministers met at Hampton Court for this purpose. From judge he turned principal disputant, silencing all opposition by his authority and loquacity, and closed his many arguments with these powerful ones: "That Presbytery agreed as well with monarchy as God with the devil, that he would not have Tom and Dick and Will meet to censure him and his council. If this be all your party hath to say, I will make them conform themselves, or else I will Harrie them out of the land, or else do worse—only hang them, that's all."

Great was the exultation and adulation of churchmen and courtiers on this occasion. Chancellor Egerton cried out, "he had often heard that royalty and priesthood were united, but never saw it verified till now." Archbishop Whitgift carried his flattery still farther, "he verily believed the king spoke by the spirit of God." Macaulay's Hist. of Eng. vol. 1. p. 5, 6.

Niele bishop of Lincoln, and Andrews bishop of Winchester, being at dinner with king James in public, James in this situation had the impudence to propose aloud this question, "whether he might not take his subjects money without consent of parliament?" The sycophant Niele replied, "God forbid you should not, for you are the breath of our nostrils!"

Andrews declined answering the question, saying, "he was not skilled in parliamentary cases." On the king's urging him, he replied pleasantly: I think your majesty has an undoubted right to my brother Niele's money.

Life of Andrews, Bishop of Winchester.

The following is a character drawn of king James by Williams, whence it appears that the servile tools whom James had raised to the highest highest preferments in the state, bestowed the same tribute of absurd flattery to his memory, as they had fed him with during life.

"I dare presume to say, you never read in your life more fully parallel amongst themselves, and distinguished from all other kings, than King James and King Solomon. King Solomon is said to be unigenitus cœramatris sue, the only son of his mother, so was King James; Solomon was of a complexion white and ruddy, so was King James; Solomon was learned above all the princes in the universal world; Solomon was a writer in prose and verse, so in a very pure and exquisite manner was our sweet sovereign King James; Solomon was the greatest patron we ever read of to church and church-men, and yet no greater (let the house of Aaron now confess) than King James—and for his words and eloquence, you know it well enough—it was rare and excellent in the highest degree—Profluente et quæ principem deceret eloquendo; as Tacitus said to Augustus, in a flowing and princely kind of elocution. Those speeches of his in the parliament, star-chamber, council table, and other public audiences of the state (of which, as of Tully's orations; ea semper optima quæ maxima: the longest still was held the best) do prove him to be the most powerful speaker who ever swayed the sceptre of this kingdom."

Russworth, vol. i. p. 160.

As a specimen of the pure and exquisite manner of this sweet sovereign's writing and speaking, I beg leave to lay before the reader a few quotations from his speeches and letters.

In a speech to the Parliament, anno 1610, he informs his subjects, that "the King's heart is in the hand of the Lord, who can create and destroy, make and unmake; so kings can give life and death, judge all and be judged by none. They can exalt low things, and abase high things, making the subjects like men at chess, a pawn to take a bishop or a knight. And, as it is blasphemy to dispute what God may do, so it is sedition in subjects to dispute what kings may do in the height of their power."

Macaulay's Hist. of Eng. vol. i. p. 61.

When the same Parliament had voted him a less sum than was demanded, he thought proper to decline accepting it, for the following judicious reasons: "Nine score thousand pounds, he could not accept, because nine was the number of the poets, who were always beggars; eleven was the number of the apostles when Judas was away, and therefore might best be affected by his Majesty; but there was a mean number, which might accord to both, and that was ten, a sacred number, for so many were God's commandments which tend to virtue and edification." Winwood's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 193.

To illustrate his princely elegance in his literary correspondence, take the following example from a letter to the Duke of Buckingham—"If thou be with me by four in the afternoon, it will be good time; and prepare thee to be a guard to me from keeping my heart unbroken he would find his English subjects like asses, on whom he might lay any burthen, and would need neither bit nor bridle, but their asses ears."

with business, before my going to the progress. And thus God send me a happy and joyful meeting with my sweet Stenny, this evening. Sweet-heart, when thou risest keep thee from importunities of people who trouble thy mind, that at meeting I may see thy white teeth shine upon me." MSS. in the British Museum, n. 6987.

But the stile of the queen was somewhat more extraordinary, and in an age and place where flattery was the most current coin, undoubtedly infected the whole court.

Queen ANN to King JAMES.

"I am glad that our brother's* horse does please you, and that my dog Stennie† does well; for I did command him that he should make your ears hang like a sow's lug, and when he comes home I will treat him better than any other dog."

Queen ANN to Viscount VILLARS.

"You do well in tugging the sow's § ear, and I thank you for it, and would have you do so still, upon condition you continue a watchful dog to him, and be always true to him."

MSS. British Museum, fol. 6986.

A fine courtly stile truly!

The following passages from the Bishop of Downe's sermon, and a letter from General Digby to the Marquis of Ormond, shew the impious nonfence as well as flattery that was preached and propagated after the death of King Charles I.

"The person now murdered, says the Bishop, was not the Lord of Glory, but a glorious Lord, Christ's own vicar, his lieutenant and vicegerent here on earth." One would imagine he was speaking of his Holiness of Rome. "Albeit he was an inferior to Christ as man is to God, yet was his privilege of inviolability far more clear than was Christ's; for Christ was not a temporal prince, his kingdom was not of this world, and therefore when he vouchsafed to come into this world, and to become the son of man, he did subject himself to the law; but our gracious sovereign was well known to be a temporal prince, a free monarch, to whom they did all owe and had sworn allegiance. The Parliament is the great council, and hath acted all and more against their lord and sovereign, than the other did against Christ. The proceedings against our sovereign were more illegal, and in many things more cruel."

"From the creation of the world," says General Digby, "to the accursed day of this damnable murder, nothing parallel to it was ever heard of. Even the crucifying our blessed Saviour, if we consider him only in human nature, did nothing equal this."

An Account of some curious Popish Relics.

THERE can be nothing more serviceable to a state than true, there cannot be any thing more destructive to the morals of a people, than false religion. The man who is devoid of the principles of grateful piety, is a stranger to heart-felt satisfaction. We all seem to be agreed in this principle; but, most of us differ as to the essentiality of this or that mode which constitutes the true religion.

Persons of condition are too polished in their manners, too refined in their sentiments, not to be shocked with the ribaldry, vulgarism and non-sense, with which too many of our pulpits abound. Yet, it is the people of sense and condition, who give a turn to the national manners. The habits of persons, in elevated stations, are followed implicitly by the middling and lower ranks. Unless religion should prevail among the higher orders, it is a folly to think, that the inferior classes of the people will be captivated with its charms.

Many instances of the enthusiasm of the Romish church, have been exhibited. The fanatic impostors, of that community, have been so numerous; their frauds have been conducted with such barefaced impudence, that to recount the one, or to lay open the other, would require many volumes. What seems the more extraordinary is, that notwithstanding these pious frauds have been again and again detected, they still continue to be practised, in open defiance of detection. There is not an holy relic, which an impudent Monk can exhibit, but what has been demonstrated spurious. Yet relics continue in vogue with the vulgar. All honest Roman Catholics, indeed, see through the cheat: sometimes, there is one good enough to confess the imposition, as the following piece of history will testify.

Michael de Marollas was an abbot of Villain. It so happened, that this good man was present, when the head of St. John the Baptist was shewn as a curious relic to the Princess Mary, at Amiens. The Princess, after surveying the head, kissed it; and, turning to the abbot, she desired him to do the same. The abbot complied; and, whilst he was performing the ceremony, he whispered softly to himself, "That this was only the fifth or sixth head of the Baptist which he had kissed."*

Notwithstanding the feats some of our methodists have performed; notwithstanding that the saints of that order possess a superlative degree of modest assurance; yet, I am inclined to think, they have not half so much interest in heaven, as their brethren of the Romish Church. The latter have performed more miracles; they can produce more authentic vouchers, in proof of their intimacy with the Deity. What signifies a few living witnesses to attest the truth of a doctrine? Give me the holy relics of the dead. The bone of Balaam's ass is a fragment of consequence. The cloak, which St. Paul left at Troas, is of infinitely more moment than a thousand scriptures. Ask you the reason? Take it, concisely, thus: Some very ingenious Christian writers suppose, that the Apostle would never have been so anxious for this cloak, had it not been the very same garment which the prophet Elias let fall when he ascended to heaven.

When the numbers of the faithful, began rather to decrease, and the religion founded by the saints was profanely called in question, certain monks stood forth as champions in the cause. To the utter confusion of scepticism, they worked miracles in so open a manner, that a man must have given up his senses, had he not discerned the hand of heaven in whatever they performed. The waverings of that age were strengthened, but, as all religious founders are anxious for the welfare of future generations, the holy fraternity, with that boldness of assurance which ever accompanies the favourites of heaven, projected a method of settling religion on a firmer basis. They knew, there were many relics scattered over the world. They set out in quest of them. Their artifice insured them success; and their impudence taught them how to make the most of the bargain. I will recite some of their discoveries for the edification of the reader.

I. "In Palestine they found the slippers of Enoch. The only remains of this antediluvian's wardrobe."

II. "The waterpots which were used at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. These are now to be seen at Ravenna and Pisa."

III. "The hem of our Lord's garment, which cured the diseased woman. This, by some accident, travelled from Jerusalem to a Carthusian monastery at Cologne. The ladies of that place send wine to the monks, to have the relic steeped in it, and they drink the wine (if the monks leave any) on every emergent occasion †."

IV. "A lock of the hair of Mary Magdalen, finely preserved. It is to be seen at Oviedo in Spain."

V. "A tear which our Lord shed over Lazarus, an angel gathered it up, put it into a phial, gave it to Mary Magdalen, and the monks found it on Mount Calvary. This tear is now at Vendome in France ‡."

VI. "The seamless coat of our Lord was discovered at a monastery near Paris. The Monks affirm, that his mother made it for him, when he was extremely young. I believe it."

VII. "Several nails § of the cross, possessing most miraculous virtues. They are now deposited in various places ||."

To apostrophize in the phrase of an apostle, "What shall we say to these things?" Believe them we must, or we question the veracity of the religious founders. Besides, numerous nations not only have believed in, but do now rely on, the authenticity of these relics. The monks, who collected them, deserve therefore the thanks of their species. If we question the genuineness of these relics, we shall be still the more in love with that impudence, which could effect such wonders as to prevail on men to lay aside the use of their senses, and believe against the conviction of reason.

Observations on some English Proverbs.

MY Lord Bacon observes, that the genius, wit, and spirit of a nation, are described by their proverbs; such as the noble sublimity of the ancient Greeks and Romans, the gravity of the Spaniards, the sprightliness of the French, and the rugged simplicity of the English. I shall make a few observations on those proverbs, which are either originally English or adopted by our countrymen, and chiefly applied to persons in high life.

"Sail, quoth the king; hold, quoth the wind."

This is a proper admonition to kings, that however great their power may be over their subjects, the wind, seas, and weather will not obey them, let them bluster and threaten as much as they please.

"The king's cheese goes half away in parings."

That is, a great deal of it is squandered away amongst the collectors and other officers of the revenue, in public salaries, and perhaps private embezzlements, unless they are strictly watched and often called to account.

"The king's chaff is worth more than other men's corn."

This signifies that even the little perquisites which attend the king's service, are more considerable than the standing wages of private persons.

"He that eats the king's goose, will be choaked with his feathers."

Though too many princes do not care how much their poor subjects are fleeced, they seldom pardon such injuries, when done to themselves, especially if they happen to be defrauded in that which is their darling passion; and therefore some of our modern ministers, much wiser than their predecessors, instead of touching a bit of their master's goose, have fattened it up for his own table at the people's expence, as well as another for themselves.

"Kings and bears often worry their keepers."

This is a very gross comparison, and I am sorry to find it amongst our English proverbs; though even Solomon, who was a king, as well as the wisest of men, makes use of it. Nay the truth of it is confirmed by a thousand instances in history, and ought to be a warning to all bad ministers and courtiers; some of whom are so sensible of their danger, that they use their masters little better than bears; keeping them almost constantly muzzled and tied up, they grow very tame, and find it for their advantage to lead them about themselves.

"The people's love is the king's lifeguard."

These words contain so plain and excellent a moral, that they stand in need of no comment, and ought to be fixed up in characters of gold, over the gates of every palace.

"It is well said, but who will bell the cat?"

This is a Scottish proverb, and was occasioned, as Mr. Kelly (not Hugh Kelly) informs us, by the following circumstance in history. The nobility of Scotland entered into a combination against one Spence, the favourite of King James the Third. It was proposed to go in a body to Stirling, seize Spence, and hang him; then to offer their service to the king, as his natural counsellors; upon which Lord Gray observed, "It is well said, but who will bell the cat?" Alluding to the fable of the mice, who proposed to put a bell about the cat's neck, that they might be apprised of her coming. The Earl of Angus replied, that he would bell the cat, which he accordingly executed, and was ever afterwards called Archibald Bell-Cat. This furnishes the nobility of all nations with a very good lesson, not to suffer a wicked favourite to domineer over his sovereign, as well as over themselves, and the whole nation, without exerting their authority against him, in the most rigorous manner, according to law.

"A friend at court is worth a penny in the purse."

My author seems to be of opinion, that this saying came into use before the custom of buying commissions, and placing of money, because at present a purse seems to be the only friend at court, without which nothing is to be got there but neglect and empty promises, unless a man hath it in his power to do a great man some notable job.

"As long as you are in the fox's service, you must hold up his tail."

This is a severe sarcasm upon abject tools, and implies that they must submit to any dirty work, which their paymaster shall think fit to impose upon them; such as holding up his tail, or even his strumpet's tail; for if they boggle at any thing, they are sure of being kicked off, and exposed. To such persons therefore I would recommend the following proverb—"Leave the court ere the court leave thee."

"If the devil be vicar, you'll be clerk."

This is spoken of trimmers, turn-coats, and time-servers, who abound too much in all courts, and commonly take the advice of another proverb,

"Never go to the devil with a disclout in your hand."

For he must be a fool, as well as a knave, who sells his soul for a trifle, if he can get any thing considerable by it; and herein consists the only difference between a rogue of state and a poor pickpocket. The former may be thought more honourable, according to court language; but the latter is equally honest, and much more excusable.

"Go back, and fall; go forward, and mar all."

Applied to those who have hemmed themselves in between such difficulties, that they cannot stir either one way or the other. This hath sometimes been the case even of ministers, who have negotiated their country into so untoward a situation, that peace and war are equally dangerous and impracticable.

These proverbs, amongst a thousand more, contain a little compendium or epitome of our natural and political constitution. There is indeed a good deal of satire, and some of it not very delicate, mixed up with them, but such as is founded in good sense, and agreeable to the spirit of a rough and free people.

The Shoulder is fitted to the Burden.

MR. Tempelt passing by one day, a porter resting himself, with his head by him, groaned aloud, and 'wished he had five hundred pounds.' 'Why, (says Tempelt) I will give you five hundred pounds; and now, what will you do with it?' 'Oh, (says the porter) I will soon tell you what I will do with it: First, I will have have a pint of ale, and a toast and nutmeg, every morning for my breakfast." "Well, and what time will you get up?" "Oh, I have been used to be up at five or six o'clock, so I will do that now." "Well, what will you do after breakfast?" "Why, I will fetch a walk till dinner." "And what will you have for dinner?" "Why, I will have a good dinner; I will have good roast and boiled beef, and some carrots and greens—and I will have a full pot every day—and then I will smoke a pipe." "Well, and then perhaps you will take a nap." "May be I may—no, I will not take a nap; I will fetch another walk till supper." "Well, and what will you have for supper?" "Why, I do not know—I will have more beef if I am a hungry; or else I will have a Welsh rabbit and another full pot of beer." "Well, and then?" "Why then I will go to bed, to be sure." "Well, but will not you have a wife too?" "Oh, d—n it, master, I have got one." "Pray how much now may you earn a week by your business?" "Why, master, I can make you eighteen shillings a week." "Why, will you not be tired now, do you think, after a little while, in doing nothing every day?" "Why, I do not know, master; I have been thinking so." "Well then, let me propose a scheme to you." "With all my heart, master." "Why, you can do all this every day as you are, and employ your time into the bargain." "Why, really so I can, master, I think, and so take your good, again, and thank you."

This honest fellow (who was much wiser than Pyrrhus on a like occasion) determined, as I believe would for the most part be done, if people were carefully and unbiassed to weigh on both sides. They would find that Providence was their best friend, in not cursing their short-sighted schemes with compliance; as Jupiter, in that fine fable, did Semele, who saw her wish in one view only, but did not consider that the "bright enflamed embrace," which was only the "glow of divine passion" for a goddess, (which her fond lover tempered as much as possible to her bearing) would scorch up a mortal to a cinder.

S I R,

THE following Jeu d'Esprit was the production of the present Dean of Derry, Dr. Barnard, who advanced in conversation with Sir Joshua Reynolds and other wits, that he thought "no man could improve when he was past the age of forty-five." Johnson (Samuel) who was in company, with his usual Elegance and polished Graces, immediately turned round to the facetious Dean, and told him he was an instance to the contrary, for that there was great room for improvement in him (the Dean) and wisbed he'd set about it; upon which, the Dean the next day sent the following elegant Bagatelle to Sir Joshua Reynolds and the same company: if you think it worth your inserting, I may venture to say it will please many of your readers, among the rest

I Lately thought no man alive,
Could e'er improve past forty-five,
And ventur'd to assert it;
The observation was not new,
But seem'd to me so just and true,
That none cou'd controvert it.
"No, Sir," says Johnson, "'tis not so,
"That's your mistake, and I can show

"I wish you'd set about it."
Encourag'd thus to mend my faults,
I turn'd his counsel in my thoughts,
Which way I shou'd apply it;
Learning and wit seem'd past my reach,
For who can learn when none will teach?
And wit—I cou'd not buy it.
Then come my friends, and try your skill,
You can inform me if you will,

DEAR charming maid, permit an artless swain
 Once more to vow his love, to sigh his pain,
 And, in poetic numbers, to impart
 The genuine dictates of a faithful heart.
 To you, my Fair! are all my thoughts confin'd,
 Thou dearest, loveliest, best of woman-kind;
 Yet thou with unconcern canst hear my sighs,
 And view the tears fast falling from my eyes,
 Without one tender look to heal my grief,
 Or yield my fainting soul the least relief.
 Were but my breast, like mighty Shakespeare's, fraught
 With all his bright sublimity of thought—
 Or were soft Orzoy's melting numbers mine,
 I then might paint thee, as thou art, divine:
 But vain thy poets' feeble art to tell
 The many beauties seen in you so well;
 When in the sprightly dance you glad the scene,
 Thy form majestic, and thy brow serene,
 Can all engage to view thy heavenly charms,
 And fire each youthful breast with fond alarms.
 How blest the youth, who in thy converse shares,
 And hears that sense so far beyond thy years.

Oh could my strain thy icy bosom move
 To bless me with a kind return of love,
 The silent vallies, and the wood-crown'd hills,
 The crystal fountains, and the tinkling rills
 Should echo whilst to thee I'd tune my lyre,
 And Love adds music to the trembling wire.

To Miss H. H——. Written by a young Gentleman who embarked lately for America.

WHEN o'er the wide tempestuous main
 I'm borne,
 Far from my friends, and from my country torn;
 Say, Oh my soul! how shall I bear to leave
 The only blessing which this world can give?
 To what kind friend shall I my pains reveal;
 To whom relate my melancholy tale?
 Alas! no friend my longing eyes will meet,
 But to the woods I must my griefs repeat;
 And while my sighs along the wilds are driv'n,
 Perhaps my love is to another giv'n.
 Be calm, my soul, nor thus my temper try;
 For in that thought doth certain madness lie:
 When parted for a day from her I love,
 My heart almost forgets that it should move:
 In vain do I my former footsteps trace,
 In fruitless search to find my long-lost peace,
 Where happiness and I went hand in hand,
 And ev'ry blessing seem'd at my command.
 But now, alas! those pleasing times are o'er,
 And I am destin'd for a distant shore;
 I now must take a long, a last adieu,
 Altho' I part my soul when parting you:
 Yet think, dear maid, that you are still my care,

And that for you shall be my constant pray'r,
 To make you blest with all that heaven can send,
 Content, and peace, and pleasures without end.

To a young Lady, on her frequently sighing.

AH! whence that sad, that cruel sigh,
 That rends Maria's tender heart;
 That bids each thought of pleasure fly,
 Which else her pretence must impart?
 Can grief within that bosom hide,
 Can sorrow center in that breast
 Where gentleness and love reside,
 Where to recline were—to be blest?
 Thy sighs must ever grief impart,
 Each swelling sigh give sad alarm;

Warsaw, August 28.

THE opening of the general diet of this kingdom took place the day before yesterday, with the usual ceremony. The King, followed by all the members of the senate, his ministers, the nuncios, and a vast number of persons of distinction, went to hear divine service at the cathedral, and then returned to the castle. The two marshals then caused the nuncios to enter, as their names were read by the secretary of the confederacy and diet, and as they were placed at the bottom of the act of confederacy. After the entry of the nuncios, the King, accompanied by the senators and ministers, went to the same hall and ascended the throne; which done, the marshals opened the sitting with analogous speeches, and they then proceeded to the appointment of deputies to put in order the constitutions; after which the sitting was adjourned till next day. Although the sittings were held with the doors shut, it is known that they yesterday read the regulation for the confederacy."

Paris, August 21.] An unhappy affair has happened to M. le Count de V. Knight of the Order of Malta. In 1772 the Count became acquainted with a young man of a noble, but reduced family, whom he appointed his secretary; he also got him admitted into the Gens d'Armes, and sent him afterwards to one of his estates in the Bourbonnois. Nov. 25, 1774, the young gentleman heated himself with sliding on the ice, and the same evening covered his legs with snow, to cure, as he said, his chilblains; he afterwards went to bed, seemingly in health, but was found dead the next day. At the end of ten months the Count's enemies remitted libels to the Attorney General, accusing him of having killed, or caused to be killed, this young man, to avoid the payment of 20,000 livres. In consequence of this, informations have been taken, and the body has been dug up, and examined by surgeons. This affair remains undecided, but the reputation, probity, and goodness of heart of the Count, entirely clear him from the charge.

Dunkirk, August 27.] An advertisement has been published here by the Board of Admiralty, giving notice of two buoys to be floated on the 1st day of October next, over some dangerous shallows and banks, as a warning to vessels sailing into the road of Dunkirk through the East channel; of which the following is a translation: "In consideration of the advantage which the navigation has reaped from the four buoys placed to the West of the road of Dunkirk, according to the general informations given in 1774, which gave notice, that navigators in entering the road through the West passage, would meet with a first black buoy placed on the East point of the bank called the Geere, at the entrance of the road, which they are to leave on the starboard side.

"A second, likewise black, at the point of the bank named Snau or Splinter, opposite to the Great Mardick, which they are also to leave on the starboard side.

"A third, white, at the West point of the Bank Braek, which they are to leave on the starboard side.

"And a fourth, black, at the point of the Plateau of Mardick, that is to say, at the most advanced point of the strand opposite the channel of Mardick, which they are to leave on the starboard side.

"Navigators will therefore observe, that the three black buoys above-mentioned are on the land side, and the white one in the Offing."

It has been resolved by the officers of the Admiralty established for Flanders at Dunkirk aforesaid, with the advice of the deputies of the pilotage, to order two more buoys to be laid at the East passage, to point out its entrance.

"Vessels coming from the North, and intending to enter by the East passage, will find on the North point of the bank, named Trapegeer, or Cam's Bank, a black buoy, which they are to leave on the starboard side.

"And on the East point of the bank named d'Helst, which is a continuation of the Bank Braek, a white buoy, which they are to leave on the starboard side.

"These two last mentioned buoys will be laid in manner above set forth, on the 1st day of October, 1776."

Reading, September 7. Sunday last the following affair happened at Blowberry, in this county: A day labourer having for some time past lived on disagreeable terms with his father and mother-in-law, took the resolution of destroying himself. It seems, after he had received his week's wages on Saturday night, he declared he had rather be shot than go home; however, he slept at home that night, and on the succeeding morning sent for two pennyworth of powder and shot, with the whole of which he charged a fowling piece, and going into a field adjoining his house, shot himself thro' the heart, and expired immediately. He has left a widow and two children.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

London, August 31.

ON Tuesday last Mrs. Pearson, a young woman very big with child, coming down from a ship, missed her hold, and fell into the Thames near St. Catherine's Stairs: She was under water full three minutes, and when taken up was to all appearance dead. She was immediately conveyed to Mr. Loutet's, the Black Boy and Trumpet, who very humanely received the body, as well as gave every other assistance with the greatest readiness. A messenger was immediately dispatched to Mr. Blount, of St.

Catharine's, who attended, and used the means laid down by the humane Society; and in about half an hour a weak pulsation was perceived, and other symptoms of returning life gradually appeared; so that in about three hours she was so well recovered as to walk home with the assistance of her friends.

Saturday night Mrs. Stoker, who was tried at a late sessions at the Old Bailey, on a charge of having seven husbands, and acquitted, was re-apprehended, and lodged in Wood-street

Sept. 6.] Yesterday the Lord Mayor and several Aldermen went to Wimbledon Common, to see an experiment tried on a house built for that purpose, in which one floor was set on fire and stopped without burning any other part of the building; it fully answered their expectation, and is done by thin plates of iron being nailed to the joists in the room of lath and plaster, and is painted to represent a ceiling, of whatever colour the builder pleases. It is said it will not cost above three and a half per cent. more than the common method of ceiling houses.

7.] On Tuesday night their Majesties took an airing about Beaconsfield, Woodburn Common, &c. and being informed that at the last mentioned place, a poor man with his wife and ten children laboured under the greatest distress, they stopped there, and bountifully relieved them.

The following is an exact description of the outside of St. Paul's clock:

The diameter of the dial plate 18 feet 10 inches.

The hour hand 5 feet 8 inches.

The minute hand 9 feet 8 inches.

The hour figures 2 feet 2 inches.

The minute figures 1 foot each.

The minute strokes 6 inches.

And the rim to the minutes 45 feet.

Yesterday, about one o'clock, as a gentlewoman crossed the road to the Asylum she was passed by a very handsome young fellow with a cockade in his hat, his eyes swelled with weeping, and muttered somewhat, nothing of which she could hear distinctly, but a repetition of Lord! His dejectedness gave her much concern. He had got but a little way into St. George's-fields, and was about two yards before her, when she saw him take somewhat out of his pocket, and put it in his mouth; a pistol went off to her great fright, and the young fellow dropped instantly down on his back; and by some who immediately assembled, she heard he was quite motionless.

9.] Last Friday night, between eight and nine o'clock, as the Lord Mayor was coming from Staines in his post-chaise and four, just on the other side Turnham-green, a highwayman, well mounted, stopped the footman, and examined if he had any fire arms, and with many imprecations threatened, if he made the least noise, he would blow his brains out; fading no fire-arms about the servant, he rode on to the Lord Mayor's gentleman, stopped and robbed him of three guineas and an half, and then stopped the chaise, called his Lordship many scandalous names, and swore, that if he did not immediately deliver, he was a dead man; upon which the Lord Mayor gave him his purse, containing four guineas and an half, and also his gold watch, with a gold chain, seals, &c. of great value. He afterwards, in sight of the Lord Mayor's servants, robbed a gentleman of his money and watch. It is said he is known by a person who was behind the Lord Mayor's chaise, and it is thought he will soon be taken.

12.] On Monday, the 12th of August last, a truck of upwards of sixty yards of flannel, packed up in a coarse wrapper about two feet eight inches long, corded with a thick cord, and sent by Mr. Adams (an exchanger of the late gold coin under government) by the Ludlow and Leominster fly, directed to Mr. A. Bennett and Co. No. 27, Aldermanbury, London, was (between the consignment of the said truck to the coach at Ludlow, and the delivery thereof at Mr. Bennett's, Aldermanbury) opened and robbed of 1000 exchangeable guineas, and about 40 ounces of moldores, ports, and light gold.

On Monday, at the Rotation Office in Litchfield-street, a woman near sixty years of age was put to the bar: Mr. William being sworn, deposed, that on Sunday afternoon, as he was sitting in the parlour, at his house in Macclesfield-street, Soho, he heard several times the cries and groans of a child, but could not tell from whence they came, till looking out, he saw a girl of about seven years old hanging by her hands at a three pair of stairs window, on which he ran into the house in order to take her in, but before he could break open the chamber-door, which was locked, she fell into a stone yard, but did not receive the least hurt: after she had been examined by a gentleman of the faculty, and recovered from the fright of the fall, she gave an account that her grandmother the prisoner, and her mother, used to beat her in a most cruel manner with a large cord, and lock her up in a room for days together without a morsel of bread, so that her bones were ready to break through her skin, and almost mortified from head to foot by the stripes and kicks she had received from them; and being locked up on Sunday without any food, she, in order to escape, got out of the window. A constable was sent in order to apprehend the mother, whom he found with her throat cut from ear to ear; the child was sent to the Middlesex Hospital, and the grand-mother committed for re-examination.

16.] On Friday three ruffians seized one of the principal evidences on the trial of one Davis for forgery, as he was going to Hicks's Hall, to prefer the bill, and carried him to a house in Suffolk-street, Charing-cross, where they locked him up in a back-room upwards of two hours, threatening to murder him if he made the least noise or disturbance; a post-chaise was brought to the door in order to take him off, but he found means to make his escape out of a back window, and ran as far as the house of James Hubbard, Esq; one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace, who sent his servant with him to Hicks's Hall, where the bill was soon found. The ruffians made their escape.

Wednesday night, about eight o'clock, a young gentleman, about twenty-six years of age, was found in Mount Row, Lambeth, lying on the ground, as was thought in a fit; but being carried to the castle, on examining his pockets a copy of a letter, without a name to it, was found, taking a last farewell of his father, as he shortly should be no more in this world; which gives reason to think that he has poisoned himself. He was not dead yesterday, but lay insensible.

The London Gazette of Sept. 22, contains a letter from Lord Howe, dated August 11, giving ing an account of his having published his declaration for pardon to such of the Americans as would return to their allegiance, with a copy of the declaration of his circular letter which accompanied it, the letter from Mr. Cooke of Rhode-Island, and resolution of the congress on his declaration—also a letter from Gen. Howe, dated August 15.

The London Gazette of October 10, contains accounts from Gen. Howe and Lord Howe, dated Sept. 3, of the taking Long Island.

One Egan was arraigned at the Old Bailey, for forging an order to procure goods in the name of the prosecutor. But the indictment being laid capitally, upon the act of parliament against forgery, Mr. Justice Althurst and Mr. Justice Gould delivered their objections to the same;—they declared that upon a solemn determination of eleven out of the twelve judges, it had been determined, that an order forged for the obtaining of goods or merchandize, in the name of another person, when the same imported credit, and if the same were delivered upon such terms, did not amount to the meaning of the act of parliament, but by construction of law was only deemed a fraud; they therefore ordered the jurors to acquit the prisoner of the charge: but Mr. Akerman acquainting the bench, that a detainer was lodged against him for the offence properly laid, he was remanded; upon which the prosecutor begged that the judges would enlarge him, for that the unhappy man had taken a dose of poison previous to his arraignment: this declaration drew the attention of the whole court, and he was observed to be in great agony.—It being impossible to dispense with the establishment of law, he could not be discharged, notwithstanding the extreme danger and singularity of his case.

A court of common-council was held at Guildhall, when Mr. Saxby moved, that the chamberlain be directed to deliver up immediately to Mr. Alderman Woolldridge the bond which he entered into to serve the office of the sheriff for the year ensuing, the said alderman having requested to be excused serving the said office for the year ensuing, on account of the present distressed state of the American trade. Mr. Horton seconded the above motion, which was agreed to. Mr. Alderman Woolldridge attended, and returned the Court thanks in a genteel speech.

At Guildhall, a common hall was held, for the purpose of electing a sheriff in the room of Mr. Alderman Woolldridge, and for the choice of a Lord Mayor for the year ensuing, when Mr. Alderman Thomas was chosen sheriff: and Mr. Alderman Halifax Lord Mayor.

The following circumstances happened lately at a village in the county of Carmarthen: A very amiable young woman was courted at one and the same time by a father and his son. Lewis jun. was handsome and sprightly; but Lewis sen. held the money-bag. The former relinquished his mistress, and gave her up to his father, who fixed on the day of marriage, but this creating great commotion in the family of Lewis, who had two daughters, and the neighbourhood exclaiming against the impropriety of the match, Lewis did not make his appearance at church on the day fixed on for the marriage. The bride came back, and young Lewis, her former lover, then renewed his addresses, and fixed on the following morning for marriage. Accordingly the bride went a second time to church, but no bridegroom attended; for the father, as he was not to marry the girl himself, resolved the son should not, and threatened to disinherit him if he did. The bride came away again from church, full of indignation and confusion; and the parson of the parish, a very worthy young man, then made love to her, and married her in about a fortnight.

The convicts have begun to work on board the lighters at Barking-thelf. They are chained by the leg, two and two, and their food consists of legs and shins of beef, and ox-check, and their drink small beer.

Thursday morning at two o'clock, a fire broke out at the Goat ale-house in Shire-lane, Temple-bar, which entirely consumed the same, with the furniture and stock in trade; together with a tallow-chandler's house adjoining.

Monday, the old woman was re-examined, touching the beating, wounding, and almost starving to death, Sophia Jane Wilson, a child about seven years old; when the infant repeated the account of the ill treatment mentioned before. Another girl, almost ten years old, was produced, whom likewise they had used in a cruel manner. The life of the child being declared by a surgeon to be still in danger, the grand-mother was remanded to prison, as well as the mother in a few days, she being nearly recovered of the wound in her throat.

At a meeting of the creditors of Mr. W. the state of his affairs was laid before them, by which it appeared, that his present situation could not, in the least degree, be imputed to any misconduct of his own, but totally owing to the present unhappy state of affairs in America. It appeared there is now due to the house 70,000l. from that quarter, and that the demand upon the house is no more than about 27,000l. It was agreed, that a letter of credit be given to the said gentleman for three years; that his affairs should be put under the inspection of five trustees, and that he should assist in getting in his effects, allowing him a stipend of 500l. per ann. for his time, trouble, and the maintenance of his family, house rent, &c.

MARRIAGES.

Hon. William Knollis, Earl of Banbury, Viscount Wallingford, Baron Knollis of Greys, and a Lieut. Colonel.—In India, the Hon. Lady Ann Monson, wife of the Hon. George Monson, one of the supreme council, and sister to the Earl of Darlington.—At Chichester, Mr. George Smith, landscape-painter, and the survivor of three brothers in that profession; he gained the premiums in 1760, 1761, and 1763.—Capt. Everat, of the Bedford, of 74 guns. His ship lies in the river, waiting for sailing orders.—At his seat at Stoke, near Guilford, Jeremiah Dylon, Esq; cofferer of his majesty's household, member of parliament for Horsham in Sussex, and one of his majesty's most honourable privy council.—In Broad-street Buildings, Theophilus M'Neal, Esq; lately arrived from Barbadoes, having left that colony on account of the distress the inhabitants are in.—Near Nancy in Lorrain, M. Lancelot Chambellan, in his 19th year; a few days before his death, he walked upwards of ten miles.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Newury, Sept. 19.

LAST Monday night, a person who was watching a cargo of coals, which had been landed at Mandin-bridge, perceived a man with a horse and car stop on the canal line, take something off his car that seemed of considerable weight, and plunge it into the river; which he had no sooner done than he directly set off for Tanderagee. Curiosity induced the watchman to see what the carman could have been depositing at such an unseasonable hour; when, to his great surprize, he found it was the body of a young man, seemingly about eighteen years of age, fair hair, his head cut in a shocking manner, and both his arms broke. He instantly alarmed the neighbourhood, and informed Sir Richard Johnston, bart. of this tragical affair, who exerted himself in discovering the persons guilty of so horrid a crime. Accordingly the carman, who threw the body into the water, was secured, and another, who is suspected of being an accomplice. All we can yet learn from the carman is, that he was paid a guinea by an unknown person, in the neighbourhood of Keady, for carrying the above, and throwing it into the river.

Carke, Sept. 23. The Diana, captain Maybury, with rum, from St Vincent for this port, and two other vessels, were lately taken by an American sloop of 10 carriage guns. The prizes were sent for Boston, and fifteen of their crews put on board a French ship, who landed them at Havre. The captain of the sloop is an Irishman, who had lost his property, and his vessel made prize of by an English man of war, when trading in full security: and on his return to America he procured the command of this sloop, in order to cruise against the nation that had stripped him of his all, and he had no resource left but retaliation.

Newury, Sept. 26. A correspondent has favoured us with an éclaircissement of the dark and seemingly horrid affair mentioned the 19th inst.—“Sir Richard Johnston, bart. after seizing the persons suspected of the supposed murder of the unhappy youth, whose remains were thrown into the canal, went in person to Keady, from whence the persons apprehended said they had brought the corpse, and on a full and fair enquiry, was sufficiently satisfied that no murder had been committed there, but that the unfortunate young man, whose body had been secretly conveyed so far from the place of his residence, had fallen a victim to an ill-fated amour; a disappointment in love having been the cause of his wilfully putting a period to a life, and, therewith, to a passion, whose painful power he could no longer sustain.”

We can assure the public from undoubted authority, that the White Boys were out in two different parties: one party was collected in and about Carrick-on-suir, which marched, with horns soundings, from thence to a village near Kilkash; the other party assembled near Nine-mile-house, went to a barn-yard of Mr. James Kennedy of Tinivane, and destroyed a parcel of tythe corn and farming utensils. They were clothed in white uniforms, as usual.

Carke, Oct. 7. Last Saturday a cause was tried in the county court, before the hon. Mr. Justice Henn, wherein Mr. Godricid-Gerrard Fehrman was plaintiff, and Mr. William Falkiner, surveyor of Robert's cove, Charles M'Carthy and Samuel Philips, revenue boatmen, were defendants. The action was brought for unlawfully detaining at Kinfale, last January, Mrs. Fehrman, the plaintiff's wife, three hours, under pretence of her having some India goods about her, she refusing to admit herself to be searched, and after a full hearing, the jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff of sixty guineas damages, and full costs of suit, to the no small satisfaction of the court and the public in general. Mr. Fehrman, last summer assizes, obtained a verdict for sixty pounds from another revenue officer, for unlawfully entering his cellar, under a pretence of his having unlicensed beer contained therein. Did every gentleman exert himself with the same spirit, it would in a great measure prevent such insolence of office.

Saturday last ended our assizes in the county court, when Darby Murphy, otherwise Killy, convicted of horse-stealing, to be hanged the 18th of October inst. Edward Wiseman to be hanged, drawn, and quartered the same day, for the murder of Daniel Riordan; Patrick Gorman, and David Glaslet, for riot and assaults at the fair of Kilmaclean, to be publicly whipped through the town of Malinow the 11th inst.—In the city court, John Pool, convicted for burglary, to be hanged on Saturday the 9th day of November next.

There are now in full bloom, in Mr Hunter's garden at Mount Landscape, near Glasnevin, a pear tree and a rose tree; both of which had already bore in season; also an apple tree, shooting out its leaves, which had not a leaf on it this year before.—A proof of the mildness of this season!

A few days since, as two gentlemen on Mill-town-road were sitting together, one of them took up a pistol which lay on a desk in the room, in order to examine its construction, and inadvertently discharged the contents into the body of the other, who now lies in a dangerous situation.

The following letter was communicated by his excellency the lord lieutenant to the right hon. the lord mayor.

S I R,

Corke, Oct. 4, 1776.

"I beg leave to send you the following information, which may be depended upon; three American privateers sailed from Salem in July last, for the Western islands of Madeira, to wait for the outward-bound West-India men; one sailed the same time to the Straits, and two others to our Irish channel, to intercept the linen ships; the latter carry eight guns each, and seventy-five men. I request you will lay this letter, with my humble duty, before his Excellency the lord lieutenant, and request a copy may be sent forward to England. I am, sir, &c.

ROBERT GORDON, Commissary."

To Thomas Waite, Esq.

In the month of September last, a cucumber of an enormous size, weighing 43lb. was cut in the garden of the Rev. Thomas Sheppard, of New-Park, near Callan. It is computed to be the largest cucumber ever reared in this kingdom.

October 8. A trooper of the first regiment of horse, and a soldier of the 67th of foot, were shot in the Phoenix-park, near Chapelizod, pursuant to the sentence of a court martial for desertion. They were conveyed in a coach from the prison to the barrack, where they received the sacrament, and were dressed in clean linen, preparatory to their execution. They walked from thence to the park, escorted by the whole garrison under arms, and attended by the chaplain of one of the regiments on duty; on their way thither the soldier seemed absorbed in cold apathy, or calm resignation, and the trooper was distinguished by his resolute temerity; being come to the place of execution, his fortitude suddenly failed; the dreadful thought of his approaching dissolution rushed on his troubled imagination in all its terrors! In vain the endeavours of the clergyman to compose his disorder, and render him resigned to his unhappy fate; he wept, wrung his hands, and appeared in the most violent agonies, a circumstance distressing to the humane spectators. The clergyman was necessitated to perform the sad office of veiling his face; when the fatal signal being given, they were instantly dispatched by twelve men placed at a small distance, after which the different regiments were ordered to march by the bodies, which were mangled in a shocking manner.

"14 Yesterday evening, between the hours of six and seven o'clock, several stones and rubbish were thrown from the upper windows of the gaol of Newgate, on a centinel placed near the door of that prison, who complained he was hurt, and could not stand his guard; whereupon the turnkey went up to that part of the gaol to suppress the abuse, during which, Richard Perry, George Eaton, Patrick Kelly, James Wall, Darby Murphy, and Robert Carroll, prisoners confined for fees, and under rules of bail, who were ordered to go on board a ship of war; also Thomas Connor, (lately sent from England to be tried on a charge of murder) armed with pistols, and other weapons, forced open the lock of the door, knocked down the centinel, (as he alleges) and were joined in corn-market by several armed ruffians, who are supposed to have been prepared for that purpose.—It is remarkable, that notwithstanding the centinel repeatedly called out for help to the soldiers on guard, they did not turn out until these desperate villains were gone out of sight.

His excellency the lord lieutenant having signified to the right hon. the lord mayor, that his excellency had appointed the Larne armed cutter, captain Cunningham, to convoy the trade to London; his lordship gave proper notice accordingly to the merchants and captains of ships.

15.] A hackney coachman, (No. 202) was fined a crown by the governors of the Work-house, for extorting on his fare; it was given for charitable uses.

The following humane Orders has been sent from the War-office, London, to General Howe, in America.

State of Allowances and Regulations.

"IF a wound shall be received in action by any commissioned officer, which shall occasion the loss of an eye or a limb, or the total loss of the use of a limb, he shall receive a gratuity in money of one year's full pay, and be further allowed such expences relating to his cure (if not performed at the king's charge) as shall be certified to be reasonable by the surgeon general of the army, and inspector general of regimental Infirmarys, upon examination of the vouchers which he shall lay before them.

"If the wounds received shall not amount to the loss of a limb, the charge of cure only shall be allowed certified as above. When any commissioned officer shall lose an eye or a limb, as aforesaid, the commanding officer of the corps in which he serves, shall deliver to him a certificate specifying the time when, and the place where the said accident happened; a duplicate of which certificate shall likewise be transmitted with the next monthly returns.

"When any commissioned officer shall be killed in action, his widow and orphan children, (if he leaves any) shall be allowed as follows:

"To the widow a full year's pay according to her husband's regimental commission. To each child under age and unmarried, one-third of what is allowed to the widow; posthumous children to be included.

"All persons dying of their wounds within six months after battle, shall be deemed slain in action.

"The commanding officers of the corps in which the slain officer served, shall, on demand, give a certificate of his being killed in action to his surviving wife and orphans respectively, specifying the time when, and the place where the said accident happened, a duplicate of which shall likewise be transmitted with the next monthly returns."

Answers to our Correspondents.

THE Complete List of the American Forces, hath appeared already in a public News Paper.

We have received a Number of Acrostics, a Species of Poetry of which few Men of any Judgment can approve; few of them are written in such a Manner as to merit being preserved.—The Acrostic signed D. Y. is such miserable Stuff as to be beneath all Criticism.—That signed G. T. falls under the same Predicament.—That signed Strephon is something better; yet below Mediocrity; and several others merit the same Character.—One indeed under the Signature of R. T. shews some poetic Talents, which, as we would ever wish to encourage a rising Genius, will be found amongst our Poetry.

A Constant Reader, from Belfast, will find we have adopted his Hint in this Month's Magazine.

A—K— (of Belfast) shews, in his Verses to Miss L— G—, some Degree of Genius that only wants due Care and Cultivation, to produce Lines which may be read with Pleasure. But Moon rhymes very badly with alone: rich and much; lament and Complaint, are also very harsh to any musical Ear. His Thoughts are pretty; and were a little Pains taken to polish his Verse, we would gladly usher them to the Public.

*Memoirs of Sir William Howe, Knight of the Bath,
And Commander in Chief of the British Forces in America.
(With a beautiful Engraving of that Officer.)*

THE Hon. Sir William Howe was the fourth and youngest son of Sir Emanuel Scrope Howe, lord viscount Howe, and baron of Clenawly, in the county of Fermanagh, in the kingdom of Ireland, and lady Maria Sophia Charlotte (who is still living) eldest daughter of baron Kilmanegg, a count of the German empire, and master of the horse to the electorate of Hanover. His eldest brother, the late brigadier-general lord Howe, was killed at the attack of Ticonderoga in North-America, July 5, 1758.—The second brother, George Scrope Howe, died without issue; and his third brother is the present vice admiral lord Howe.

Sir William Howe was early enrolled under the banners of Mars. He went through several ranks in the army with a distinguished character. On the 19th of February, 1762, he was raised to the command of a regiment; and his commission as major-general is dated the 15th of May, 1772.

On the death of the late lord Howe, the present lord Howe succeeded to his brother's rank, and vacated his seat in November, 1776.

the British parliament for the town of Nottingham. Sir William Howe was then absent at Louisbourg, yet he was elected to fill his brother's seat, chiefly in consequence of a letter written to the electors by his heroic mother, which roused the natural love of Britons for those who have deserved well of their country. Lady Howe's address was in these words:

To the Gentlemen, Clergy, Freeholders and Burgeſſes of the Town, and County of the Town of Nottingham.

“As lord Howe is now absent upon the public service, and lieutenant-colonel Howe is with his regiment at Louisburgh, it rests upon me to beg the favour of your votes and interest, that lieutenant-colonel Howe, may supply the place of his late brother, as your representative in parliament.

“Permit me, therefore, to implore the protection of every one of you, as the mother of him, whose life has been lost in the service of his country:

CHARLOTTE HOWE.”

Such an address, which would have done
Y y y y honour

honour to a Roman matron, in the most virtuous times of the republic, could not fail of success, and that lady had the additional satisfaction of seeing her son William rechosen for the same town, at the last general election.

From the command of the 46th regiment of foot, general Howe was, on the death of general Boscawen, promoted to the 23d regiment, or Royal Welch Fusiliers, and was also appointed lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Wight.

When the present troubles broke out in America, although general Howe had a peculiar esteem for the Americans, who paid the most singular honour to his late noble brother for the services he performed, and the obligations he conferred upon them, yet judging himself bound in duty to obey his sovereign's orders upon every occasion, he took upon him, with alacrity, the command in America, with which he was honoured. His behaviour on the 17th of June, 1775, in the action near Boston, fixed his character for coolness, fortitude and bravery; and now the sole command has fallen upon him, there is no doubt but he will do all that any man in his situation can do, to maintain the reputation he has so justly acquired; and as a proof of his majesty's esteem, he has lately conferred the Order of the Bath on major-general, now Sir William Howe.

Political Character of the Duke of Grafton.

THE political character of this nobleman, while it will exhibit as marvellous and astonishing a succession of events as any which have happened at St. James's for the last ninety years, will likewise include in it an account of every material measure which originally promoted or led to the present unnatural civil war raging in America.

Upon the arrangements proposed and carried into execution, under the patronage and interference of the late Duke of Cumberland in 1765, commonly called the Rockingham administration, his Grace was appointed one of the Secretaries of State; and continued in that situation till after the conclusion of the session, when he thought proper to resign in the month of June 1766.

This resignation, or sudden desertion of his friend, is what has puzzled every man, who does not chuse to form his opinions on mere popular reports, or party misrepresentation, originating in vain surmises, in exaggerated anecdotes, or in spleen, disappointment, and personal pique.

In this state of indecision we have nothing to do but report facts, and leave the public to form their conclusions.

Some time in the course of the session, finding a most formidable opposition to the measures of administration, he lamented its weakness, and said, for his part, he could not think of much longer remaining a member of it, because, with the best dispositions to serve their country, the present Ministers every day experienced a want of support both in parliament and elsewhere. He added, though he positively intended to resign, that he would, if called upon again, cheerfully join in any future administration, that should be formed upon a larger basis, particularly if a certain great man *, a leading member of the other house, were to be at the head of it.

On this open declaration in parliament, two observations were made at the time by a few.—In two months after they were repeated with more confidence, and became more generally believed. The first political conjecture was, that his Grace had learned that a change of Ministry was soon to take place, in the arrangement of which Mr. Pitt was to take the lead. The other, which was rather the effect of what followed, than of any thing which then appeared, was, that his Grace was employed to throw out this hint as a bait to the great man, the matter being previously considered and determined on, in order to strip him of his popularity.—None of these secret transactions can, in our opinion, be decided, but by the parties themselves. Every one on such occasions will, or ought to think for himself; under that privilege we can hardly be persuaded that his Grace designedly stooped so low as to be the pimp, spy, or tool of any party, much less of the avowed authors of a court system, formed on the most rigid doctrines of Filmer, Leslie, and Barclay.—He was liable to error, but we can hardly bring ourselves to believe that he was actuated by treachery, or swayed by deliberate malice.

The time soon approached, when his Grace was to appear entirely in a new light. On the advancement of Mr. Pitt to the peerage, in August 1766, his Grace was appointed First Lord of the Treasury; the new-created Earl of Chatham, Lord Privy Seal, being supposed to be the ostensible Minister. His Lordship's illness deprived the young First Commissioner of his assistance, the nominal command of course devolved on his Grace. A kind of political juggle took place. Charles Townsend wavered, staggered and fell. Lord Chatham threw himself on the illustrious house of Bedford; the new Financier grew giddy from pride or incapacity; or rather, we suspect, through the arts of those who were set about him to betray him. At this fatal instant, in the very whirlwind of folly, treachery, vanity, and treason against the country, were the dearest interests of the British empire sacrificed. The old Whigs, under Lord Rockingham, were either disgraced or seduced; the new created Earl was compelled, by the most unequivocal proofs, to write a satire on all future patriots, and pretenders to public spirit; and the noble Duke, who is the subject of the present observations, after taking the most vigorous and decided part in the repeal of the Stamp-act, through the treachery of his Chancellor * of the Exchequer, the influence of the Closet, the sudden change of sentiments of that hallowed mansion, and the consequences arising from such a change of sentiments, among the King's friends, at last acquiesced in the American Port Duties.

From that fatal instant, every thing dear, important, and valuable to this country, was alternately sacrificed to the dark, dangerous designs of a set of men, whom nobody knows, whom nobody can name, without hazarding the most cruel injustice, whose cabals Britain hath severely felt the effects of, and her children, to the latest posterity, may have cause to excrete in the bitterness of their hearts.

It is no part of our plan to enter into any discussion on the right of the Commons of Great-Britain to tax unrepresented America, though we do not retain a single doubt of the impolicy and inexpediency of endeavouring to effect it by force of arms. Be that as it may, it is our duty to relate the part the Duke of Grafton took in that business, as first Lord of the Treasury. This we find very fully stated in his speeches in parliament, since his resignation of the office of Privy Seal, at the opening of the last session, and in part confirmed by his brother Ministers; because, if the facts were at first denied, when afterwards re-asserted and frequently repeated by his Grace, they in fact received the fullest and fairest stamp of authenticity; the objections or denials on the part of administration, contained little more than mere quibbles on words, and mistakes relative to trivial circumstances. Two of these, out of many others, we shall give as a specimen. The Duke of Grafton asserted, that he was out-voted in cabinet. Lord Weymouth denied it, and insisted the numbers were equal. This was the 5th of March last. On the 14th his Grace insisted he was right; said he looked over his papers, and found a note from Lord Hillsborough, who informed him that the question was carried against him, by a majority of one. On this last day, Lord Hillsborough denied the sending the cabinet note; but neither his Lordship nor Lord Weymouth presumed to controvert the fact. His defence on consenting to the port duties laid on in 1767, was shortly this: That when the American military establishment came before the committee of supply, the house of commons rose as one man, and insisted, that the colonists should be obliged to contribute towards the public burdens; particularly some equivalent for the estimates now voting. On applying to such of the members of administration as were of the other house, they assured him that all resistance would be vain. This not satisfying him, he was determined to oppose the bill in the house of lords; but was prevailed on at length to desist on the mere motive of impropriety; as he was confidently assured, that any opposition to a money bill, in that house, would be highly resented by the commons; would create a breach between the two houses, and might in the end be productive of the very worst consequences, both to government and to the public in general. It did not, however, prevent him from expressing his disapprobation of the bill, and informing their Lordships, that the measure was not his; but that since the other House seemed resolved to assert the right, he did every thing in his power to render the law as palatable and innoxious as possible, by coupling the duty on tea with an actual saving of nine-pence per pound, by granting a drawback of the whole duty of one shilling per pound on exportation of that commodity to America, and laying on only three pence on importation into that country in lieu thereof. This is his Grace's state of the part he took in the port duties. In 1769, however, when he found that all his predictions relative to the folly and bad policy of taxing America had been fatally verified, he resolved to make another attempt, to rescue this country from the ruin and misery with which it is now threatened. With that view, he moved in the cabinet in 1769, that the American port duties should be totally repealed; but he was at length out-voted by a majority of one. Here the intelligent reader will be apt to ask, why his Grace did not resign, at least in the latter instance, when he found himself thus thwarted, counteracted, or over-ruled. It is not our business, as merely relating facts, to become an advocate for or against any man; but we presume to say, that there may be situations, into which a minister may be led by the arts of court seduction, or his own inexperience, credulity, or folly, that it may not be safe or expedient for him to tell the truth, or assert his own innocence; there may be situations, when and where it may be as hazardous to seek or regain the confidence of his quondam friends and associates, as to refuse to execute the dirtiest work of his merciless seducers and task-masters. These, it is true, are no more than mere conjectures; but we trust, the day of reckoning is not far off, when those, and several other transactions of no less importance to the well-being of this distracted empire, will be laid open in all their naked deformity.

There is one measure, that of the Middlesex election, and the previous expulsion of Mr. Wilkes, which has been solely attributed to his Grace. Whether the measure originated with him, or was dictated as an act of duty, we hold him equally responsible to the people. If he acted on pure principles of conviction, we feel for him as an honest, misled man; if he carried it through both houses, contrary to his own opinion, and as a sacrifice at the shrine of magisterial oppression and revenge, we do not hesitate to affirm, that his nearest and warmest friends and admirers have good reason to lament, that war entered the — closet.

His Grace resigned, in 1770, the post of First Commissioner of the Treasury, and still continued to support the measures of the Court. His obedience to the wishes of his Royal Master, and his approbation of the measures pursued by those, from whom he had just parted, were so kindly received by the persons who had it in their power to reward him, that he did not long continue out of office. He was shortly after appointed Lord Privy Seal, in which post he remained till his late resignation, when he declared boldly and openly against the measures now pursuing against America.

The two first sessions, after the commencement of the present troubles in America, he spoke and voted with administration. The reasons assigned by his Grace for his alteration of conduct was, that he had not sufficient information to determine his judgment; that such as was imparted to him, was false, or the facts were misrepresented; that he always disapproved of coercing America by force of arms, but hoped in the beginning that the people of that country would submit; that being thus misinformed, he supported measures he would otherwise never have consented to; that although the right had been clear, the asserting of it in the present state of our finances, and of the other powers of Europe, would be inexpedient; that the point of inexpediency became still more glaring and manifest, when the real strength and ability of America came to be revealed, and the actual disposition of its inhabitants seriously and attentively considered; and, that the only two specific measures relating to America, which he supported since the spring sessions, 1774, were the Boston Port and Charter bills, which he had been solely induced to do, upon false, or ill-founded information, being assured by those whose business it was to be thoroughly acquainted, and perfectly satisfied of the real disposition of the inhabitants of Boston, and the people of the Massachusetts Bay, that it was in the former instance the intention of the Bostonians to make reparation for the tea to the East India Company; and in the latter, the earnest wish of the principal landowners, merchants, and tradesmen of that province, to have their charter modified. Thus he said, he had been all along deceived directly in matters of opinion, and constrained, either to give his support blindfolded, or withhold it on principle. In such a mass of facts, and such a contradiction in conduct, it is impossible to argue even with plausibility, much less decide with candour or precision; but it seems on a transient view, uninformed as we are of the true motives which actuated his Grace, rather a little unfortunate that his eyes were not opened earlier; or that he trusted so much and so long to those of others; for most indubitably in point of pure principle, unconnected with the events of war, there did not exist a single reason for his supporting the Duke of Richmond's motion on the 5th of March, 1776, which did not hold equally strong, for his supporting that made by Lord Chatham, almost in the same words, full 13 months before.

We have waded through this painful task with no small degree of reluctance, if not disgust, because we found ourselves under the necessity to perform it at this very important crisis, in order that the nation, if our situation should become more critical, may know and look up to those who are supposed, only to have it in their power to relieve them; namely, the powerful and distinguished leaders in both houses; and yet we have been compelled to the mortifying circumstance, so far as we have hitherto proceeded, to impress substantially in the minds of our readers this eternal truth, that every public man, on either side, has given, in some one part or other of his political conduct, the most

irrefragable testimonies of his want of talents or want of principle; or which comes nearly to the same point, a compound of both, of indolence, inattention, and indifference, to the true interests of his country.

The duke of Grafton is one of the most persuasive, or rather pathetic speakers in the house. His speeches are delivered in the style of a gentleman and a scholar. His language is chosen, chaste, and correct. His judgment in arranging his matter is not excelled, perhaps not equalled, by any on the other side of the house. He may be sometimes flat and confused; but he is never vulgar, slovenly, nor ignorant. As he is a strict observer of decorum of debate, and the dignity of the august assembly in which he has the honour to sit, any deviation from it while he is up, such as talking, changing seats, &c. is very apt to disconcert him, and disarrange his ideas. From the same mode of thinking, he is ready to catch fire when any coarse or sarcastic expressions fall from his antagonists, or when any thing personal is directed to himself; but even then he restrains his feelings, and retorts with the energy and dignity becoming his elevated rank and senatorial situation. Lord Mansfield has more than once felt the effect of this irascible disposition, and that even before his Grace came over to opposition; since when there seems a certain acrimony, whenever an opportunity happens, in all his speeches, hinting, if not directly pointed towards that noble and learned Lord. How far this can be reconciled to his former situation, when in high office, and when the learned Lord was supposed to influence those councils which his Grace, as Prime Minister for nearly four years, was presumed to direct, we do not pretend to determine. He is equally liberal of his hints of pernicious counsels having been given, and of the impressions they may have made in a place, where in the world they ought to be soonest resisted. He has even ventured so far as to liken addresses of a more modern date to those presented to the insatuated James the Second; and not stopping there, has spoken of the possibility, if not probability, of a similar catastrophe. He has reprehended the King's servants in the strongest terms for their despotic doctrines in parliament, and their correspondent measures, and lamented, in the face of the whole nation, the dangerous effects such doctrines may be productive of, when it is known that they are promulgated, and publicly asserted and maintained by those who have equally the will and opportunity of endeavouring to insil them into the royal ear. On the whole, as he is one of the most able, so, if he could once more regain the confidence of the party he at first embarked with, and the favour and good opinion of the public, he would be, without question, by much the most formidable opponent to the measures of the court in either house of parliament.

The Virtuous Females: or, the False Husband reclaimed.

IN former times when fashion, folly and vice were not so prevalent as at present, conjugal love was deemed a virtue, which adorned those who wore it; but in this present age of refinement, fidelity in wedlock is looked on as a vulgarism not worthy to be used by a star or a coronet.

If therefore in these enlightened days, I may be suffered to relate a virtuous tale; if striking virtue can charm, or a blush for guilt can please, the following lines are justly deserving to be read by the lovely part of the creation, who are so extremely unfashionable as to look on virtue as the richest jewel that can be worn, and wantonness as the most vicious stain that can sully beauty, or deform the mind.

'Tis true we have many of our gay ladies of fashion, who indulge themselves in what they term innocent pleasures, which in the end bring on their ruin, and end in the disgrace of their families; yet we have many who are of a quite contrary nature, and who shine with undiminished lustre: among this number are two ladies whom I shall disguise under the names of Miranda and Angelina, both of noble and ancient families; their persons were joined to captivate and their minds to link the fetters their beauty made; both delicate in their sentiments, abhorred even the shadow of a thought, that did not coincide with the strictest rules of true honour and spotless chastity.

These two ladies, who had been school-fellows and connected in the bonds of friendship, were at length for a while separated by the marriage of Miranda, to a noble peer, to whom beside her own personal charms, she brought a very handsome fortune; if there was any advantage in point of beauty between these two female friends, it rather leaned to the side of Angelina, who after Miranda's marriage used to pass whole days and nights with her, especially in the absence of Libdinus, Miranda's husband, who somewhat cloyed with his lovely wife, would be absent from her arms for several days and weeks together, while he was revelling during that time in the lascivious embraces of one of those females, who are a disgrace to their sex.

One day Libdinus having returned sooner than usual from one of his excursions, saw Angelina with his wife, she was then playing on her guitar, which she accompanied with her voice; novelty, the characteristic of Libdinus, immediately made him fancy charms in Angelina, superior to any he had before seen; in short, he remained the rest of the evening at home, gazed on her with secret pleasure, and he found himself deeply smitten with the person of Angelina.

Libdinus now was more constantly at home, and was uneasy when the lovely friend of his wife, was out of his sight; he endeavoured to conquer his growing passion, but he found the flame irresistible, and the oftener he saw her it burnt with greater fury. At last he resolved to disclose his passion, but the friendship he perceived that Miranda and Angelina bore each other, made him fearful to venture the attempt. He was now reserved and melancholy, and the gay lively Libdinus, appeared now to resemble the sage, contemplative philosopher. Miranda observed her husband's sudden change, and not in the least suspecting the real motive, insisted on her friend's remaining a longer time than usual with her, in order by her sprightly conversation, to dispel the gloom which hung over her husband; Angelina consented, but this only added fuel to the flame, and the more she exerted her abilities to divert him, the more he was charmed and enamoured with her.

Unable to contain his love any longer, he took an opportunity in the absence of his wife, to unfold his passion to Angelina; she heard it, was amazed, and received his proposal with the utmost indignation and horror, and with the greatest speed flung out of the room. No sooner was her friend returned, but she made a pretence of having received a note that her mother was ill at home, and therefore immediately took her leave of Miranda, who was extremely sorry to part with her friend; but upon such an occasion, she could not attempt to compel her longer stay, but earnestly insisted on her speedy return, as soon as the health of her mother would permit.

When Libdinus heard of Angelina's departure, he was almost frantic, and secretly cursed his folly that had occasioned his losing her company; he therefore used every art in his power, to discover her retreat, and it was not long before his cunning succeeded, and he learnt her habitation. This accomplished he directly followed her, and renewed his addresses to her with redoubled vigour, but though he had always come off victorious over every female heart he had before attacked, and though he had laid close siege to the present object of his pursuit, he found the fortress of Angelina's virtue impregnable, and that it strongly resisted his most powerful eloquence.

As he did not desist from his addresses, Angelina determined to remove herself from her present abode, hoping by that method to get rid of his impetuous importunities; for her delicacy would not permit her to complain to Miranda, as she was fearful of adding a fresh sting to her heart, and harboured not a single wish to give her dear friend a moment's pain.

Libdinus was not a man that easily gave up the chase, till he had hunted down his game; he therefore resolved to attempt a new method, and make use of the strongest battery that can be played off against a female; for which purpose he brought her a bond, offered to settle six hundred a year upon her for life, if she would comply, and release him from his present state of misery, and render him happy; this he thought would have great effect, the more especially as he knew her estate was but small, and such an addition to her income, which was sufficient to gratify the pride of a woman, might make her surrender up her person to him.

Elated with this flattering hope, he hastened again to her house with the wings of an impatient lover, but with the fierce desires of a lecherous satyr. He found the beautiful object of his flame seated under a shady bower in her garden, she was reading! what? Ladies, do you ask me? she was reading Hervey's meditations among the tombs. Oh, monstrous! methinks I hear one exclaim, "the unfashionable creature;" unfashionable as you please, fair ladies, but this was really the book Angelina was perusing when Libdinus approached her; 'twas not "the Man of Feeling, Hoyle, nor the method of restoring a lost complexion;" no, Angelina leaves such curious treatises to the gay belles of quality and the pantheon.

Excuse this digression, and now to return, Libdinus immediately threw himself at her feet, renewed his addresses with tears, expostulated on her cruelty, of his love, and presenting her with the bond, tenderly asked her in a plaintive accent, if that was not a sincere proof of the violent love he bore her, and a sufficient testimony of the sincerity of his intention. A kneeling lover, importunate, handsome and persuasive, say, what female could withstand? but though Angelina was for a short time speechless, and staggered in her resolution, she recollected herself and her situation in so retired a place, with the husband of her dearest friend, rushing on her her mind, she recovered her fortitude; her virtue took the alarm, she started up and endeavoured to escape; but Libdinus immediately seized, nor would let go his hold; Angelina now more terrified than ever, uttered a violent scream, and a youth who had long made his addressee to her, but in vain, was just then entering the garden, and rushing directly to the spot from whence the sound proceeded, saw his lovely fair one detained by Libdinus, who was on his knees before her. If pity before to see the occasion of the noise and aid the distressed, had lent him wings at first, love, rage and fury now nerved the arms of the protector of Angelina, he immediately laid his hand on his sword, and bid the aggressor quit his hold, or meet with the chastisement a ravisher and a villain deserved.

Libdinus, though he gave way to his lewd and violent inclinations, yet had a true sense of honour, and could distinguish the nature of a crime, and was ever ready to acknowledge any error he had committed; but the opprobrious name of ravisher and villain, was too much for him to brook; he did not want for courage, and was immediately going to answer the lucky intruder's challenge; when Miranda, who had come to pay a visit to Angelina, and hearing she was in the garden, fortunately intervened to stop the fatal effects that might have ensued.

Libdinus was all astonishment at being caught in such a place and in such a situation, by a stranger and by his wife, and knew not what to do or say. But if the husband was confused, what must be the situation of Miranda! She first looked at Angelina, then at her husband and the young gentleman, and seemed wishing for an explanation, but dreaded to request it. She knew her husband's vicious inclinations, and she could not think her friend so base as to wrong her marriage bed. Angelina seeing her in this dilemma went up to her, and acquainted her with the whole proceedings, at the same time presenting her with the bond her husband had offered her. Miranda, convinced of Angelina's chastity, embraced and begged of her to accept of the bond; at the same time taking her by the hand gave it into that of her deliverer, who received it with a heartfelt joy, and at the same time pressing it to his lips, "My Angelina," said he, "I hope will not retract from me the inestimable present her friend has made me." Angelina who had a real love for the youth, gently blushed consent, and let her hand remain fast locked in his.

Miranda now turned to Libdinus, and was going to tell him of his faults, but the tear of love prevented the least breath of reproach. Her husband who saw the feelings of her heart, hastily rose up, and clasping her in his arms; "Oh, Miranda! how long I have wronged so much goodness, but from this hour I promise reformation, and my future love and conduct shall prove to you how greatly I value virtue."

All the parties now happily agreed, the nuptial of Angelina was soon accomplished; Libdinus kept true to his promise, and the four friends have since that time lived in uninterrupted felicity.

Conjugal Happiness, or the Autumnal Morning. Imitated from the German of the celebrated Gesner.

ALREADY had the sun's rays gilded the summit of the mountains, and proclaimed the approach of the fairest of autumnal days, when Milton placed himself at his window. The sun then shone through the branches of the vine, whose verdure, mixed with purple and Aurora, formed over the window a shady arbour, that lightly waved to the morning's gentle gale. The sky was serene; a sea of vapours covered the valley. The highest hills, crowned with smoking cottages, and with the party-coloured garb of Autumn, rose, like islands, by the power of the sun's rays, out of the bosom of that sea. The trees, loaded with ripening fruit, presented to the eye a striking mixture of a thousand shades of gold and purple, with some remains of verdure. Milton, in sweet ecstasy, suffered his sight to wander through the vast extent. Sometimes he heard far off, sometimes more near, the joyous bleating of the sheep, the flutes of the shepherds, and the warblings of the birds, that by turns pursued each other on the floating gales, or died away in the vapours of the valley. Plunged in a profound contemplation, for a long time he stood motionless; then, fired with a sudden transport of divine enthusiasm, he seized his lyre, that hung against the wall, and thus he sung:

“Grant, O grant me, Gods! the power to express my transports and my gratitude, in hymns worthy of you! Full-blown Nature now shines forth in all her charms; her riches she profusely pours around; mirth and festivity reign throughout the plains. The prosperous year smiles in our vineyards and orchards. How beautiful appears this vast champaign! How delightful the variegated dress of Autumn! Happy the man whose heart feels no remorse, who, with his lot contented, frequently enjoys the delight of doing good. The serenity of the morning invites him to new joy; his days are full of happiness, and night night finds him in the arms of the sweetest slumbers; his mind is for ever open to the impressions of pleasure! The various beauties of the season enchant him, and he alone enjoys all the bounties of Nature. But doubly blessed is he, who shares his happiness with a companion formed by Virtue and the Graces: With one like thee, my beloved Daphne. Since Hymen has united our destinies, there is no felicity that is more delightful to me. Yes, since Hymen has united our destinies, they are like the concord of two flutes, whose pure and sweet accents repeat the same air: Whoever hears them is penetrated with joy. Did my eyes ever express a desire that thou didst not accomplish? Have I ever tasted any happiness that thou didst not augment? Did any care ever pursue me to thy arms that thou didst not dispel, as the vernal sun dispels the fogs? Yes, my spouse, the day that I conducted thee to my cottage, I saw all the joys of life attend thy train, and join themselves to our Household-gods, there for ever to remain. Domestic order and elegance, fortitude and joy, preside over all our labours, and the Gods vouchsafe to bless thy undertakings. Since thou hast been the felicity of my heart, since thou hast been mine, O Daphne! all that surrounds me is become more pleasing to my sight; Prosperity has rested on my cottage, and dwells among my flocks, my plantations, and my harvests. Each day's labour is a new pleasure; and, when I return fatigued to this peaceful roof, how delightfully am I solaced by thy tender assiduity! Spring now appears more joyous, Summer and Autumn more rich, and when Winter covers our habitation with its hoary frost, then, before the glowing fire, seated by thy side, I enjoy, in the midst of the most tender cares and pleasing converse, the delicious pleasures of domestic tranquility. Let the North-wind rage, and let storms or snow hide the face of all the country from my view; shut up with thee, my Daphne, I feel, I more sensibly feel, that thou art all to me; and you, my lovely infants! crown my felicity; adorned with all the graces of your mother, you are to us an earnest of Hymen's unbounded favours. The first words that Daphne taught you to lip were, that you loved me; health and gaiety smile in all your features, and sweet complacency shines already in your eyes; you are the joy of our youth, and your prosperity will be the comfort of our latter days. When returning from the labours of the field, or from guarding my flocks, you meet me at the cottage-door with cries of joy; when, hanging on my knees, you receive, with the transports of innocence, the trifling presents of fruits that I have gathered, or the little instruments that I have made, while tending my flocks, to form your hands, as yet too feeble, to cultivate the garden or the field: Gods! how does the sweet simplicity of your joys delight me! In my transport, O Daphne! I rush to thy arms, that open to embrace me! then, with what an enchanting grace you kiss away the tears of joy that flow from my eyes!

While he thus sung, Daphne entered, holding in each arm an infant, more beautiful than Love himself. The morning, bathed in resplendent dew, is not so charming as was Daphne, while tears of joy ran down her cheeks. O my love! she sighing said, how happy am I! We are come, O we are come to thank thee for thy tender love. At these words he clasped the lovely infants and their mother in his arms; lost in delight, they could not speak. Ah, he, who at that instant had seen them, must sure have felt, at the bottom of his heart, that the virtuous man alone is happy.

The False Friend: A Moral Tale.

MR. Thornhill, a young man of fashion and fortune, about eight years ago paid his addresses to the blooming Amelia Conyers; and as his character was as unexceptionable as his manners were elegant, she made no objection to his proposals, nor were they disapproved by her friends; they were, indeed, like himself, very worthy of her acceptance. Accordingly this amiable couple were married; and the birth of a son, in the first year of their conjugal union, considerably increased their conjugal felicity—All was joy and gladness within their happy habitation. As they were mutually attached to each other in consequence of the sincerest mutual affection, they reciprocally endeavoured to oblige each other upon every occasion. But all sublunary enjoyments must have their alloy: the happiness of this affectionate pair began at last to be diminished; and each of them began to be less and less studious to please. They felt, indeed, the same affectionate regard for each other, but it wanted its first animation. Time, which alleviates our afflictions, by rendering them habitual, produces, by making them habitual too, the diminution of our pleasures.

Thornhill, though very amiable, was rather inclined to be suspicious, and could not bear the least trifling. Amelia, though extremely agreeable, was a little haughty sometimes, and capricious. The delicate apprehension of giving offence in the slightest degree; that delicacy so pleasing to all married people, and so common to those who have not long been united, gradually wore off. They both took less pains to conceal their respective foibles; and at length, from mere inattention and negligence, suffered them to appear in as strong a light as their good qualities had formerly appeared. This change in their behaviour became disgusting to both parties; and gave birth to a number of little cavils and disputes, which rendered them still more dissatisfied with their nuptial connection, and naturally prompted them to vent their disquiets to a third person.

The person to whom Mrs. Thornhill made her complaints, was her sister, three years younger than herself, but full as handsome, of a lively and pleasing disposition. Too much attached to her sister not to condemn her brother's behaviour, she very kindly, however, strove to bring about a reconciliation between them. Of a different, of an opposite temper was the confidential friend of Thornhill; a man of family, nearly of his own age, young, fond of women (but averse to marriage) artful and designing. This artful favourite, who appeared, in the prejudiced eyes of his undiscerning friend, a pattern for honour and honesty, openness and fair dealing, secretly endeavoured, at the same time, to foment all the little domestic misunderstandings between him and his wife, partly from a desire to attach the former entirely to himself, and partly from a growing inclination which he felt for the latter, who would, he hoped, transfer her affections on him, when she was thoroughly disgusted with her husband.

With Johnson's real intentions Mr. Thornhill was not at first acquainted; but Miss Conyers suspected the sincerity of his favoured friend. She had resided with her sister from the time of her father's decease: On her Johnson had designs; but his inclination led him first to attempt a conquest over Amelia. He believed, indeed, that his generalship would be doubly conspicuous by a victory over the two sisters; but Charlotte, with a great share of discretion, had also a great share of sagacity, and felt a particular aversion to Johnson on account of his character. Her aversion was certainly well grounded; for he really was a friend to nobody; to women he was a profest enemy. As his principal pleasure was to seduce every female who fell in his way, he took no small delight also in corrupting all the men with whom he had any connections. Actuated by this last propensity, he was at this very time practising upon a young fellow related to Thornhill, who was just arrived from the North, where his family-estate lay, to make a visit to his cousin.

Neville was not only a very worthy, but a very agreeable young man; but not having seen so much of the world as those with whom he now resided, and their acquaintance, he was not at first aware of Johnson's character: he supposed, indeed, from the air of gallantry in his behaviour to Miss Conyers, that he intended to make honourable proposals to her, though he was always ridiculing matrimony to him.

Neville, conceiving a violent passion for Miss Conyers, soon began to be alarmed about every man who paid the least attention to her; and he was particularly uneasy with regard to Johnson, who had a very attractive exterior, which, with the general turn of his carriage to the fair sex, greatly prepossessed them in his favour. Alarmed, however, and disquieted as Neville was, with all the agitations and anxieties of a sincere lover, he received some satisfaction by observing, that Charlotte did not discover the slightest partiality for his rival—as he took him to be; but the indifference with which he himself was also treated by her, contributed to strengthen his apprehensions, lest Johnson should win a heart which he should, he imagined, find it extremely difficult to obtain. However, though Charlotte outwardly discovered no particular favour for Neville, she very clearly distinguished him, in a moral view, from Johnson; but she was somewhat afraid lest the latter might, from his insinuating manners, prevail on the former to become as finished a libertine as himself. She perceived, it is true, that she had made a complete conquest of Neville's heart; but she feared, at the same time, that Johnson would, by his address, gain an ascendant over him equal to that which he had gained over Thornhill.—She never had looked upon Johnson as a desirable lover, and she thought him less qualified for a husband; imputing the disagreements between her brother and sister to the sentiments which the former had caught from his perfidious friend. Thornhill, indeed, saw not Johnson in his true colours, in the light in which he ought to have viewed him; yet he was far from thinking as he did upon any subject of a very interesting nature. He still loved his wife with a sincere affection: their disputes had weakened the force of his first ardour, but he was sensible enough of the value of domestic felicity, to wish for its return; for the return of that felicity he often sighed, hourly lamented the change discernible in his lady, and the change which he felt in himself. By the last sensation, however, he was the least troubled: few people, when they have been in a state of variance, think themselves half so much to blame, as those with whom they have had repeated altercations.

By a dispute in which the Thornhills were one day warmly engaged concerning their little son, the breach between them was considerably widened. Thornhill, in direct opposition to his wife's judgment, took him from her, at an age when boys usually remain under the tuition of the female part of the family, in order to place him at a boarding-school; though he was so fond of him at the same time, that he could hardly bear him out of his sight. Mrs. Thornhill on the other hand, who loved her husband's likeness in miniature, sighed at the absence of her amiable little Harry, but knew that her solicitations for his return would be to no purpose, being certain that his father would deny her request.

The domestic debates between Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill were at last so frequent, and so fierce, that the former began to drop hints about a separation.—The latter, though she trembled at the sound of that word, was too proud to let him who uttered it see that it affected her. Johnson, who was ever upon the watch, and ever spurring up his friend to proceed with the greatest violence, determined to seize this very favourable opportunity (as he imagined) to pay his court to Amelia, resolving, at the same time, to prevent Neville from forming an alliance with Charlotte. To facilitate the execution of the last design, and prompted also by his consummate vanity, which not only induced him to believe that no woman could resist him, but made him eagerly endeavour to bring every man over to the same belief, he carelessly hinted, one day, that he was sure of the heart of Mrs. Thornhill, and that he had no doubts with regard to the possession of her sister's, whenever he should have leisure to attempt such a conquest. This bold assertion justly raised Neville's indignation, and he threatened to acquaint both Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill with what he had delivered.

Johnson answered him first with a loud laugh, and then dared him to the commission of so capital a folly, as he called it; assuring him, that there was nothing particular in what he had affirmed, as all people of fashion, people who know any thing of life, thought and acted precisely in the same manner; adding, that he would make himself appear in the most ridiculous light, by publishing any of his rustic and obsolete notions; which were quite contrary to the ton.

Neville, who had by this time formed his plan, made a short reply. He then left him, and went in search of Miss Conyers, whom he found ready to reproach him for his attachment to Johnson, and who declared, that she had a worse opinion of him than of any other man in the world.

Transported at this declaration, which confirmed the falsity of Johnson's assertions, he seized that moment to tell her every thing he had been saying, and to press his suit with more ardour than ever. She gave him in return the most flattering encouragement; but not till he had promised her to break off all connections with Johnson, and assist her in paving the way for a reconciliation between her brother and sister; vindicating the latter in the warmest terms, and assuring her lover, that whatever faults she had, they all proceeded from an excess of sensibility, and from an uncommon delicacy of disposition, which had both been, she was afraid, carried too far.

Highly pleased with having put things in this promising train, she flew to her sister, and informed her of all she had learnt from Neville; who would, she was certain, endeavour to make her husband sensible of the mistakes into which he had been led by Johnson, his false friend, in every sense of the word.

Amelia thanked her sister for her information; and asked her, if she thought the interposition of her little Harry might not also be of considerable service. "Though we have long ceased to be fond of each other (continued she) we both doat on our child; I will go, and fetch him this moment from school. Mr. Thornhill cannot be offended at my love for my dear boy; when he has made us friends, he may be sent again to school, if his father chuses it."

Accordingly she set out with her sister; but when she arrived at the school, she was told that Mr. Thornhill, accompanied by Mr. Neville, had just carried her son away. The latter of these gentlemen, indeed, had prevailed on the former to listen to reason, and to be reconciled to his lady, who had been basely represented to him by Johnson, whose infamous designs, both upon her, and her sister, were no longer of a questionable nature.

As soon as Thornhill was convinced of the falsehood of his pretended friend, he began to doubt whether Amelia, who had been, he was thoroughly sensible, very ill-treated by him, would ever forgive him.

Upon his expressing this apprehension, Neville told him, that the sight of her son would, in his opinion, disarm her resentment. The little fellow was rejoiced to come home. On his eagerly flying to look for his Mamma, his Papa stopped him, and bade him conceal himself in his closet till he sent for him. The boy whimpered, but obeyed. In the mean while, Mrs. Thornhill and Miss Conyers returned very much dissatisfied from the school.

Miss Conyers, by questioning the servant closely, soon found out the little Harry, and brought him privately to his mother. While she was caressing him, Johnson, who began to suspect that he was found out, but who also believed he had still sufficient power to impose upon Thornhill, came and discovered him with Neville. Very soon after his arrival, Mrs. Thornhill, followed by her sister, led in her Harry, and bade him regain his father's heart for her.

Thornhill could not immediately recover from his surprize and embarrassment; especially as Johnson stood close at his elbow, stimulating him to reject every offer towards a reconciliation; but the modest appearance and tender behaviour of Mrs. Thornhill, a recollection of every thing that Neville had told him, and especially the sight of his amiable son, who discovered the greatest fondness both for him and his mother, quite softened his heart. He embraced his wife and child with unutterable transport; and then turning to Johnson, forbade him his house. Miss Conyers at this moment gave her hand to Neville, as a reward for his friendly interposition in their affairs, and for the information he had given them with regard to Johnson's iniquitous designs.

Johnson, now covered with shame and confusion, and inflamed with rage, made a kind of an attempt to challenge Neville, but on being told by him, that he defied both him and his sword, he thought proper to take no further notice of a family, whom he had, merely for the gratification of his own ridiculous vanity, rendered sufficiently miserable for a considerable time.

Mr. and Mrs. Thornhill, now as sensible of their own errors as of Johnson's criminal conduct, were perfectly reconciled, and the revival of their conjugal affection promised them more felicity than they had enjoyed at their setting out in the conjugal state; both of them being now sufficiently guarded against the dangerous, as well as detestable, machinations of a false friend.

THE perusal of the above lines this morning, threw me into a train of reflections on the resemblance between several animals of the human and the canine species; a resemblance, indeed, which appeared to me so strong, that I could not help thinking some of my readers might be amused with my speculations concerning it.

The supple, sinister, smooth-tongued sycophant, in the suite of a great man, who is ready to execute the commands of a Premier, however repugnant they may be to his inclination, however they may revolt against his ideas of honour—(to say nothing of the shocks which they give his conscience) who is ever disposed to say Ay, or No, to every thing a great man says—though ay, and no, too, are not certainly, as old Lear says, true Divinity—may aptly be coupled in the way of comparison with the Spaniel, who is distinguished among his canine companions by fawning upon those that use him worst, and licking even the hand raised in wrath against him; crouching at the feet of his imperious master, and becoming more humble the more he is beaten by him.

The four and severe Critic, whose supreme delight is to discover errors in a work which has met with a favourable reception from the public, (especially a dramatic piece)—who sits down to examine with all the malice * (not of a friend, but) of an enemy—fastens upon the slightest deviations from the rigid rules of the Stagyrite with the execrable satisfaction of a Scaliger, and points them out to public view with an exultation which does no credit to his Heart, whatever compliments he may receive for his critical Acumen—ranks with the Cur, who is always snapping and snarling at every man he meets, sticks close to his heels, and annoys those whom he assails in such a manner, that they find it no easy matter to disengage themselves.

The Pimp, who makes it the dishonourable employment of his life to make the life of a Right Honourable Personage happy by drawing innocent girls from the paths of virtue, and putting them into his Lordship's power, may be classed with the Pointer, who watches for that game which his master wants to get into his possession; and as soon as he sees the poor birds endeavouring to make their escape, gives him notice, that some of them at least may be intercepted in their flight.

The Country Gentleman who lives upon his patrimonial estate in the most prudent style, in a style which enables him at once to make a respectable appearance, and to endear himself to his indigent neighbours, by a well-governed hospitality, is (if the comparing him to a dog carries no degradation with it) like one of those faithful domestic animals that guards the house of his protector with the utmost faithfulness, and makes a noble opposition to those who attempt, by bribes or blows, to prevent him from doing the duty of a true English Mastiff.

The delicate Dangler after the Fair, who spends his whole time in giving himself an effeminate appearance, and in distinguishing himself by feminine employments, whose conversation turns chiefly upon the tattle of the day, and who prefers a tete-a-tete with the silliest girl in the kingdom to the company of any of his own sex, is of no more consequence in the creation than a lap-dog.

The Brilliff, whose sweet occupation is to seize those unfortunate members of the community whom the law has condemned to durance vile for the contraction of debts which they cannot discharge, often appears with the fierceness, and acts with the vigour, of a Bull Dog; and as well may the stupidest of the horned race hope to throw off his ferocious assailant, whom he despises at the same time, as the unhappy debtor shake off a catch-pole, though he may perhaps look at him with the most cordial contempt.

The vigilant Thief-taker, who peeps into Courts and Alleys for those who have endeavoured to screen themselves from the eye of justice, by skulking in corners and obscure places, may, with particular propriety, be compared to the Terrier, as they are both serviceable in bringing to light the vermin by which society is grievously infested.

The Projector, who is always in pursuit of something which continually eludes his search, may be classed with the Water-Spaniel in chace of a duck, who is perpetually seeing the object of his pursuit sinking from his sight, and tantalizing him by a re-appearance in a different place, to which he hurries, animated with fresh hopes, only to be mortified by a fresh disappointment.

I might increase my catalogue by coupling Soldiers with Blood-hounds, Couriers with Turn-spits, and Blunderers in Politicks with Blind Puppies, &c. &c. &c. but I imagine I have sufficiently proved, that there is a striking resemblance between the human and the canine species; and I believe I may venture to add, that upon many occasions the latter, making all due allowances for education, discover more rationality, though they cannot reason.

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed: or, Memoirs of the Noble Cricketer, and Mischief-maker.

THE following memoirs were received from a gentleman whose hand we often recognize, and whose veracity we have the greatest reason to credit. He also favoured us with a sketch of the portraits as striking resemblances.

The house of S— has been for some ages celebrated for producing men of eminence, and some living examples will corroborate the assertion.—Our hero, we acknowledge, has not had opportunities of displaying his abilities in the cabinet, nor has he exerted his talents in the senate—but the field has afforded ample scope for calling forth his talents and agility. The plains of Kent have often borne witness of his uncommon merit—not indeed as a general or commander, but as a very expert cricket-player. This noble sportsman, not like most men of rank, abandons the hazard and card-tables, where by frequent vigils they destroy their constitutions and ruin their fortunes, and finds manly recreation in athletic exercises, which brace the nerves, and renovate health.

His

His days of adolescence were, as usual, passed in the pursuits of learning, when he first testified a strong propensity for field sports, which he yet retains; and he is not only an excellent cricketer, but a good tennis and a fine billiard-player.

Coming very early in life to his title and fortune, he soon gave way to another passion, which he had long entertained——this was travelling. As he resembled but few noblemen in his pursuits of pleasure, he seemed resolved to differ with them in one of the most essential. Our young men of quality who go abroad propose to themselves, not only the sight of the Venu de Medicis in the Florentine gallery, but to enjoy every beautiful Thais and woman of gallantry in the course of their travels. Our hero, on the contrary, giving the preference to his own countrywomen, before all the exotic beauties of the Continent, chose for his female companion the celebrated Nancy P——ns. After that time she yielded to the solicitations of Mr. P——n; but this gentleman, being of a roving disposition, soon quitted her arms for the embraces of an Opera-singer.

She travelled with our hero through France and Italy, gained many admirers, and received some very advantageous offers from even princes of the blood; but to her honour be it spoken, she rejected them all, and was invariably faithful to her English lover.

The Count de D—— sat one night behind Miss P——ns, at the Opera at Paris, and became so enamoured with her, that as soon as the performance was finished, he dispatched a faithful Mercury after her, who bringing him intelligence of her situation and connexions he began to set every engine at work, in order to recommend his suit. He wrote to his charmer the most tender billets, which were accompanied with many valuable presents; but the returned most of his epistles unopened with his intended presents. One of them falling into the hands of the D. it greatly alarmed him, being conceived in such equivocal expressions, that they left a doubt, whether his mistress had not been unfaithful to him, and in the first emotions of his resentment resolved to be revenged, by dismissing her, and taking some favourite fille de joie into pay. But, upon cooler reflexion, he resolved first to be convinced of her guilt, and watched her so closely, that in the course of a fortnight, he could not discover the least grounds, except the letter for his suspicions. What restored Miss P—— to the D's former good opinion, was his being present, and having oral proof of her refusing to receive a letter from the hands of a milliner. Being satisfied of her innocence, the D. now revealed to her the cause of his suspicions, and the coolness that she had perceived on his part for several days. She was very happy in discovering the source of his uneasiness, and frankly revealed to him the professions the Count had made to her, and her conduct upon the occasion.

They soon after set out for Italy, and arrived at Rome without any material occurrence on the road. It was the time of the carnival, and they entered into all the spirit of that gay season. Here again he had like to have lost his dear charmer. A noble Venetian had become deeply enamoured with her, and finding that all the overtures he had made, and all the machinations of his emissaries were fruitless, he resolved, in a fit of phrenzy, to carry her off by stratagem. This he proposed effecting at a masked ball, and having learnt the precise dress of Miss P——, he engaged a courtesan, who was entirely at his devotion, to dress exactly like her, and being about the same stature, she was to personify her to the D. whilst the Venetian put his plan in execution. Accordingly Miss P—— having parted from the D. for a few minutes, the courtesan joined him, taking him by the arm as Miss P—— had done before, and he walked several turns with her ere the discovery was made. An outcry being heard, and the alarm given, all the masks flew to the spot where the noise arose, except the courtesan, who knowing the cause, got off in the crowd. Upon the D's missing his supposed Miss P——, he was very uneasy; but what was his astonishment when he found the real lady in the greatest distress, fainting between two ruffians, who were endeavouring to force her into a carriage that waited for that purpose.

She was rescued and brought back; but the perpetrators of this villainy escaped, and the noble Venetian could not be detected.

Notwithstanding the strictest cordiality prevailed between the D. and Miss P—— during their whole journey, they were not long returned to England before a great coolness ensued between them. Whether his G. had the fortitude to resist the impressions of foreign beauty, but was incapable to withstand the charms of his own countrywomen, or whether some irregularities on the side of Miss P——, gave rise to a misunderstanding, one soon ensued, and we find his G. in pursuit of many demireps of fashion, as well as coquettes of an inferior class.

His G—e being esteemed a very amorous nobleman, handsome, and of an athletic frame, many amours have been ascribed to him, which probably were the chimeras of fancy, or were echoed by the voice of scandal and malice. One in particular with a certain countess, which has been pretty freely talked of, seems to be of the latter cast.

However, certain it is, he has since his return from the continent, had several gallantries upon his hands, and, among others, that which has given rise to the present memoirs.

Miss G—m is a young lady, about twenty, remarkably tall and genteel, with a fine expressive countenance, languishing eyes, and a most beautiful mouth. Her father was a reputable farmer in the county of Suffex, and gave her as good an education as the place of his residence would admit. Being intimate with the parson's daughter, she had access to his books, which, added to the conversation of Miss C—, was a great means of improving her understanding. A captain was quartered in the neighbourhood, either was, or pretended to be, deeply enamoured with her; he died at her feet, and with protestations of invariable love, pressed her so closely as to extort from her the avowal of a mutual passion. This acknowledgment being once obtained, he judged himself sure of his prize; began to talk of an elopement, and visiting dear London, which was the seat of pleasure, politeness, and joy. Her heart fluttered at the thought, yet she chid him for his daring proposal, when he proposed never to make it again. Miss C—, her confidante, was already in the secret of their affairs, and being older and more prudent than Miss G—m, cautioned her strenuously to be careful in her conduct with captain S—. Notwithstanding their friendship, Miss G— could not help construing this into jealousy, and the slight the captain had put upon her, in not paying his addresses to Miss C—. This rendered the son of Mars more valuable in her eyes, and she began to consider him as a great conquest, worthy the attention of any woman. Having once harboured this opinion, he soon found means to prevail upon her (notwithstanding his former promise never to mention the subject again) to take a trip to the metropolis. The journey once begun, he now called forth all his rhetoric, to prove that it was necessary upon the road to pass for man and wife, which would be the real state of the case in a few days; she was not prepared for this artful battery against her chastity, and, in fine, yielded at discretion.

The circle of a honey-moon cooled all the glowing ardour of the captain's passion. Miss G— saw, when too late, her folly and credulity. After a few weeks, the captain informed her he was ordered again to quarters; but that the greatest mortification he felt, was leaving her behind: a flood of involuntary tears expressed her grief, at which her lover pretended great emotions. He attempted, but in vain, with flowery speeches, to dry up the current of her sorrow, and in a few days left her to bemoan her fate.

Her landlady, who was one of those elderly ladies in the world, who never fail profiting of an opportunity to turn every thing to advantage, perceiving her distress, and finding her a very fine girl, began to give, what the old gentlewoman called some good advice. "My dear," said she, "you do not know the men so well as I do—they are all frail by nature—never fix your heart upon any one, but make the most of them, turn them to your account. One has proved false, the next may do the same; but be before-hand with him, and induce him to make you a handsome settlement, or something similar, ere you yield to his wishes. You are now in your prime, and it is a pity those fine eyes should be spoilt with crying." Miss G— listened attentively to the matron's good council, and finding her finances in a disorderly state, she began to think there was more good sense in the advice than she was at first aware of.

In a word, the old lady introduced our hero to Miss G—, and finding her a girl entirely to his taste, he made her such proposals as she, with a becoming reluctance, thought at length proper to accept. Some months have now elapsed since the alliance has commenced, in the greatest harmony and mutual pleasure. His G. does every thing to divert his charmer, giving frequent concerts at his seat, chiefly for her amusement, while Miss G— exerts all her engaging assiduities to remain the empress of his heart.

The English Theatre.

SINCE the opening of the Theatre with the Productions of Messrs. Colman and Murphy, characterized in our last number, the transactions of them have not been important enough to assign them distinct and separate Articles.

The managers of both houses have used a proper caution in giving us specimens of their intended conduct. Good plays, and our best actors, have been produced rather earlier than usual. Mrs. Yates, Mrs. Barry, Mrs. Younge, Messrs. Barry, Smith, Reddish, &c. have been received by the public public with the applause they deserve. But the reception of Miss Catley, Miss Brown, and Mrs. Baddeley, sufficiently shew the taste and expectations of the great majority of those who attend the houses.

The managers of Drury-Lane accompanied the Brooms (mentioned in our last) with the tragedy of Jane Shore. The piece was well played. Reddish filled the character of Shore with a good deal of merit; and Smith was very decent in Hastings. Miss Young was capital in Alicia; and Mrs. Yates was tolerable, and but barely so, in Jane Shore. She should never be thrust into a part, where the tender feelings of pity are to be excited, merely to collect a mob to look at her.

Miss Brown, after having been lost some time to the public, in spite of her father, made her first appearance in Leonora in the Padlock. We would recommend to this young lady, to recollect herself; and not mistake the applause she received that night on her entrance, or afterwards in the course of her performance, in any light but the true one; that of encouragement, and to relieve her from that embarrass and distress, visible in her countenance and demeanour, and plainly perceivable by the failure of her voice, and her tremulous accents.

The Beggar's Opera was played three or four times at the same Theatre, towards the conclusion of this month, and the beginning of the ensuing, to very full houses; but nothing but the unrivalled pipe of Catley could have made the performance endurable. Mattocks performed the part of Macheath, in the style and manner of a maccaroni officer of the guards making love to his friend's lady, or amusing himself in small chat with a maid of honour. His wife played Polly, in the same style she plays lady Racket in the farce of Three Weeks after Marriage. Miss Brown succeeded Catley in Polly, and filled the cells of Newgate with all the affected quavers and warblings of a first serious Signora at the Opera-House. Catley succeeded Mrs. Mattocks in Lucy; and looked as if she had just made her escape not from Newgate as a domestic inmate, but as if she was journeying thither, from her own settled or vagrant residence in the Almshouse of St. Giles's. In spite of all those otherwise damning circumstances, the melody, strength, variety, and harmony of her voice surmounted all difficulties, to the no small emolument of her employers.

The tragedy of Matilda concluded the theatrical representations at Drury-Lane for the month of September. The play was, as might be expected, tolerably performed. Miss Younge is a very improving actress. She is certainly possessed of as just a sense of her author, and has as clear conceptions, as any one performer on either stage.

At Covent-Garden the play of the Distressed Mother was well supported, particularly by Mrs. Barry and Mrs. Hartley. Barry preserved his powers of voice astonishingly in Orestes; but his infirmities have totally unfitted him for so animated a character.

The Fair Penitent was attempted at Drury-Lane, but was cruelly mangled. Mr. Reddish was very decent in Lothario, Bensley poor in Horatio, and Aickin horrid in Scioto: Mrs. Yates and Miss Sherry, were little better in Calista and Lavinia.

We were pleased to see Miss Pope on her return from her Irish excursion. She is undoubtedly a good second-rate comic actress; but we do not think her trip from Drury-lane, has done her any essential service. She acquitted herself very well in Miss Sterling, in the Clandestine Marriage. King, as the familiar phrase is, was at home in Lord Ogleby; and however Mrs. Hopkins might have thought herself at home in Mrs. Heidelbergh, we may venture to say she did not seem to be at her brother Sterling's. As for the rest, we shall do them a favour in being silent.

In the same House, the managers continued to serve up Miss Catley in her several favourite characters, in the Maid of the Mill, Love in a Village, Jovial Crew, Comus, Golden Pippin, Midas, &c. &c. which can only furnish an occasion to us, to make one material observation, which is, that when she pleases to exert herself, we never remember to have heard one female singer since our first acquaintance with the stage, have a fuller, a clearer, nor a sweeter voice, except that of Amicis, who sung in the burlettas.

A young man has appeared at Drury-lane in the character of Jerry Sneak. He is said to be a taylor by trade, and we wish he had kept to his proper occupation. We are grieved to be put in mind of poor Tom Welton by copies of his attitudes and bodily appearance, while his eloquence, his expressions, his soul are gone for ever.

A Mr. Ward too has performed the part of Romeo, for the first time, at Covent-garden. The character of Romeo is one of the most difficult to execute of any on the English stage. The extremes of tenderness and desperation are most astonishingly delineated by the Poet; and they require a sensibility of heart, and a force and vigour of expression, which can but but seldom be found in the same performer. We wish, on Mr. Ward's account, as well as our own, that we could congratulate the public on the appearance of a Romeo. But Mr. Ward declains with solemn action, where he ought to discover exquisite sensibility, and speak almost in murmurs and in despair. He wants power both of body and voice, though he seems to rouse his passion, and to conceive his part better than in the tenderest scenes with Juliet. His person is rather genteel, but his countenance is sickly, inexpressive, and unpleasing. He has a little impediment in speaking, which throws his mouth into a disagreeable form. He walks the stage in measured steps, and was often more attentive to his attitude, dress, and hair, than to his part. On the whole, we were disappointed.

The Christmas Tale, altered by Mr. Garrick, has been introduced as an after-piece at Drury-lane. Though greatly shortened, it still contains nothing; and we were sorry to see the genius and abilities of Mr. Louthembourg so misemployed. The scenes and machines were all admirable; and we could not help wishing that the talents of this man, instead of being used to save paitry things from damnation, were united to those of a Shakespeare, to astonish or to enchant us into virtue.

As the Revolutions of the Theatrical, like those of the Political World, have always been thought of sufficient moment to engage the attention of the public, we shall make no apology for laying before our readers the following state of some Commotions which arose in Drury-lane during the course of this month, and seemed likely to terminate in the dissolution of that ancient Monarchy.

When Mr. Garrick first began to treat with Mr. Sheridan for the parting with his moiety of the Patent, &c. a difficulty was started by Mr. W. (Mr. Garrick's Solicitor), that by the old article subsisting between the late Mr. Lacey and Mr. Garrick—either party that should be desirous of selling his share, or any part of it, must first give due notice to the other—with the offer of the purchase; and not in any case to part with it, but during the vacation of the Theatre. Upon this the treaty between Mr. Garrick and Mr. Sheridan was suspended; nor was it renewed till the offer had been made to Mr. Lacey, and he had declined it, and declared his having no objection to Mr. Garrick's selling. The business then went on, and matters being agreed, the parties signed and sealed, relying on the faith of this article, that as they stood in Mr. Garrick's situation, the same preference was due to them, from Mr. Lacey, which he, as Successor to his father, had received from Mr. Garrick. This appearing so equitable to all the Partners, (Mr. Lacey, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ford, and Mr. Linley) they agreed to make the point as clear as possible. At a consequent meeting at Mr. Wallis's, they signified unanimously their consent to act under that obligation; and Mr. Wallis was empowered accordingly to specify it in the Articles of Partnership preparing for their use. Mr. Lacey, however, having attempted to introduce two new partners, Capt. Thompson, and Mr. R. Langford the auctioneer; the Partners who purchased of Mr. G. objected on the above ground to the bargain, as made without notice, in the midst of the season, and without the offer of the purchase, which they were ready to take on the same terms, or superior, if required; and continuing stiff in this opinion, remained firm in their resolution to exclude the said Partners. In consequence of this, the greatest confusions prevailed in the theatre, and the business of it dragged on very heavily, till at last they were happily composed, though not till after a suspension of two nights public entertainment. In consequence, Mr. Lacey inserted an advertisement in the Papers, "that having been called to account for his conduct in differing with his Partners, by giving a preference to another, in his intended disposal of part of his share in Drury lane theatre; he thinks it incumbent on him to declare the principles on which he acted. He did not conceive himself to be in the least bound by the article which had subsisted between his father and Mr. Garrick, and which had influenced Mr. Garrick in disposing of his share; nor did he conceive the proposed engagement between him and his present partners to be assented to, farther than for consideration; as he would be as far from breaking a contract of Honour as of Law. Confiding on this, he wished to serve a particular friend with the preference of what he thought might prove an advantageous situation to him; but as the satisfaction he could reap from any act of friendship would not compensate for the regret he should feel to have injured his partners, the prosperity of the theatre, or the entertainment of the public, he willingly foregoes his intention, and is at the same time happy to say, the Gentlemen whom he wished to serve, actuated by the same principles, have withdrawn every claim their treaty had given them."

The Life of Mr. John Aubrey.

AUBREY (JOHN) an able and industrious antiquary, was born at Easton-Piers, in Wiltshire, November 3, 1626. He received the first rudiments of his education in the grammar-school at Malmesbury, under Mr. Robert Latimer, who had also been preceptor to the celebrated Thomas Hobbes, with whom Mr. Aubrey commenced an early friendship, which lasted as long as Mr. Hobbes lived. On the 6th of May, 1642, Mr. Aubrey was entered a gentleman commoner of Trinity-college, in Oxford, where he pursued his studies with uncommon diligence, making the history and antiquities of England his peculiar study and delight. About this time the famous Monasticon Anglicanum was talked of in the university, to which Mr. Aubrey contributed considerable assistance, and procured at his own expence a curious draught of the remains of Osney-abbey, near Oxford, which were entirely destroyed in the civil wars. In 1646, he was admitted a student of the Middle-Temple, but the death of his father prevented his pursuing the law. He succeeded to several estates in the counties of Wilts, Surry, Hereford, Brecknock, and Monmouth; but they were involved in many law-suits. These suits, together with other misfortunes, by degrees consumed all his estates, and obliged him to lead a more active life than he was otherwise inclined to. He did not, however, break off his acquaintance with the learned at Oxford or at London: he kept up a close correspondence with the lovers of antiquity and natural philosophy in the university, and furnished Anthony Wood with a considerable part of the materials for his two large works.

Soon after the Restoration, Mr. Aubrey went into Ireland, and returning from thence in the autumn of 1660, narrowly escaped shipwreck near Holyhead. In the year 1662, he was admitted a fellow of the Royal Society. In June 1664, he travelled through France into Orleans, and returned in October. In 1666, he sold his estate in Wiltshire; and was at length obliged to dispose of all he had left, so that in the space of four years he was reduced even to want. His chief benefactress was the lady Long, of Draycot, in Wilts, who gave him an apartment in her November, 1776.

house, and supported him as long lived. He died about the year 1700. He was a man of an excellent capacity, great learning, and indefatigable application; a diligent searcher into antiquities, a good Latin poet, and an excellent naturalist; but somewhat credulous, and tainted with superstition. He wrote, 1. The Life of Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury. 2. Miscellanies. 3. A Perambulation of the County of Surry, in five volumes, oct. 70. 4. The Natural History of the North Division of Wiltshire. 5. Monumenta Britannica, or a Discourse concerning Stonehenge, and Roll-Rich Stones in Oxfordshire. 6. Architectonica Sacra: a Dissertation concerning the Manner of our Church-building in England. 7. The Idea of universal Education. There are besides many letters of our author's relating to natural philosophy, and other curious subjects, published in several collections.

The Life of James, Lord Audley.

Audley (James, Lord) of Heleigh, in Staffordshire, was born about the year 1314. In 1343, he was appointed governor of Berwick upon Tweed, and the two next years served in France. In 1349, he was created a knight of the most noble order of the Garter, then first founded; and, in 1353, he reduced a great part of the county of Valois. He distinguished himself on several occasions by his bravery, particularly at the glorious battle of Poitiers, in which, by the permission of Edward the Black Prince, he, with four esquires who attended him, charged the enemy in front, and performed wonders. In consideration of his signal proofs, the prince bestowed on him a grant of five hundred marks a year out of his own inheritance; which bounty he afterwards distributed among his four esquires. Edward being informed of this particular, applauded his generosity, confirmed the donation, and settled upon Audley six hundred marks a year out of the coinage of the stannaries of Cornwall. In 1360, he attended king Edward III. and his three sons, in their wars in France. For these services he was appointed constable of Gloucester-castle for life, as well as governor of Aquitaine, and seneschal of Poitou. He died on the 12th of April 1386, leaving his estate to his only son Nicholas, who died July 22, 1399, without issue.

The Life of Edmund Audley, Bishop of Salisbury.

Audley (Edmund) bishop of Salisbury, was the son of James, lord Audley. He was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, and, in 1466, took the degree of bachelor.

lor of arts. He afterwards obtained a prebend in the church of Lincoln, and another in the church of Wells, as also the archdeaconry of the East Riding of Yorkshire. In 1480, he was promoted to the bishopric of Rochester; in 1492, was translated to the see of Hereford; and ten years after to that of Salisbury. About the same time he was made chancellor of the order of the Garter. In 1518, he gave for a hundred pounds, to the college where he had been educated, to purchase lands, and bestowed upon it the patronage of a chantry, which he founded in the cathedral of Salisbury. He was likewise a benefactor to St. Mary's church, in Oxford, and contributed to the erection of its curious stone pulpit. As a farther mark of his respect to his mother-university, he gave to Chickley's Chest, which had been lately robbed, the sum of two hundred pounds, a considerable benefaction in those days. His death happened on the 23d of August, 1524.

The Life of Sir Thomas Audley.

Audley (Sir Thomas) lord-chancellor of England, in the reign of king Henry VIII. was descended of an ancient and honourable family in Essex, and born in 1488. After finishing his studies at the university, he removed to the inns of court, where he distinguished himself so much by his abilities, as to attract the notice of the duke of Suffolk, by whom he was recommended to the king. By his influence he was chosen speaker of that parliament which confirmed the king's divorce from Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage with Anne Boleyn. In 1530, he was made attorney of the duchy of Lancaster; and May 20, 1532, upon the resignation of Sir Thomas More, the king delivered to him the great-seal, with the title of lord-keeper, and, at the same time, conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In January following, the king appointed him lord-chancellor; and soon after granted him the site of the priory of Christ-church near Aldgate, together with all the church-plate and lands belonging to that house. In July 1535, he sat in judgment, and pronounced sentence of death upon Sir Thomas More, indicted of high-treason, for refusing to acknowledge the king's supremacy. On the 29th of November, 1538, he was created baron Audley of Walden, in Essex, and installed knight of the garter. He presided at the trials of bishop Fisher, Anne Boleyn, the marquiss of Exeter, and of several other eminent personages. A little before his death he obtained from the king a licence to change the name of Buckingham college, into that of Magdalen, or Maudlin. To this college he was a great benefactor, bestowed on it his own arms, and is generally reputed its founder. After enjoying the favour of his sovereign for the greatest part of his life, and the office of chancellor for upwards of twelve years, he died on the last day of April, 1544, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. Mr. Rapin says, he was a man of sound judgment, and was serviceable to the reformers, whenever he could be so without any hazard or danger to himself; but was too much a courtier to insist even upon what he judged reasonable, if it was disapproved by the king. Lloyd says, that he was always in favour with the queens, who had no less interest in the king's heart, than the kingdom had in his head; and that he knew king Henry's temper better than he did himself, whom he always surprised to his own bent, never moving any of his suits to him but when in haste, and most commonly amusing him with other matters until he passed his request.

The Life of St. Augustin or Auslin.

Augustin, or Auslin (St.) the first archbishop of Canterbury, was originally a monk in the convent of St. Andrew at Rome, and educated under St. Gregory, afterwards pope Gregory I. by whom he was dispatched into Britain with forty other monks of the same order, about the year 596, to convert the English Saxons to Christianity. They landed in the isle of Thanet, and having sent some French interpreters to king Ethelbert with an account of their errand, that prince gave them leave to convert as many of his subjects as they could, and appointed their place of residence at Canterbury; where, by their sermons in St. Martin's chapel, the austerity and innocence of their manners, and certain miracles which had an effect upon the vulgar, they gained a great number of proselytes. Soon after, the king himself openly espoused the Christian religion, and his example had a powerful influence in promoting the conversion of his subjects. Augustin, by direction of the pope, went afterwards to Arles in France, where he was consecrated archbishop and metropolitan of the English nation by the primate of that place. On his return to Britain he dispatched a priest and a monk to Rome, to acquaint the pope with the success of his labours, and to desire his resolution of certain questions. These men brought back a pall, and several books, vestments, utensils, and ornaments for the churches. His holiness, by the same messengers, gave Augustin directions concerning the settling of episcopal sees in Britain, and ordered him not to pull down down the idol temples, but convert them into Christian churches, only destroying the idols, and sprinkling the place with holy water, that the natives, by frequenting the temples they had been always accustomed to, might be less shocked at their entrance into Christianity. And, whereas, it had been the custom to sacrifice oxen to their false gods, he advised that upon the anniversary of each church's consecration, the people should erect booths around it, and feast therein, not sacrificing their oxen to devils, but killing them for their own refreshment, and praising God for the blessing. He further cautioned Augustin not to be puffed up with the miracles he was enabled to work in confirmation of his ministry; but to consider how much the English were the favourites of heaven, since God empowered him to alter the course of nature to promote their conversion.

Augustin fixed his see at Canterbury, and being supported by the interest of king Ethelbert, made an attempt to settle a correspondence with the British bishops, and to bring them to a conformity with the Roman church. To this purpose a conference was held at a place since called Augustin's Oak, in Worcestershire, but without success. The British prelates desired another conference, and Augustin agreeing to the proposal, they consulted a venerable hermit, who told them they might look upon Augustin as a man of God, if he was of a meek and lowly spirit, and behaved with that humility which ought to distinguish the followers of Christ. Persuaded that this was the real criterion of true holiness, they by the advice of this sage counsellor, delayed to appear at the place of appointment, until they knew Augustin was arrived; and then entering, they were received with all the state and haughtiness of a Roman emperor. He did not even rise from his seat at their approach, but insisted, in a peremptory manner, that they should keep the festival of Easter, and administer the sacrament of baptism, according to the practice of the Romish church; and that they should acknowledge the pope's authority: if they would comply in these respects, and assist in the conversion of the Saxons, he would bear with the disagreement of their customs in other cases. Far from being convinced by his arguments, and assured by his insolence that his call was not from above, they steadfastly persisted in refusing to conform with the Romish church, and to pay any other obedience to the bishop of Rome, than that which one Christian owes to another in meekness and charity: at the same time they declared, that the administration and supremacy of their church was under God, vested in the bishop of Caerleon.

Augustin, usually styled the Apostle of the English, died at Canterbury, in the year 604. The observation of the festival of St. Augustin was first enjoined in a synod held under Cuthbert archbishop of Canterbury, and afterwards by the pope's bull in the reign of king Edward III.

The Life of the Rev. Richard Aungervyle.

Aungervyle (Richard) commonly known by the name of Richard de Bury, was born at St. Edmundsbury in Suffolk, in the year 1281, and educated in the university of Oxford. When he had finished his studies in that noble seminary, he entered into the order of Benedictine monks, and became tutor to Edward prince of Wales, afterwards king Edward III. Upon the accession of his royal pupil to the throne, he was appointed cofferer, then treasurer of the wardrobe, archdeacon of Northampton, prebendary of Lincoln, Sarum, and Litchfield, and keeper of the privy-seal. In the five years in which he held this last place, he was twice sent ambassador to the pope. In 1333, he was made dean of Wells, and bishop of Durham. The next year he was appointed lord high chancellor, and, in 1336, treasurer of England. In 1338, he was twice sent with other commissioners, to treat of a peace with the king of France. He was one of the most learned men of his time, and a very great encourager of learning in others. He used to have some of his attendants read to him while he was at his meals, and afterwards to discourse with his chaplains upon the subject that had been read. He maintained a correspondence with some of the greatest geniuses of the age, particularly with the celebrated Italian poet Petrarch. He was naturally of a humane and benevolent temper, and performed many signal acts of charity; but the noblest instance of his generosity and munificence was the public library which he founded at Oxford, and built upon the spot where Trinity-college now stands. It continued till the dissolution of religious houses in the reign of king Henry VIII. when the books were dispersed into different repositories. He wrote a treatise intitled Philobiblos, for the regulation of his library; and a copy of this performance, in manuscript, is still to be seen in the Cotton library. Bishop Aungervyle died at his manor of Aukland, April the 24th, 1345, and was interred in the cathedral of Durham.

The Life of John Aylmer, Bishop of London.

Aylmer, or Ælmer, (John) bishop of London, was born of honourable parents at Aylmer-hall, in Norfolk, about the year 1521. When very young he became the favourite of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, afterwards duke of Suffolk, who entertained him as his scholar, and gave him an exhibition at the university of Cambridge, where, as Mr. Wood supposes, he took his degrees in arts; after which the marquis appointed him tutor to his children, among whom was the lady Jane Grey. He early adopted the opinions of the primitive reformers; and, under the patronage of the duke of Suffolk and the earl of Huntingdon, in the reign of king Edward VI. was for some time the only preacher in Leicestershire, and was highly instrumental in bringing over the people of that county to the protestant religion. In 1553, he obtained the archdeaconry of Stow, in the diocese of Lincoln. In the convocation which sat in the first year of queen Mary, he boldly opposed that return to popery, to which the body of the clergy seemed generally inclined; and was one of the six, who, in the midst of all the violences committed in the assembly, offered to dispute all the controverted points in religion, against the most learned champions of the Romanists.

The violent measures of queen Mary's ministry rendering his stay in England unsafe, he retired beyond sea, and resided first at Strasburgh, and afterwards at Zurich in Switzerland, where he undertook the instruction of several young gentlemen in classical learning and religion. During his exile he assisted John Fox in translating his Martyrology into Latin, and wrote a spirited answer to Knox's First Blast against the monstrous Regiment and Empire of Women; a pamphlet, says Mr. Granger, not only remarkable for its insolence in respect of the subject, but also for the acrimony of style which distinguishes the works of that turbulent reformer. On the accession of queen Elizabeth, Mr. Aylmer returned to England; and, in 1562, was promoted to the archdeaconry of Lincoln. On the 20th of October, 1573, he accumulated the degrees of bachelor and doctor in divinity. In 1576, on the translation of his friend and fellow-exile Dr. Edwin Sandys to the archbishopric of York, he was advanced to the see of London; and though Sandys had been very instrumental in his promotion, recommending him to the queen as a proper person for his successor, he sued him for dilapidations, and after some years litigation recovered nine hundred or one thousand pounds. It was usual with Aylmer, when he saw occasion to rouse the attention of his audience to his sermons, to take a Hebrew Bible out of his pocket, and read them a few verses, and then to resume his discourse. After the defeat of the Armada in 1589, he expressed in strong terms his disapprobation of certain libels against the king of Spain; on so glorious a victory, he said, it was better to thank God, than insult men, especially princes. He died at Fulham, the 3d of June, 1594, and was interred in his own cathedral of St. Paul.

Bishop Aylmer was an excellent logician and historian, and well skilled in the Hebrew tongue: he understood the civil law, divinity, and the ancient writers; and was a rhetorical, bold, and pathetic preacher. The following is an instance of his courage: queen Elizabeth was once grievously tormented with the tooth-ach, and, though it was absolutely necessary, she was afraid to have her tooth drawn; bishop Aylmer being present, in order to encourage her majesty, sat down in a chair, and calling the tooth-drawer, "Come, said he, though I am an old man, and have few teeth to spare, draw me this," which was accordingly performed; and the queen seeing him make so slight a matter of it, sat down, and permitted her's to be drawn also.

The Life of Sir George Ayscue.

Ayscue, or Ayscough, (Sir George) a brave English admiral in the seventeenth century. In the reign of Charles I. he was raised to the rank of a captain of a man of war; and in 1648, when the fleet revolted to prince Rupert, he declared for the parliament, and brought the Lion, which he then commanded, into the river Thames. He was the next year appointed admiral of the Irish seas, and was very instrumental in reducing the whole island to the obedience of the republic. In 1651, he forced Barbadoes, and several other British settlements in America, to submit to the commonwealth. In 1652, he attacked a Dutch fleet of forty sail, under the convoy of four men of war; of these he burned some, took others, and drove the rest on shore. Lilly tells us, in his Almanack for 1653, that he, the year before, engaged sixty sail of Dutch men of war with only fourteen or fifteen ships, and obliged them to give way. He protested against admiral Blake's retreat in that desperate action of the 29th of November, 1652, thinking it much more honourable to die by the shot of the enemy. This, and his great influence over the seamen, are supposed to have been the reasons for his being afterwards dismissed from his his command; on which occasion the parliament voted him a reward of three hundred pounds a year in Ireland, and three hundred pounds in money. He was afterwards a short time admiral in Sweden, under Charles Gustavus; but returned to England soon after the Restoration. When the Dutch war broke out in 1664, he went to sea as rear-admiral of the blue squadron, and behaved very gallantly in the battle of the third of June, 1665. On the earl of Sandwich's hoisting the royal flag, Sir George served as vice-admiral of the red; and in 1666, when prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle commanded, Sir George, in the Royal Prince, the largest ship in the fleet, bore the white flag, as admiral of the squadron, when he engaged the Dutch with his usual intrepidity, in that memorable battle which continued four days; but towards the evening of the third day, his ship unfortunately ran upon the Galloper sands, and he was compelled by his own seamen to strike; upon which the Dutch took them on board, and finding it impossible to bring off the Royal Prince, set her on fire. He was for some months detained a prisoner in Holland, and, during that time, was carried from town to town, and exposed to the people by way of triumph. On his return to England, he passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity, and never after went to sea.

The Life of Bishop Babington.

Babington (Gervase) bishop of Worcester, was born in Nottinghamshire, in the year 1551, and educated at Trinity-college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. On the 15th of July, 1578, he was incorporated master of arts at Oxford. He afterwards took the degree of doctor in divinity, and was appointed domestic chaplain to Henry earl of Pembroke, whose countess he is supposed to have assisted in her translation of the Psalms. By the interest of that nobleman he became treasurer of the church of Landaff, prebendary of Wellington in the cathedral of Hereford, and, in 1591, was advanced to the bishopric of Landaff, which he used jocularly to call Affe, the land thereof having been alienated by his predecessor Kitchin, in the days of king Henry VIII. and queen Elizabeth. In February 1594, he was translated to the see of Exeter; and, in October 1597, to that of Worcester: he was likewise appointed one of the council for the Marches of Wales. He bequeathed all his books, which were of considerable value, to the library of his cathedral at Worcester. His works consist of Notes on the Pentateuch, Expositions of the Creed and the Ten Commandments, and several Sermons. He died of the jaundice, May 17, 1610. He was a pattern of piety to the people, of learning to the clergy, and of wisdom to all governors.

The Life of Roger Bacon.

Bacon (Roger) an English Franciscan friar, was distinguished by the title of Doctor Mirabilis, on account of the penetration of his genius, and the amazing extent of his learning. He was descended of an ancient family, and born near Ilchester in Somersetshire, in the year 1214. He was first educated at Oxford; from whence he removed to the university of Paris, at that time much frequented by the English. Having been admitted to the degree of doctor, he returned to England, and took the habit of the Franciscan order in 1240, when he was about twenty-six years of age; but, according to others, he became a monk before he left France. After his return he was considered as a most able and indefatigable enquirer after knowledge by the greatest men of that university, who generously contributed to defray the expences of advancing science by experiments, the method which he had determined to follow. His discoveries were little understood by the generality of mankind; and because by the help of mathematical knowledge he performed things beyond the reach of common understandings, he was suspected of magic. He was persecuted particularly by his own fraternity, who would not receive his works into their library; and at last they had interest enough with the general of their order to get him imprisoned; so that, as he himself confesses, he had reason to repent of his having taken such pains in the arts and sciences. Bacon was possessed with the notion of judicial astrology. He imagined that the stars had a great influence upon human affairs, and by their means he imagined future things might be foretold. This, according to Dr. Jebb, making the friars of his order consider him as a person engaged in unlawful arts, occasioned his imprisonment.

At the particular desire of pope Clement IV. Bacon collected and enlarged his several pieces, and sent them to him in the year 1267. This collection is still extant, in a beautiful folio, neatly and accurately printed by William Bowyer, at London, A. D. 1733, under the title of "Fratris Rogeri Bacon ordinis minorum Opus Majus ad Clementem quartum pontificem Romanum: ex MS Codice Dubliniensi, cum aliis quibusdam collato." This work is, in some measure, a complete plete system of science, built upon free enquiry and useful experiments.

When Bacon had been confined ten years in prison, Jerom d'Ascoli, general of his order, who had condemned his doctrine, was chosen pope, and assumed the name of Nicholas IV. As he was reputed a person of great abilities, and one who had turned his thoughts to philosophical studies, Bacon resolved to apply to him for his discharge; and, in order to shew both the innocence and utility of his studies, addressed to him a treatise on the Means of avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age. What effect this treatise had on his holiness does not appear. At length, however, by the interest of some noblemen, Bacon recovered his liberty, and returning to England, ended his days at Oxford, in 1292, or, according to others, in 1294. His body was interred in the church of the Franciscans.

"He was (says Dr. Peter Shaw, a very able judge of his merit) beyond all comparison, the greatest man of his time; and might, perhaps, stand in competition with the greatest that have appeared since. It is astonishing, considering the ignorant age wherein he lived, how he came by such a depth of knowledge on all subjects. His writings are composed with that elegance, conciseness, and strength, and abound with such just and exquisite observations on nature, that, among all the chemists, we do not know his equal. He writ many treatises, some of which are lost, or locked up in private libraries. What relate to chemistry, are principally two small pieces, wrote at Oxford, which are now in print, and the manuscripts to be seen in the public library of Leyden, having been carried thither, among Vossius's manuscripts, from England. In these he attempts to shew, how imperfect metals may be ripened into perfect ones. He adopts Geber's notion, that mercury is the common basis of all metals, and sulphur the cement; and shews, that it is by a gradual depuration of the mercurial matter, and the accession of a subtle sulphur, that nature produces gold; and that if, during the process, any other third matter happens to intervene, besides the mercury and sulphur, some other baser metal will arise; so that, if we could but imitate nature's method, we might change other metals into gold.

"Having compared, (says the same ingenious writer) several of friar Bacon's operations with the modern experiments of M. Homberg, made by the direction of that curious prince the duke of Orleans, we judge that Bacon has described some of the very things which Homberg publishes as new discoveries. Thus, for instance, Bacon teaches expressly, that if a pure sulphur be united with mercury, it will produce gold; on which very principle M. Homberg has made many experiments for the production of gold, described in the Memoires de l'Academie Roy. des Sciences, An. 1705. His other physical writings display no less genius and strength of mind. In his treatise, Of the secret Works of Art and Nature, he shews, that a person who was perfectly acquainted with the manner which nature observes in her operations, would not only be able to rival, but surpass her. In another piece, Of the Nullity of Magic, he shews, with great sagacity and penetration, whence the notion sprang, and how weak all pretensions to it are. From a repeated perusal of his works, we find our friar was no stranger to many of the capital discoveries of the present and past ages. Gun-powder he certainly knew: thunder and lightning, he tells us, may be produced by art; for that sulphur, nitre, and charcoal, which, when separate, have no sensible effect, yet, when mixed together in a due proportion, and closely confined, and fired, they yield a loud report. A more precise description of gun-powder cannot be given in words; and yet a Jesuit, Barthol. Schwartz, some ages after, has had the glory of the discovery. He likewise mentions a sort of inextinguishable fire prepared by art; which shews he was not unacquainted with phosphorus: and that he had a notion of the rarefaction of the air, and the structure of an air-pump, is past contradiction."

Dr. Friend ascribes the honour of introducing chemistry into Europe to Bacon, who, he observes, speaks in some part or other of his works, of almost every operation now used in chemistry, and describes the method of making tinctures and elixirs. "He was the miracle (says Friend) of the age he lived in, and the greatest genius, perhaps, for mechanical knowledge, that ever appeared in the world since Archimedes: he appears likewise to have been master of the whole science of optics." He has very accurately described the uses of reading-glasses, and shewn the way of making them: Dr. Friend remarks, that he also describes the camera obscura, and all sorts of glasses which magnify or diminish objects, by bringing them nearer to the eye, or removing them to a greater distance. Bacon tells us himself, that he had a great number of burning-glasses; and that there were none ever in use among the

Latins,

Latins, till his friend Peter de Maharn Curia applied himself to the making of them. That the telescope was not unknown to him, is evident from a passage wherein he says, that he was able to form glasses in such a manner, with respect to our sight and the objects, that the rays shall be refracted and reflected wherever we please, so that we may see a thing under what angle we think proper, either near or at a distance, and be able to read the smallest letters, at an incredible distance, and to count the dust and sand, on account of the greatness of the angle under which we see the objects; and also that we shall scarce see the greatest bodies near us, on account of the smallness of the angle under which we view them. His skill in astronomy was amazing: he discovered that error which occasioned the reformation of the calendar; one of the greatest efforts, according to Dr. Jebb, of human industry: and his plan for correcting it was followed by pope Gregory XIII. with this variation, that Bacon would have had the correction to begin from the birth of our Saviour, whereas Gregory's amendment reaches no higher than the Nicene council.

The Life of Sir Nicholas Bacon.

Bacon (Sir Nicholas) lord-keeper of the great seal in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was descended of an ancient and honourable family, and born at Chislehurst in Kent, in 1510. He was educated at Bennet college, in Cambridge, where he afterwards founded six scholarships (appropriating three of them to the school which he built at Botesdale) and gave two hundred pounds towards erecting a new chapel. After leaving college, he travelled into France, and at his return settled in Gray's-inn, where he applied himself to the study of the law with such assiduity, that he soon became one of the most distinguished in the profession. In 1537, he was appointed solicitor of the court of augmentation. He presented to king Henry VIII. a scheme for a seminary of statesmen, by founding a college for the study of the civil law, and the teaching of the Latin and French languages in their purity. Young gentlemen of distinguished parts, after being sufficiently instructed in these things, were to be sent abroad with ambassadors; whilst others were to write the history of all embassies, treaties, and other foreign transactions, and of all arrangements and public trials at home. This plan was never carried into execution; but at the dissolution of the monasteries, the king gave its author a grant of several manors in Suffolk, to be held in capite by knight's service; and, in 1546, promoted him to the office of attorney in the court of wards. He enjoyed the same office under king Edward VI. and, by his prudence and moderation, kept himself safe during the dangerous reign of queen Mary.

Upon the accession of queen Elizabeth he was created a knight; and Dr. Heath, archbishop of York and chancellor of England, refusing to concur with the queen's measures, the great seal was taken from him, and delivered to Sir Nicholas Bacon, with the title of lord-keeper, and all the powers of a chancellor, which no former lord-keeper ever had, being only empowered to put the seal to such writs or patents as passed of course, and not to hear causes, or preside in the house of lords. His known dislike to popery, and his favouring, for this reason, the title of the house of Suffolk to the crown, rather than that of the queen of Scots, drew upon him a suspicion of being concerned in a tract written by Mr. John Hales, clerk of the hanaper, in favour of the Suffolk title; in consequence of which, he received an order from the queen not to appear at court, or intermeddle in any other public business than that of chancery: even the seal would, at the instigation of the earl of Leicester, have been taken from him, and given to Sir Anthony Brown, who had been lord chief-justice of the Common-pleas in queen Mary's time, if this gentleman's religion, which was that of the church of Rome, would have permitted his accepting of it. By the interest of Sir William Cecil, who by some is thought to have been also privy to Hales's book, Sir Nicholas was restored to the queen's favour. He had a considerable share in the settling of religion: as a statesman, he was remarkable for a clear head and deep counsels; but his great parts and high preferment were far from raising him in his own opinion, as appears from the modest and polite answer he gave queen Elizabeth, when he told him his house at Redgrave was too little for him: "Not so, madam, replied he, but your majesty has made me too great for my house." Towards the latter end of his life he grew very corpulent, which made queen Elizabeth say merrily, that "Sir Nicholas's soul lodged well." To himself, however, this bulk was very cumbersome; for, after walking from Westminster-hall to the Star-chamber, which was a very little way, he was usually so much out of breath, that the lawyers forbore speaking at the bar till he recovered himself, and gave them notice of it by knocking with his staff. At length, after having held the great seal for the space of twenty years, this able statesman and faithful counsellor was suddenly removed from this life, as Mr. Mallet informs us, by the following accident: he was under the hands of the barber, and thinking the weather warm, had ordered a window before him to be thrown open, but fell asleep as the current of fresh air was blowing in upon him, and when he awaked, found himself distempered all over: "Why, said he to the servant, did you suffer me to sleep thus exposed?" the fellow replied, that he durst not presume to disturb him: "Then, said the lord-keeper, by your civility I lose my life;" and so removed into his bed-chamber, where he died a few days after, on the 20th of February, 1578-9, equally lamented by the queen and her subjects. He was interred in St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 9th of March following.

The great Sir Francis Bacon says, that his father, the lord-keeper, was "a man plain, direct, and constant, without all finesse and doubleness; and one that was of the mind that a man in his private proceedings and estate, and in the proceedings of state, should rest upon the soundness and strength of his own courses, and not upon practice to circumvent others, according to the sentence of Solomon, "Vir prudens advertit ad gressus suos; stultus autem divertit ad dolos:" inasmuch that the bishop of Ross, [the Scotch ambassador, who made the complaint against him in the affair of Hales's book] a subtle and observing man, said of him, that he could fasten no words upon him, and that it was impossible to come within him, because he offered no play.

The Life of Anne Bacon.

Bacon (Anne) was the second daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, preceptor to king Edward VI. and was born about the year 1528. She had a very liberal education, and became eminent for her skill in the Greek, Latin, and Italian languages. She was married to the above-mentioned Sir Nicholas Bacon, by whom she had two sons, Anthony and Francis, whose distinguished abilities were greatly improved by the tender care of so accomplished a mother. She translated, from the Italian into English, twenty-five sermons written by Bernardine Ochino, on predestination and election; and, from the Latin, bishop Jewel's Apology for the Church of England. She survived her husband Sir Nicholas, and is supposed to have died about the beginning of the reign of king James I. at Gorhambury, near St. Alban's.

The Life of Lord Viscount St. Alban's.

Bacon (Francis) lord Verulam, viscount St. Alban's, and lord high chancellor of England, was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper of the great-seal, by Anne his second wife; and was born at York-house in the Strand, on the 22d of January, 1561. He gave very early indications of a superiority of genius: and Elizabeth took such delight in trying him with questions, and received so much satisfaction from the good sense and manliness of his answers, that she used to call him, in mirth, her young lord-keeper. One saying of his is particularly mentioned: the queen having asked him his age, while he was yet a boy, he answered readily, that, "he was just two years younger than her majesty's happy reign." He was sent to study in the university of Cambridge under Dr. Whitgift, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, and was entered of Trinity-college in his twelfth year. The progress he made was rapid and uncommon; for he had run through the whole circle of the liberal arts, as they were then taught, before he was sixteen. But what is far more surprising, he began, even then, to see through the emptiness and futility of the philosophy in vogue; and to conjecture, that useful knowledge must be raised on other foundations, and built up with other materials, than had been employed through a tract of many centuries backward. In this, his own genius, aided by a singular discernment, must have been his only preceptor. In matters of reasoning, the authority of Aristotle was still acknowledged infallible in the schools: and our author may be justly styled the first great reformer of philosophy. He had the prepossessions, the voluminous and useless reading, nay he had the vanity of men grown old in contrary opinions, to struggle with: yet he lived to see a considerable revolution on his side. Another age brought over the learned of all nations to his party.

Bacon was little more than sixteen years of age when his father called him from the university, in order to attend Sir Amias Pawlet, the queen's ambassador, into France, and to improve himself in the knowledge of the world under that minister. It appears that the ambassador soon conceived a favourable opinion of young Bacon; for he sent him over to the queen with a commission that required secrecy and dispatch; of which he acquitted himself with applause, and then returned to Paris. From thence he made some excursions into the French provinces, that he might be the better acquainted with the

the country, residing for some time at Poitiers. The native turn of Bacon's mind, which was strongly inclined to reflection and enquiry, led him to make the most accurate observations on the customs and manners of the nations of Europe, on the characters of their princes, and on the constitution of their several governments. As a proof of this, there is still extant among his works, a paper of observations on the general state of Europe, written by him shortly after this time, when he was nineteen years of age.

As he was the youngest son, so he seems to have been the favourite of his father, who had set apart a considerable sum of money to purchase an estate for him, in his absence. But before this kind intention could take effect, the lord-keeper died suddenly; by which means there remained to his youngest son only the small proportion of a sum, which was to be divided among five brothers. Soon after his father's death, Mr. Bacon returned to England; and the narrowness of his circumstances obliging him to think of some profession for a subsistence, he applied himself to the study of the common law. For that purpose he placed himself in the society of Gray's Inn, where his superior talents rendered him the ornament of the house; as the gentleness and affability of his deportment won him the affection of all its members.

He quickly rose to so much eminence and reputation in his profession as a lawyer, that, at the age of twenty-eight years, he was named by queen Elizabeth her learned council extraordinary. It was, however, next to impossible, that so noble a genius, born to embrace the whole compass of science, should confine its researches within the narrow and perplexed study of precedents and authorities; a study hedged round with brambles and thorns, dark and barbarous in its beginnings, and rendered in its progress still more obscure, by the learned dulness of commentators and compilers; men, for the most part, of indefatigable industry, and of no spirit or discernment. Accordingly we find that in this interval he often gave full scope to his conceptions; surveying the whole state of learning, observing its defects, and imagining the proper methods to supply them. This he first attempted in a treatise which he entitled, The greatest Birth of Time; and though the piece itself is supposed to be lost, it appears to have been the first outlines of that amazing design, which he afterwards filled up and finished in his Grand Instauration of the Sciences.

In 1593, Mr. Bacon was chosen member of parliament for the county of Middlesex, 1776.

He frequently distinguished himself in the house of Commons, where he spoke often, and with great force and eloquence; and though he usually joined with the court party, yet he was looked upon as a friend to the people. It appears that he once drew upon himself the displeasure of the queen, by opposing the payment of three subsidies in less than six years; which he strongly argued against, alledging the necessities of the people, the danger of raising public discontents, and of setting an evil precedent against themselves and their posterity.

As Sir William Cecil, lord treasurer to queen Elizabeth, afterwards lord Burleigh, had married Mr. Bacon's aunt, he frequently applied to him for some place of credit and service in the state; but Sir William never procured any thing for him, except the reversion of the office of register to the Star-chamber, then reckoned worth about one thousand six hundred pounds a year, which did not fall to him till near twenty years afterwards; and, as he probably thought himself neglected by his uncle, he attached himself strongly to the earl of Essex; which of course made his uncle, and also his cousin, Sir Robert Cecil, his enemies; for when the earl, a little before his fall, warmly solicited his being made solicitor-general, it was opposed by his cousin Sir Robert, who represented him to the queen as a man of mere speculation, and more likely to distract her affairs than to serve her usefully and with judgment: and as the earl found he could not serve him in this way, he gave him a recompence out of his own estate, by making him a present of Twickenham-park and its garden of Paradise.

Bacon long kept up a friendly correspondence with Essex, who often asked his advice on affairs of importance, and received such counsel from him, as would certainly have been of the utmost advantage to him, if he had been prudent enough to follow it. But Bacon's advice, however salutary, not being agreeable to the earl's temper and views, a coldness ensued between them: and when the earl was at length brought to a trial for high-treason, Bacon appeared against him as one of the queen's counsel. In justice to Bacon it should be observed, that though he openly pleaded against Essex, there is great reason to believe that, in private, he really endeavoured to serve him under his misfortunes. But notwithstanding this, his open appearance against the man who had treated him with such uncommon friendship and generosity, justly subjected him to reproach. After the death of Essex, the reflections of the people on the prevailing party at court, and even on the queen herself, were so severe and so general, that the administration thought it necessary to vindicate their conduct in a public appeal to the people. This task was assigned to Bacon, even then in high esteem for his excellencies as a writer. Some say it was by his enemies insidiously imposed upon him, to divert the national resentment from themselves upon a particular person, who was known to have lived in friendship with Essex, and whom they intended to ruin in the public esteem. If such was their intention, they succeeded but too well in it: for never man incurred more universal or more lasting censure than Bacon did by this writing. He was every where traduced as one who endeavoured to murder the good name of his benefactor, after the ministry had destroyed his person. His life was even threatened; and it is said that he went in daily hazard of assassination. This obliged him to publish, in his own defence, that vindication of himself which we find among his writings. It is intitled, The Apology of Francis Bacon, in certain Imputations concerning the late Earl of Essex. He alleged, that he owed duty and obedience to the queen, which he thought ought not to be sacrificed to his private obligations to the earl of Essex; and that he did no more than what as a loyal subject he was bound to do, in the way of his profession.

On the death of queen Elizabeth, Mr. Bacon was very early in his homage and application for favour to the new sovereign, king James I. On the 23d of July, 1603, the king conferred on him the honour of knighthood. On the 25th of August, 1604, he was constituted, by patent, one of his majesty's learned council, with a fee of forty pounds a year. And the king granted him the same day, by another patent under the great seal, a pension of sixty pounds a year, for special services received from his brother Anthony Bacon and himself. In 1605, Sir Francis Bacon recommended himself to the king's particular notice, as well as to the general esteem of his contemporaries, by publishing a work which he had long meditated, and which he dedicated to the king, entitled, Of the Proficiency and Advancement of Learning, in two books. The great aim of this treatise, no less original in the design than happy in the execution, was to survey accurately the whole state and extent of the intellectual world; what parts of it had been unsuccessfully cultivated; what lay still neglected, or unknown; and by what methods these might be discovered, and those improved, to the farther advantage of society and human nature. By exposing the errors and imperfections of our knowledge, he led mankind into the only right way of reforming the one, and supplying the other: he taught them to know their wants. He even went farther, and pointed out to them general methods of correction and improvement in the whole circle of arts and sciences. This work he first published in English; but to render it of more extensive use, he, after his retirement, very much enlarged and corrected the original, and with the assistance of some friends turned the whole into Latin. This is the edition of 1623; and stands as the first part to his grand Instauracion of the Sciences.

Sir Robert Cecil, now earl of Salisbury, who had opposed the progress of Bacon's fortune under Elizabeth, appears to have observed the same conduct towards him in the present reign, till he had fixed himself in the king's favour so firmly, as to be above all fear of a rival; and then he seems to have been somewhat disposed to favour his kinsman. But Sir Francis Bacon found a formidable enemy in the famous Sir Edward Coke, now attorney-general. The quarrel between them seems to have been personal; and it lasted to the end of their lives. The place which Sir Francis Bacon had so long expected, he at length obtained; for, in 1607, he was appointed solicitor general.

In 1610, he published another treatise, intitled, Of the Wisdom of the Ancients. There have been very few books written either in this or in any other nation, which deserved or met with more general applause than this, and scarce any that are like to retain it longer; for in all this performance, Sir Francis Bacon gave a singular proof of his capacity to please all parties in literature; as, in his political conduct, he stood fair with all the parties in the nation. The admirers of antiquity were charmed with this discourse, which seems expressly calculated to justify their admiration: and, on the other hand, their opposites were no less pleased with a piece, from which they thought they could demonstrate, that the sagacity of a modern genius had found out much better meanings for the ancients than ever were meant by them. In this admirable work, our author has laid open, with great sagacity and penetration, the secret meaning of the physical, moral, and political fables of antiquity; in doing which, he very wisely and prudently took occasion to throw out many observations of his own; for for which he could not have found otherwise so favourable an opportunity.

In 1611, he was constituted judge of the Marshal's-court, jointly with Sir Thomas Vavasor, then knight-marshal. In 1613, he succeeded Sir Henry Hobart in the office of attorney-general. The parliament, at this time, though they were extremely out of humour with the ministers in general, distinguished Bacon by an unusual mark of favour and confidence. An objection having been started in the House of Commons, that a seat there was incompatible with the office of attorney-general, which required his frequent attendance in the upper-house, the commons, from their particular regard for Sir Francis Bacon, and in consideration of his former services in parliament, overruled the objection; though for that time only: and he was accordingly permitted to take his place among them.

When Sir George Villiers, afterwards duke of Buckingham, became possessed of king James's confidence, Sir Francis Bacon took great pains to cultivate the good-will of the favourite, to whom he was so subservient, that he submitted to be a sort of steward for those great estates bestowed upon Villiers by the king. However, it appears from his letters, and other writings, that he generally gave good advice to his patrons: but, when he found that they would not follow his, he was ready to follow theirs without reserve; tho' it does not appear that he was in the least concerned in the treasonable practices of the earl of Essex; which was, perhaps, more owing to his want of courage than his want of ambition. As Sir Francis was extremely submissive, and often useful to his patrons; so he was diligent, and but too ready to use any means for getting the better of those whom he thought his rivals; as appeared upon the resignation of the old lord-chancellor Egerton, in 1617. The seals he was highly ambitious of; and as he looked upon Sir Edward Coke as his rival, he took care to represent him to the king and Buckingham, as one who abounded in his own sense, and who, by an affectation of popularity, was likely to court the good-will of the people at the hazard of the prerogative. In this he was the more easily believed, as Sir Edward had been but the year before chief-justice, because the ministers found him not so ductile as they wished him to be. Accordingly the seals were delivered to Sir Francis, with the title of lord keeper; and, in 1619, he was created lord high-chancellor of England, and baron of Verulam; and, the year following, viscount St. Alban's.

Neither the weight and variety of public business, nor the pomps of a court, could divert the attention of Bacon from the study of philosophy. In 1620, he published his Novum Organum Scientiarum, as a second part to his Grand Instauration of the Sciences: a work that for twelve years together he had been methodizing, altering, and polishing, till he had labour'd the whole into a series of Aphorisms, as it now appears. Of all his writings this seems to have undergone the strictest revision*, and to be finished with the severest judgment. Indeed, the form into which it is cast admits of nothing foreign, of nothing merely ornamental. The lights and embellishments of imagination, the grace and harmony of style, are rejected here, as beauties either superfluous, or of an inferior nature. Of all his writings this has been the least read or understood†. It was intended as a more useful, a more extensive logic, than the world had yet been acquainted with. An art not conversant about syllogisms and modes of argumentation, that may be serviceable sometimes in arranging truths already known, or in detecting fallacies that lie concealed among our own reasonings, and those of other men: but an art inven-

N O T E S.

* Dr. Rawley assures us, that he had seen twelve copies of this work revised, altered, and corrected year by year, before it was reduced into the form in which it was published.

† The celebrated Voltaire, in his Letters concerning the English Nation, says, "The most singular and the best of all lord Bacon's pieces, is that which is most useless and least read: I mean his Novum Scientiarum Organum. This is the scaffold with which the new philosophy was raised, and when the edifice was built, part of it at least, the scaffold was no longer of service. The lord Bacon was not yet acquainted with nature, but then he knew, and pointed out, the several paths which led to it. He had despised, in his younger years, the thing called Philosophy in the universities; and did all that lay in his power to prevent those societies of men, instituted to improve human reason, from depraving it by their quiddities, their horrors of vacuum, their substantial forms, and all those impertinent terms, which not only ignorance had rendered venerable, but which had been made sacred by their being ridiculously blended with religion."

tive of arts; productive of new discoveries, real and important, and of general use to human life. This he proposed, by turning our attention from notions to things; from those subtle and frivolous speculations that dazzle, not enlighten, the understanding, to a sober and sensible investigation of the laws and powers of nature, in a way becoming philosophers who make truth and information the sole aim of their inquiries. In order to this, his first endeavour was to weed out of the mind such errors as naturally grow in it, or have been planted there by education, and cherished by the influence of men, whose writings had long claimed a right of prescription to rule and mislead mankind. To a mind thus prepared for instruction, he proposes the second and scientific part of his scheme, the true method of interpreting nature, by fact and observation; by sound and genuine induction, widely differing from that puerile art, which till then had solely prevailed in philosophy. His requires a sufficient, an accurate collection of instances, gathered with sagacity, and recorded with impartial plainness, on both sides of the question; from which, after viewing them in all possible lights, to be sure that no contradictory instances can be brought, some portion of useful truth, leading on to further discoveries, may be at last fairly deduced. In this way experiments and reasonings grow up together, to support and illustrate each other mutually, in every part of science.

On the 12th of October, 1620, lord Bacon sent a copy of his Novum Organum Scientiarum to the King, who thereupon wrote the following letter to his lordship with his own hand:

“To the Lord Chancellor.

“My very good Lord,

“I have received your letter, and your book, than the which you could not have sent a more acceptable present unto me. How thankful I am for it, cannot better be expressed by me, than by a firm resolution I have taken; first to read it through with care and attention, though I should steal some hours from my sleep, having otherwise as little spare time to read it as you to write it: and then to use the liberty of a true friend, in not sparing to ask you the question, in any point whereof I shall stand in doubt: as, on the other part, I will willingly give a due commendation to such places, as, in my opinion, shall deserve it. In the mean time I can with comfort assure you, that you could not have made choice of a subject more befitting your place, and your universal and methodical knowledge: and in the general, I have already observed, that you jump with me, in keeping the mid-way between the two extremes; as also in some particulars, I have found that you agree fully with my opinion. And so praying God to give your work as good success as your heart can wish, and your labours deserve, I bid you heartily farewell.

“Oct. 16, 1620.

Lord Bacon also sent three copies of this work to Sir Henry Wotton; and how much that eminent man valued the present, we may learn from his own words, in a letter to Bacon. “Your lordship, (says he) hath done a great and ever-living benefit to all the children of nature, and to nature herself in her uttermost extent of latitude, who never before had so noble, nor so true an interpreter, or (as I am readier to style your lordship) never so inward a secretary of her cabinet. But of your work, which came but this week to my hands, I shall find occasion to speak more hereafter; having yet read only the first book thereof, and a few aphorisms of the second. For it is not a banquet that men may superficially taste, and put up the rest in their pockets; but, in truth, a solid feast, which requireth due mastication. Therefore, when I have once, myself, perused the whole, I determine to have it read, piece by piece, at certain hours, in my domestic college, as an ancient author: for I have learned thus much by it already, that we are extremely mistaken in the computation of antiquity, by searching it backwards; because, indeed, the first times were the youngest; especially in points of natural discovery and experience.”

But while the lord Bacon was thus acquiring the highest reputation as a philosopher, and exciting the universal admiration of the learned, he was about to suffer a melancholy reverse of fortune, and to become the object of public disgrace and punishment. In the parliament which was assembled in January, 1621, an inquiry was made into several national grievances; and among other things, a committee was appointed by the house of commons, to enquire into the abuses of the courts of justice. It does not appear that this was set on foot with any particular view to Bacon: however, in the course of these inquiries, on the 14th and 15th of March, he was accused for taking of bribes, in causes which had depended before him as chancellor; of which information was given to the marquis of Buckingham, by letters of the same date, from Mr. secretary Calvert and Sir Lionel Cranfield, both Members of the House of Commons. Several other members, gentlemen of reputation, and of the law, spoke in his lordship's behalf; as did Sir Edward Sackville, who was his particular friend: and when Sir Robert Phillips, the chairman of the committee, made his report, he made it with great tenderness, because, he said, "It concerned the honour of a great man, so endued with all parts, both of art and nature, that he would say no more of him, being not able to say enough." At a conference, on the 19th of the same month, between certain members of both houses, the lords agreed to take this affair into their speedy consideration. As soon as the matter was become the subject of public talk, more accusations against him were brought, and an impeachment or charge, consisting of several articles, preferred to the lords against him. On the day this complaint was made to the House of Lords, the marquis of Buckingham presented a letter from the lord chancellor, who was then sick, wherein he desired four things of their lordships. "First, that they would maintain him in their good opinion till his cause was heard. Secondly, that they would give him a convenient time, as well in regard of his ill-state of health, as of the importance of the charge, to make his defence. Thirdly, that they would allow him to except against the credit of the witnesses against him, to cross-examine them, and to produce evidence in his own defence. And fourthly, that in case there came any more petitions of the like nature, that their lordships would not take any prejudice at their number, considering that they were against a judge, that made two thousand orders and decrees in a year."

But lord Bacon soon relinquished his design of entering into a long and formal defence of himself. On the contrary, he threw himself on the mercy of the house, by an humble submission, which he drew up in writing, and prevailed upon the prince of Wales, afterwards king Charles I. to present to the house of Peers; which he did on the 24th of April, when this matter came again under their lordships consideration. But the lords were not satisfied with his letter of general confession, though he renounced in it all justification of himself, and sued for no other favour, "but that his penitent submission might be his sentence, and the loss of the seals his punishment." He was obliged to put in a particular answer to every point of his accusation; which he did on the 1st of May, 1621, acknowledging, in the most explicit words, the corruption charged on him in twenty eight several articles, and throwing his cause entirely on the compassion of his judges. On the second of May his lordship resigned the great-seal; and the following day the lords, by the mouth of the lord chief justice, their speaker pro tempore, pronounced the following sentence: "That the viscount St. Alban's, lord chancellor of England, shall undergo a fine or ransom of forty thousand pounds; that he shall be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure; that he shall for ever be incapable of any office, place, or employment in the state or common-wealth; and that he shall never sit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court." Thus he lost the great privilege of his peerage; a severity unusual, except in cases of treason and attainder.

The last article of his charge furnishes matter for much reflection. It alledges, "that he had given way to great exactions in his servants, both in respect of private seals, and otherwise for sealing injunctions." This indulgence to his domestics, which was certainly extreme, has been generally reckoned the principal cause of those irregularities that drew on his disgrace. Liberal in his own temper, or rather profuse beyond the condition of a man who means to preserve his integrity, he allowed his family in every kind of extravagance*: and as many of his retinue were young, dissipated, and giddy in the pursuit of pleasure, they squandered away without measure, where they were indulged without controul†. Whether he did not discover this error till it was too late, or whether a soul like his, lost in the greatness and immensity of its own views, could not attend to that detail of little and disagreeable particulars which œconomy requires; however that was, to support his ordinary train of living, he fell into corruption himself, and connived at it in his dependants. Thus we behold him a memorable example of all that is great and exalted, of all that is little and low, in man. Rushworth says of Bacon, that "this learned peer, eminent over the Christian world for his many writings extant in print, was known to be no admirer of money, yet had the unhappiness to be defiled therewith: he treasured up nothing, either for himself or his family, for he both lived and died in debt; yet he was over-indulgent to his servants, and connived at their takings, and their ways betrayed him to that error; they were profuse and expensive, and had at their command whatever he was master of. The gifts taken were, for the most part, for interlocutory orders; his decrees were generally made with so much equity, that though gifts rendered him suspected for injustice, yet never any decree made by him was reversed as unjust, as it hath been observed by some knowing in our laws."

N O T E S.

* A gentleman once expressing some disapprobation of his liberality to his retinue, lord Bacon said to him, "Sir, I am all of a piece; if the head be lifted up, the inferior parts of the body must be so too." Tennison's Baconiana.

† One day, during his trial, as he was passing thro' a room where several of his domestics were sitting; upon their rising up to salute him, he cried, "Sit down, my masters; your rise hath been my fall."

After a short confinement in the Tower, his lordship was set at liberty; and upon the prorogation of the parliament in some heat, the king was pleased to consult with him in what manner he should proceed in the reformation of the courts of justice, and the other grievances which the Commons had been enquiring into; upon which he drew up a memorial on the subject, which is printed among his works. The king afterwards permitted him, by a licence dated the 13th of September, 1621, to stay at Sir John Vaughan's house at Parson's Green, and at London, for six weeks, and he then retired, by the king's command, to his own house at Gorhambury. It was probable at this time that the incident happened, which is related by Dr. Goodman. Prince Charles, we are told, coming to London, saw at a distance a coach followed by a considerable number of people on horseback, and upon enquiry, was informed it was the lord St. Alban's attended by his friends; on which his highness said with a smile, "Well! do what we can, this man seems to go out like a snuff."

Lord Bacon had hitherto been immersed in the hurry and bustle of public business; but he now entered into a more pleasing, though a less conspicuous, situation. Being freed from the servitude of a court, from an intolerable attendance there, on the vices and follies of men every way his inferiors, he was now in a condition to pursue the native bent of his genius; to live to himself, and for the advantage, not of one age, or one people only, but of all mankind, and all ages to come. And when he was thus withdrawn from the glare of a public station, into the shade of retirement and studious leisure, he often lamented that ambition and false glory had so long diverted him from the noblest, as well as the most useful employments of a reasonable being; mortified, no doubt, into these sentiments, by a severe conviction in his own person, of the instability and emptiness of all human grandeur.

The first considerable work which he engaged in, after his retirement, was the History of Henry VII. which he undertook at the desire of king James, and published in the year 1622. He also methodized and enriched some of his former pieces; and composed several new ones, no less considerable for the greatness and variety of the arguments he treated, than for his manner of treating them. Nor are they works of mere erudition and labour; but original efforts of genius and reflection, on subjects either new, or handled in a manner that renders them so. His notions he drew from his own fund, and they were solid, comprehensive and systematical; the disposition of his whole plan throwing light and grace on all the particular parts. Indeed, nothing can give us a more exalted idea of the fruitfulness and vigour of Bacon's genius, than the number and nature of those writings composed by him after his fall. Under the discouragement of a public censure, broken both in his health, and in his fortunes, he enjoyed his retirement no longer than five years: a little portion of time! yet he found means to crowd into it, what might have been the whole business, and the glory too, of a long and fortunate life.

The fine which lord Bacon had been sentenced to pay by the parliament, was remitted by king James, soon after his discharge from the Tower. About three years after this, he petitioned his majesty for a total remission of his censure; "to the end that this blot of ignominy might be removed from him, and from his memory with posterity." The king hereupon granted him a full and entire pardon of his whole sentence. Posterity likewise, to which he appealed, has seemed unwilling to remember that he ever offended: and those who record his failings, like those who have made observations on the spots in the sun, neither pretend to diminish his real brightness in himself, nor deny his universal influence on the world of learning.

Lord Bacon's poverty in the latter part of his life, has been much insisted on by several writers; and it has been asserted, that he languished out a solitary being in obscurity and indigence. But the matter appears to have been exaggerated. He certainly did not enjoy affluence, or entire ease of fortune; but his ordinary income must have placed him above sordid want and anxiety. Dr. Rawley, who lived long in his family, affirms affirms that the king had given him, out of the Broad seal and Alienation office, to the value of eighteen hundred pounds a year; which, with his own lands amounting to a third part more, he retained to his death. But he had treasured up nothing in his prosperous condition against the day of adversity; and his pension was not only precarious, but ill paid by a king, who, instead of husbanding his revenues for great or good purposes, was daily lavishing them away in fruitless negotiations, or on the least deserving of his subjects. Add to these things, that lord Bacon lay all this time under the incumbrance of a vast debt; and that he had doubtless expended very considerable sums in procuring or making experiments. Such were the causes of that distress, and those difficulties, into which he was often plunged. That they were many and great, we can entertain no doubt. It is but too strongly confirmed to us by some unusual expressions in his letters to king James; where we find him pouring out his heart in complaints and supplications of such a strain, as every one who reveres his memory must wish he had never uttered.

King James I. died in 1625, after an inglorious reign of two and twenty years, and lord Bacon survived him somewhat more than a year. This great man, after having been for some time infirm and declining, at last owed his death to an excess not unbecoming a philosopher, in pursuing, with more application than his strength could bear, certain experiments touching the conservation of bodies. He was so suddenly struck in his head and stomach, that he found himself obliged to retire into the earl of Arundel's house at Highgate, near which he then happened to be. There he sickened of a fever, attended with a defluxion on his breast; and, after a week's illness, he expired on the 9th of April, 1626, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. He was buried privately in St. Michael's church, near St. Alban's. The spot that contained his remains lay obscure and undistinguished, till the gratitude of Sir Thomas Meautys, who had been formerly his secretary, erected a monument to his name and memory. In another country, in a better age, (says Mr. Mallet) his monument would have stood a public proof in what veneration the whole society held a citizen, whose genius did them honour, and, whose writings will instruct their latest posterity.

Lord Bacon was, as to his person, of a middling stature; his forehead spacious and open, early impressed with marks of age; his eye lively and penetrating; and his whole appearance venerably pleasing. He continued single till after forty, and then took to wife a daughter of alderman Barnham of London, with whom he received a plentiful fortune, but had no children by her: and she outlived him upwards of twenty years.

Mr. Addison, in one of the Tatlers, in which he vindicates the Christian religion, by shewing that the wisest and ablest men in all ages, have professed themselves believers, speaks of our author thus: "I shall in this paper only instance Sir Francis Bacon, a man who, for the greatness of genius, and compass of knowledge, did honour to his age and country, I could almost say to human nature itself. He possessed, at once, all those extraordinary talents which were divided amongst the greatest authors of antiquity: he had the sound, distinct, comprehensive knowledge of Aristotle, with all the beautiful lights, graces and embellishments, of Cicero: one does not know which to admire most in his writings; the strength of reason, force of stile, or brightness of imagination. This author has remarked, in several parts of his works, that a thorough insight into philosophy makes a good believer; and that a smattering in it naturally produces such a race of despicable infidels, as the little profligate writers of the present age, whom, I must confess, I have always accused to myself, not so much for their want of faith as their want of learning. I was infinitely pleased to find, among the works of this extraordinary man, a prayer of his own composing; which, for the elevation of thought, and greatness of expression, seems rather the devotion of an angel than of a man. His principal fault seems to have been the excess of that virtue which covers a multitude of faults: this betrayed him to so great an indulgence towards his servants, who made a corrupt use of it, that it stripped him of all those riches and honours which a long series of merits had heaped upon him."

Anecdotes of the Residence, Munificence, and the Condescension of their Majesties at Windsor.

AS the late residence of their majesties at Windsor has furnished almost an universal topic for conversation, a genuine narrative of it will not, perhaps, be displeasing.

On the first arrival of their majesties at Windsor, they were received with every demonstration of joy and satisfaction, by which a loyal people could honour beloved, revered, majesty. The town was illuminated luminated, the bells and chearful glaſs announced their felicity.

At their next return they brought three of the young princeſſes; then the three younger princes; and at laſt on the prince of Wales's birth-day aſſembled their whole family, expreſſing a viſible ſatisfaction in ſhewing them to the people; while they, in return, gazed on them with delight and admiration.

At firſt, they had not even their guards to attend them, (ſo that we may truly ſay, "The affections of the people were the guard of the ſovereign") till an accident, in their way at Colnbrook, of ſome dray horſes running againſt the carriage and breaking it, being frightened at the report of ſome cannon fired to ſalute them, made it neceſſary for ſome light-horſe to clear the way: yet, even then, at Windſor they walked publicly unſcorted by any but a page or two; and more than once paſſed through the town on foot, whiſt buſineſs and play ſtood ſtill to admire and applaud.

Crouds of people ever waited to ſee them enter the chaiſe to take their rides at the uſual hours; and the Park was lined, and the terrace groaned again (if I may be allowed the expreſſion of the Mæonian bard) under the weight of ſuch numbers, which on Sunday evening appeared of all ſorts, high and low waiting their arrival. Nor was the concourſe diminished by a repetition; but on the contrary, rather increaſed the laſt times of their appearance, which plainly evidences that curioſity was not the only motive that collected ſuch a multitude; but that the candid affability and pleaſing condeſcenſion of their majeſties had endeared them to the hearts and affections of their ſubjects. What a pattern this for nobility! ſo apt to be elated, and look down with ſcorn on the vulgar, as if of an inferior ſpecies, rouſing thereby their indignation.

Their majeſties took every opportunity of appearing publickly, and choſe rather to ride through the public town than the retired Park. Often have I heard the queſtion put to our moſt gracious queen, "which ſhould be the way?" and never did the private Park receive the preference.

They generally roſe very early, and walked through the palace with their children almoſt every morning; or, if alone, went out to ſurvey the works, not diſdaining to converſe affably with the meaneſt labourer about them; in this reſpect giving us another example of the propriety and wholeſomeſs of early riſing; ſince the bed of down had not allurements ſufficient to lull them to ſoft repoſe, when the morning ſummoned them to the works of the day.

They went even to ſee the ſoldiers exerciſe with the riſle barrel guns in ſhooting at the target; and amply rewarded the beſt markſman.

They employed many poor in new graving the terrace, repairing the caſtle, and re-fitting their own habitation, (which is the houſe oppoſite the grand entrance to the palace, adjoining to the Park, which was lord Talbot's) and charitably gave them all a ſupper for their encouragement.

They uſually came with great exactneſs about ſeven o'clock on Sunday evening, and returned at ten on Wednesday morning.

In return, as it were, for the kind agreeable reception they met with at Windſor, their majeſties ordered the prince of Wales's birth-day to be kept here. The whole family was aſſembled on the occaſion. The princeſſes came on Sunday evening and returned on Tueſday morning, together with the younger princes. The prince of Wales, the biſhop of Oſnaburg, princes William and Henry, came with the light-horſe on Monday morning, and returned at evening. They went all in proceſſion to St. George's chapel, the ſoldiers forming a line on each ſide. The king, the prince of Wales, and prince William and the biſhop of Oſnaburg, as knights of the Garter, preſented their offerings at the altar, being met at the chapel door by the canons, with whom they converſed ſome time, and poor knights. After divine ſervice was over, they returned to the palace, and from thence came out by a back door on the terrace, among an immenſe croud there aſſembled, without any guards, and undiſtinguiſhed from the pooreſt mechanic; the queen ſaying to the king, "My dear, the people ſeem pleaſed and look chearful;" and both ſpeaking to ſeveral gentlemen they knew. Having walked round to the front ſide, where the ſoldiers were drawn up, the officers having given the royal ſalute, the ſoldiers, as uſual on the day, fired three volleys, and gave three cheers. They walked from thence quite round the terrace to their reſidence.

Every demonſtration of joy for this honour and favour conferred on them was returned by the grateful inhabitants, by elegant illuminations, fireworks, &c.

But whiſt I enumerate and enlarge on theſe trifles, "trifles, perhaps, indeed!" cries the unconcerned indifferent reader, (much more the biassed and diſloyal, who with a jaundiced eye can convert even virtue tue into hypocrisy, throw a shade over the brightest actions, and maintain the fairest rose which blossoms to be the produce of the bramble) let me not pass over those beneficent acts of charity and benevolence, which add such lustre to them, as christians; that the most brilliant gems that sparkle in their crowns, are lost in the superior splendor.

The account may serve as a noble illustration of that beautiful line so well known and admired by every classical reader :

“Regia, crede mihi, res est succurrere lapsis.”

“To raise the fallen, is a noble thing ;
“To help distress, is worthy of a king.”

As their majesties were riding over Taplow common, they stopped at a poor little cottage, driven in by a shower, and having entered into it, the king shut the door, and enquired whether the inhabitants had any beer to sell for their men, or fruit, and were answered in the negative. They then asked shelter from the shower, and their request was granted.

As there was a large family in the house (which was ornamented with humble neatness, “simplex munditiis,” in Horatian language, if it may be applied to the house, if not, to the house-keeper) and one little child sat shivering with an ague, almost naked on a block by the fire-side.

The tender feelings of a mother were soon kindled in the royal parent, and her curiosity (not that impertinent passion which enquires after misfortunes only to insult them, but humane curiosity!) eager to assist distress, instantly enquired, if that numerous family of ten or eleven children belonged to her hostess?

The distressed mother answered, “Yes—that two were twins, and one of them sick in the house, or as some say, dead.”

“Where is your husband?”

“Sick in bed.”

“Good God!” exclaimed their benignant majesties, and not scrupulous or fearful of being infected, as some more over nice gentry, went up stairs and visited the sick wretches.

The next question was, “How they could maintain such a family?”

“Their eldest son, they said, was out of his time, and was so kind as to work and maintain them by brick-making.”

“What wages has he?”

“Seven shillings and six-pence a week.”

Astonished at this, that such a poor pittance should keep so large a family, their majesties then eagerly enquired “how they could support themselves?”

The poor woman replied, “That bread, thank God! was pretty cheap, and roots and herbs easy to be gotten. That this was the main of their food, unless they sometimes reached to a bit of meat, but this was but rarely, on account of the great price.”

The condescending queen then asked, “What was in the pot?” which was hung over a few sticks.

The woman said, she was almost ashamed to tell her; but on her requiring it again, replied with the modest blush of poverty, ashamed of itself, “a few dumplings made of flour and water, and potatoes.”

The queen then desired to taste of them, accordingly one was taken up, and majesty did not disdain to eat of the humble food of poverty.—Then, no doubt, her good heart, impatient to relieve them, and deeply affected with so melancholy a scene of adverse fortune and oppressed industry, presented them with a purse of twenty guineas, (as I have since heard from credible authority, both from the relations of the woman, and the king’s attendants) with a charge to tell no one the precise sum; and having enquired of the truth of this narrative, and their characters, of lord Boston, their majesties gave orders to their physician to attend the sick, till restored to a good state of health, at their own expence—sent down, in a few days, two changes of raiment for the whole family, with express orders to wear them immediately, and not lay them by—ordered the eldest son to come to them at Windfor—took the two twins under their care, and settled twenty pounds a year on them for life.

Thus did the beneficent hand of Providence rain down a propitious shower, and guide their steps to this particular cot, to succour distressed industry, and relieve the burthen of laborious poverty: and let any materialist, who can, call it a casual visit, and impute it to the foresight of blind chance! This I am confident of, that every humane and tender person will admire the royal bounty; every compassionate breast leap for joy at the hospitable news; while every christian must acknowledge the good action performed with that secrecy, which the gospel requires; for even “the left hand was forbid to know the great charity the right hand had done.” Happy is the comfort of so gracious a queen! yea, thrice happy pair! Happy are the offspring of such noble blood! Happy are the people who can love and admire, obey and imitate them—and happy the seat which enjoys their royal presence.

A Description of the modern State of Loretto, and the famous celebrated Chapel dedicated to the Holy Virgin.

SOME authors say, that this city takes its name from the word Allori (laurels) which were growing on the plain at the top of the hill on which this city is situated, at the first founding of it. The situation is agreeable, and hath a fine prospect of the Adriatic sea, from which it is but one mile distant—15 from Ancona, and about 150 miles from Rome.

The place is surrounded with a ditch and walls, but of very inconsiderable strength. It is supposed to contain about 7000 inhabitants, but was formerly reckoned the richest town in the world, on account of the numerous pilgrimages, and votive presents made to the Santa Casa or Holy House, where the popish writers maintain the Virgin Mary was born—saluted by the angel Gabriel—conceived—and brought up the Saviour till he was twelve years of age. To inclose this pretended holy house, esteemed by all good catholics the most sacred under heaven, a magnificent church was built, and dedicated to the Virgin, in the pontificate of Innocent VIII. beautified with marble, fine sculptures, precious furniture, and whatever might attract travellers and the superstitious. The church is computed to have an annual revenue in land of 15,000*l.* which supports a vast number of clergy, who, as there is no other church in the place, constantly perform their services in it.

The city is exempted from all episcopal jurisdiction, and is entirely dependent on a governor sent from Rome, and a congregation of Roman prelates, of whom the cardinal secretary of state is the head.

The houses make but a very mean appearance; the principal street consists for the most part of small shops, in which are sold little else besides beads for rosaries, gold and silver ornaments for the same, worked in filagree, small brass bells, much bought by the country people, as preservatives against thunder and lightening, brown paper caps to cure the head-ach, and broad ribbons with the effigies of Nostro Donna di Loretto, painted on them to be worn by women in child-birth.

The inn is very indifferent and dirty; they served us in the dirtiest pewter-plates I ever saw, and greasy trenchers. The provisions consisted of very stale fish, ragoued in oil, and highly seasoned with garlick; peas ragoued also, and cabbage;

but all was so disgusting, that we were obliged to feed upon some very bad cheese, and the bread, it being fast day, was plentifully seasoned with coriander and anniseed, which to me is very disagreeable. Our beds were tolerable, and we slept well. We have employed this morning in viewing the Santa Casa, &c. The church, which contains the Holy House, is very large; the piazza before it not yet nearly finished; the architecture of the church is neither beautiful nor remarkable; the door of entrance is of bronze, sculpted in basso relievo; the subject relates to Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, &c. and not ill executed. Towards the further end of the church is found the Santissima Casa, built of a kind of stone, which exactly resembles brick; the outside is incrusted with marble, as a case for it; this casing is loaded with various ornaments of sculpture, all heavy and ill done. They tell you, that the stones with which this house is built never wear, although rubbed and scraped continually by the pilgrims; yet the marble pavement, which is modern, is extremely worn by their knees, continually trailing themselves round and round it, one after the other. As I was looking up at the architecture, and not attending to my footing, I made a faux pas, and stumbling, tumbled over a sturdy female pilgrim, who was proceeding on her knees, saying her prayers, and in a great heat and sweat; I could not help laughing, and I begged her pardon with the best grace I could; the other pilgrims laughed also, at the oddity of the accident; the woman was surprized, but not angry. The Santa Casa is surrounded with a great number of silver lamps (very thin) which burn constantly. In the interior is placed the miraculous image, with the infant Jesus; the Virgin is made of cedar, but having been in a fire, from which it was miraculously preserved, is as black as a coal. She is dressed in a very bad taste, with a farthingale, or old fashioned hoop-petticoat: the outside garment is gold or silver stuff, I am not clear which; she is in such a cloud of smoke proceeding from the lamps, that I could not be certain; you are not permitted to touch her. She had several crotchets of diamonds, reaching from the top of her stomacher down to the hem of her petticoat, but they appeared to me to be composed of a great mixture of stones, none of any great value, and many very indifferent; I saw none so fine, or so large, as some belonging to the Dukes of Montilibretti at Rome; she wears a triple crown set with jewels, and a black gauze veil; she has new clothes every year, and her veil when she puts it off is cut into small pieces, and sold or given given to devout persons and genteel pilgrims, as a charm against witchcraft. As to the coloured precious stones they are by no means good, being for the most part clouded and streaky, and many of them no better than the root of emerald, amethyst, ruby, &c. Here are some lamps of fine gold, but extremely thin. Several votive gifts, presented by various princes and great people, decorate the image; such as hearts, chains of gold set with precious stones, crucifixes, &c.; in particular a statue of an angel, shewn for gold, but which appears to me to be silver gilt; he is in a kneeling posture to the Virgin, and offers a gold or gilt heart set with diamonds, rubies, and pearls. This statue was presented to the Virgin by James II's queen of England, who was of the house of Este, in order that the Virgin in return might give her in exchange a son; her gift was accepted, her request was granted, and she produced the Pretender.

Per damna, per cædes, ab ipso

Hor.

Oh! save my Country, Heaven! shall be my last.

Pope.

THE speaker begins with apologies for want of calmness, of which a resentment, he says, for the injuries of his country hath deprived him. After an exordium, in which he inveighs against monarchy, he passionately exclaims:

“Ye darkners of counsel, who would make the property, lives, and religion of millions depend on the evasive interpretations of musty parchments—who would send us to antiquated charters of uncertain and contradictory meaning, to prove that the present generation are not bound to be victims to cruel and unforgiving despotism—tell us, whether our pious and generous ancestors bequeathed to us the miserable privilege of having the rewards of our honest industry, the fruits of those fields which they purchased and bled for, wrested from us at the will of men over whom we have no check? Did they contract for us, that, with folded arms, we should expect that justice and mercy from brutal and inflamed invaders, which had been denied to our supplications at the foot of the throne? Were we to hear our character as a people ridiculed with indifference? Did they promise for us that our meekness and patience should be insulted, our coasts harrassed, our towns demolished and plundered, and our wives and offspring exposed to nakedness, hunger and death, without our feeling the resentment of Men, and exerting those powers of self-preservation which God has given us?—No man had once a greater veneration for Englishmen than I entertained; they were dear to me as branches of the same paternal trunk, and partakers of the same religion and laws: I still view with respect the remains of the constitution as I would a lifeless body which had once been animated by a great and heroic soul; but when I am roused by the din of arms; when I behold legions of foreign assassins paid by Englishmen to embroil their hands in our blood; when I tread over the uncoffined bones of my countrymen, neighbours, and friends; when I see the locks of a venerable father torn by savage hands, and a feeble mother clasping her infants to her bosom, and on her knees imploring their lives from her own slaves whom Englishmen have allured to treachery and murder; when I behold my country, once the seat of industry, peace and plenty, changed by Englishmen to a theatre of blood, and misery; Heaven forgive me, if I cannot root out those passions which it has implanted in my bosom, and detest submission to a people who have either ceased to be human, or have not virtue enough to feel their own wretchedness and servitude.

“Men who content themselves with the semblance of truth, and a display of words, talk much of our obligations to Great Britain for protection: had she a single eye to our advantage? A nation of shop-keepers are very seldom so disinterested. Let us not be so amused with words; the extension of her commerce was her object. When she defended our coasts, she fought for her customers, and convoyed our ships loaded with wealth, which we had acquired for her by our industry. She has treated us as beasts of burthen, whom the lordly masters cherish that they may carry a greater load. Let us enquire also against whom she has protected us? Against her own enemies with whom we had no quarrel, or only on her account, and against whom we always readily exerted our wealth and strength when they were required. Were these colonies backward in giving assistance to Great Britain when they were called upon, in 1739, to aid the expedition against Carthage? They at that time sent 3000 men to join the British army.

"But the last war, 'tis said, was purely American. This is a vulgar error, which like many others has gained credit by being confidently repeated. The dispute between the courts of Great Britain and France related to the limits of Canada and Nova Scotia. The controverted territory was not claimed by any in the colonies, but by the crown of Great Britain. It was therefore their own quarrel. The infringement of a right which England had, by the treaty of Utrecht, of trading in the Indian country of Ohio, was another cause of the war. The French seized large quantities of British manufacture, and took possession of a fort which a company of British merchants and factors had erected for the security of their commerce. The war was therefore waged in defence of lands claimed by the crown, and for the protection of British property. The French at that time had no quarrel with America; and, as appears by letters sent from their commander in chief to some of the Colonies, wished to remain in peace with us. The part therefore which we then took, and the miseries to which we exposed ourselves, ought to be charged to our affliction for Britain. These Colonies granted more than their proportion to the support of the war. They raised, clothed, and maintained nearly 25,000 men, and so sensible were the people of England of our great exertions, that a message was annually sent to the house of Commons, purporting, "that his majesty, being highly satisfied of the zeal and vigor with which his faithful subjects in North America had exerted themselves, in defence of his Majesty's just rights and possessions, recommended it to the house, to take the same into consideration, and enable him to give them a proper compensation."

"But what purpose can arguments of this kind answer? Did the protection we received annul our rights as men, and lay us under an obligation of being miserable? Who among you, my countrymen, that is a father would claim authority to make your child a slave because you had nourished him in his infancy?

"'Tis a strange species of generosity which requires a return infinitely more valuable than any thing it could have bestowed; that demands, as a reward for a defence of our property, a surrender of those inestimable privileges, to the arbitrary will of vindictive tyrants, which alone give value to that very property."

The orator then employs several arguments to prove the necessity of independence on Great Britain. Amongst which the most striking are these: "We are now on this continent, to the astonishment of the world, three millions of souls, united in one common cause.—We have large armies well disciplined and appointed, with commanders inferior to none in military skill, and superior in activity and zeal.—We are furnished with arsenals and stores beyond our most sanguine expectations, and foreign nations are waiting to crown our success by their alliances. There are instances of, I would say, an almost astonishing Providence in our favour; our success has staggered our enemies, and almost given faith to infidels: So that we may truly say it is not our own arm which has saved us.

"The hand of Heaven appears to have led us on to be perhaps humble instruments, and means in the great providential dispensation which is completing.—We have fled from the political sodom; let us not look back lest we perish, and become a monument of infamy and derision to the world: for can we ever expect more unanimity, and a better preparation for defence; more infatuation of council among our enemies, and more valour and zeal among ourselves! The same force and resistance which are sufficient to procure us our liberties, will secure us a glorious independence and support us in the dignity of free, imperial states. We cannot suppose that our oppression has made a corrupt and dissipated nation more friendly to America, or created in them a greater respect for the rights of mankind. We can therefore expect a restoration and establishment of our privileges, and a compensation for the injuries we have received, from their want of power, from their fears, and not from their virtues. The unanimity and valour which will effect an honourable peace, can render a future contest for our liberties unnecessary. He who has a strength to chain down the wolf, is a madman if he lets him loose, without drawing his teeth and paring his nails.

"From the day on which an accommodation takes place between England and America, on any other terms than as Independent States, I shall date the ruin of this country. A politic minister will study to lull us into security by granting us the full extent of our petitions. The warm sunshine of influence would melt down the virtue, which the violence of the storm rendered more firm and unyielding."

He then breaks out into the following exclamation:

Ruins of the Temple of Esculapius, near Epidaurus in Greece.

exclamation: "Ye abandoned Minions of an infatuated Ministry; if peradventure any should yet remain among us!—Remember that a Warren and Montgomery are numbered among the dead.—Contemplate the mangled bodies of your countrymen—and then say, What should be the reward of such sacrifices?—Bid us and our posterity bow the knee, supplicate the friendship, and plow, and sow, and reap, to glut the avarice of the men who have let loose on us the dogs of War to riot in our blood, and hunt us from the face of the Earth.—If ye love wealth better than liberty; the tranquillity of servitude, than the animating contest of Freedom; go from us in Peace—we ask not your councils or arms—crouch down and lick the hands which feed you—May your chains sit light upon you, and may posterity forget that ye were our countrymen."

In prosecuting his subject, he says, "Britain is now, I will suppose, the seat of liberty and virtue; and its legislature consists of a body of able and independent men, who govern with wisdom and justice. The time may come when all will be reversed: when its excellent constitution of government will be subverted; when pressed by debts and taxes, it will be greedy to draw to itself an increase of revenue from every distant province, in order to ease its own burdens: when the Influence of the Crown, strengthened by luxury and an universal profligacy of manners, will have tainted every heart, broken down every fence of liberty, and rendered us a nation of tame and contented vassals: when a general election will be nothing but a general auction of boroughs; and when the parliament, the grand council of the nation, and once the faithful guardian of the state, and a terror to evil Ministers, will be degenerated into a body of sycophants, dependent and venal, always ready to confirm any measures, and little more than a public court for registering royal edicts.—Such it is possible, may, some time or other, be the state of Great Britain.—What will at that period be the duty of the Colonies? Will they be still bound to unconditional submission?—Must they always continue an appendage to our government, and follow it implicitly through every change that can happen to it?—Wretched condition indeed of millions of freemen, as good as ourselves!—Will you say that we now govern equitably, and that there is no danger of such revolution?—Would to God that this were true.—But will you not always say the same? Who shall judge whether we govern equitably or not? Can you give the Colonies any security that such a period will never come?"—No—the period, countrymen, is already come. The calamities were at our door.—The rod of Oppression was raised over us.—We were roused from our slumbers,—and may we never sink into repose, until we can convey a clear and undisputed inheritance to our posterity."

After enumerating the advantages and produce of the country, he extends his views to the West India islands: "The want of our naval stores has already increased the price of these articles to a great height, especially in Britain: without our Lumber, it will be impossible for those haughty Islanders to convey the products of the West Indies to their own ports—for a while, they may with difficulty effect it, but without our assistance their resources soon must fail.—"

"Indeed the West India islands appear as the necessary appendages to this, our Empire: They must owe their support to it, and ere long, I doubt not, some of them will from necessity wish to enjoy the benefit of our protection.

"These natural advantages will enable us to remain independent of the world, or make it the interest of European powers to court our alliance and aid in protecting us against the invasions of others."

And concludes with these words: "You have now in the field, armies sufficient to repel the whole force of your enemies, and their base and mercenary auxiliaries. The hearts of your soldiers beat high with the spirit of freedom—they are animated with the justice of their cause, and while they grasp their swords, can look up to Heaven for assistance.—Your adversaries are composed of wretches who laugh at the rights of humanity, who turn religion into derision, and would, for higher wages, direct their swords against their leaders or their country.—Go on then in your generous enterprize, with gratitude to Heaven for past success, and confidence of it in the future.—For my own part, I ask no greater blessing than to share with you the common danger, and common glory:—If I have a wish dearer to my soul, than that my ashes may be mingled with those of a Warren and Montgomery—it is—that these American States may never cease to be Free and Independent.

A humorous Story of a Lover of Dogs.

HAVING accepted of a warm invitation from a young man of family and fortune, lately married to a young lady reckoned a beauty, and of a very amiable temper, to spend a few days with him in the country, I naturally expected to see as much conjugal felicity as this world can afford. My friend is tall and well made; he has a healthy complexion, and expressive eyes; he is active and lively to excess. His lady, with an elegant form, and features most happily arranged, is possessed of a delicacy in her taste and manner, and has a stock of ideas which render her superior to the majority of her sex; she is also of the most fearful disposition to be conceived; she is timidly itself.—I got down a little while before dinner, received a hearty welcome from my friend, and was by him presented to his lovely wife; a woman, indeed, “formed to engage all hearts, to charm all eyes.” We were soon afterwards summoned to the dining parlour. During our passage to this convivial apartment, the master of the house began to whistle, and in a loud voice began to call Phillis, Thunder, Ringwood, Rover, and Cupid. In consequence of this vocal address to them, a number of dogs rushed immediately into our view, of all sorts and sizes, and almost overfret us in the passage. The Lady was particularly annoyed by them, as they not only, by leaping upon her with their usual activity, soiled the purity of her elegant muslin gown, but tore it in several places. One of the taller animals laid his paws on her fine falling shoulders, and scratched a hole in her laced tucker, while another jumping over her head, entirely removed two of her curls, and brushed away also some of the ornaments out of their respective places. She started, shrugged, and screamed, but all to no purpose; her husband burst into a loud laugh, caught her by the hand, and cried, “Why, my dear creature, my puppies have actually undressed you, villains as they are; but come, never mind that, their notice is a proof of their fondness for you; and your sufferance of their fondness is a proof of your affection for me. ‘Love me, love my dog,’ you know.”

We had, by this time, reached the table: as soon as the mistress had seated herself with her sister, a showy girl about thirteen, two of the largest quadrupeds very familiarly laid their noses upon the cloth, and before the wing of a most tempting chicken could be carved for me, one of them fairly licked the liver off the plate into his own chops; and he swallowed it directly with as little ceremony, as he had “marked it for his own.”—“Bless me, Mr. Fondlehound, said the lady, with a blush of confusion which gave a new lustre to her beauty, only see how troublesome Cupid is; he has taken what I designed for Mr. Townly.”—“Cupid will be troublesome, replied my friend, but he is very pleasing for all that, and Townly, I am sure, will excuse it: The poor dog is half famished—Here, Cupid, continued he, tossing him a leg, on a handsome carpet beautifully variegated with the most lively colours, which had been worked, I afterwards found, by Mrs. Fondlehound and her sister.—Here, Cupid, “take that!” then turning to his blushing wife, he added, “Come, come, Lissy, (seeing her look grave) eat your dinner, my dear; the dogs will be quiet enough when they are once served.—Kitty, do you help your sister to a piece of this venison pasty. “Indeed, Sir, I cannot stir, answered she, for Rover’s head is in my lap, and I dare not touch him when he is hungry.”—“What, you are afraid he shall be angry? but Rovers will be always about the girls.” He then took up a whole carcase of one of the fowls upon his three pronged fork, and called Rover, who was silenced by this sop for about a minute or two, and returned to his station on the young lady’s lap till the second course was set upon the table, part of which was a ragout of veal, &c.—Phillis, a little black bitch, big with pup, fairly jumped upon the table, and seizing one of the sweet-breads, dragged it along the fine damask table cloth. This last seizure so much disgusted the lovely Eliza, that she pushed her plate, knife, and fork from her, and with a very significant look, declared, she could not eat any more. Here her husband, who really loved her, in his way, rose up, and coming to her, took her hand in his, and with great tenderness, in his manner, asked her if she was not well, and what had spoiled her appetite: you want air and exercise, my dear, added he; we will therefore take a ride after dinner, and drink tea at the wood. He then returned to his seat, and calling his kennel about him by their names, pulled one by the ears, clapped a second on the back, and spit into the mouth of a third, bidding the servants at the same time bring in the dogs meat: he took up the little bitch on his knees, and ordered her plate to be set on the table, that he might see she had what she liked. “I don’t know any thing more cruel, said he, after having enlarged upon the attention he bestowed upon his animals, than to keep creatures, and suffer them to be starved by the negligence of servants. You know well enough, Townly, added he, turning to me, how these people conduct things when they are left to themselves.”

When the dogs had dined, they began to stretch their limbs upon the above-mentioned carpet. We had soon, however, something something else to attend to, than a "Canine entertainment;" on the appearance of a very high phaeton, which was drawn up to the door, accompanied with a smart whisky.—"Come Lissy, come Kitty, cried my friend, with much alacrity, get your hats and cloaks in a moment.—Here Cupid, Phillis, hallo—hallo!" The beasts expressed their joy in the most clamorous manner, by yelping at a furious rate; and Thunder bellowed so loudly, that I could but just hear the timid Eliza express her terror at the thoughts of being mounted in the vehicle before us.——"Phaw, phaw, cried her husband, how can you be so silly, child? you know Townly cannot manage my horses, they are too high bred for him; but he can drive the little bay ponies, with Kitty in the whisky, I'll warrant; hey, Townly?—Here, Rover, Thunder, come on, you curs.—He then mounted into his seat, and dragged his poor, trembling, milder half after him. On his setting off in the most spirited stile, the dogs leaping and barking around him, and Eliza shrieking, the noise arising from their combined tones was not to be matched by the confusion of tongues in the tower of Babel; the uproar is not to be described. We arrived safe at the place of destination, a house of entertainment, remarkable for the pleasantness of its situation. While we refreshed ourselves there with tea and coffee, the noisy crew surrounded us, all over mud, as it rained in the morning, and as the road was very dirty, threw themselves down upon Mrs. Fondlehound's white satin petticoat, and rendered totally offensive to the delicacy of so neat a lady, or indeed any lady whatever; deaf, however, to her well grounded complaints, her husband only continued calling and bawling for water for his dogs, and milk for his bitch, who had, he was soon informed, gotten into the window of a dairy, and lapped up a whole quart of cream, of that we could not procure a drop for our tea. This disappointment, added to the preceding vexations, so much disconcerted poor Eliza, that Mr. Fondlehound began a second time to fear that she might be ill, and really discovered great affection for her. Of this attentive behaviour she availed herself, by desiring to go home, as it was almost dusk, and as she was afraid he would not see to drive. "Oh, never fear me, replied he, never fear me; I can drive to an inch, if it should be as dark as Erebus; but we shall have a brilliant moon, my love, presently." They accordingly reascended the towering machine. To shew his dexterity, my friend Hippolitus drove his dear Eliza into a ditch, within a few yards of his own house. Happily she escaped without any fractures; but her clothes were so thoroughly soaked in dirty water, that the whole economy of her dress was utterly destroyed; and in consequence of the extreme wetness of her clothes, she caught a cold, which confined her to her bed during the remainder of the time I staid with them. I was indeed myself so much hurt, by seeing so delicate a young creature, who was, I could see plainly, fond of her husband (in spite of the striking difference in their dispositions) rendered so unhappy by his boisterous behaviour to her, that I could not help coming to an expostulation with him. I seriously remonstrated against a carriage which gave his Eliza so much unnecessary pain. I soon found, by his answer, that he was really no less fond of her, than she was of him: but he at the same time declared, that he thought there was no reason in the world for his giving up the principal amusement of his life, merely because his wife happened to have no taste for them. From this reply, I drew this conclusion, "that happiness in the marriage state arises neither from wealth, nor wit, nor birth, nor beauty, but can only result from a perfect suitableness of disposition, from which alone, without any of the other appendages, true felicity may be rationally expected."

A Sermon on Mortality.

A Few days ago, being in company with a friend, amongst other topics arose that of Mortality; my friend said he could furnish me with a sermon on the subject:—I begged the favour, (thinking it a written discourse) but he assured me that it was very laconic; and therefore would deliver it verbatim, as he found it somewhere. It was as follows:

Text—Job v. 7.—"Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward."

I shall divide the discourse into, and consider it under, the three following heads:

First, man's ingress into the world.

Secondly, progress through the world.

Thirdly and lastly, his egress out of the world.

And first, man's ingress into the world—is naked and bare!

Secondly, his progress through the world—is trouble and care;

Third and lastly, his egress out of the world—is nobody knows where.

To conclude:

"If we do well here, we shall be well there:

"I can tell you no more, if I preach a whole year!"

Historical Facts extracted from the Votes and Resolutions of the American Assemblies, and other authentic Materials.

ON the 29th of July last, the Speaker of the General Assembly of the island of Barbadoes acquainted the House, that since their last meeting he had received a letter from the Hon. George Walker, Esq; the agent of the island in Great Britain, of which the following is a copy :

" Sir,

" I have received the letter you did me the honour to write, inclosing a petition from the Hon. House of Assembly to the King, and importing their commands to lay it before his Majesty.

" On the morning after it came to hand, I delivered the petition to Lord George Sackville Germaine, the Secretary of State for America. It is the official mode; and his Lordship promised to lay it before the King.

" After waiting a reasonable time, I again attended his Lordship; he said, he had laid the petition before the King, who had been pleased to say, " He would be glad to do any thing in his power for the advantage of his good subjects of Barbadoes." The Secretary of State added, that this kind of answer was all that was ever expected to be given by the Crown; and went on, that the Governor had written, " The measure was a measure of the Assembly's, and the distress was not so great as it appeared to the Assembly."

" It was in vain to urge the contrary; his Lordship was in no disposition to listen, and left me as soon as good manners would allow.

" The Honourable House and yourself have been informed by my letters to the Committee of Correspondence, of the propositions made by the West India body to this noble Lord, and to Lord North. These propositions went minutely to the general object of the Assembly's petition, and the answer of those ministers then made me, as one of the committee, is the answer that would now have been repeated to me as your agent, if the Governor had not furnished them with another, or if they had been formally driven to a farther explanation. There is a settled plan of operation, to which they seem determined to adhere, let Barbadoes, let all the West Indies suffer as they may. To this perseverance I trust the House will solely impute the want of success."

" I have the honour to remain, &c.

G. W."

This letter being read, Mr. Solicitor

General observed upon it, that the governor had, in fact, counteracted the efforts of the house for the service of the community, by taking upon him to contradict the account of the distressful situation of the people, exhibited in the petition. He appealed to the house, whether, at the time Captain Payne was asking supplies, he, by the desire of the governor, did not visit the merchants to enquire what stores were on hand; and whether the report made by him did not agree with the manner of stating the distress? Nay, so sensible, said he, was the governor himself of our hard and melancholy case, under the respective heads or causes of scarcity, that he, at a late sitting, transmitted to us copies of letters that had passed between the admiral and himself; on his part requesting the admiral to grant passes to vessels that would bring us provision from the colonies of foreign powers; and containing other overtures that necessity only could give birth to. Little, he added, at the time I moved for the thanks of this house to be given him, did I think I moved to thank one who had plotted the loss of our credit, and to fix upon us at home the charge, the odious charge of impostors; for impostors all are who feign what they do not feel, who speak of grievances when there are none.

He concluded with moving, that the house go into a committee on the subject of the agent's letter. This motion being seconded, the house resolved themselves into a committee accordingly, and came to the following resolutions :

That, from the information of the hon. George Walker, Esq; the agent of this island, in a letter of his, addressed to the hon. Sir John Gay Alleyne, bart. and speaker of this house, it manifestly appears that his excellency, the hon. Edward Hay, has, by application to his majesty's secretary of state for the colonies, done what lay in his power to intercept his majesty's relief towards his loyal and distressed subjects of this colony.

That a dutiful petition or memorial be transmitted to his majesty, in support of the assembly's late petition.

Mr. Solicitor then, agreeable to the last resolution, on a motion seconded by Mr. Thomas Alleyne, had leave given him, and he accordingly delivered in at the table a second humble petition and address, &c. which, after a debate, was read and agreed to, on a division of 9 to 5.

It was then ordered, that the said petition and address be signed by Mr. Speaker, and transmitted to the agent to be,

by

by him, laid before his majesty, which being accordingly done, his Majesty was graciously pleased to refer it to the board of treasury.

This address to his majesty was accompanied by a memorial to the Secretary of state, shewing, that the price of food, for the white people, this year, is risen to fifty and an hundred per cent. more than in the two preceding years; that the food for the negroes, in herrings and salt-fish, hath increased in the same proportion; and that corn, their chief support, the staff of life, hath been uniformly dearer by four hundred per cent. At the same time sugar is fallen at a rate from twenty five to forty per cent. and rum above thirty-seven.

That the poor white people, now, are on the point of perishing in most parts of the island; that those in the neighbourhood of the coast came down to it in small flocks, to gather the most wretched of all the fruits of the earth to eat for their subsistence; and when the ripe ones are all gathered, they then took the green ones to boil, and thereby soften them as food to keep their lives and souls together; and with regard to the negroes, many gangs had no allowance, and so now left to plunder for their support, or starve. In consequence of which, the cattle had been stolen off the pens and killed, the plantain walks, and corn fields, the few that had been happy enough to produce an early crop from partial showers, were robbed likewise; and the bloodshed that had followed the rapine in some late instances, opened a dismal prelude to the tragedy that was preparing.

To this memorial was added, a state of the provisions, and the value of sugar and rum in the years 1774, 1775, and 1776.

In 1774 and 1775.

Good flour from 15s. to 25s. per cent.

History of the present Session of the British Parliament.

Thursday, Oct. 31, 1776.

THIS day his majesty, attended in the state coach by his grace the Duke of Ancafter and lord Robert Bertie, went to the house of Peers, and being seated on the throne, a message was sent to the Commons, requiring their immediate attendance, who attended accordingly; when his majesty opened the sessions with the following speech:

“ My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ Nothing could have afforded me so much satisfaction, as to have been able to inform you, at the opening of the session, that the troubles which have so long distracted my colonies in North America were at an end; and that my unhappy people, recovered from their delusion, had delivered themselves from the oppression of their leaders, and returned to their duty: But so daring and desperate is the spirit of those leaders, whose object has always been dominion and power, that they have now openly renounced all allegiance to the crown, and all political connection with this country; they have rejected, with circumstances of indignity and insult, the means of conciliation held out to them under the authority of our commission: and have presumed to set up their rebellious confederacies for independent states. If their treason be suffered to take root, much mischief must grow from it to the safety of my loyal colonies, to the commerce of my kingdoms, and indeed to the present system of all Europe. One great advantage, however, will be derived from the object of the rebels being openly avowed, and clearly understood; we shall have unanimity at home, founded in the general conviction of the justice and necessity of our measures.

“ I am happy to inform you, that, by the blessing of Divine Providence on the good conduct and valour of my officers and forces by sea and land, and on the zeal of the auxiliary troops in my service, Canada is recovered; and although, from unavoidable delays, the operations at New-York could not begin before the month of August, the success in that province has been so important, as to give the strongest hopes of the most decisive good consequences: But notwithstanding this fair prospect, we must, at all events, prepare for another campaign.

“ I continue to receive assurances of amity from the several courts of Europe, and am using my utmost endeavours to conciliate unhappy differences between two neighbouring powers; and I still hope that all misunderstandings may be removed, and Europe continue to enjoy the inestimable blessings of peace. I think nevertheless, that, in the present situation of affairs, it is expedient that we should be in a respectable state of defence at home.
 D d d d d amity

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I will order the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you. It is matter of real concern to me, that the important considerations which I have stated to you must necessarily be followed by great expence; I doubt not however but that my faithful commons will readily and cheerfully grant me such supplies, as the maintenance of the honour of my crown, the vindication of the just rights of parliament, and the public welfare shall be found to require.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"In this arduous contest I can have no other object but to promote the true interests of all my subjects. No people ever enjoyed more happiness, or lived under a milder government, than those now revolted provinces; the improvements in every art, of which they boast, declare it; their numbers, their wealth, their strength by sea and land, which they think sufficient to make head against the whole power of the mother country, are irrefragable proofs of it. My desire is to restore to them the blessings of law and liberty, equally enjoyed by every British subject, which they have fatally and desperately exchanged for all the calamities of war, and the tyranny of their chiefs."

His majesty having quitted the throne, and retired, after he had delivered his speech, the following peers (being severally introduced according to form,) took the oaths and their seats: The earls of Fairfield, Powis, Ilchester, Alesbury, and Clarendon; lords Hampden and Onslow. After which the chancellor and clerk having severally read over the king's speech, the earl of Carlisle arose, and after a modest panegyric on the royal oration, the valour of the officers and troops, both British as well as Hessians, now serving in America, and a little raillery on the false predictions of opposition with respect to the loss of Canada, he moved for a loyal and dutiful address to be presented to his majesty, "returning him their humble thanks for his paternal regard for the welfare of his people, congratulating him on the success of his arms in America, and assuring him of their zeal for the honour of his crown, and the legislative authority of parliament over every part of the British empire.

The address being read by the chancellor and seconded by lord Falkland, the marquis of Rockingham got up, and arraigning in the gross the present measures of administration, moved for a long amendment, or rather a counter address, which he read in his place; the purport of which was, that "his majesty would be graciously pleased to offer such terms of conciliation to his American colonies, which might restore peace and harmony amongst those subjects; who were now alienated from the mother country by the machinations of his majesty's ministers, who being invested with too great a share of power, had driven a great part of the British empire to revolt from the parent state," &c. &c.

The duke of Manchester took a review of every part of the king's speech, but dwelt particularly on the passage which mentions the pacific assurances of all the European powers, and that of putting this country into so instantaneous a state of defence. With respect to the assurances of the courts of France and Spain, he said they were but little to be depended on; that the former had actually furnished the Provincials with arms and ammunition, which were embarked openly on board an American vessel the other day at Havre de Grace, in sight of one of his particular friends; that a fleet of ten sail of the line, with eleven thousand forces, had lately sailed from Cadiz, the destination of which he called upon administration to explain; that we are bound by treaty to defend Portugal, who had made no small sacrifices to us; that Portugal had, at our request, forbidden American vessels from entering any of her Ports; but had France or Spain done so, notwithstanding repeated requisitions? no;—what then was the natural consequence to be apprehended? that a war with the house of Bourbon was inevitable, and that the distracted state in which the affairs of this country appeared at present threatened no less than its total ruin.

Lord Mount Stewart contended for the propriety of the address, painted the ingratitude of the Americans in the strongest colours, for whom he said this country had last war sacrificed the blood of her first families, nay, he feared had so far exhausted her wealth, that he doubted whether she would ever recover herself. He said the right of taxation was no longer the question; the mask was thrown off, and independency, their secret and sole view, was now impudently avowed and published.

He

He conceived, however, that this libel on all government was not declared with the free consent of the people, but by the artful insinuations of Hancock and Adams, those Oliverian relicts, who had tainted the minds of these his majesty's loyal subjects, and led them, as it were, involuntarily into all the horrors of the present unnatural rebellion.

The duke of Richmond entered into the debate with great calmness and temper. After a survey of the melancholy prospect arising from the fatal separation between this country and America, which he deemed now for ever severed from the British empire, he attributed the whole scene of American calamities to the fatal conduct of an administration, who, refusing to listen to the prayers of the colonies, after the idea of taxation had been formally given up by the repeal of various acts of parliament, were obstinately determined to keep up the semblance of taxation, by the obnoxious and pitiful twopenny duty on teas; that succeeding acts had compelled them to resistance; since, agreeable to Mr. Gibbon's observation on the primitive christians, "they were thus driven from the protection of the law." With regard to that part of his majesty's speech which says, "that his desire is to restore to them the blessings of law and liberty, equally enjoyed by every British subject," &c. his grace wondered any minister would be daring enough to put such a sentence in the mouth of his sovereign. Did the natives enjoy the same privileges with Englishmen? Circumscribed and cramped by the act of Navigation, they, as well as the Americans, were cut off, as it were, from the common privileges of the empire, and therefore how are they to enjoy equally with Englishmen, the blessings of law and liberty? So far, however, from the Americans deeming that as a motive inducing them to declare themselves independent states, they had not even mentioned it in the long catalogue of grievances which they enumerate as the real cause of that effect. He ascribed the present tottering state of the constitution of this country to that bribery and corruption which poisoned the senate; adding, that the welfare of it could only depend now on his majesty's forbearance. His grace paid a genteel compliment to generals Howe and Carleton, whom he said he personally knew and honoured; but he asserted, that they would be more happy, and derive greater honour, from effecting peace with America by negotiation, than by the sword; adding, that every provincial that was slain was a loss to the general state; and that the harder the terms were, into which they were now forced, so much more would that tend to a future revolt, when either their own inclination, or the solicitations of a foreign power, should prompt them to it. He next touched on the state of defence which his majesty mentions as necessary to put this country into, and called upon administration to answer whether this kingdom could be said to be in a proper state of defence, when the principal parts of its force were on the other side the Atlantic? The duke concluded with this observation, that he did not imagine any change of men or measures whatsoever would be able to effect the reconciliation he so ardently wished; declaring at the same time, he never could be induced again to take any post in office; but if there was a possibility of a re-union of the two countries, he could even desire to see it effected, tho' parliament were under the necessity of acknowledging the independence of the colonies.

Lord Sandwich, in answer to the duke of Richmond said, that the greater part of the defensive force of this country was by no means on the other side of the Atlantic, there being no more than 15,000 Seamen, Marines included, on that service, and only two line of battle ships; and at home we had the largest fleet in the whole world, and in the best condition; that the defence of this island depended upon its fleet, which he said he would venture to assure the house was at present every way superior to those fitting out by France and Spain. He concluded, by dissenting from the duke of Richmond, where he mentioned, "a reconciliation with America, even upon the ground of admitting their independency;"—observing, that he was happy in being the first in that house (and he begged it might be remembered) who opposed, and avowed ever to oppose, with all his might a doctrine in every respect so disgraceful to the honour and interest of the mother country.

The Duke of Grafton, in a speech of great eloquence, enumerated those measures of administration, with respect to America, which he declared he would oppose as long as his legs would carry him to that house:—He averred, from authority unquestionable, that they had driven the provincials to seek protection from our natural enemies;—that France had all along supplied them with arms, and every kind of military stores; that a member of the congress was now resident at Paris, and actually in treaty with that court, tho' his credentials perhaps had not been received in form; or such a circumstance might might have been concealed for political purposes.—With respect to the conduct of the Americans, he had blamed it all along, and now more particularly condemned their declaration of independency; but he could not at the same time forget the censure that was due to those men, who had done all in their power to drive them to these fatal extremities. As to the pacific assurances of the other powers of Europe, thrown out in his majesty's speech, little reliance was to be placed on those, at this crisis; for if they were likely to pass current this year as well as last, why this extraordinary armament? If it were only to put the nation in a state of defence, why defer a preparation till two days ago, which it was criminal not to have made three months since? As to the defence of this country being left to a single fleet, it was highly impolitic, since the variation of wind and weather might at any time counteract the best laid plan of operations. [Here his grace mentioned, as a case in point, the sudden change of the wind that unfettered admiral Hawke's fleet in the last war, and miraculously saved this country from falling into the hands of the enemy.] He observed, that as he wished not to mince the matter, he openly declared it as his opinion, that France and Spain were about to take America by the hand, in order to join their several armaments together, to crush this devoted country; he wished, therefore, to be informed by the noble lord at the head of the admiralty, whether the fleet would be manned and ready to sail as soon as that of the French, now fitting out at Brest? [Here Lord Sandwich rose, and pledged himself to the house that it would.] The duke marvelled at this information, and concluded with dissenting from the motion for an address, thinking it more proper to move for an adjournment thereof, till the house had gone into a serious enquiry into the present state of the nation.

Lord Weymouth replied to the duke of Grafton, assured the house officially, that administration were under no apprehensions of a war with any European power; that the answer of France was, she was only improving her marine; that it was however thought advisable for us to be upon our guard, lest our want of activity might induce any foreign state to think the powers of this country were totally exhausting in the American dispute, and therefore set us down as an easy conquest. He acquitted government of the least criminality, on account of not arming in time; observing that it was customary to get ships ready before they pressed men to put into them; that those had been preparing with the utmost diligence for many months past, and rejoiced to find that the operations of government could be carried on with so much secrecy as not to reach even the ears of his grace.

Lord Shelburne was up an hour and an half on the other side of the question, and stated matters in a more mortifying point of view for Great Britain than any other speaker. His lordship said, the noble lords for the address were going to thank the king upon false principles, the facts (on which they were to ground the address) in the speech not being strictly true. He denied particularly that the measure pursued by the ministry would produce what they expected, unanimity: The contrary was apparent, for the lord mayor, on whose amiable character he enlarged, refused to encourage the pressing of seamen, which shewed the war was unpopular; whereas if it was a war with France or Spain, he would be pulled out of the Mansion-house, if he did not back the warrants. He denied the pacific intentions of the powers of Europe; said he should not be surprized if this kingdom became a province to some foreign power soon, if peace be not made with America. His Lordship asked what frigates we had at home; he always understood frigates were necessary to protect our trade, to cruize after privateers, and other service, for which line of battle ships were unfit; and where were we to find men? 15,000 seamen are in America in the king's service, and North America supplied us with 13,000; here is a deduction of 28,000 seamen from our naval force. It could not be imagined Spain would trump up an old quarrel with Portugal, on a dispute of nine years standing, at this crisis, but as knowing that Great Britain must protect her old ally, when they are involved in a war; that England and Ireland defenceless, were temptations flesh and blood could not resist,

The Earl of Bristol gave an account of our naval strength; he said we should have forty sail of the line to put to sea by February, if the lord mayor did not prevent men's going to sea by any contrivance; but he did not think it in his power, though on the night of the press thirty or forty coaches of seamen had been sent out of Town.

The debate lasted till ten, and on the division the numbers were, for the amendment, Contents 26; Non-contents 82, Proxies 9—91.—Majority 55.

The amendment offered by the Marquis of Rockingham to the motion for the address, is entered by way of protest, and is signed

Friday, Nov. 1.

At two o'clock the House, preceded by the lord Chancellor, waited on his majesty at St. James's with their address of thanks for his speech on opening the sessions; and received a most gracious answer.

Ordered, that the bishop of Rochester do preach before them on Tuesday, being the Anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot.

The chancellor being returned, his majesty's answer to the address was read, of which the following is a copy :

" My Lords,

" I return you my thanks for this dutiful and affectionate address.

" It is with great pleasure I observe the satisfaction which the success of my arms against the rebels, in North America, has given to all my loving subjects. That which you express is highly acceptable to me.

" The preservation of the public tranquillity; the happiness of all my people; and the maintainance of our most excellent constitution, are the invariable objects of my heart."

As soon as his majesty's answer was read, the House immediately broke up, and adjourned to Monday.

House of Commons.

Tuesday, October 31.

The Speaker being returned from attending on his majesty in the house of peers, the speech was read.

Mr. Neville (member for Grampound in Cornwall) rose and moved "for an humble address to be presented to his majesty." As usual, the address was read, and the motion for presenting it seconded by Mr. Hatton (member for Rochester.) Both these gentlemen spoke for some time on the occasion.

Lord John Cavendish then arose and opposed the motion, recapitulating the old grounds of opposition on the American subject, censuring the war itself as unjust, and the conduct of it as ineffectual, barbarous, and inhuman. After dwelling for some time on the disagreeable side of the picture, his lordship produced an amendment to the address, which the Speaker read to the House. It chiefly turned upon a censure of the ministry; a desire that his majesty would order an enquiry into their conduct; and after very circumstantially arguing upon the evil advice which had been given his majesty, begged that the success of the war might be used moderately and prudently.

Governor Johnstone followed Lord John, and in very severe terms arraigned the conduct of administration, not only blaming them for commencing the present war, but endeavouring to prove that they had as yet had no success; and that even the affair of Long Island was by no means a matter worthy of triumph, as that island was a mere out-post to New-York, as New-York was an out-post to America, and that it would have been wrong for the Provincials to have attempted to maintain it. The governor paid general Howe and his brother very great compliments on their manœuvres in the capture of the island, and inferred that from the whole of general Howe's conduct in taking it, his caution in not forcing any of the Provincials' strong-holds, his opening trenches at six hundred yards distance from their redoubts, with his general orders to his officers to act with all possible circumspection, it was evident the general thought most highly of the Provincials, and that he therefore treated them with as much respect as any enemy ever were treated with. The governor complained of the defenceless state of the kingdom, and urged the danger of an immediate war with France and Spain. The minister's speech, which they had just heard from the king's mouth, he declared to be an entire compound of—hypocrisy. It made his majesty talk of peace at the very moment when not only all Europe, but this kingdom, gave the most evident appearances of preparation for war. In short, it was like a deceptive mirror, reflecting a false image of truth. That part of it which talked of giving the Americans Law and Liberty, he conceived to be a mere turn of wit and humour, which would not bear a serious interpretation. The Governor spoke loudly of the falsehood of France, and the little reliance that was to be put on her professions, instancing a circumstance which happened while cardinal Mazarine was minister, when the Portuguese and Spaniards were at war together, and the latter had received repeated assurances of the pacific intentions of France, although that kingdom had actually lent Portugal troops, clothed them, paid them, and officered them.—The governor said he was far from being pleased with the Americans for their declarations in favour of independence; but he saw clearly they were driven to the measure by our vigorous persecution of them. We had hired foreign troops to fight against them, and they had no other way of putting themselves on a footing with us, than by throwing off the yoke, declaring themselves independent, and inviting foreign aid to defend them. They had, he said, taken every possible means to avoid such a measure; they had sent a most humble petition to government, praying relief, and couched their prayer in the strongest terms of duty and allegiance; government had with the most provoking hardness rejected their petition, refusing to give any answer to it, or offering in any other manner to hear them. The mode of their declaring for independency was to be sure in some measure indefensible. The declaration of the New-England government was exceedingly rude and ill-written; the language was more unmannerly and abusive than even worse treatment than what they had received would have justified; but then it must be considered as written merely to captivate the common people, and therefore a polished style, and very scrupulous decency, were probably but trifling objects with the writer. He however as much condemned it, as he applauded that of the Pennsylvanians. The governor took occasion to censure the late issuing of preps-warrants, and declared that he was not only convinced a better mode of manning the navy might be found out, but that he was well informed the late preps was carried on with a degree of irregularity and cruelty altogether unprecedented. He stated the list of killed and wounded to the house, declaring that one of a preps-gang was killed on board a merchantman, through the temerity of the officer of the gang; that many, both sea and landmen, attempted to be pressed, were desperately wounded, and that fourteen persons were drowned. —After having, with his usual warmth, condemned the ministry, and painted the speech as ill-timed and fallacious, the governor gave his hearty assent to the amendment.

Mr. Wombwell rose to contradict the governor's assertions relative to the conduct of the preps, and the death of the sailor unfortunately shot; he declared that he was well instructed to declare, that the mercantile part of the city in general condemned the person who shot him, and were unanimously of opinion that there never was a preps better conducted than the present, nor more men obtained with less blood and tumult. Mr. Wombwell spoke much in favour of government, and described the Americans as awkwardly Banditti, who talked loudly, and ran lustily, when faced by men of courage. He dissented from the proposed amendment.

Mr. Wilkes, in a speech of half an hour, condemned the present war as one of the most unnatural and unjust that time had ever produced. He said the ministers boasted of their foresight in having prophesied in the speech of last year, what had this year been verified, as the speech of the day from the throne had asserted. This triumph, he said, was exceedingly ill-founded, the minister having last year prophesied no more than what he had determined his measures this year should certainly produce. It was like the prophesy of the Jesuits in the 16th century, respecting the fate of the greatest prince that ever reigned in Europe. Henry IV. of France, whom they had prophesied to die at a certain period, well knowing at the time of their uttering their prediction that they had hired Ravillac to assassinate him at the time they mentioned. —Mr. Wilkes differed from governor Johnstone respecting his condemnation of the stile of the New-England Congress's declaration for independency, declaring he always considered good writing by its effect, as men judged of the merit of a tragedy or a comedy, by the effect it produced; that as it was addressed to the common people, if it served to allure them, it was certainly well written. After having created a good deal of laughter, the alderman returned to serious argument, and joined in governor Johnstone's censure of the preps, declaring that nothing could more strongly mark the jarring councils and inconsistency of administration, than their offering so large a bounty as £1. for every able seaman, and 50s. for ordinary seamen, in Saturday's Gazette, and issuing preps-warrants on Monday, not even allowing the proclamation for so large a bounty a week to try its effect. The alderman summed up his speech by a severe satire on the ministry, declaring, that in all their proceedings they went backward; that they would at last find themselves procul a Jove, sic procul a Fulmine, and that if a sudden alteration of measures did not take place he feared this country would soon experience most dreadful consequences. He mentioned a fact of consequence; this was the conduct of Spain to the American privateer at Bilbao, which being stopped at the instance of the British consul, an express came from the court of Madrid, ordering it to be released, supplied with every military store wanted, and a general order, that all American ships should be treated in the same manner.

Mr. Temple Lutterel spoke next, and from a great variety of historical precedents, proved, that in former times, in similar situations with the present state of our dispute with America, it had always been held politic to treat with the opposite parties whether they were rebels or not. It is in vain for us to follow this gentleman throughout his speech, which almost entirely consisted of stories quoted from ancient history. He ended with calling on the independent country gentlemen to support the amendment, as it promised to be of more service than the address first proposed.

Mr. Mackworth followed Mr. Lutterel; and said, he rose in answer to the last speaker's call on the independent country gentlemen. He professed himself to be one of that number, and declared, he feared that matters were much misrepresented without doors; that he did not like to hear gentlemen so ready to find a plea for the Americans on every occasion; and even when they were beat, to hunt after a reason to shew that they could not avoid it, and that some particular circumstance occasioned it. He said, he was ever most clearly against that house attempting to tax America, as America was not represented in that house; but that he thought it highly necessary to maintain the right, and that it was but reasonable America should contribute something in return for the millions she had cost this country. That he most heartily wished government success, and the more against America, than against a foreign foe, as there was something exceedingly ungrateful in the resistance and rebellion now made by the colonists against a country, which had acted, in every respect, so motherly as Great Britain. [At the word, motherly, there was a loud laugh.] Mr. Mackworth spoke highly of some of the opposition, and yet continually lauded administration, finally declaring, that as an ancient Briton he felt for the honour of England, and therefore wished her success, not but he would be glad that a proper treaty for reconciliation was on foot; and he added, he cared not whether it was with rebels in arms, or without them. He gave his assent to the address as first proposed, and therefore was of course against the amendment

A Description of the Town of Belfast.

THIS town is by all allowed to exceed all others in the province, whether we regard extent, population, commerce, or regularity of its buildings; it is situated on the mouth of the river Lagan, over which there is a good stone-bridge, nearly half an Irish mile in length, containing 21 arches. The bay is esteemed one of the best and safest in Ireland. Large vessels cannot come up to the town, but anchor in a part of the bay called Carmoyl-pool, which is about 2 miles from the bridge. As to the number of houses in the town, I must beg leave to inform you, that Mr. Watson, in his almanack, has committed a great mistake, where he computes the number at 5295, as in our almanack they are reckoned 2595, which I believe is pretty exact; therefore Mr. Watson has led people much astray by misplacing the figures. The streets are wide, and regularly built, mostly of brick, especially High-street, which is as well built as most trading streets in Ireland, a few in Dublin excepted. The principal inhabitants of this town are presbyterians, who have four large meeting-houses; there is but one church of the established religion; it was lately built at the expence of Lord Donnegal, and in many respects it exceeds any other in Ireland; it is built of fine bricks, with a portico of large white stone pillars in the front, and a balcony at top; the seats are mahogany, very elegant, but as yet it wants a steeple; however it is expected it will soon have that ornament. The poor-house is a handsome building of brick, with two wings and a handsome spire. The exchange is not yet finished; it is asquare of five arches on each side; above it is an elegant assembly room. There is likewise a barrack for three companies of foot. The trade of this town is very great, as it supplies the country towns round about with foreign merchandize, and has a great export of linen cloth, beef, &c. A canal is now nearly completed from hence to Lough-neagh, which, when finished, will be of great advantage to the trade of this town, as it will afford water-carriage from hence to the counties of Derry, Tyrone, and Armagh.

ExtraTs from Letters on the American Troubles. Translated from the French of M. de Pinto.

AFTER the many masterly productions on the subject of the American dispute, by writers on both sides of the question, it may perhaps be deemed superfluous to offer the following translation to the public.—But, as there are few natives of this country so entirely unbiassed as not to be warped by prejudice, or blinded by passion, the translator thought that the work of a foreigner, who must necessarily be disinterested, would not be unacceptable to his countrymen in general;

ral; and the rather as M. Pinto is of deserved literary reputation."

Such is the apology of the translator; and, if it be a truth, (of which, however we do not see the necessity) that M. Pinto is really disinterested in every thing he advances respecting Great-Britain and its settlements, his arguments certainly claim the attention of those among our countrymen who make any pretensions to candour and impartiality; although such arguments have not altogether novelty to recommend them. M. Pinto indeed observes, that truth ought to be repeated again and again, 'till she be acknowledged.

"In the opinion of foreigners, says he, who are not acquainted with the unlimited resources of England, the most alarming point is, the enormous expence necessary to subjugate the rebels; and consequently encreasing that common bug-bear, the national debt. We must first observe, that the English in general appear easy enough on that head. A proof that the bulk of the nation is but little alarmed at the state of things in America, is, that public credit is not at all hurt by it. It is true, that without this grievous event, stocks would be still higher. Nothing is more truly laughable, than to hear it said, that it is the ministry which by gaming in the stocks upholds them. The ridiculous absurdity has been repeated, echo-like, by a thousand ignorant people, without adverting to the impossibility of it. It is a shame that in a commercial country as England is, such silly notions should be broached. Pecuniary people might, for example, be able to uphold for a time, against all endeavours to the contrary, the shares of the Dutch East India Company's stock, because there is a great deal more money than shares. With two or three millions of florins, all the shares might be bought which are not mortmain in Holland. It would be much more difficult to monopolize the shares of the English East India Company's stock, as they amount to several millions sterling. But as to the different government-funds, whose total amount is an hundred and twenty-eight millions sterling, dispersed in so many hands, there can be no possibility of keeping up their price, either by artifice or gaming. If public credit was not founded on a solid basis, the ministry could never support it. Twenty-five millions sterling, in real specie, would not be sufficient for it. Those who are acquainted with the temper of the English, know, on the contrary, that a panick which takes them sometimes, lowers the funds without any solid reason; but it is not possible to deceive them, when they think that they have good reason for their fears. It is a shame to be obliged to refute such an absurdity."

M. Pinto proceeds, however, to such refutation; though it be, as he confesses, a repetition merely of what he had advanced in his essay on circulation.

"One certain good," says this ingenious and sensible writer, "has ensued from the rebellion of the colonies, as it has occasioned a thorough examination of the importance, utility, and inconveniencies of them: our ideas were very vague before on that subject—but it has been examined and searched into—and that object on which there were formerly so many various opinions, is now very well known and understood. At the end of the last war, nobody in England, some few East India directors excepted, knew the importance of the British possessions in Indostan.—They wanted in a manner to sacrifice Asia to America; the contrary ought to have been done.—It is true that this erroneous plan has been in part amended; but before the preliminaries it might have been more perfect, more solid, and, I will venture to say, more beneficial for the contracting parties. Since that epoch some faults have likewise been committed, and perhaps there still remain some prejudices relative to the India Company; but certainly the territory possessed by the English in the East Indies ought to be looked upon as the richest gem of the crown; and as this important object presents itself to my pen, I shall give my sentiments on it; and the rather as it is closely connected with American affairs. It is but lately that the importance of the Indian possessions has been known. They are invaluable—provided that Government and the Company keep in their remembrance the apologue of the hen that laid golden eggs.—They had very nearly verified the fable, by almost embowelling the hen; and the means which were afterwards used to remedy the evil, were not applied with all the art necessary to render them specific, salutary, just, and free from great inconveniencies. At first the intoxication caused by the successes of the East India Company,—her riches exaggerated by those who had contributed to them, made them reap too soon the harvest which they should have left to ripen maturely. The company in 1766, before it had liquidated its debts, at once offered to government four hundred thousand pounds sterling a year, in consideration of the revenue of the newly-acquired territorial dominions in the province of Bengal; and this hasty step of the the directors and of the proprietors, occasioned by a blind impatience of having their dividends augmented, has sheltered government from that censure which it would have incurred if the ministers had prematurely and authoritatively required that exorbitant sum. It appears to my weak understanding, that during the continuation of the company's charter, and perhaps after its expiration, all that government could have pretended to, with any justice, would have been a land-tax on the territorial revenue of Bengal, on the same footing as that levied in England; a step which would at once have obviated that great absurdity of imperium in imperio. These possessions have cost an immense sum to the Company. The proprietors have long suffered for it by a trivial dividend. It is partly at their expence that these acquisitions have been made; it was but just that they should in their turn reap the advantages accruing from them; but those happy days had hardly dawned for them, when they were again eclipsed by unforeseen accidents. Every body knows that the fear of the French troops, which in the year 1768 were in the island of Mauritius, involved the Company in a ruinous expence for fortifications and other military works, to the amount of three millions sterling: I leave it to be imagined how much its servants have abused their trust in using this circumstance as a pretext for the encrease of many other unnecessary expences. The directors, who could not possibly foresee the rebellion of the Americans, had ordered nine thousand ton of tea to be sent home, and not having been able to sell it, the price of it has consequently fallen, to the great detriment of the Company; which has besides suffered a further loss by the large quantities of it which have rotted in the warehouses: for the above reasons Government, on the repeal of the American stamp-act, should have laid a duty on any other article rather than on tea.

"The Company has been, on this occasion, the victim of the measures of government. It has, besides, had the additional charge of a shilling per pound to indemnify Government for the suppression of a shilling per pound duty taken off, in favour of the Americans. This new duty, jointly with the annual four hundred thousand pounds sterling became too heavy a burden. The consequences of this have been fatal. However these unlucky accidents were only of a temporary nature. Another unaccountable blunder, which the Company was guilty of at the time of the convention with Government, was, to engage to continue the payment of four hundred thousand pounds annually, which should only be lessened in proportion as the dividend of 12 h. per cent. should be lessened, and not entirely to cease until the dividend was reduced to 6 per cent.—This was very unjust; for according to a list of the dividends one year with another, the English East India Company has always divided eight per cent; but by this convention the proprietors have been reduced to the cruel alternative of either giving, in cases of accidents, forced dividends, or being reduced all at once to 6 per cent."

Our author appeals to experience in the affair of the East-India Company, against what has been advanced by Mr. Bolt and others, on the subject; asserting the flourishing state of the Company, notwithstanding all their over-sights and blunders in their bargains with administration, and the mismanagement of their servants.

"The Abbe Reynal, a celebrated and judicious author, has written on the subject of the Dutch East-India Company: his materials were memoirs, which should appear to be faithful, since they were drawn up by persons who had been at the head of the Company's affairs in the East-Indies. These memoirs, however, were written a long while before the publication of the Abbe's book. I acknowledge that it contains many curious, interesting, and true particulars, which are not to be found any where else. But several of the consequences which he draws are, nevertheless false. One example will be sufficient. If the Dutch East-India Company did not clear at the end of the year, more than two hundred and fifty thousand florins, as is pretended, it would have been insolvent long before now; for since the date of the memoirs included in the Philosophical History of the above-named author, the company has met with great losses by the war carried on in the island of Ceylon, and other incidents, and yet it is not ruined. Let the other consequences, deduced by the said memoirs, be also compared with recent events, and they will be found equally erroneous. The work of Mr. Holwell is an historical picture of the affairs of Indostan, much more faithful and more comfortable for the English nation, than the caricatures of Mr. Bolt, or the memoirs which seduced the ingenious author of the Philosophical and Critical History of both the Indies.

"The English and Dutch may meet with a check from the Indians; but whilst they preserve their power at sea, with a few troops they will always be able to master them. That indolent and effeminate people will always be mastered by the English, if other powers do not espouse their cause. This weakness of the Indians is the consequence of their climate, and of other physical and moral causes. It is even probable that the English will always have the superiority which their marine gives them over the other powers of Europe; and attacking that nation in Asia would I think, be like laying hold of the bull by the horns.

“Many people pretend that territorial possessions, and the wars which they occasion, are inconsistent with trade, and ruinous to the Company—from this assertion I appeal to experience. After the catastrophe of the massacre of the English at Calcutta, the Company, supported by the Admirals Watson and Pocock, revenged that outrage, by taking possession of the province of Orixá. That conquest and the revenues arising from it, have been the source of the prodigious success of the Company in India, even against European enemies who appear to have superior force to what had ever been seen before in that country. This single observation seems to determine the question. But if there wants more proof, consider the extraordinary sums which government has received since that epocha, by the customs which have brought in almost double the four hundred thousand pounds a year, the dividend which the Company have paid, the great expences it has been at in fortifications, the ease and quickness with which it surmounted the embarrassment of its affairs about three years ago; if all this does not demonstrate the utility of its territorial possessions, nothing can be demonstrated. The Dutch East-India Company would be nothing without territorial possessions. The servants of the Company, in that case, in India, strive to make a rapid fortune, in order the sooner to return home again. Means must be found to remedy this great evil. Such as fill the chief posts ought to have assurances from government and from the company, that they should be handsomely rewarded after ten years residence; but, to obtain that reward, their conduct ought to be strictly examined into, and they should be punished if they had behaved ill. This must be the basis of all the amendments that can be projected. I should think it advisable even to offer a premium of so much per cent. for those who should prove that they had cut off any useless expences, improved some branches of commerce, laid out money on some useful and important objects; for in great concerns, niggardliness and dissimulation ought to be avoided with as much care as prodigality and lavishness—maxims that are little known in Holland.—Every thing that tends to hurt or distress the Indians ought to be carefully avoided and discouraged; they should be treated with mildness and humanity, but at the same time be made sensible that they are not feared, and that they would be punished with severity if they became perfidious. I repeat it, war should not be renewed in India out of wantonness, or to answer particular private purposes; but at the same time it ought not to be dreaded when it appears necessary. Wars in India are of a different nature from any carried on in any other part of the world; humanity ought to prevail, and therefore the seducing advantages which an Indian war offers to some political eyes, should be renounced. The English East-India Company being in possession of Bengal, Bahor, and Orixá, cannot but profit from the territorial revenue, by the receipt of the specie which other nations bring there to carry on their commercial transactions. It is therefore the interest of the English East-India Company to suffer this trade to be carried on freely; whilst, on the other hand, the nations so permitted to trade should think themselves happy therein, as they are thereby free from military expences, which in their situation is a very great advantage; and they will do so, provided they are not blinded by jealousy, contrary to the reciprocal interest of all the parties. I recommend it to the proprietors of both the English and Dutch companies not to lose sight of this great, this important truth.

“There are people who take a pleasure in reporting, that at the expiration of the term of the charter, government will take the territorial revenue from the company; and by this absurd report, which I hold to be without foundation, the price of India stock is kept low. I must observe, by the by, that even if this was to be the case, the price of the stock ought to rise; for it is not under a government mild and free, like that of England, that the company should be dispossessed of an estate acquired at its own expence and risk, without making a compensation for it: it is their property. But why should I refute chimeras? The British government knows that all that has been written against the exclusive trade of the Company, treating it as a ruinous monopoly, are political sophisms, which have hitherto always been contradicted by experience. It is ridiculous to call the commerce of the English or Dutch companies a monopoly. They procure the subsistence of millions of people, they are the source of the riches of the two states; the fortunes which their servants make in India per fas & nefas, always turn to the profit profit of the state, therefore cannot be called a monopoly. This commerce is of such a nature as to be better directed by a company than by individuals. The Dutch were sensible of this when their company was established. Experience and good sense have always confirmed them in that system, and they are happy in never having had its propriety called in question. The trade of separate individuals would be ruinous: because the more competitors there are in India for the purchase of goods, the dearer the commodities are, and in proportion to the quantities of goods brought into Europe, do their prices rise or fall; and individuals would pay no regard to these circumstances. Besides, this is a trade which of late has more or less been carried on by force of arms: for which reason it can only be successful to a company. Let us now come to the produce of the territory.

If government took from the company the produce of the territory, confining it only to the trade, the revenue would run the risque of losing annually above two millions sterling well secured, and this for the sake of adopting a precarious and doubtful system. The duties which the company pays to the customs have nearly doubled since 1763—this is a fact well known.

“This augmentation of duties amounts to above four hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. This overplus proceeds from the considerable returns, and the prodigious sales of the company, which would be totally impossible to be made, if it was deprived of its territorial revenue: it could no more make such large investments, and the sales would decrease considerably to the great detriment of trade. Government would suffer (besides any other losses) by thus stopping the sources of its finances. The East-India Company, far from being a monopoly, gives life by its navigation, exportation, and sales to all classes of the state. Its commerce protects and enriches them; but all these benefits are returned with ingratitude; that vice too common in the world—Besides, how would government get the territorial revenue remitted to Europe? It would be absolutely impossible. Specie cannot be brought out of India without a very great loss; and if this was to be done, in that case it would be found out only a possible way of draining that country of its riches, it follows then, indubitably, that the territorial revenue cannot be brought to Europe advantageously, otherwise than in goods, by the traffic of the Company. This operation is more to the interest of Government than of the Company; which, by means of this territorial revenue increases its sales, and consequently its commerce, which increases the royal revenue by a hundred different ways, independently of the augmentation of the custom-house duties.*

“The share of the territorial revenue which government might pretend to, ought to be very moderate; in order to avoid the fate of him who killed the hen that laid golden eggs—Government ought to watch over the establishments in the East-Indies, and the economical administration of the directors, to be constantly correcting rising abuses to stop their progress, for there will always be some, and it is their excesses and consequences which ought to be prevented. The revenue which Government draws from the Company is very considerable; and equity requires that the proprietors, who have suffered so much, should soon feel the good effects of the present opulence of the Company.”

Georgia.

IN the year 1732, a number of public spirited gentlemen, taking into consideration the vast benefit that might arise from the tract of land lying between the Savannah river and the river Altamaha, which is contained in Charles the second's charter, and undoubtedly belonged to England, formed a scheme of making it subservient to many noble purposes, by erecting it into a bulwark for our southern colonies against the Spaniards; of producing great benefits to the mother country; but, above all, of giving employment to vast numbers of people who were burthensome at home to their friends and parishes; and petitioned the king for a charter, which was accordingly granted them. This charter, which was dated that year, constituted them a corporation, by the name of trustees for establishing a colony in Georgia, including all that country situated in South Carolina, which lies from the most northern stream of the Savannah river, along the coast, to the

N O T E.

* It is then as clear as the day, that it is the interest of Great Britain that the charter of the company should be continued for several years, and it is the only means by which the finances can most profit. All other methods are only chimerical and ruinous projects, supported only by declamation, which experience shows to be contrary to the true principles of trade and finance.

most southern stream of the Alatomaha, and west from the heads of the said rivers respectively, in a direct line to the South-Sea. The corporation was vested with all the necessary powers, for the term of twenty-one years from the date of the charter; particularly, to collect benefactions for fitting out the emigrants, and supporting them till their houses could be built, and their lands cleared. General Oglethorpe, one of the trustees, a gentleman of unbounded benevolence and public spirit, commanded the first embarkation to Georgia, to whom the Greek nation voluntarily relinquished their right to all the lands lying between the above-mentioned rivers, which they did not use themselves. Upon this, Mr. Oglethorpe laid out the town of Savannah; and erected several forts, to cover the colony against any hostile attempts of the Spaniards or Indians. In the year 1734, a considerable number of protestant Saltzburghers went over, who with others of their countrymen, that followed, were settled in a town on the Savannah, which they called Ebenezer; and, by their habits of industry and sobriety, they soon became a considerable settlement. In 1734, another embarkation, consisting of three hundred men, one hundred and ten women, one hundred and two boys, and eighty-three girls, arrived from England, most of them at the public expence. In 1735, one hundred and sixty Scotch Highlanders, all able-bodied men, went over, and settled themselves upon Alatomaha river, sixteen miles by water from the island of St. Simon. They gave the name of Darien to a small fort they built there, and that of New Inverness to a small town they afterwards added to it. In February 1736, Mr. Oglethorpe, with about three hundred passengers on board two ships anchored in the road of Savannah, and soon after laid the foundations of the town and fort of Frederica. Besides the private benefactions received by the trustees during the term of the charter, large supplies were granted by parliament. In 1739, a specimen of Georgian raw silk was exhibited in London, which the merchants, who dealt in that commodity, declared to be as good as any raw silk that came from Italy, and worth at least twenty shillings per pound. In 1742, about five or six thousand Spaniards and Indians invaded Georgia, from St. Augustine, in about fifty vessels of all kinds; but were repulsed by general Oglethorpe, at the head of the English forces, and a small body of Indians, under Tomo Chichi's son. From that time it remained undisturbed, but not out of danger from the Spaniards, till the reduction of St. Augustine, and the cession not only of that town, but of all Florida, by the last peace.

Whatever might be the cause, it is certain, this infant colony drooped and languished from the year 1742, till Mr. Ellis was appointed governor; but under his administration, it became again of such importance, that upon being removed to another government, he was rewarded with a handsome present of money for his administration of that of Georgia.

Though some parts of Georgia are less proper for cultivation than others, it is universally allowed to be a rich and delicious country in general, producing Indian corn, oats, barley, potatoes, pumpkins, melons, cucumbers, green peas, and garden beans, with fallading of all kinds, throughout the year. Nectarines, plumbs, and peaches grow here in great abundance, and might, by cultivation, be rendered equal if not superior, to any in Europe. The grapes grow wild, and are ripe in June; and English apple and pear trees, and sometimes apricot trees, agree with the soil. The white and black mulberry afford excellent nourishment for the silk worms, the propagation of which was one of the great inducements for settling the colony. Oranges and olives thrive, especially in the southern parts, to the greatest perfection. Their chief timber trees are oaks, of which they have six or seven kinds, pines, hickory, cedar, cypress, walnut, sassafras, beech trees, and many others for which the Europeans have no names; besides a great variety of flowering shrubs.

Georgia produces variety of game, from the beginning of November to March; such as a small kind of woodcocks and partridges, turkeys weighing from twenty to thirty pounds, turtle-doves, wild-geese, ducks, teal, widgeons, with great quantities of wild pigeons; not to mention other birds, little known in Europe. In the summer-time the inhabitants kill deer, and in winter ducks. They have likewise the possum, or, as they call it, the opossum, which shuts up its young in a false belly, and are said to be excellent food as well as racoons. Tygers are very common in this country, and bears whose cubs eat like young pigs. Their woods abound also with wild cattle, and wolves and snakes; but none of the last are venomous, except the rattle-snake, for the bite of which the natives have a ready and infallible cure. Their rivers are pestered with sharks and alligators; but, at the same time, their coasts are stored with trout, mullet, whittings, and a vast variety.

riety of other fish, which are both cheap and good. They have vast quantities of oysters; but they are not so delicious as those of England. They have likewise clams, mussels, and very large prawns.

There are several islands on the coast of this colony; the chief are Amelia, Cumberland, and St. Simon's island. The first, lying seven leagues to the north of St. Augustine, is about two miles broad, and thirteen long. The second, lying about twenty-one miles south of Frederica, forms the inlet of Amelia Sound, which it commands, by means of a fort called Fort William, and has fine springs of water. The third, lying near the northern mouth of the Alatomaha, is said to be about three miles in breadth, and forty-five in length. In the middle of this island stands Frederica, which is well fortified, and has a regular magistracy.

The town of Savannah lies ten miles up the river of that name, where it forms a half moon, and where ships, that draw ten or twelve feet water, may ride for a mile, within ten yards of the bank. Opposite to it is an island of very rich pasturage. The river is pretty wide, and the water fresh; and from the key of the town, you see the whole course of it towards the sea, with the island Tybec, which forms the mouth of the river; and the other way, you see the river for sixty miles up into the country. Savannah and Frederica are now considerable towns.

When the property of Carolina was purchased by his late majesty, orders were issued for building eleven towns here and in Carolina; each of which was to have a district of twenty thousand acres of land square, to be divided into shares of five acres for each man, woman, or child of one family, which was to be augmented, as the planters should be in a condition to cultivate a larger quantity: each town was also to be formed into a parish, the extent whereof was to be about six miles round; and, as soon as the parish contained one hundred masters of families, it was qualified to send two members to the assembly of the province, and to enjoy the same privileges as any of the other provinces: the ground round each town, being marked out, was to belong in common to all the inhabitants, till shared out to each of them: there were to be three hundred acres of land near each town to be common for ever, without being charged with rent; and no person by virtue of any former grant, was to take possession of any land within six miles of each town: the rent payable for every hundred acres, after ten years, was to be four shillings a year; and to every European servant, whether male or female, fifty acres of land were also to be distributed, free of all rent, for ten years.—Some progress has been made in these projected improvements.

Florida.

Florida, which was ceded to Great-Britain by the late treaty of peace, and, including a part of Louisiana, is now divided into the government of East and West Florida, terminates to the south on the Gulph of Mexico; to the north, on the Apalachian and Cherokee mountains, or the Great Lakes; to the east, on Georgia, the Atlantic Ocean, the channel of Bahama, and the Gulph of Florida; and, to the west, its boundaries are, a line drawn along the river Mississippi, from its source to the river Iberville, and from thence, by a line drawn along the middle of that river and the Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea. It is of a vast extent, stretching, it is said, near one thousand miles in length; but its breadth varies greatly, a considerable part of it consisting of a peninsula, which grows gradually narrower, till it terminates in a point.

Florida, properly so called, was first discovered in 1497, by John Cabot, a Venetian mariner, in the service of Henry VII. king of England. It was more completely discovered in the year 1512, by Juan Ponce de Leon, a Spaniard, who gave it the name of Florida, because it was first seen in Easter, called Pasqua de Flores, in the language of his country; or, as Herrera alledges, because it was covered with flowers, and the most beautiful blossoms.

A country so extensive must vary somewhat in point of air and climate; but it may, upon the whole, be called very warm, though the great heats in the southern parts are much allayed by the cool breezes from the sea; and such as are more inland, towards the north, feel a little of the roughness of the north-west wind, which, more or less, diffuses its chilling breath over the whole continent of North-America, carrying frost and snow many degrees more to the southward in these regions, than the north-east wind does in ours.

On the American continent the winters are cold and severe, as far as 34 or 35 degrees of north latitude, which is farther to the south than the Straights of Gibraltar in Europe, and vast shoals of ice are seen floating in the sea, which is frequently frozen to a small distance from the shore, in the latitude of 44 or 45 degrees north, which are the same parallels under under which the southern parts of France lie. This difference in the climate may perhaps, in a great measure, be accounted for, by considering the amazing extent of uncultivated land covered with forests, and intermixed with vast lakes and marshes, over which the north wind in America blows. The air, however, is pure and wholesome, as evidently appears from the size, vigour, and longevity of the Floridan Indians, in all which respects they far exceed the Mexicans.

The soil, except on the sea coast, is rich and fertile, producing frequently two or three crops of Indian corn in the year, and might, with proper cultivation, be made to bear every sort of grain. Here are all kinds of timber and fruit trees, especially pines, laurels, palms, cedars, cypresses, and chestnut trees, which grow to an extraordinary length and size, and, with the oaks, afford nourishment to swine: but the wood most prized, and in greatest plenty is the sassafras, of which considerable quantities are exported. Excellent limes and prunes also grow here in great abundance, with vines of various sorts, and cotton trees, hemp, flax, pulse, roots, and herbs; and there is no scarcity of game, fowl, and fish, where sufficient industry is exerted to procure these gifts of nature. The root mendihoca, of which the cassava flour and bread are made, is very common; and there is a kind of grain, like our oats, that shoots up spontaneously in marshy places, and by the sides of rivers. Of the fruits, there is one called tuna, so exquisite and wholesome, when ripe, that among the Europeans it goes by the name of the cordial julep. Excellent beef, veal, and mutton are the produce of the country, together with horses fit for draught and carriage, so cheap that they may be purchased for the value of a crown in European commodities. The other products of Florida are ambergrease, cochineal, indigo, silk-grass; amethysts, turquoises, lapis lazuli, and other precious stones; copper, quicksilver, pit coal, iron ore, and a kind of stone pitch, called copea, which the Spaniards used as tar for their shipping; pearls also are found on the coasts of Florida.

Of the mountains, the most considerable are the Apalachian, which divide Carolina, and the rest of the British plantations, from Florida. A vast number of noble rivers pass through this country, most of which rise in the Apalachian mountains, and fall into the gulph of Mexico, or the Atlantic Ocean. The chief are the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Coza or Couffé, and the river St. John. The Mississippi, which the French call St. Louis, is, in many respects, the finest river in the world. It runs a very long course, free from shoals and cataracts, and navigable within sixty leagues of its source. The channel is every where deep, and the current gentle, except at a certain season, when, like the Nile, it overflows. Its banks are adorned with a delightful variety of meadows and groves inhabited by a vast number of Indian tribes. What renders the Mississippi more considerable, is the number of large and navigable rivers that fall into it, both from the eastward and westward: of the first, Mr. De la Sale, in the relation he presented to Count Frontenac of his voyage on that river, affirms, there are six or seven, each three hundred leagues in length; of which the most considerable are, the Oubache or river of St. Jerome, the river Illinois, the Cherokee river, and the Ohio, (on which stands fort Pitt and Pittsburgh) a vast river which runs along the back of New-York, Maryland, and Virginia: in the Indian language it signifies a fair river, and is navigable six hundred miles, traversing the most beautiful and fruitful countries in the world, and receiving ten or twelve rivers, besides innumerable brooks: of the rivers that fall into the Mississippi, on the west side, the chief is the Missure. The Coza or Couffé, which the French call Mobile; is a very large river, which has its source in the Apalachian mountains, and falls into the gulph of Mexico one hundred miles south of the town of Manhela; or Mobile. The river of St. John is a noble navigable river, which rises also in the Apalachian mountains, and, running parallel to the Alatomaha, falls into the Atlantic ocean, not far from St. Augustine.

There are a great many lakes in Florida, among which those of Pontchartrain and Maurepas, mentioned above, are none of the least considerable.

The principal bays are, St. Bernard's, Ascension, Mobile, Pensacola, Dauphin, Joseph, Apalaxy, Spirito Sancto, and Charles Bay.

The chief capes are, cape Blanco, Sambias, Ancote, St. Augustine, and cape Florida, at the extremity of the peninsula.

Louisiana, most of which was ceded to us by the late peace, and now constitutes the greater part of the government of West-Florida, bounded by the Mississippi on the west, and by East-Florida, Georgia, and Carolina on the east; and extending from the lake of the Illinois, or rather, from the source of the Mississippi on the north, to the gulph of Mexico on the south, is a very pleasant fruitful country, being watered by a number of rivers, the frequent overflowings of which contribute not a little to its fertility. Nothing is more delightful than the meadows, which are fit for seeds of all kinds. In some parts the soil yields three or four crops in the year; for the winter consists only in heavy rains, without any nipping frosts. Almost all sorts of trees which Europe affords are to be found here, besides a variety of others unknown to us, and some of them of great value; such as lofty cedars, which distil a gum that is said to excel all the noblest European perfumes; and cotton-trees, which are of a prodigious height. The whole country abounds with an infinite variety of game, fowl, cattle, and indeed every thing that life can desire. The woods and lakes, both here and in East Florida, are full of deer, goats, lions, leopards, wolves, hares, rabbits, elks, buffaloes, panthers, bears, wild cats, beavers, otters, foxes, racoons, squirrels, and martins. The rivers abound with fish, and also with snakes and alligators. As for the winged species, here are turkies, partridges, parrots, pelicans, bustards, pheasants, pigeons, turtles, blackbirds, thrushes, herons, storks, cranes, snipes, eagles, hawks, swans, geese, ducks, and many others, some of which have their plumage elegantly variegated. The natives, who are divided into innumerable tribes, the most considerable of whom are, the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Natches, are of an olive complexion, their bodies robust, and finely proportioned: both sexes go generally naked, except only a deer-skin round their waist. They stain their skins with the juice of plants.

An ELEGY on the Death of a young Lady.

WHAT mean those tears which flow from friendship's eye,
Why languid thus each fair one droops her
head,

These fault'ring accents, and that heart-felt sigh,
Proclaim the good, the blest Eliza dead.
Each virtue center'd in her youthful mind,
Each action spoke her heart at peace with all;
Long time she bore the want of health, resign'd,
And patient waited for her Maker's call.
Ye blooming fair, whose hearts are form'd to feel,

Ye that have seen Eliza's mournful bier,
Let sorrow o'er your tender minds prevail,
Add drop with me the sympathetic tear.
And you, ye gay, attend this awful truth,
Ye that in pleasure's giddy round do roam,
That tho' possess'd of grandeur, health, and youth,

You soon must yield to meet your long last home.

As oft I've seen the rose, the garden's pride,
Nursed beneath the summer's temp'rate skies,
Yet from the stock the blooming flow'r divide,
And soon it droops its tender head and dies.
Thus dropp'd the maid, and met th' unerring
hand

Of awful death, with looks divinely sweet,
And with a smile receiv'd the dread command,
To quit her sorrows, and her God to meet.
Now far remov'd, the bright angelic maid,
Hath left these scenes of transient delight,
To taste of pleasure that can never fade,
And joys eternal in the realms of light.

O N W I N T E R.

WINTER comes again to rule
On the plain and gelid pool,
Snow and hail and wind he flings
From his many-sounding wings,
Loud he rattles in the wood,
Sullen binds the bubbling flood;
Now the valley sweeps, and now
Thunders on the mountain brow:

From the clouds that awful frown,
Lets the sluicy torrent down,
Now descends all in disdain,
On the loud-lamenting main:
Now again upon the land,
Rushing with his raging band,
Snow and hail and wind he flings,
From his many-sounding wings.

Shall I like the swallow fly,
From this bleak inclement sky?
Rather, like that friendly form,
Let me sing amid the storm;
That with aspect sweet and gay,
Boldly mounts the leafless spray,
And with this enlivening strain,
Seems to cheer the winged train:
Fellow tenants of the grove,
Be not fearful yet to rove;
Over you presides a power,
Greater than the snowy shower,
Without whose Almighty will,
Nor the gunner can you kill,
Nor the little lisping boy
By his wily art destroy.

Further, did one gentle gale
Always over earth prevail,
Life would languish, and the joy
Of the balmy blessing eloy.
Having ended, up it hies,
And to yonder window flies;
Cælia, to the loves akin,
Lets familiar Robin in;
Where it hops with modest bound,
All the smiling larks round.

Frowning Winter we defy,
May the frugal family
Cry; who, like the busy bee,
That in early summer free,
Wisely fills its waxen dome,
Weening well the time will come,
When, as summer sources fail,
Toil nor sorrow will avail;
Having, with a decent care,
Laid up a sufficient store,

Now enjoy the happy store,
And the God of all adore.

Now no more the gentle breeze,
Ventilates sweet verdant trees;
Now no more unfolds the flower,
Scents no more the balmy bower :
Howling from the noisy north,
Bold tornadoes issue forth ;
And impetuous down the plain,
Sweep the leaves that yet remain :
Well denoting, as they fly,
That the race of man must die.
When a little while we bloom,
Down we drop into the tomb ;
Happy, if we entertain
Lively hopes to rise again,
And for ever taste above,
Fulness of redeeming love.

Though no more the gentle breeze,
Ventilates sweet verdant trees,
Though no more unfolds the flower,
Scents no more the balmy bower ;
Ever under wintry skies,
Beauty hails poetick eyes.
Even now the learned mind
May sweet entertainment find,
Now may see the fable rill
Tumble down the snowy hill ;
Now, upon the mountain hoar,
Hear the rapid rivers roar,
And the distant deeps reply
With a sympathetick cry ;
We'll suppose, each object round
Bids sweet charity abound,
The Omnipotent will find
Walking on the wings of wind ;
And, when night involves the sky,
Round the glorious canopy,
Bright celestial orbs will view,
Bright celestial way : pursue ;
* Ever singing as they shine,
He that made us is divine."

Loud and louder on the land,
Stormy Winter takes his stand ;
Louder yet, and louder rings,
Till in vain I strike the strings.
Let me hie me to my cell,
Gentle reader, fare thee well ;
Christianity will give
Joy, and teach thee how to live.

A DRAMATIC REFLECTION, on Mr. GARRICK's quitting the Stage.

POETS and Actors, with true blended skill,
Mould all their actions to their instant will ;
I was thus, when feeling Garrick trod the stage,
(The speaking comment of his Shakespeare's page)
Oft as I heard the words, with eager care,
I shook with horror, or dissolv'd with tears ;
But—pliant muscles of the various face,
The mein that gave each sentence strength and grace,
The tuneful voice—the eye that spoke the mind,
Are gone,—nor leave a single trace behind !

CUPID'S FROLICK.

ONE morn in spring, when painted flowers
Bestrew'd the fields, and deckt the bow'ers ;

And from the spray, the lionet's strains
Enliven'd all the neighb'ring plains ;
Gay Cupid left the realms above,
As usual, on affairs of love :
His quiver he had fill'd with darts,
Intent to pierce a thousand hearts :—
He wounded beaux, and belles, and 'squires ;
And fill'd their breasts with am'rous fires.—
His arrows spent, the urchin stray'd
Across a verdant, flow'ry mead ;
By chance he pass'd a fountain's side,
And dabbled in the silver tide ;
And as he loiter'd on the strand,
Cull'd glitt'ring pebbles from the sand ;
He pluck'd the pinks and lillies trim,
That bloom'd and blossom'd on its brim :
Beside the stream, beneath a thorn,
A damsel, beauteous as the morn,
In silent contemplation stood,
And view'd the passing crystal flood ;
He gaz'd with infinite surprise,
For lovely Johnson met his eyes :
" Oh ! ho ! my girl—have at your heart,
The urchin cry'd, but not a dart
Within his quiver there was found,
To give the poignant, deadly wound ;
Then stood a while, to contemplate
How he in love might fix her fate :
But first of all, he thought it best,
On Mars to pass a witty jest ;
Says he, " her lovely form and mien,
" Will make him think her beauty's queen."
Then plum'd his painted wings, and flew,
And as he near Olympus drew,
He met the mighty god of arms,
With all his train of wars alarms ;
" Great Mars (he cry'd) from earth I'm come,
" Drawn by the rattling of your drum,
" I bring a message from my mother,
" Who loves you best of any other ;
" Quick to Dunleavy's plains repair,
" Beside a brook she waits you there."—
The god then quit his hostile crew,
Thro' liquid air he swiftly flew ;
And lighting near the blooming fair,
Admir'd her lovely shape and air ;
Her sparkling eyes, and snowy breast,
Her flowing hair, and lovely waist :
" Tho' oft (says he) I've fill'd her arms,
" She ne'er display'd so many charms :"
Love's glowing fires his soul possess'd,
He clasp'd, and strain'd her to his breast ;
But she, with indignation fir'd,
From his embraces quick retir'd ;
Confus'd, surpris'd, deceiv'd, he swore,
He'd never follow Venus more ;
" For not in Heav'n, but on these plains,
(He cry'd) " The queen of beauty reigns."—
Young Cupid perching on a tree,
Who thither came th' event to see,
" Cease, cease your am'rous flights (says he)
" For Johnson's virtues, not her eyes,
" (Tho' they might claim the golden prize,)
" Is chaste Minerva's choicest care,
" Who rules the conduct of this fair ;
" And guides her inexperienc'd youth,
" In the unerring paths of truth."—
Then Mars in sullen mood withdrew,
And join'd again his martial crew.

Account

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonists, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. Continued from p. 705.

UNHAPPILY for this country, and for America, the terms of reconciliation have been rejected, the sword is drawn, and the slaughter of the people is begun. Success has attended his Majesty's arms at the first onset, and the enemy has received a most signal defeat.

The particulars are contained in the following letter from Gen. Howe, who commanded in the action, to Lord Geo. Germaine, Secretary for the American department, dated Camp at Newtown, Long Island, Sept. 3, 1776.

ON the 22d of last month, in the morning, the British, with Col. Donop's corps of Chasseurs and Hessian grenadiers, disembarked near Utrecht, on Long Island, without opposition, the whole being landed, with forty pieces of cannon, in two hours and half, under the direction of Commodore Hotham; Lieutenant General Clinton commanding the first division of the troops.

The enemy had only small parties on the coast, who, upon the approach of the boats, retired to the woody heights, commanding a principal pass on the road from Flat-bush, to their works at Brooklyn. Lord Cornwallis was immediately detached to Flat-Bush with the reserve, two battalions of light Infantry, and Col. Donop's Corps, with six field-pieces, having orders not to risk an attack upon the pass, if he should find it occupied; which proving to be the case, his Lordship took post in the village, and the army extended from the Ferry at the Narrows, through Utrecht and Graveland, to the village of Flat-land.

On the 25th Lieut. General de Heister, with two Brigades of Hessians from Staten Island, joined the army, leaving one brigade of his troops, a detachment of the 14th regiment from Virginia, some convalescents and recruits, under the command of Lieut. Col. Dalrymple, for the security of that island.

On the 26th Lieut. Gen. de Heister took post at Flat-bush, and in the evening Lord Cornwallis, with the British, drew off to Flat-land. About nine o'clock the same night the van of the army, commanded by Lieut. General Clinton, consisting of the light dragoons, and brigade of light infantry, the reserve, under the command of Lord Cornwallis, excepting the 22d regiment, which was posted to the left of the Hessians, the first Brigade, and the 71st regiment, with fourteen field pieces, began to move from Flat-land, across the country, through the New Lots, to seize a pass in the heights, extending from east to west along the middle of the island, and about three miles from Bedford on the road to Jamaica, in order to turn the enemy's left posted at Flat-bush.

General Clinton, being arrived within half a mile of the pass, about two hours before day-break, halted, and settled his disposition for the attack. One of his patrols, falling in with a patrol of the enemy's officers, took them; and the General learning from their information, that the rebels had not occupied the pass, detached a battalion of light infantry to secure it, and, advancing with his corps upon the first appearance of day, possessed himself of the heights, with such a disposition as must have ensured success, had he found the enemy in force to oppose him.

The main body of the army, consisting of the guards, 2d, 3d, and 5th Brigades, with 10 field-pieces, led by Lord Piercy, marched soon after General Clinton, and halted, an hour before day, in his rear. This column (the country not admitting of two columns of march) was followed by the 49th regiment, with four medium twelve pounders, and the baggage closed the rear, with a separate guard.

As soon as these corps had passed the heights, they halted, for the soldiers to take a little refreshment, after which the march was continued, and about half an hour past eight o'clock, having got to Bedford, in the rear of the enemy's left, the attack was commenced by the light infantry and light dragoons, upon large bodies of the rebels, having cannon, who were quitting the woody heights before-mentioned, to return to their lines, upon discovering the march of the army; instead of which they were drove back, and the army still moving on to gain the enemy's rear, the grenadiers and 33d regiment being in front of the column, soon approached within musket-shot of the enemy's lines at Brooklyn, from whence these battalions, without regarding the fire of the cannon and small arms upon them, pursued numbers of the rebels that were retiring from the heights so close to their principal redoubt, and with such eagerness to attack it by storm, that it required repeated orders to prevail upon them to desist from the attempt. Had they been permitted to go on, it is my opinion they would have carried the redoubt; but as it was apparent the lines must have been ours, at a very cheap rate, by regular approaches, I would not risk the loss that might have been sustained in the assault, and ordered them back to a hollow way, in the front of the works, out of the reach of the musketry.

Lieut. Gen. de Heister began, soon after day-break, to cannonade the enemy in his front, and, upon the approach of our right, ordered Col. Donop's corps to advance to the attack of the hill, following himself at the head of the brigades. The light infantry, about that time, having been reinforced by the light company, the grenadier company, and two other companies of the guards, who joined them with the greatest activity and spirit, had taken three pieces of cannon, and were warmly engaged with very superior numbers in the woods, when, on the Hessians advancing, the enemy gave way, and was entirely routed in that quarter.

On the left, Major-General Grant, having the 4th and 6th brigades, the 42d regiment, and two companies of New-York Provincials, raised by Governor Tryon in the Spring, advanced along the coast, with ten pieces of cannon, to divert the enemy's attention from their left. About midnight he fell in with their advanced parties, and at day-break with a large corps, having cannon, and advantageously posted, with whom there was skirmishing, and a cannonade, for some hours, until by the firing at Brooklyn, the rebels suspecting their retreat would be cut off, made a movement to their right, in order to secure it across a swamp and creek that covered the right of their works; but being met in their way by a part of the 2d grenadiers, who were soon after supported by the 71st regiment, and Gen. Grant's left coming up, they suffered considerably: Numbers of them, however, did get into the morass, where many were suffocated or drowned.

The force of the enemy detached from the lines where Gen. Putnam commanded, was not less, from the best accounts I have had, than 10,000 men, who were under the orders of Major General Sullivan, Brigadier Generals Lord Stirling and Udell. Their loss is computed to be about 3300 killed, wounded, prisoners, and drowned; with five field pieces, and one howitzer taken.—A return of the prisoners is inclosed.

On the part of the King's troops, five officers, and fifty-six non-commissioned officers, and rank and file, killed; twelve officers and 245 non-commissioned officers, and rank and file, wounded: one officer and twenty grenadiers of the marines taken by mistaking the enemy for the Hessians.

The Hessians had two privates killed, three officers, and twenty-three rank and file wounded. The wounds are in general very slight. Lieutenant Colonel Monckton is shot through the body, but there are the greatest hopes of his recovery.

The behaviour of both officers and soldiers, British and Hessian, was highly to their honour. More determined courage and steadiness in troops have never been experienced, or a greater ardour to distinguish themselves, as all those who had an opportunity have amply evinced by their actions.

In the evening of the 27th, the army encamped in front of the enemy's works. On the 28th, at night, broke ground 600 yards distant from a redoubt upon their left, and on the 29th at night the rebels evacuated their entrenchments, and Redbank, with the utmost silence, and quitted Governor's island the following evening, leaving their cannon and a quantity of stores in all their works. At day-break on the 30th their flight was discovered, the pickets of the line took possession, and those most advanced reached the shore opposite to New York, as their rear guard was going over, and fired some shot among them.

The enemy is still in possession of the town and island of New York, in force, and making demonstration of opposing us in their works on both sides of King's-bridge.

The inhabitants of this island, many of whom had been forced into rebellion, have all submitted, and are ready to take the oaths of allegiance.

This dispatch will be delivered to your Lordship by Major Cuyler, my first Aid de Camp, who I trust will be able to give your Lordship such further information as may be required.

I have the honour to be, &c.

W. Howe.

P. S. I have omitted to take notice, in its proper place, of a movement made by the King's ships towards the town, on the 27th, at day-break, with a view of drawing off the attention of the enemy from our real design, which, I believe, effectually answered the intended purpose.

Return of prisoners taken on Long Island, 27th August, 1776.

Commissioned Officers: Their three Generals—Sullivan, Lord Sterling, and Udell; three Colonels, four Lieutenant Colonels, three Majors, eighteen Captains, forty-three Lieutenants, eleven Ensigns, one Adjutant, three Surgeons, and two Volunteers; Privates 1006.

N. B. Nine officers and fifty-eight privates of the above, wounded.

Camp at Newtown, Sept. 3, 1776.

Hessian Troops—two Rank and File killed; 23 ditto, wounded.

Major Paoli, Capt. O'Reilly, Lieut. Donop, wounded.

W. HOWE,

Commander in Chief.

Lord Viscount Howe, Commander in Chief of his Majesty's ships and vessels in North America, in his letter of the 10th of October, after giving an account of the return of the Phoenix, Rose, and Tryal armed schooner, with their loss, and of the landing of the troops, as already related, adds—That "being informed the next day, by General Howe, of his intentions to advance with the army that night to the enemy's lines, and of his wishes that some diversion might be attempted by the ships on this side, I gave direction to Sir Peter Parker for proceeding higher up in the channel towards the town of New York next morning, with the Asia, Renown, Preston, (Commodore Hotham embarked in the Phoenix, having been left to carry on the service in Gravesend Bay) Roebuck and Repulse; and to keep those ships in readiness for being employed as occasion might require; but the wind veering to the northward soon after the break of day, the ships could not be moved up to the distance proposed; therefore when the corps under General Grant, forming the left column of the army, were seen to be engaged with the enemy in the morning, the Roebuck, Capt. Hammond, leading the detached Squadron, was the only ship that could fetch high enough to the northward to exchange a few random shot with the battery on Red Hook; and the ebb making strongly down the river soon after, I ordered the signal to be shewn for the Squadron to anchor.

"It was observed, that as soon as the centre column of the army was seen to have turned the flank of the enemy's line opposed to General Grant, they immediately attempted to make their retreat within their works; but that they suffered great loss, both in the number killed and made prisoners."—Gaz.

The following advices, seemingly authentic, are collected from the public prints:

"That the Congress had appointed Samuel Tucker, Esq; of Trenton, in New Jersey, Governor of that Province; and that John Morin Scott, Esq; an eminent attorney (by the same authority) was appointed Governor of New York.

"That the Provincials had erected two very strong forts on the banks of the river Delaware; the one at a place called Red Bank, and the other at Gloucester Point, and that they had fortified the town of Newcastle.

"That a very ingenious person has erected a foundry on the banks of the aforesaid river, and had engaged to furnish the Congress with any number of cannon, made of copper, obtained from the vast copper mines on Col. Schuyler's estate; and that the said person had already cast a number of pieces of ordnance (for the Congress) called two-and-forty pounders, for 100l. a-piece "That the Congress were assured that upwards of 35,000 men, in the West India islands, were ready to declare for the liberties of America.

"That Governor Franklin, and David Matthews, late Mayor of York (now under sentence of death for holding correspondence with Governor Tryon) are removed to Connecticut Government, to prevent their escape.

"That many of the friends of Government have been seized at New York, and ridden on rails, &c. and that others have fled to the King's Army, for fear of a like or worse punishment.

"That 1,500 loyal Americans have already joined the King's Army; and that the famous partizan, Major Rogers, with his corps of Rangers, is among the number.

"That the resentment of the Guards is not so to be expressed on hearing the insult offered to their Sovereign, by pulling down his statue.

"That numbers of persons of fortune have been committed to prison for refusing the oath of allegiance to the Congress.

"That Mr. John Dickenson is employed by the Congress, in forming and digesting a code of laws for their High Mightinesses the States General of America.

"That Lady Johnson is seized by order of General Schuyler, instead of her husband Sir John, who has taken an active part in favour of government; but that the faithful Mohawks have declared, that if the least indignity is offered to her person, they will desolate the whole estate belonging to the General.

"That 3l. a man are given to deserters, and 5 guineas to recruits.

"That the two armies are nearly equal, about 25,000 men each.

"That Admiral Gayton, in the Antelope, had fallen in with Rear Admiral Avery, in the Resolution, and that both ships had suffered considerably in the action. Avery lost an arm, and 90 men.

"That the Hon. James Otis, John Adams, Jedediah Foster, Enoch Freeman, Charles Chauncy, and Joseph Palmer, late of the Council in Massachusetts Bay, have changed sides, and resigned their posts.

"The Provincial Congress of New York have ordered that all males of that city and county, above the age of 16, and under that of 50, who have withdrawn themselves since the 1st of June last, do forthwith return to their usual places of abode under severe penalties.

"A proclamation has been published at Halifax, forbidding the masters of vessels from taking any person from thence without a pass.—This proclamation is intended to prevent desertion.

"The Governors of East and West Florida, taking advantage of the times, have offered great encouragement to the North Americans, who may be inclined to change their residence, to come and settle in their government, offering land without limitation to all those who have the means to cultivate it.

"That Archibald Govan's vessel, with a number of Scotch passengers on board, from Virginia, had been stopped, the money, about 50000l. taken out, and the remainder of the property of the fugitives secured; and there was no doubt but that the whole would be confiscated.

"That several persons of rank in that province had been taken up on suspicion of holding a treasonable correspondence with Lord Dunmore; and that young Ralph Warmley, Esq; formerly one of the Governor's Council, had been sent to Williamsburg, under a guard of 50 men, after an inventory had been taken of his estate and effects.

"That the Council of Safety, for the Province of Georgia, had resolved, That it be incumbent on the friends of America to defend the metropolis, as long as the same shall be tenable: that, rather than the same shall be held and occupied by the enemy, or the ships in the harbour taken and employed by them, the same shall be burned and destroyed.

"That it shall be considered as a desertion from the cause of America, and a desertion of property, for any one to quit Savanna, or the haploets thereunto belonging, on the present alarming occasion."

March 21.

MR. Alderman Wilkes. All wise governments and well-regulated states, have been particularly careful to remark and correct the various abuses, which a considerable length of time almost necessarily creates. Among these, one of the most striking and important in our country is, the present unfair and inadequate state, of the representation of the people of England in Parliament. It is now become so partial and unequal, from the lapse of time, that I believe almost every gentleman in the house will agree with me in the necessity of its being taken into the most serious consideration, and of our endeavouring to find a remedy for this great and growing evil.

I wish, Sir, my slender abilities were equal to a thorough investigation of this momentous business. Very diligent and well-meant endeavours have not been wanting to trace it from its first origin. The most natural and perfect idea of free government is, in my mind, that of the people themselves assembling to determine by what law they chuse to be governed, and to establish the regulations they think necessary for the protection of their property and liberty against all violence and fraud. Every member of such a community would submit with alacrity to the observance of what had been enacted by himself, and assist with spirit in giving efficacy and vigour to laws and ordinances which derived all their authority from his own approbation and concurrence. In small inconsiderable states, this mode of legislation has been happily followed, both in antient and modern times. The extent and populousness of a great empire seem scarcely to admit it without confusion and tumult; and therefore, our ancestors, more wise in this than the antient Romans, adopted the representation of the many by a few, as answering more fully the true ends of government. Rome was enslaved from inattention to this very circumstance, and by one other fatal act, which ought to be a strong warning to the people, even against their own representatives here, the leaving power too long in the hands of the same persons, by which the armies of the republic became the armies of Sylla, Pompey, and Cæsar. When all the burghers of Italy obtained the freedom of Rome, and voted in public assemblies, their multitude rendered the distinction of the citizen of Rome and the alien impossible. Their assemblies and deliberations became disorderly and tumultuous. Unprincipled and ambitious men found out the secret of turning them to the ruin of the Roman liberty, and the common-wealth; among us this evil is avoided by representation, and yet the justice of the principle is preserved. Every Englishman is supposed to be present in parliament, either in person, or by deputy chosen by himself, and therefore the resolution of parliament is taken to be the resolution of every individual, and to give the public the consent and approbation of every free agent of the community.

According to the first formation of this excellent constitution, so long and so justly our greatest boast and best inheritance, we find that the people thus took care no laws should be enacted, no taxes levied but by their consent, expressed by their representatives in the great council of the nation. The mode of representation in antient times being tolerably adequate and proportionate, the sense of the people were known by that of Parliament; their share of power in the legislature was preserved, and founded in equal justice; at present it is become insufficient, partial, and unjust.

From so pleasing a view as that of the equal power, which our ancestors had, with great wisdom and care, modelled for the commons of this realm, the present scene gives us not very venerable ruins of that majestic and beautiful fabric, the English constitution. As the whole seems in disorder and confusion, all the former union and harmony of the parts are lost or destroyed. It appears, Sir, from the writs remaining in the King's remembrancer's office in the exchequer, that no less than twenty-two towns sent members to the parliaments in the 23d, 25th, and 26th, of King Edward I. which have long ceased to be represented. The names of some of them are scarcely known to us, such as Canebrig, and Bamburg in Northumberland; Pefstore and Brem in Worcesterhire, Jarvall and Tykhull in Yorkshire. What a happy fate, Sir, has attended the boroughs of Gatton and Old Sarum, of which, although "ipse periere ruinæ," the names are familiar to us, the clerk regularly calls them over, and four respectable gentlemen represent their departed greatness, as the knights at a coronation represent Aquitaine and Normandy! The little town of Banbury, "petite ville grand renom," as Rabelais says of Chinon, has, I believe, only seventeen electors, yet gives us, in its representative, what is of the utmost importance to the majority here, a first Lord of the treasury, and a Chancellor of the exchequer. Its influence and weight, on a division, I have often seen overpower the united force of members for London, Bristol, and several of the most populous counties. East-Grinstead too, I think, has only about thirty electors, yet gives a seat among us to that brave, heroic lord at the head of a great department, now very military, who has fully determined to conquer America—but not in Germany. It is not, Sir, my purpose to weary the patience of the House by the researches of an antiquarian into the antient state of our representation, and its variations at different periods. I shall only remark shortly on what passed in the reign of Henry VI. and some of his successors. In that reign Sir John Fortescue, his chancellor, observed that the House of Commons consisted of more than three hundred chosen men; various alterations were made by succeeding kings till James II. since which period no change has happened. Great abuses, it must be owned, contrary to the primary ideas of the English constitution, were committed by our former princes, in giving the right of representation to several paltry boroughs, because the places were poor, and dependent on them, or on a favourite over-grown peer. The land marks of the constitution have often been removed. The marked partiality of Cornwall, which single county still sends, within one, as many members as the whole whole kingdom of Scotland, is striking, and arose from its yielding to the crown in tin and lands a larger hereditary revenue than any other English county, as well as from the duchy being in the crown, and giving an amazing command and influence. By such acts of our princes the constitution was wounded in its most vital part. Henry VIII. restored two members. Edward VI. twenty, Queen Mary four, Queen Elizabeth twelve, James I. sixteen. Charles I. eighteen, in all seventy-two. The alterations by creation in the same period were more considerable, for Henry VIII. created thirty-three, Edward VI. twenty-eight, Queen Mary seventeen, Queen Elizabeth forty-eight, James I. eleven; in all 137. Charles I. made no new creation of this kind. Charles II. added two for the county, and two for the city of Durham, and two for Newark on Trent. This House is at this hour composed of the same representation it was at his demise, notwithstanding the many and important changes which have since happened: it becomes us therefore to enquire, whether the sense of parliament can be now, on solid grounds, from the present representation, said to be the sense of the nation, as in the time of our forefathers. I am satisfied, Sir, the sentiments of the people cannot be justly known at this time from the resolutions of a parliament, composed as the present is, even tho' no undue influence was practised after the return of the members to the House, even supposing for a moment the influence of all the baneful arts of corruption to be suspended, which, for a moment, I believe, they have not been, under the present profligate administration. Let us examine, Sir, with exactness and candour, of what the efficient parts of this House are composed, and what proportion they bear on the large scale, to the body of the people of England, who are supposed to be represented.

The southern part of this island, to which I now confine my ideas, consists of about five millions of people, according to the most received calculation. I will state by what numbers the majority of this House is elected, and I suppose the largest number present of any recorded in our journals, which was in the famous year 1741. In that year the three largest divisions appear on our journals.—The first is that of the 21st of January, when the numbers were 253 to 250; the second on the 18th of the same month 236 to 235; the third on the 9th of March, 244 to 242. In these divisions the members of Scotland are included; but I will state my calculations only for England, because it gives the argument more force. The division therefore, I adopt, is that of January 21; the number of members present on that day, were 503. Let me however suppose the number of 254 to be the majority of members, who will ever be able to attend in their places. I state it high, from the accidents of sickness, service in foreign parts, travelling, and necessary avocations. From the majority of electors in the boroughs, which return members to this House, it has been demonstrated that this number of 254 members are actually elected by no more than 5723 persons, generally the inhabitants of Cornish, and other boroughs, and perhaps not the most respectable part of the community. Is our sovereign then to learn the sense of his whole people from these few persons? Are these the men to give laws to this vast empire, and to tax this wealthy nation? I do not mention all the tedious calculations, because gentlemen may find them at length in the works of the incomparable Dr. Price, in Postlethwaite, and in Burgh's political disquisitions. Figures afford the clearest demonstration, incapable of cavil or sophistry. Since Burgh's calculation only one alteration has happened; I allude to the borough of Shoreham, in Sussex; for by the act of 1771, all the freeholders of forty shillings per annum, in the neighbouring rape or hundred of Bramber, are admitted to vote for that borough; but many of the old electors were disfranchised. It appears likewise that 50 of our members are elected by only 364 persons. Lord chancellor Talbot supposed that the majority of this House was elected by 50,000 persons, and he exclaimed against the injustice of that idea. More accurate calculations than his Lordship's, and the unerring rules of political arithmetic, have shewn the injustice to be vastly beyond what his Lordship even suspected.

When we consider, Sir, that the most important powers of this house, the levying taxes on, and enacting laws for, five millions of persons, is thus usurped and unconstitutionally exercised by the small number I have mentioned, it becomes our duty to the people to redress to them their clear rights, their original share in the legislature. The ancient representation of this kingdom we find was founded by our ancestors in justice, wisdom, and equality. The present state of it would be continued by us in folly, obstinacy, and injustice. This evil has been complained of by some of the wisest patriots our country has ever produced. I shall beg leave to give that close reasoner, Mr. Locke's ideas in his own words. He says, in the treatise on civil government, "Things not changing equally, and private interest often keeping up customs and privileges, when the reasons of them are ceased, it often comes to pass, that in governments, where part of the legislative consists of representatives chosen by the people, that in tract of time this representation becomes very unequal and disproportionate to the reasons it was at first established upon. To what gross absurdities the following of a custom, when reason has left it, may lead, we may be satisfied when we see the bare name of a town, of which there remains not so much as the ruins, where scarce so much housing as a sheep-cote, or more inhabitants than a shepherd is to be found, sends as many representatives to the grand assembly of law-makers, as a whole county, numerous in people, and powerful in riches. This strangers stand amazed at, and every one must confess needs a remedy." After so great an authority as that of Mr. Locke, I shall scarcely be treated on this occasion as a mere visionary, and the propriety of the motion I shall have the honour of submitting to the house, will scarcely be disputed. Even the members for such places as Old Sarum, and Gatton, who I may venture to say at present stant nominis umbra, will, I am persuaded, have too much candour to complain of the right of their few consti-agents, if indeed they have constituents, if they are not self-created, self-elected, self-existent, of this pretended right being transferred to the county, while the rich and populous manufacturing towns of Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, and others, may have at least an equitable share in the formation of those laws by which they are governed. My idea, Sir, in this case, as to the wretched and depopulated towns and boroughs in general, I own is amputation. I say with Horace, Inutilis ramos amputans, feliciore inferat.

This is not, Sir, the first attempt of the kind to correct, although in an inconsiderable degree, this growing evil. Proceedings of a similar nature were had among us above a century past. The clerk will read from our journals what passed on the 26th of March, 1668, on a bill to enable the county palatine of Durham to send two knights for the county, and two citizens for the city of Durham. [The clerk reads.] In a book of authority, Anchitell Grey's debates, we have a more particular account of what passed in the house on that occasion. He says, that "Sir Thomas Meies moved, that the shires may have an increase of Knights, and that some of the small boroughs, where there are but few electors, may be taken away, and a bill for that purpose." "On a division, the bill was rejected, 65 to 50." This, however, alludes only to the bill then before the house, respecting the county and city of Durham. I desire to add the few remarkable words of Sir Thomas Strickland in this debate, because I have not seen them quoted on the late important American questions. "The county-palatine of Durham was never taxed in Parliament by ancient privilege before King James's time, and so needed no representation, but now being taxed, it is but reasonable they should have." Such sentiments, Sir, were promulgated in this house even so long ago as the reign of Charles II.

I am aware, Sir, that the power de jure, of the legislature to disfranchise a number of boroughs, upon the general grounds of improving the constitution, has been doubted; and gentlemen will ask, whether a power is lodged in the representative to destroy his immediate constituent? Such a question is best answered by another: How originated the right, and upon what grounds was it granted? Old Sarum and Gatton, for instance, were populous towns, when the right of representation was first given them. They are now desolate, and therefore ought not to retain a privilege, which they acquired only by their extent and populousness. We ought in every thing, as far as we can, to make the theory and practice of the constitution coincide, and the supreme legislative body of a state must surely have this power inherent in them. It was de facto lately exercised to its full extent by this house in the case of Shoreham, with universal approbation, for near a hundred corrupt voters were disfranchised, and about twice that number of freeholders admitted from the county of Sussex.

It will be objected, I foresee, that a time of perfect calm and peace throughout this vast empire, is the most proper to propose internal regulations of this importance; and that while intel-tine discord rages in the whole northern continent of America, our attention ought to be fixed upon that most alarming object, and all our efforts employed to extinguish the devouring flame of a civil war. In my opinion, Sir, the American war is in this truly critical era one of the strongest arguments for the regulations of our representation, which I now submit to the house. During the rest of our lives, likewise, I may venture to prophesy, America will be the leading feature of this age. In our late disputes with the Americans, we have always taken it for granted, that the people of England justified all the iniquitous, cruel, arbitrary, and mad proceedings of administration, because they had the approbation of the majority of this house. The absurdity of such an argument is apparent, for the majority of this house we know speak only the sense of 5723 persons, even supposing, according to the constitutional custom of our ancestors, the constituent had been consulted on this great national point, as he ought to have been. We have seen in what manner the acquiescence of a majority here is obtained. The people in the southern part of this island amount to upwards of five millions. The sense, therefore, of five millions cannot be ascertained by the opinion of not six thousand, even supposing it had been collected. The Americans with great reason insist, that the present war is carried on contrary to the sense of the nation, by a ministerial junto, and an arbitrary faction equally hostile to the rights of Englishmen, and the claims of Americans. The various addresses to the throne from most numerous bodies, praying that the sword may be returned to the scabbard, and all hostilities cease, confirm this assertion. The capital of our country has repeatedly declared, by various public acts, its abhorrence of the present unnatural civil war, begun on principles subversive of our constitution. Our history furnishes frequent instances of the sense of parliament running directly counter to the sense of the nation. It was notoriously of late the case in the business of the Middlesex election. I believe the fact to be equally certain in the grand American dispute, at least as to the actual hostilities now carrying on against our brethren and fellow subjects. The proposition before us will bring the case to an issue, and from a fair and equal representation of the people, America may at length distinguish the real sentiments of freemen and Englishmen.

I do not mean, Sir, at this time, to go into a tedious detail of all the various proposals which have been made for redressing this irregularity in the representation of the people. I will not intrude on the indulgence of the house, which I have always found so favourable to me. When the bill is brought in, and sent to a committee, it will be the proper time to examine all the minutiae of this great plan, and to determine on the propriety of what ought now to be done, as well as of what formerly was actually accomplished. The journals of Cromwell's parliaments prove that a more equal representation was feuled, and carried by him into execution. That wonderful, comprehensive mind embraced the whole of this powerful empire. Ireland was put on a par with Scotland, and each kingdom sent thirty members to a parliament, which consisted likewise of four hundred from England and Wales, and was to be triennial. Our colonies were then a speck on the face of the globe; now they cover half the new world. I will at this time, Sir, only throw out general ideas, that every free agent in this kingdom should, in my wish, be represented in parliament; that the metropolis, which contains in itself a ninth part of the people, and the counties of Middlesex, York, and others, which so greatly abound with inhabitants, should receive an increase in their representation; that the mean, and insignificant boroughs, so emphatically stiled the rotten part of our constitution, should be lopped off, and the electors in them thrown into the counties; and the rich, populous, trading towns, Birmingham, Manchester, Sheffield, Leeds, and others, be permitted to send deputies to the great council of the nation.

The disfranchising of the mean, venal and dependant boroughs would be laying the axe to the root of corruption and treasury influence, as well as aristocratical tyranny. We ought equally to guard against those who sell themselves, or whose Lords sell them. Burgage tenures, and private property in a share of the legislature, are monstrous absurdities in a free state, as well as an insult to common sense. I wish, Sir, an English parliament to speak the free unbiassed sense of the English people, and of every man among us, of each individual, who may justly be supposed to be comprehended in a fair majority. The meanest mechanic, the poorest peasant and day-labourer, has important rights respecting his personal liberty, that of his wife and children, his property, however inconsiderable, his wages, his earnings, the very price and value of each day's hard labour, which are in many trades and manufactures regulated by the power of parliament. Every law relative to marriage, to the protection of a wife, sister, or daughter, against violence and brutal lust, to every contract or agreement with a rapacious or unjust master, interest the manufacturer, the cottager, the servant, as well as the rich subjects of the state. Some share therefore in the power of making those laws, which deeply interest them, and to which they are expected to pay obedience, should be reserved even to this inferior, but of most useful set of men in the community: and we ought always to remember this important truth, acknowledged by every free state, that all government is instituted for the good of the mass of the people to be governed; that they are the original fountain of power, and even of revenue, and in all events the last resource.

The various instances of partial injustice throughout this kingdom will likewise become the proper subjects of enquiry in the course of the bill before the committee, such as the many freeholds in the city of London, which are not represented in this house. These freeholds being within the particular jurisdiction of the city, are excluded from giving a vote in the county of Middlesex, and by act of parliament only liverymen can vote for members of parliament in London. These, and other particulars, I leave. I mention them now to shew the necessity of a new regulation of the representation of this kingdom.

My squireies, Sir, are confined to the southern part of the island. Scotland I leave to the care of its own prudent and careful sons. I hope they will spare a few moments from the management of the arduous affairs of England and America, which at present so much engross their time, to attend to the state of representation among their own people, if they have not all emigrated to this warmer and more fruitful climate. I am almost afraid that forty-five Scottish gentlemen among us represent themselves. Perhaps in my plan for the improvement of the representation of England, almost all the natives of Scotland may be included. I shall only remark, that the proportion of representation between the two countries cannot be changed. In the twenty-second article of the treaty of Union, the number of forty-five is to be the representative body in the parliament of Great-Britain for the northern part of this island. To increase the members for England and Wales beyond the number, of which the English parliament consisted at the period of that treaty in 1706, would be a breach of public faith, and a violation of a solemn treaty between the independent states. My proposition has for its basis the preservation of that compact, the proportional share of each kingdom in the legislative body remaining exactly according to its present establishment.

The monstrous injustice and glaring partiality of the present representation of the commons of England has been fully stated, and is, I believe, almost universally acknowledged, as well as the necessity of our recurring to the great leading principle of our nice constitution, which declares this house of parliament to be only delegated power from the people at large. Policy, so less than justice, calls our attention to this momentous point; and reason, not custom, ought to be our guide in a business of this consequence, where the rights of a free people are materially interested. Without a true representation of the Commons, our constitution is essentially defective, our parliament is a delusive name, a mere phantom, and all other remedies to recover the pristine purity of the form of government established by our ancestors would be ineffectual, even the shortening the period of parliaments, and a place and pension bill, both which I highly approve, and think absolutely necessary. I therefore flatter myself, Sir, that I shall have the concurrence of the house with the motion, which I have now the honour of making, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for a just and equal representation of the people of England in parliament."

Mr. Alderman Bull seconded the motion.

Lord North was very jocular. He said, whatever reason other gentlemen had to complain, he imagined the honourable gentleman was tolerably well pleased with his success in London and Middlesex. He supposed the honourable gentleman was not serious, nor ever meant his proposition should go to a committee. If he should prevail, he assured him it would cause great discontent; and he would find it no easy task to prevail on those who had an interest in the boroughs, on which he bestowed so many hard names, to sacrifice to ideal schemes of reformation so beneficial a species of property. His lordship entered into a physical, chirurgical, and political disquisition on the nature and effects of an apoplexy in general.

general, as operating on the body natural and body politic; and shewed how dangerous such experiments have proved, and the risk of overthrowing or dissolving the constitutions such experiments were intended to correct and amend. He thought the proposition could do no good, and might do much harm; and added, that he did not approve of it.

Mr. Wilkes made a short reply; and the question being put, it passed in the negative, without a division.

Order for second reading of the bill for the better supply of mariners and seamen on board the king's ships and merchants's ships (being to employ foreign seamen, not exceeding in number, on board one vessel, three-fourths of her crew.)

Hon. T. Luttrell said he would maintain the veracity of his assertions in a former debate on naval affairs, and which had been publicly called in question in another place by the first naval authority in Great-Britain. He said, that the same noble earl had likewise in that other place [meaning, no doubt, the House of Lords] positively, and with consummate effrontery, denied, that any vagrants had been admitted on board the king's ships, and had recourse to the miserable subterfuge, when a noble duke, [his grace of Richmond] produced the minute books of the last sessions for Hampshire, of protesting, that though this was a proof of commitment on the part of the magistrates, it was no proof of their having been received on board any of his Majesty's vessels; and that he was particularly careful to preserve the morals of the seamen by preventing such wretches as those spoken of from being entered for the naval service. He produced the clearest testimony, that several of those vagrants, whose names had been read in the other house by the noble Duke before-mentioned, were on the first day of February last delivered by the goaler at Gosport on board his Majesty's frigate Greyhound, captain Dickson, lately gone to America. He wished the ministers to recollect what happened from a similar measure in 1755, when, for the purpose of getting men for Admiral Boscawen's fleet, the outcasts of the prisons were, by an order of the Privy Council, couched in the same terms with the recent one, admitted on board, and cost no less than two thousand lives in that Squadron of eleven ships of the line, within the space of eight months. He reprehended in very severe terms, what he called, the supercilious confidence with which the noble lord [Lord Sandwich] contradicted the most notorious facts, and asserted day after day falsehoods so very glaring, that he had no chance to escape being detected, though he infamously shut the door to all official information whatever, unless derived from himself in person; going to so extraordinary length, as to desire that professional men might be referred to an audience with him, to be convinced that they knew nothing of a service, to the theory and practice of which they had devoted the better part of their lives, and which he only could possess in ideal presumption. He shewed the weak state of nineteen guard-ships; that their present complements scarcely exceeded altogether 6000 men, and their war establishment, to be fit for action, would exceed 12,000; that to procure the other 6000 upon an emergency, you would be obliged to disarm at least 1000 trading vessels of different sorts; for that raw men, such as ploughmen or menial servants, could never be taken for a Squadron that was to relieve Gibraltar in case of a siege, or to protect Ireland, or to cover the British coasts. The marines, he said, were mostly in America. The French and Spaniards will have by the latter end of next month, in their several ports of the Mediterranean and the bay of Biscay, near 30 men of war of the line ready for actual service, and may, if they judge expedient, by means of their registers, augment that number to at least 40 within the same space of time. The utmost exertion of this country could not find maritime resources nearly equal to that strength of the House of Bourbon, in case of threatened invasion, under five or six months. The ships for America have scarce any able seamen at all. The Le Blonde, commanded by Capt. Pownall, on whom Lord Sandwich had bestowed such lavish compliments for completely manning his ship in a few days, had in fact, when she sailed from Chatham, only 30 able seamen out of 220. The Flora, another frigate of 32 guns, had only four able seamen when she left that port, and was obliged to borrow 50 men from the Ramilles guardship to carry her out of the river Medway to Blackfakes. A very diligent officer at one of the rendezvous stations in 28 days was able to procure five seamen only; and Lord Howe's own ship, the Eagle, had on Saturday last scarce more than 40 seamen out of about 108 nominal sailors, a great part of which 108 were lent from the yachts, and for occasional operations, and her full complement, as a 64 gun ship, is 520 men. He asked how this state of the flag-ship, which had been several weeks commissioned, and was so central a department for the reception of volunteers, agreed with the noble Earl's assertion, that the character of the commander was sufficient at this time to supply the ship's complement expeditiously and completely. Did not the noble Earl mean, when he observed, that he should further the naval service by putting less reliance on the admiralty board, and more confidence in the captains, to throw the miscarriage in raising men off his own shoulders upon those gentlemen, and hope by that means to shelter himself from the censure and vengeance of his insulted country? The censure of his country he had long and deservedly been in possession of; and there was every appearance, that if he pursued the same profligate and imposing career, the vengeance of this nation must very soon overtake him. The noble Earl had said in another place, that more had been done within two months by the activity and talents of the present admiralty board, than during the whole course of the last glorious war. If the noble Earl meant by more having been done, that more mischief had been done, and more absurd and reprehensible acts, he heartily joined issue with him; but certain it is, that more good was done at the admiralty board in two months when Lord Anson presided there, than during the whole five years of the present first commissioner's naval administration.

An Authentic Journal of Occurrences which happened within the Circle of Major Meigs's Observations in that extraordinary Route of Col. Arnold and his Army from the Neighbourhood of Boston to Quebec, with the Operations of that Army against Quebec.

NOV. 19. Early in the morning we decamped and marched up to Point aux Trembles, about 7 leagues from Quebec. The country through which we passed was well settled. Every few miles a handsome little chapel. We have with us 7 prisoners and 2 deserters.

20. An express came in this morning from Gen. Montgomery at Montreal—the contents were, that the king's troops had abandoned the town and fled to the shipping, and that he was about to attack them with row-gallies and boats with artillery mounted in them, and that he should immediately join our detachment with men and artillery. We have now an express ready to return to Montreal, by which conveyance I write to my family.

21. The curate of the parish at Point aux Trembles dined this day at head quarters.

22. An express arrived from Montreal, which informs us that all the shipping were taken last Sabbath evening, and that General Montgomery was about to march for Quebec.

23. An express arrived from Montreal, by whom we have intelligence that General Montgomery was on his march, and that yesterday he had sent clothing for our troops. One of our men came in from the woods, who had been left behind; and says, that himself with one more, killed a horse, and lived on the flesh several days.

24. This morning the Hunter sloop of war, and three other armed vessels, appeared in sight. An express is now going to meet the troops that are coming down from Montreal.

25. The Hunter sloop, a large snow, and an armed schooner, came to an anchor opposite to our quarters. This morning a number of men were sent up the river in a canoe to meet the troops that were coming down.

26. A number of gentlemen came in this morning from Quebec.—I wrote to my father and Mrs. Meigs.

27. We are informed that the house of Major Caldwell, in which our troops were quartered, is burnt.

28. Col. Arnold went up to Jackarty, to hasten down the ammunition.

29. Capt. Morgan, who had been sent down to the neighbourhood of Quebec, sent up to our quarters two prisoners, which he took in the suburbs.

30. This day an express went to Gen. Montgomery.—Capt. — arrived with ammunition and provisions.

Dec. 1. Gen. Montgomery arrived this day at 1 P. M. with three armed schooners, with men, artillery, ammunition, and provisions, to the great joy of our detachment. Towards evening our detachment turned out, and marched down to the General's quarters, and was there received. The General complimented us on our appearance.

November, 1776.

2. In the morning I assisted in sending down our field pieces by land. The large cannon are ordered down in bateaux, which when landed, the bateaux are to go to Point Levi for the ladders.

3. Major Brown arrived from Sorrell. The soldiers drew for their clothing.

4. We marched at 12 o'clock with our camp before Quebec. At evening I quartered at the house of the curate of the parish of St. Augustin; we were entertained with hospitality and elegance. The curate's name is Michael Barreau.

5. In the morning proceeded on our march for St. Fry, our camp before Quebec, where we arrived about noon. This day wrote to Mrs. Meigs.

6. I wrote to Titus Hosner, Esq; at Middle-Town. Weather cold, with storms of snow.

7. I am informed that our men yesterday took a sloop with provisions and some cash.

8. We received some shot from the city, but no person was hurt.

9. A party of one hundred men are ordered to cover the train this evening, while they bombard the town: I went with this party. Twenty-seven shots were thrown into the town. This day we began to erect a battery before St. John's gate.

10. The enemy cannonaded our camp early in the morning, and continued it till night: a party of our men are ordered into St. Rue, to cover the train which are ordered there also with five mortars and two field pieces. This evening forty-five shells were thrown into the town, the enemy returned a few, and some twenty four pounders and grape shot. No person on our side was hurt, except a Canadian, who was shot thro' the body;

11. The town kept a warm cannonading upon our men, one of whom was wounded in the thigh. In the evening we sent forty-five shells into the town. I had the command of the working party at the battery this night. The enemy gave us a few shot and shells, but not one of them struck the battery. W. E. exceeding cold.

12. The platforms nearly ready for the gun battery. W. E. cold.

13. We opened our battery, had two men wounded in it by a cannon from the city. Five men of Col. Livingston's regiment of Canadians were also wounded by a cannon shot, which went through a house in St. John's suburbs, where they were quartered.

14. One of our men was killed in the battery, and several wounded. In the evening we threw into the town twenty-four shells; at the same time we were briskly cannonaded from the town.

15. This morning before sun-rise our battery began to play and continued one hour, then ceased by order of the general. A flag was then sent into the city, but was refused admittance. After some discourse with the officers from the ramparts, the flag returned. (The discourse was, that Gen. Carlton would suffer no truce with rebels; if they came to implore mercy from the king, he would then give them a hearing.) At 2 P. M. our battery began to play upon the town, and mortars also from the suburbs of St. Rue, which sent in fifty bombs. This day we had two men killed at our battery, and our guns damaged by a shot from the enemy. It is now in agitation to storm the town, which if resolved, I hope will be undertaken with a proper sense of the nature and importance of such an attack, and vigorously executed.

G g g g

and

16. The enemy this morning began to cannonade our quarters; several shot struck the house, on which it was thought best to remove elsewhere. One of our men was shot through the body with a grape shot; his life is despaired of. I wrote to Mrs. Meigs by way of Montreal. This evening a council was held by all the commissioned officers of Col. Arnold's detachment, when the majority were for storming Quebec, as soon as the men were provided with bayonets, spears, hatchets, and hand grenades.

17. All day at Captain Hanchet's quarters. Nothing extraordinary happened. Cold and snow.

18. This morning I came to Mr. Duvene's house to quarter. W. E. snow.

19. No occurrences extraordinary. W. E. moderate and snowy.

20. Several of our men have the small pox at this time. W. E. cold.

21. We have orders for all our men to wear hemlock sprigs in their hats, to distinguish them in the attack upon the works.

22. Preparations are making and things ripening fast for the assault upon the works of Quebec. The blessing of heaven attend the enterprise!—This evening celebrated the anniversary of a happy event or circumstance in my life.

23. This day the officers of our detachment met; the general attended to compose some matters of dispute, which were happily settled.

24. I was on a general court martial. Our chaplain preached a sermon in the chapel of the general hospital, which is exceeding elegant inside, and richly decorated with carriages and gilt work.

25. Col. Arnold's detachment paraded this evening at Capt. Morgan's quarters. At 4 P. M. his honour Gen. Montgomery attended, and addressed us on the subject of an assault upon the town in a spirited manner.

26. Nothing material happened; W. E. cold.

27. This evening the troops assembled by order of the general, with a design to make an attack upon the works of Quebec—when an order from the general came for their returning to their quarters, the time and season not being thought proper for the attack.

28. The following came out in the general orders, "the General had the most sensible pleasure in seeing the good disposition with which the troops last night moved towards the attack. It was with the greatest reluctance he found himself called upon by his duty to repress their ardour; but he should hold himself answerable to those brave men, whose lives might be saved by waiting for a more favourable opportunity." This day is the 25th anniversary of my birth. A variety of scenes have presented themselves in this short term; prosperity and adversity have alternately chequered my path. Some dangers elapsed, and favours innumerable received by me, demand a tribute of the warmest gratitude.

29. This day I dined with Gen. Montgomery, and spent the afternoon and evening with him in an agreeable manner. This evening as a party of our men were executing a command in the suburbs of St. Rue, they were fired upon from the walls, and one man was wounded in the leg.

30. This morning between the hours of one and three o'clock, our train threw into the city about thirty shells, which produced a number of shells and a brisk cannonading from the town. Continued our preparations to make an attack upon the city, the ladders being now ready, and the W. E. stormy, which was thought best for our purpose; the troops were ordered to parade at two o'clock to morrow morning.

31. The troops assembled at two o'clock this morning; those that were to make the attack by the way of Cape Diamond collected at the general quarters upon the heights of Abraham, and were headed by Gen. Montgomery. Those that were to make the attack by the suburbs of St. Rue, were headed by Col. Arnold, and which were two battalions that were detached from the army at Cambridge.—Col. Livingston with a regiment of Canadians, and Major Brown with part of a regiment from Boston, were to make a false attack upon the walls southward of St. John's gate, and in the mean time to set fire to the gate with combustibles prepared for that purpose.

These different bodies were to move to the attack from their places of assembly exactly at five o'clock; but the different routes they had to make, the great depth of snow, and other obstacles prevented the execution of Col. Livingston's command. The general moved with his corps and a number of carpenters, to the pickets at Cape Diamond; the carpenters soon cut the pickets with saws, the general pulled them down with his own hands, and entered with his aid de camp Mr. McPherson, Mr. Antill the engineer, Capt. Cheesman, the carpenters and others. The troops did not follow, except a few who attacked the guard house; the enemy gave them a discharge of grape shot from their cannon, and of small arms at the same time, by which the general, his aid de camp, Capt. Cheesman, and some others, bravely fell. The firing then entirely ceased, and the lights in the guard house were out, at which time, 'tis said, the troops might have entered.—But Colonels—thought of retreating, which they did, and carried off the wounded to the camp.

I came now to Col. Arnold's division, which was to proceed to the attack in the following manner:—A lieutenant and 30 men were to march in front as an advanced guard, then the artillery company with a field piece mounted on a sledge, and as the main body, of which Capt. Morgan's company was the first. The advanced party were to open when arrived near the battery, which was raised upon a wharf, and which we were obliged to attack on the way; and when our field pieces had given a shot or two, the advanced party were to rush forward with ladders and force the battery, while Captain Morgan's gan's company were to march round the wharf, if possible, on the ice. But the snow was so deep, the piece of artillery was brought on very slow, and we were finally obliged to leave it behind; and to add to the delay, the main body mistook their way, there being no road, the way dark and intricate, among store-houses, boats, and wharfs, and harraised at the same time with a constant fire of the enemy from the walls, which killed and wounded a number of men, without our being able to annoy them in the least, from our situation. The field pieces not coming up, the advanced party, with Capt. Morgan's company, attacked the battery, some firing into the port-holes, or a kind of embrasures, while others scaled the battery with ladders, and immediately took possession of it with a guard, consisting of 30 men. This was executed with so much dispatch, that the enemy only discharged one cannon. In the attack we lost one or two men, the enemy the same number. At this battery Col. Arnold received a wound in one of his legs with a musquet ball. So soon as the prisoners were taken care of, and a few men come up (which was near half an hour) our men attempted the next barrier, but could not force it; and as the main body were some time in coming up, occasioned by the obstacles before-mentioned: adding to this, that the part of the army, commanded by General Montgomery, after his fall having retreated, gave the enemy the advantage to turn their whole force and attention upon us; so that before our men attempted the second barrier, the enemy had such a number of men behind it and in the houses, that we were surrounded with such a fire, from double our numbers, we found it impossible to force it, they being also under cover, while we were exposed to their fire. To add to the embarrassment, we lost the help of one of our companies, which was quartered on the north side of the river St. Charles, by their not having notice in season, who, in endeavouring to join the main body, were surprized by a party of men, who made a sortie through Palace Gate, and most of them were made prisoners. Our men near the second barrier took possession of some houses, and kept up a fire from them for some time: but as the body which sallied out of Palace Gate came upon the rear, and our numbers were greatly lessened by being killed and wounded, it was thought best to retreat to the battery that we had taken, which we did, with the greatest part of our men, where, at a consultation of officers present, it was the unanimous opinion, that it was impracticable to retreat, as we must have passed a great part of the way under the walls of the town, exposed to a line of fire, and our rear exposed to the fire of the enemy at the same time, besides having the party that sallied out through Palace Gate to oppose in front. We maintained our ground till about ten in the morning; but were at last obliged, with great reluctance, to surrender prisoners of war.

By the best accounts we can obtain, our loss, by killed and wounded, amounts to about one hundred; the loss which the town sustained we cannot learn; it must be small in comparison with ours, owing to the advantage of situation. We had one Captain and two Lieutenants killed; wounded officers, Colonel Arnold, Captain Hubbard, Capt. Lambe, Lieut. Steel, Lieut. Tildale, and Brigade Major Ogden. The loss in that part of the army commanded by the General, besides himself, was his Aid de Camp, Mr. M'Pherson and Capt. Cheefman; private, number unknown. His Honour, Brigadier General Montgomery, was shot through both his thighs and through his head: his body was taken up the next day, an elegant coffin was prepared, and he was decently interred the Thursday after. I am informed; when his body was taken up, his features were not in the least distorted: his countenance appeared regular, serene, and placid, like the soul that late had animated it. He was tall and slender, well limbed, of a genteel, easy, graceful, manly address, and had the voluntary love, esteem, and confidence of the whole army. His death, though honourable, is lamented, not only as the death of an amiable, worthy friend, but as an experienced, brave General: the whole country suffers greatly by such a loss at this time. The native goodness and rectitude of his heart might easily be seen in his actions: his sentiments, which appeared on every occasion, were fraught with that unaffected goodness, which plainly discovered the goodness of the heart from whence they flowed.

In the afternoon the officers were confined in the Seminary, and well accommodated with bedding; the privates were confined in the Recollects or Jesuits College. I dined this day with Capt. Law; whom in the morning I had made prisoner; but in a few hours after I was in my turn made prisoner also. Capt. Law treated me with great politeness and generosity.

Jan. 1st. This whole day in the Seminary: the first day I ever knew confinement. I hope I shall bear it with becoming fortitude.

Major M'Kenzie brought General Montgomery's knee buckles and Mr. M'Pherson's gold broach, and made a present of them to me, which I highly value for the sake of their late worthy owners.

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS.

Rome, September 7.

THE famous poetess Corilla was crowned in the capitol, on the 31st of last month, with the usual pomp and ceremony. She was conducted thither by the countesses Cardelli, Dandini, and Ginnasi: when she entered, she kneeled to the conservators, who were sitting under a canopy; and after the usual Latin forms, the chevalier Jean Paul de Cinque placed the laurel crown upon her head; after which the chevalier John Baptist Conci registered the act of her coronation in the public registers, under the discharge of 100 pieces of cannon. Several members of the academy of the Arcades read pieces of their composition, and three questions were proposed to Corilla, who answered in verse, with an eloquence and vivacity which surprized all present.

Vienna, Sept. 12.] The emperor, accompanied by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, in making a vifit to the hospitals at an unsuspected time, as is usual with him, perceived a little door in a dark corner, which he ordered to be opened; but he was obeyed with so much reluctance that it railed his curiosity: upon going in he descended into a kind of dungeon, where he found a female, rather young and handsome, covered with rage, and laid upon straw. The monarch was very much surprized and affected at this sight; and upon interrogating the unfortunate person, she answered with a noble air, which neither her misfortunes nor her sufferings could deprive her of: "Sire, I am a woman of family, and have the honour to be your subject; I have long suffered shame and misery in this place, without deserving that double punishment. When I was 20 years of age, I had the misfortune to please the baron de B——; his love was not honourable; he only sought to gratify his unlawful passion; but I would not hear of his addresses without his marrying me, which he did, and I brought him three children, to whose fortunes I am a stranger. Before I was placed here I heard he was in Moravia, where he has married another wife; but I would not complain. This new lady, uneasy and suspicious, persuaded him to sacrifice me; and I was seized one night, and confined here, where I have been for several years. I see your majesty deigns to take my cause to heart, and will loose my fetters; but Sire, I have three sons, and if the shame of my husband should be made public, it will retort upon them; let me therefore beseech you to spare him for their sakes; and if I may request one more favour, deign to insure me an asylum in some Convent, and that I may again press to my bosom those children whom I have suckled." The emperor willingly granted the lady her request, has caused the young barons to be found, and has taken them under his own care. The second wife of the baron is punished with perpetual imprisonment, himself exiled, and all his estates forfeited to his children.

Zurich, Sept. 19.] A person had the audacity to poison the wine in our church the night before the last sacrament day. Four wooden beakers full were poisoned, and upon pouring it out at the time, the wine was found to be foul in them, and not in tin ones, which made people afraid to drink it, though they had no suspicion of its being poisoned. Those who drank but little, were seized with vomiting, and those who drank much were very sick. However, by God's goodness none were killed, or made dangerously ill, as the people were in general quite set against drinking it. These circumstances made it necessary to have the wine examined, which being done, it was found to be poisoned; but the person who did it could not be found, notwithstanding the most diligent search was made.

Some later accounts from Zurich mention, that the wretch who poisoned the wine was taken; that his name is Wirz, and that he proves to be a grave-digger, who is sent to prison; and no other reason can be assigned for this shocking action, than that there were not burials enough to satisfy his avaricious and diabolical disposition.

Hague, Oct. 18.] The States General have published a proclamation, forbidding, under the severest penalties the exportation of warlike stores and ammunition to the British Colonies in America, or in British bottoms any where, for the space of one year from the date of the proclamation, which is the 10th of the present month.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

Edinburgh, September 25.

WE hear from Dundee, that a few days ago, as a young lady was writing, the candle set her head-dress on fire; it burnt some time before she was aware; she then wrapped a handkerchief round her head to smother the flame, which also caught fire: it was, however, extinguished, without having scorched the lady much, but the fright affected her so that she died in two days. Her name was Wedderburn, an amiable young woman, and her death is deeply regretted.

11.] The following melancholy accident happened last week near Fort George. Major Balfour, of the first or royal Scots regiment, and his brother, being out a shooting; the Major fired his piece at some birds, and desired his brother to fire also, who was preparing to do so, when unluckily the Major slept forward before the muzzle of his brother's gun, which went off, and lodged the shot in the Major's head, who expired a few hours after. The Major was universally esteemed. No words can express the agony of his brother upon this melancholy occasion.

L O N D O N.

Octber 2.] In the afternoon Mr. Cutler, butler to her Grace the Duchess of Portland, in Privy-gardens, went to the water-side, and set himself down upon the side of a barge, and shot himself, and afterwards fell backwards into the river. The above unfortunate man died worth upwards of 950l. 900l. of which he left by will to his brother, out of which he is to pay 20l. per annum to his mother during her life, and afterwards it is to return to his children; and fifty pounds to a maid servant in her Grace's family; a large box of very curious insects he left to her Grace, which he said her Grace was very curious in. The jury brought in their verdict lunacy.

5.] William Mee, landlord to the Queen Mab alehouse, at Loughborough, in Leicestershire, was committed to Leicester gaol, charged on the Coroner's inquest with the wilful murder of his own wife. The following is the substance of the depositions before the Coroner on Friday the 4th instant:—A person who lives at Thorpe, near Loughborough, passing through the latter place on Thursday, the 26th of September last, between nine and ten at night, heard a great noise on approaching the Queen Mab alehouse; on this he pulled up his horse, and there being a light in the chamber, perceived a man's arm move up and down several times; that he heard the deceased cry out, "for God's sake, don't beat me so;" and at intervals he heard Mee frequently say to the deceased, "D—n you, now got tell your mother that."—This witness further deposed, that he called several neighbours, and then pursued his journey home.—The son of one of these neighbours neighbours deposed, that being raised on two men's shoulders, he looked through the window, and saw Mee sitting at the foot of the bed; and heard the deceased in a weak and faint voice say, "Will Mee, why don't you come to bed?"—No farther violence being offered that night, the neighbours retired, and next day they applied such things among themselves as seemed likely to heal her wounds; but finding her getting worse, a surgeon's assistance was procured, who found, on examination, a muscle on her temple so bruised as to threaten a gangrene; he dressed the part injured, but without success, a mortification soon ensued, and the poor woman died on the Wednesday following. Two surgeons declared on oath before the Coroner, that the blows she had received were the cause of her death.—So hardened was this inhuman murderer of his wife, that he sung, and appeared as merry when he was found guilty, as though nothing had happened; and this unfeeling behaviour he supported all the way to, and for some time after he reached, the place of his confinement; where he remains for trial at the next Leicester assizes.

7.] This night the Ludlow stage was stopped near Shepherd's Bush by a single highwayman, who robbed two of the passengers, Messrs. Hall and Elwood, of their watches and money; but on clapping his pistol to the breast of Mr. Ay-rill, an attorney, the latter discharged a blunderbuss, and lodged the contents in the neck of the robber. His horse immediately ran off, and threw the rider, whose neckcloth took fire and burnt a considerable time; notwithstanding which, he for that night made his escape; but on an information of the transaction being sent to the Public-office in Bow-street, the offender was taken at an alehouse in Hammer-smith next day, and carried to St. George's hospital, where three slugs were extracted from the wound soon after his admission. He has been since removed to Tothill-fields Bridewell.

8.] Mr. Macklin has filed a bill in Chancery against the Managers of Covent-garden theatre, in order to recover special damages of them for the time he was absent from the theatre.

19.] St. James's, Oct. 19. The following addresses of the lord mayor, recorder, aldermen, sheriffs, and commons of the city of York, in common-council assembled, having been transmitted to the earl of Suffolk, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, has been presented to his majesty: which address his majesty was pleased to receive very graciously.

To the king's most excellent majesty.

Most gracious sovereign,

WE your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lord mayor, recorder, aldermen, sheriffs, and commons, of your ancient city of York, beg leave with joyful hearts, to congratulate your majesty upon the late glorious success of your forces in America.

We regard with just indignation, the avowed and hostile defiance of some of your majesty's colonies to the legal authority of the mother country, by which they have been so liberally cherished and supported, and from which they derive the most signal advantages. So ungrateful a defection, aggravated by such acts of violence and cruelty that it is become dangerous to be loyal, obliges us to acknowledge the justice of coercive measures, at the same time we lament their necessity. But we trust, that by the wisdom of your majesty's councils, and the terror of your arms, the authors of this unnatural rebellion will speedily be subdued; your majesty's faithful American subjects freed from oppression; and those who have been deluded by faction will, by a timely submission, become fit objects of your royal clemency and benevolence.

Permit us, Sir, to assure your majesty, that we are warm with affection for your royal person, family, and government; that we are zealous friends to law, liberty, and order, and determined enemies to faction, licentiousness, and sedition; and that we regard the honour and dignity of your majesty's crown, and the supreme authority of the British legislature, as the great pillars of that excellent constitution, on which depends the freedom and prosperity of every branch of the British empire.

From the Kingston (Jamaica) Journal, Aug. 3.

On the 24th of July last, his excellency Sir Basil Keith, governor, published a proclamation for the putting martial law in force; and another the 25th, laying an embargo on the shipping till peace is restored.

The above proclamations were issued on account of the discovery of an intended insurrection of the negroes.

26.] This night's gazette contains three proclamations:—one for encouraging seamen to enter on board his majesty's ships of war, offering a bounty of five pounds for every able seaman, and two pounds ten shillings for every ordinary seaman.—The second orders an embargo to be forthwith laid upon all ships and vessels laden, or to be laden in the ports of Great-Britain, with any sort of provisions except fish, corn or grain of any kind, and that such embargo do remain till further order; but not to extend to vessels employed carrying provisions to any of his majesty's West India islands, or to any of his colonies in North-America, except those of New Hampshire, Massachusetts bay, Rhode island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, the three Lower counties on Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.—The third proclamation contains an embargo of a similar nature on the ports of Ireland.

29.] In consequence of 10 sail of the line having been put into commission during the last week, and the stocks having fallen considerably, a report has generally prevailed, that the peace of Europe is on the point of being interrupted by the disputes between the Spaniards and the Portuguese, in which, should they come to an open declaration of war, we must unavoidably be involved. Certain it is, that last night, about twenty boats properly manned and officer'd, came up the river from Deptford and Woolwich, when a general press began, and every man was taken on board the several ships they boarded, except the master, mate, and boys.

The number of men impressed as above is variously reported; some say, 1500, others 2000, but it is most generally thought that it did not exceed 7 or 800.

Press-warrants have been sent down to all the western ports to impress as many seamen as possible for the service of the navy; and it is supposed the press has been general throughout all England.

Several lives are said to have been lost in enforcing the press warrants on the river Thames.

MARRIAGES.

William Chafin Grove, Esq; Member for Weymouth, to Miss Elizabeth Grove, of Ferne, near Shaftesbury.—At Edinburgh, Capt. George Wauchope, commander of the King George Lisbon-packet, to Miss Helen Spottiswoode, second daughter of John Spottiswoode, Esq; of Spottiswoode.

S. and commissioner of his Majesty's customs.—At his lodgings in Southwark, the very celebrated Dr. Thomas Townsend, alchymist to his Majesty.—In Portugal, the Duke of Cadaval, descended from Alphonso, the first King of Portugal.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Kilkenny, October 30:

ON Monday was sent to the house of Mr. Finn, printer, in this city, as a curiosity, a potatoe stem, raised to a seed, set in a part of the ground of Joseph Mathews, of Bonnetstown, Esq; on which stem were an incredible number of apple potatoes of a most extraordinary large size, which prove, on being boiled, to be very dry, and sweeter flavoured than this chief food of the poor is generally found to be. If every gentleman would manifest equal inclination to promote and improve the cultivation of this necessary provision, we should speedily find it brought to the highest perfection, and consequently bring it on more eligible terms to individuals.

Kilkenny, Nov. 9. Early on Thursday morning the body of the Rev. Mr. Smithwick, Parish Priest of St. Patrick's, was found in the waste ground at the north-west side of St. John's-bridge, near the watering slip. The coroner's inquest sat on his body, and brought in their verdict, accidental death. He was a gentleman universally beloved, and his untimely death is most sincerely lamented.

Extract of a letter from Cork.

Last Friday the Lucy of Bristol, Capt. Watton, arrived here from New York, by whom we have the New-York Journal of Aug. 29, which contains the following intelligence:

Philadelphia, August 18.

Extract of a letter from an Officer in the Northern Army to a Gentleman in Salisbury, dated Mount Independence (opposite Ticonderago) August 5.

"I herewith send you a list of our fleet, now ready for action, with the number of carriage and swivel guns for each, the names of the vessels, and number of men to each.

"Royal Savage, Capt. Wynkoop, 12 carriage guns, nine 6 and 4 pounders, ten swivels and fifty men.—Revenge, Captain Laman, ten carriage guns, 4 and 2 pounders, ten swivels and thirty-five men.—Liberty, Capt. Primer, ten carriage guns, 4 and 2 pounders, eight swivels and forty-five men.—Four Gondolas, Mansfield, Simmons, Sumner and Utine, captains; each Gondola carries 3 guns, one 12 and two 9 pounders, 8 swivels, and forty-five men, well found in every particular; three row Gallies on a new construction, just ready to launch, and ten Gondolas more will soon be ready. I cannot but think we shall be able at all events, to maintain our superiority on lake Champlain."

Extract of a letter from Bourdeaux.

"—Our ears are continually filled with accounts of the preparations which are daily making in this kingdom for war. The unity subsisting amongst the different branches of the family of Bourbon, leaves no doubt that the stroke is intended against Britain. We are well acquainted here with the defenceless state of Ireland, that its forts are much out of order, and not above 6000 men there for its defence. The plan of operations, I am credibly informed, is this. A large reinforcement to be sent to the Americans to keep our fleet and army in that country in full employment, and prevent their return home to oppose them. To make a descent in Ireland, to keep the coast between Cork and Waterford in continual terror; and by the plunder they may get in that defenceless part, to reimburse part of the expenses of the war. The Spanish fleet to join that of America in the reduction of Jamaica. The Spanish army to attack Gibraltar, now only defended by a few Germans. The French army in America to assist in the recovery of Canada, which is ceded to France. Diversion to be made by Germany and Sweden on the frontiers of Russia to keep their troops at home. The Prussians to fall upon Hanover, and the Dutch to lie quiet, and be the universal carriers of Europe."

On Friday, the 25th Inst. in consequence of an information, some of Sir John Fielding's men apprehended Richard White, while at work in a Shoemaker's shop at Darking, in Surrey, on a charge of the wilful murder of Jeremiah Brien, by shooting him through the body at Ne-nagh, in this kingdom, on the night of the 10th of May, 1774. He was committed to the New Prison, and will be transmitted here to take his trial. A servant

A servant of Mr. Oliver Carter's, on the Bachelor's walk, having got false keys to his vaults, on Thursday night attempted to rob him, and descending into the vaults, brought up some of his bottled wine, and returning again, dropped down dead, suffocated it is supposed by the fumes of Charcoal, which Mr. Carter had left in his binn-vault in order to air them. In a room which the servant rented in Strand-street, was found bottled wine with Mr. Carter's seal;—thus Providence punished a villain in the very act of robbing.

The following is inserted from the best authority: Ann Nicholas, daughter of Robert Nicholas, of Childer Thornton, in Wirral in Cheshire, being a long time afflicted with falling fits, and having taken many medicines without receiving the least benefit, was, at last, prevailed on to try the following experiment viz. "To wear the skin of a long worm (or Adder) wrapped in a piece of linen cloth, round her waist;" accordingly a worm was obtained, fleaed, and applied as directed. Nine months elapsed without the least symptoms of a return of the disorder; when, one day, as she sat sewing, she (to her inexpressible surprise) felt something crawling in her breast, where, upon examination, she, in the presence of her mother, discovered six or seven worms, each about two inches long, in the cloth where the skin of the late one had been deposited. The terror which naturally seized her at the unexpected sight of those worms, caused an immediate relapse of three successive fits. She, however, discontinued wearing the recipe any longer, and, happily, has not experienced the least return of her disorder, though near twelve months are expired since this circumstance happened. The father and mother of this girl, with other neighbours, are ready to confirm the truth of this upon oath.—How, and from what these reptiles could engender and vivify, we must leave to the curious to account for.

Between the hours of eleven and twelve on Friday night, Mr. Sheriff Alexander apprehended and lodged in Newgate, Thomas Doyle and Cornelius Conlan, who were charged upon oath, for that they with several other riotous persons, journeymen Stocking Weavers, unlawfully assembled, and feloniously carried away several implements, belonging to a Stocking frame or loom, and pulling asunder another looms the property of Mrs. Quin, an industrious widow, in High-street, for no other reason than that she had given employment (in that branch) to four soldiers; as it seems these combining journeymen are sworn not to work with, or admit any of the Military (or an Englishman) to follow their lawful occupations in the city; a circumstance that reflects the greatest opprobrium on our laws and police, as no country in Europe would suffer such an illegal confederacy to exist against the common rights of mankind. It is therefore hoped, that the magistrates as well as citizens of this metropolis, will unite on this public occasion, in bringing such offenders to punishment, that by a timely example other deluded mechanics may know the dangerous and criminal consequences of these unlawful combinations, so very detrimental to trade, and injurious to society in general.

A dangerous faction which for some time past has been hatching in a part of the county of Meath near Trim, did on Thursday the 7th inst. break out in the most outrageous manner at the fair of Aibboy. It appears by several examinations, that one John Rourke, a most dangerous and desperate fellow, who kept a public house, was indicted for stabbing a man with a Pitchfork, and that Parris Kellet, Esq; a justice of the peace, assisted by several gentlemen of the county, took him into custody on the day of the fair above mentioned; but as they were endeavouring to bring him to goal, the brethren of this faction, who were all assembled in the town, attacked the gentlemen, knocked them down, and rescued Rourke. Mr. Kellet was the particular object of their fury; they trampled on his body, and beat him in the most inhuman manner; and a pistol having gone off, by which Michael Daniel, Esq; another justice of the peace, received three balls in his thigh; and Mr. Kellet being at that time lying to all appearance dead, the villains imagined he (Mr. Kellet) was shot, and giving a shout to that purpose made off. By this time the gentlemen collected themselves, and pursuing Rourke and his companions, made every effort to support the dignity of the civil power, and to suppress this dangerous faction. In the pursuit Rourke received many blows, some of which proved fatal; for the next day he was found with his skull fractured in several places, of which fractures he is since dead. To such a pitch of violence had this faction arisen, that they assembled constantly in the parish chapel, where an oath of alliance, offensive and defensive, was in the most solemn manner administered, and the members sworn to assist each other at every hazard of life and property. They have given themselves the title of Peep of Day boys, and a bell is usually tolled, or sometimes a horn sounded to collect them together. The protestant inhabitants of Athboy, on these notices being given, are always obliged to shut up their doors, and preserve themselves within their houses; for so strong and so desperate is this faction, that a protestant dare not appear at the time of public meeting. They have now sworn vengeance against the justices of the county for the death of Rourke, and unless those gentlemen, who wish to support the established religion in that county, form themselves into a proper body, and take such methods as the law has authorised, it will be impossible to prevent this faction from increasing to such a formidable appearance as may in these times of general danger be of the most fatal consequences to the whole kingdom. The spirit, the resolution, and the activity of Mr. Kellet on the foregoing occasion, deserve the warmest acknowledgment of thanks from the whole county.

November 21.] A post assembly was held at the Thollet, for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee, appointed to enquire into the conduct of Mr. Henry Roe, gaoler of Newgate, on account of the outrage committed by some felons who lately escaped from that goal. It appearing that Mr. Roe was not censurable for their escape, it was agreed to restore him to said office,

November 22.] About the hour of nine o'clock o'clock, a number of villains confined for robbery and other capital offences in the Gaol of Newgate, made an attack upon one of the hatch-men in the prison, in order to force their way down stairs for the purpose of escaping; and, on the turnkey calling in the guard to his aid, to prevent the intentions of these desperate rogues, they flung glass-bottles, &c. &c. at him and his assistants; and after a long and stout resistance, were overpowered and properly secured. This confederacy, it seems, was formed by the noted Donaghoe, who being lately in care of that prison, on quitting it, unshackled twenty three of these miscreants, preparatory to an escape.

The Provost and senior fellows of the University of Dublin have conferred the degree of Dr. of Laws, by Diploma, on Sir Joshua Reynolds, president of the royal academy of London.

Clonmell, Nov. 21. On Sunday the 17th inst. as the rev. Mr. Lord, his wife and daughter, Mr. Potter, his sister, and a son of Mr. Wayland, were returning from the church of Ballintemple, between the hours of one and two o'clock, at the turn of the road near the new bridge of Dundrum, they were attacked by nine or ten men in arms, who rushed from behind the wall, when one of the villains knocked Mr. Lord's coachman off the box, another clapped a pistol to master Wayland's ear, and swore he would blow out his brains if he offered to stir, while another with the butt end of a gun knocked Mr. Potter off his horse, and immediately seized Miss Potter, who rode behind her brother, whom they forced into a chair, out of which the twice jumped and fell on the ground, by which the wheel run over her face; but one of the villains getting into the chair, held her there, and made off, leaving two or three of their party to guard Mr. Lord and the rest, lest they should alarm the country. They were soon after pursued by Mr. Wayland, Mr. Dexter, and some servants of lord de Montalt's, and about six or seven o'clock at night were overtaken in the town of Burrosfollagh, where with the assistance of Mark Lidwell, Esq. and his brother, the young lady was rescued from the hands of these villains, who it is hoped will soon meet with the punishment they deserve, for this most daring attempt, as some of them are known. Mr. Potter and his sister are now both dangerously ill with the treatment they received.

The following melancholy affair lately happened at Carrick. Two young lads having some words together, the one beat the other; a complaint was made, and the relations of the lad who had beat the other, obliged him to ask pardon, which he did with great reluctance, but vowed he would be even with them for it. He accordingly went immediately and prepared a cup of strong poison, returned with it, and drank it in their presence before they could prevent him. All intreaties for him to drink oil to bring it up again, were in vain, and he soon after expired.

Wednesday last a woman who lodged in a house in Exchequer-street, was decoyed by two gentlemen's servants in a hackney coach down to Clonarf, where they made an attempt to commit a rape on her; she making resistance they cut her throat and legs in so inhuman a manner, that she died on Friday morning. The Coroner's Inquest sat on the body, and brought in their verdict willful murder. One of these villains was last Friday apprehended by Justice Beckford, and committed to Newgate by the sitting Justice.

Answers to our Correspondents.

A. B.'s Letter is on a subject which might bring on a controversy we would wish to avoid; disputes on religious matters are not proper subjects for a Magazine, especially when they are likely to produce mutual recriminations.

Sempronius's little narrative is too personal, and would be quite uninteresting to such of our readers as have no knowledge of the parties.

Virtue's Advocate, from Cork, may mean well, but he expresses his meaning too incorrectly for the public Eye. We wish those Correspondents who send us such trivial Essays, would pay the Postage of their Letters, and not subject the Publisher to expence for nothing.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge.

For D E C E M B E R, 1776.

Memoirs of Charles Lee, Esq;Major-General of the Continental Forces.(With an elegant Engraving of that Officer.)

CHARLES LEE, Esq; was born about the year 1726, in the city of West Chester. His father, who was a man of considerable property in that county, was, in the year 1745, appointed Colonel of the 44th regiment of foot.

As Charles was an only son, and had very great natural abilities, his father bestowed upon him a very liberal education, and in the year 1745, he obtained a commission for him in his own regiment, in which regiment he continued till the year 1760, passing with honour through the ranks of Ensign, Lieutenant and Captain.

During this time Charles Lee was present at several actions, the first of which was at the defeat of General Braddock, at Monagahelly, in North America; he was then at the attack of the lines of Ticonderoga, in 1758, where he was shot through the body. The next year he was with General Prideaux, at the reduction of Niagara, and in the year 1760 was at the conquest of Canada, with General Amherst.

The campaign being ended, Captain Lee obtained leave to return to England, where in the year 1761, he was appointed Major to the 103d regiment, which, on the breaking out of the Spanish war, was sent to Portugal, under the command of Lord Loudon. In Portugal, as well as America, Major Lee behaved with distinguished bravery; and General Burgoyne, under whose immediate direction he was, bore testimony of his firmness in executing the orders he received, to surprise the Spanish camp; which he did, with a bravery and intrepidity that settled his character as a distinguished officer.

At the peace of 1763, Major Lee's corps was disbanded, and he, unwilling to let his abilities remain undisplayed, obtained leave to enter in the service of the King of Poland, by whom he was greatly cared for; he afterwards went as a volunteer in the war between Russia and the Ottoman Porte.

In the year 1772, he returned to England, and in the month of May, in that year, he was honoured with the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, after which he went over to America, to visit a numerous set of friends he had in that country.

Whether he had at that time entertained any intention of intermeddling in the dispute between the Colonies and Great Britain, or whether the daily augmentations of what he thought, their wrongs, first put

it

it in his head to join them, we cannot pretend to decide; but as soon as the colonies thought it necessary to raise forces, he with the greatest alacrity accepted the post of Major-General in their armies. How he has acted in that station, must be fresh in the minds of all our readers, who have carefully perused the article in our preceding Magazines, entitled, "An Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonies, since the passing of the Boston Port-bill."

In person, general Lee is five feet eight inches high, slender in his make, but able to endure the greatest hardships, little caring what he eats or drinks, or on what he lies. He hath a high sense of honour, which caused him, on his engaging in the American service, to make a formal resignation of his rank in the British army, and of the halfpay he was allotted suitable to that rank. His actions have shown him to be brave and determined. He is very warm in his friendships and attachments; equally strong in his resentments, and jealous of injuries or insults. He is also a studious man, and of intense application to acquire knowledge, not only in his profession as a soldier, but even of that of a lawyer, he having thoroughly studied the constitution of Great Britain, and also that of every European state. As he has visited most of the courts of Europe, so he has acquired a perfect mastery of their languages. He speaks the Indian language as well as English, and as he passed great part of last war among the Indians, they have a particular friendship for him.

As a writer and reasoner, we cannot desire stronger specimens than his letter on the present troubles, which we have already published in our preceding Magazines, to which we beg leave to refer our readers; particularly his letter to Earl Percy, page 424. July 1775. His letter to Lord Barrington, on resigning his half pay, page 563. April 1775. And his letter to his old friend and fellow-soldier, General Burgoyne, page 134. March 1776.

These letters display not only his talents in the epistolary stile, but the reasons which actuated his conduct. And as they seem the effect of inward conviction, there is no doubt but he will continue to act in strict conformity to the principles he has adopted.

Liberty: An Essay.

LIBERTY is like innocence and virtue; the value of which we feel, in proportion only as we enjoy them ourselves, and the relish for which we lose, as soon as they are lost. "I know the delights of thy country," replied Brasidas to a Persian nobleman, who drew a comparison between the way of living at Sparta, and at Persepolis; "but thou canst never know the pleasures of mine."

Slaves lose every thing in their fetters, except the desire of quitting them; they love their servitude, as the companions of Ulysses loved their brutality.

It is very difficult to reduce him to obedience who does not seek to command; and the most skilful politician would never be able to enslave men who only wish to be free; but inequality is extended without difficulty, among ambitious minds, always ready to run the risque of fortune, and command or serve indifferently, according as she becomes favourable, or unkind.

Few men have hearts found enough to know how to love liberty. All would command, at this rate none fear obeying. A man, who arrives at preferment, gives himself an hundred masters to acquire ten servants; we need only see the haughtiness of nobles in monarchies, with what emphasis do they pronounce the words "service, and to obey?" How great and respectable do they think themselves, when they can have the honour of saying, "The king my master?" How they despise the republicans who are only free, and who are certainly more noble than they.

It is undeniable, and the fundamental maxim of all politics, that the people gave themselves rulers to defend their liberty, and not to enslave them: "If we have a prince," said Pliny to Trajan, "it is, that he may keep us from having a master."

To renounce our liberty, is to renounce the quality of men, the rights of humanity, and even our duty. There can be no possible recompence for him who renounces every thing; such a renunciation is incompatible with the nature of mankind, it is taking away all morality from his actions, and all liberty from his will.

The lawyers, who have gravely pronounced that the child of a slave, is born a slave; have declared in other terms, that man is not born man.

Man acquires in the civil state, moral liberty; which alone renders man truly master of himself, for the impulse of his appetite alone, is slavery and obedience to the prescribed laws, is liberty.

The strength of the state only, produces the liberty of its members.

[To be concluded in the Appendix.]

Story of Rosalie.

THE fair but unfortunate Rosalie was the daughter of reputable, though not illustrious parents, her father being, at the time of her birth, a considerable merchant at Bourdeaux. But the misfortunes which were fated to attend her through life, seemed to commence even with her existence; for in a few years from that æra, her father beheld the fruits of his honest industry dissipated by a succession of unavoidable losses, and became at length a bankrupt. The only consolation that remained to her afflicted parents was this their darling daughter; when gazing on her, they forgot their sorrows, and lamented the want of riches for her sake only. Rosalie deserved their love; she discovered so many charms both of mind and person, that Monf. Domerval, her father, willingly sacrificed the little remnant of his broken fortune to the bestowing an education on her, more suitable to her genius and merit, than to the rank which she then held in life.

Joined to her other amiable qualities, Rosalie was possessed of the most refined sensibility and delicate sentiment, which exalts the heart it warms above its fellows, and is yet, perhaps, more prejudicial than serviceable to the female sex; as the very softness it inspires contributes but to render them unsuspecting, and of course an easier prey to the arts of seduction.

Death deprived the unhappy Rosalie of both her parents before she had reached her sixteenth year. Left without friends or fortune, a maiden aunt of her mother's, who was tolerably rich, took this lovely orphan to her care.

It may not be improper here to give a slight sketch of Mademoiselle Mezirac's character.—She was one of those narrow minded souls who are incapable of feeling for any creatures but themselves; who mistake their dislike of human kind for an abhorrence of vice; and justify their spleen and ill-temper to their wretched dependants, as arising from their want of virtue. She boasted of her never having loved any human being; she considered marriage as a gross attachment, and looked upon a state of celibacy as a state of perfection. Added to these perverse qualities, she was censorious, avaricious, and an outrageous bigot. Notwithstanding the hatefulness of her disposition, as she was known to be rich, she was visited by persons of the best rank in the village where she lived, and was particularly intimate with a neighbouring widow lady, of the name of Montalman, who had a son but two years older than Rosalie. This youth soon distinguished our fair orphan, and became so assiduous in his visits to Mademoiselle Mezirac, that he never suffered his mother to go there without him.

Women are quick-sighted in love, and Rosalie soon discovered the cause of Montalman's attention to her aunt; but for a long time their eyes only declared the mutual affection which had taken possession of their youthful hearts. At length Montalman dared to write, and Rosalie to receive the fullest and tenderest declaration of his passion. She had now found an object on whom she could bestow that vast fund of sensibility which was treasured in her heart; she poured it all forth into her lover's bosom, while her own received almost, in the same instant, the opposite passions of love and hate. Her aunt's severity, which she had hitherto borne with patience, rendered her now detestable; and she determined to deceive her, without considering that she was at the same time deceiving herself. The young people eluded the vigilance of their parents, they had many stolen interviews, and the too tender Rosalie sacrificed that honour, which she had till then held dearer than her life, to her fondness for the no less enamoured Montalman.

In a few days after she had been guilty of this fatal error, she received the following billet from her lover :

" I am compelled to obey my mother ; she has discovered all, and refuses absolutely to consent to my marriage. By her authority I am hurried from this place, and obliged to renounce my love, nay, even my hope ; as there is a match concluded for me, which must throw me into the arms of another."

Rosalie had not power to finish this shocking adieu ; she sunk upon the earth, as if she had been blasted by lightning, and continued senseless for a considerable time. No words can describe the state of her mind, when her sorrows and her senses returned together. She called upon her husband, her lover, her Montalmant ! Nor could she believe he was really fled, till she went to the house where his mother had resided, and was informed that the whole family had quitted it on the preceding night, without letting any person know whither they were gone.

The unhappy Rosalie, loaded with the reproaches of her own mind, abandoned by her lover, without a friend to whom she could reveal her grief, devoured it in secret, and vainly thought she had reached the summit of affliction.—But, alas ! her present sufferings were but like the foundation, from whence the superstructure of her future miseries must arise. It was not enough that she should blush in secret, or humble herself before the Almighty for her crime ; public contempt and infamy awaited her ; for the unhappy orphan soon perceived that she was likely to become a mother. Death was the sole resource which now seemed left ; her fame was dearer to her than life, and she determined to hide her sorrows and her shame together within the silent grave. But that true friend which flies not the afflicted, but stretches forth a pitying hand to raise the wretch oppressed with crimes and sorrows, opposed the fatal purpose—religion forbade suicide, and stopped her trembling hand. She bowed, adored, and suffered.

If any event of Rosalie's life could be deemed fortunate, Mad. Mezirac's being confined to her bed at this particular crisis was so.—Rosalie was too ill to quit her's ; this screened her from the prying eyes of her aunt and every other person, and in the fullness of time she brought forth a lovely boy. Though she had not much attendance from her aunt's servants during her illness, and that her chamber was retired from the rest of the family, she knew it would be impossible to conceal her infant there ; at midnight, therefore, she stole softly down stairs with him in her arms, and conveyed him to a little decayed summer-house at the end of the garden, and deposited her precious charge upon some clean straw. To this spot she retired as often as she could, unseen, to nourish and attend her helpless child. Reflection soon convinced her that he could not long remain there undiscovered ; maternal tenderness at length triumphed over the fear of shame ; she went to the curate of the parish Monsieur Fremenville, threw herself at his feet, confessed her crime, and implored his protection for the innocent effect of her's and Montalmant's guilt.

This good, this pious man calmed her wild transports, approved her penitence, and received her child, whom he immediately put to nurse, without revealing its unhappy mother's shame.

Rosalie's mind now became a little calmer ; her health returned of course, though sorrow's deepest traits were not effaced either from her heart or face. Mademoiselle Mezirac during her illness had, in the height of her zeal for her own recovery, devoted her niece, as her bigotry conceived, to God ; and as soon as her health was established, she communicated her pious resolution to Rosalie, and bid her prepare immediately to pass the rest of her days in a convent. In vain the devoted victim knelt, wept, and prayed before her, and as vainly assured her she had no call to that vocation.—She would not even listen to her pleading, and allowed her but eight days to take her leave of the world, and all that it contained.

Rosalie again flew to her venerable friend and benefactor, again poured forth her sorrows in his humane and pious bosom. He promised her to use his utmost power of persuasion with her aunt to dissuade her from her cruel purpose. He kept his promise ; but the obdurate Mezirac, so far from being softened by his eloquence, flew into the most outrageous passion, both against him and her niece, and treated him with the most opprobrious language. Not contented with having insulted, she resolved to injure him still farther ; and wrote to the bishop of the diocese, representing him as a debauched and wicked man, who had at that time a bastard child, nursed even in the face of the whole parish, as she had heard it whispered. Mademoiselle Mezirac's affected piety had gained her so great a reputation for sanctity, that the bishop, without enquiring farther, immediately dismissed Fremenville from his cure with the most ignominious reproach.

This was, of all she had felt, the severest wound to the generous heart of Rosalie; and setting at naught even the fear of infamy, she hastened to clear the innocence of Freminville, and prostrating herself at the bishop's feet, confessed herself the mother of the child, and avowed her obligation to the good and virtuous Freminville. The bishop was affected by the nobleness of her conduct; said he would give Freminville another cure, for his was disposed of; and also would use his authority with her aunt, to prevent Rosalie from being forced into a convent. But, alas! this gleam of hope soon vanished; the bishop had been long in a bad state of health, he was seized with a paralytic stroke in the night, and expired on the following day.

Deprived of every resource, the almost distracted Rosalie wandered into a public garden, where the people of condition in the village used to walk; it was at that time full of company; but her disturbed imagination prevented her from taking notice of any object that surrounded her, till chance directed her eyes to a little wooden bridge which was over a deep piece of water, the floor of which was decayed by time: at that instant she beheld the woman who nursed her child with him in her arms, crossing the bridge; a plank gave way, and they both fell in together. The feelings of a mother were not to be suppressed; she screamed aloud, "O save my child from perishing!" and rushing madly into the water caught him in her arms, still crying out, "O my child!" All the people in the garden ran to her assistance; she was dragged out more dead than alive, and fainted the moment she was brought to land. The whole village was now in an uproar; the cause soon reached Mademoiselle Mezirac's ears; she flew amongst the rest to gaze on her now dishonoured niece, whom she found clasping her infant to her bosom, and chafing his chilled limbs. Mezirac darted towards her, and would have torn her and her child piece-meal, had she not been prevented by the humanity of the spectators. But though her hands were restrained, her tongue was free; she loaded her with the most pointed abuse, and declared that Freminville was the father of the child.

Rosalie again rising superior to her sex, nay to herself, still pressing her infant to her heart, declared aloud her amour with Montalmant, and the humane and pious part which Freminville had acted towards her.

From that hour her aunt abandoned Rosalie to want and wretchedness; the short-lived commiseration which her extraordinary accident had occasioned, expired with the surprize; and she had now no other means of support for herself and infant, but what she could procure from hands weakened by sorrow, and unused to labour; yet still she felt much more for the distress which she had brought on the good Curate, than that which she herself most patiently endured.

In about two years the iron-hearted Mezirac expired, bequeathing her whole fortune to the convent where she meant to bury her niece, refusing even to forgive her with her latest breath.

Worn out with continual sorrow, the unfortunate Rosalie fell into so languishing a state of health, that she was no longer able to assist in supporting herself or child. Freminville's resources were also at an end, that good, that ministering angel had long since parted with every thing he possessed, which could contribute to the relief of the wretched Rosalie and her lovely boy. Yet the pious Father still continued to enforce that humble resignation to the dispensations of Providence, that would entitle her to happiness hereafter, however for wise ends denied her here. His admonitions were not lost upon his penitent; she owned her chastisement was just, and only prayed for blessings on her son.

At length the hour of her release approached; the pious Curate administered the last sacraments; that over, she clasped her child close to her dying bosom, bathed him with tears, and covered him with kisses. "These are the last (said she) that I shall ever give him. But thou best, most generous of friends! If you should ever learn what is become of—Alas, I should forget him—But he is the father of my hapless orphan—If you should ever hear that Montalmant lives—Why, O gracious Heaven, will not this fatal passion quit my troubled heart, while yet one quivering pulse remains to beat!" At these words she sunk upon the pillow, the paleness of death spread fast over her countenance, her lovely boy, shocked at the sudden change, gave a loud cry, and sprang to catch his mother in his arms.

At that instant, a young man with the utmost precipitation threw open the chamber door, and exclaimed, "Where is she! Where is Mademoiselle Domerval!"—"You see her there before you, (said the Priest) she is just now expiring." "Expiring! (said the youth) It must not be;" and rushing towards the bed, "O my dear Rosalie!" was all that he could utter, and sunk down senseless by her. "O Heavens! you are Montalmant," cried out Freminville.—This sound seemed to recal the parting spirit of Rosalie; she opened wide her eyes and sighed out, "Tis Montalmant!"

mant!" "Yes, my adorable Rosalie! (he replied) but O! in what a state do I now find you!"

"I die content, (said she) having seen you.—But are you married? Is it another's husband I embrace?" "O no?" he answered quick. Behold your son; (said she) let him remind you of his mother's fondness." "My son! (said he, and caught him in his arms). My mother is no more, added Montalant, I now am free; you are, and ever were, the only object of my love. I flew with transport to repair the ills you have suffered, and offer you my hand and fortune; my heart has ever been your own; nor shall it ever wander from you; if you should die, the grave unites us both. But try, my love, try to recover, for this cherub's sake,—for this beloved boy!" Physicians were immediately sent for, and every aid employed for Rosalie's recovery, which for some weeks remained doubtful. At length the peace of mind which she now experienced, joined to her youth and naturally good constitution, prevailed; and as soon as she was able to quit her bed, the worthy Freminville had the satisfaction of uniting her in marriage to the husband of her heart, and rendering them both completely happy.

Montalant settled a handsome provision upon the preserver of his wife and child; and Rosalie's gratitude continued undiminished to the last hour of her benefactor's life. The latter part of her own was as singularly exemplary in goodness, as the beginning had been in misfortunes.

S I R,

HAVING seen some remarks on a narrative in the Rev. Mr. Wesley's journal, in your useful Magazine of last October, with reflections on that gentleman's veracity—I cannot help observing a difficulty in the way of a particular answer, unless the remarker will tell me what sort of evidence is necessary to remove his doubts.—For my part such an authority as Mr. Wesley is fully sufficient to satisfy me; for beside his known character for upwards of fifty years, he could have no end to answer by publishing a false story that could, and no doubt would, before now, have been refuted, had it not been literally true, as there are many now living in that place where the Almighty was pleased in an extraordinary manner, to shew that he is not always a silent spectator of the wickedness of men; and it is not to be supposed that these are all in collusion with Mr. Wesley, to vend a falsehood on the world that could be of no use to one or the other; for it does not appear that the gentleman mentioned, was any way concerned with Mr. Wesley, or his friends, as one who favoured or opposed them; nor did he know more of it than as a strange relation he heard at twelve miles distance from the place, which he was willing to have the particulars of, and therefore desired a person he could depend on, who was going there, to send him them, which he did, and Mr. Wesley inserted the matters in his journal, evidently with no other view than the benefit of his fellow-creatures, which it hath been, and still is, even in a very advanced period of life his unwearied study.

Eminently assisted by divine grace, to save from eternal misery, his labours in this way have been attended with amazing success; there is no occasion for legendary tales to support the truth of his mission. Upon the whole the facts are recent, and the place particularly described by him. The best way your occasional correspondent can take, is to go or send there for such evidence as he may judge sufficient to remove his doubts. Had he taken this plain method at first, it would have saved me the trouble of desiring him to be more candid in all future enquiries. I am, sir, your constant reader.

Genuine Anecdote of an American Officer.

A Captain of foot, who was born in America, and had obtained a command in the army in the early part of last war, was attacked with the flux (a distemper very common there.) He applied to the General for leave of absence, declaring that he found himself extremely ill, and he was sure if he could but see his poor wife and children, he should soon be better. The General received him with great civility and great calmness. He questioned him minutely on the symptoms of his case, enquiring into the frequency of his motions, the nature of his rest, and the quickness of his pulse. Having heard him fully, he replied, "I am exceeding sorry, Captain, that your case should so nearly resemble mine; I have the flux violently, and go to stool twice a day oftener than you do. I still am not out of heart, and when I think it necessary to apply for leave of absence, and in consequence of that application, receive it, depend upon my granting you the same indulgence." The Captain retired in confusion; and the fact is, the General never applied for leave to make a cowardly retreat from his duty, but rather preferred the honourable maintaining of his post, though at the expence of his life, which was a short time afterwards a sacrifice to the virulence of his disorder.

An Account of a Journey from the Town of Coleraine, tracing the Coast, to Glenarm, in the County of Antrim.

Busb-mills, April 7, 1775.

IN the evening visited Dunluce Castle, so called from its having formerly been the seat of the Antrim family. At present nothing remains of it excepting an extensive range of old forsaken walls, which speak its having been an edifice of some elegance, considering the rudeness of the age in which it was erected. It is situated on a huge rock on the sea shore, which runs a considerable way into the sea, being totally covered with the building, the form of which is accommodated to that of the rock. It appears to have been well situated either for repelling a foreign or domestic enemy, the ascent of the rock towards the sea being extremely difficult, and the parts opposite the land divided from the shore by such a precipice as renders any access to it on that side altogether impracticable; the only entrance was by means of a narrow bridge, of which nothing now remains but one of the walls, about 18 or 20 inches thick, over which few venture to pass, on account of the unevenness of its surface, and a dreadful precipice presenting itself to the sight on either hand. The rock is perforated at the bottom by a large cavern running in about 60 feet, when it is met by the sea, for which there is an open passage.

Proceeded this day about a mile further on the shore to a natural production called the White Rocks, from their presenting to the view a range of limestone, which extends in length about 200 yards. On our approach we perceived eight caves running a considerable way into the land, the surface of which is about 100 feet higher than that of the sea; the rocks in one part have divided so far as to admit a person without stooping; having advanced about 100 feet in it, we did not venture further, being deprived of the little light the chink afforded, by the winding of the passage.

One of these caverns, with which we were extremely pleased, we could not arrive at without considerable trouble. Upon entering, the eye is struck with its magnitude, over which Nature, with a boldness of design peculiar to her, has thrown a regular well-turned arch, considering the rudeness of the materials; the whole being so elegantly incrustated by the hand of Time, as to form a very brilliant and ornamental appearance. This cave is about 25 feet high: and nearly circular, having two entrances divided by a number of very large rocks, which heighten much the grandeur of the scene.

It is impossible to avoid being struck with the infinite distance at which this simple production of Nature has left behind the trifling attempts of art at real grandeur, ever too attentive to minute decoration, whereby the general effect is lost:—so different from this, which, though executed in the rudest style, is yet truly magnificent.

It is probable that these phenomena owe their formation to the influx of the sea; and yet we meet with an appearance which would seem to make that solution doubtful. A high, oblong rock stands seven feet forward into the sea, unconnected with the rest of the rocks, through which an arch is sprung; but from its posture, the open part not facing the sea, but running in a direct line from the land towards it, the stroke of the surge could not have produced this effect, as it would waste its force upon the end of the rock.

From thence we returned to Busb, and proceeded along the coast to the Giant's Causeway, which has been very accurately and justly described by the author of Hibernia Curiosa.

From thence we went round to Ballycastle, and the following day to Glenarm (the present seat of the earl of Antrim) by two trifling hamlets, Cushindin and Cushindall; between the latter of which and Glenarm, there is a continuation of romantic scenes far exceeding any thing I had ever before met with.

You travel close by the sea shore from which spring a chain of mountains, rising in almost an exact perpendicular direction from their bases, which turn out a very singular appearance of limestone, diversified in such a manner by the different shades of the stone, and a mixture of verdure, as to produce a very beautiful effect.

Though some miles of this part of my excursion are very bad, yet let not the curious traveller be discouraged at that circumstance, as his toil will be amply repaid by a wonderful display of the most sublime scenery, which is to be met with in every mile of the road.

Between Cushindin and Cushindall there are three small caves, one of which has been rendered useful by the ingenuity of one of the offspring of Vulcan, who has erected a forge in it, and by a small improvement upon Nature, formed a little apartment, well secured from the inclemency of the weather, as well as enjoyed without acknowledging any other proprietor, than its possessor.

VIATOR.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

SIR,

IN your Magazine for last July I saw delineated, the character of a Man of Gallantry; and in whatsoever light the polite world may consider the picture, I am sorry that justice allows me to observe, it is but too much to the life.

However unfortunate those females are, who are so unhappy as to fall victims to the poisonous eloquence, and flattering, though destructive appearances held out to them by such men, yet there are some to be found, among men of this cast, who bear the highest esteem for inflexible virtue, and an inclination to amply reward it, wherever it is found, in spite of the disadvantages of rank and fortune.

If it be excusable in any man, even to attempt to trap the innocent, unwary girl, and sacrifice her fame, her virtue, her happiness, to infamy and misery, both here and hereafter, for the sake of gratifying his criminal passions, it is in him only, who unripened by maturity, blind to morality, and unexperienced in the world, is left solely to be directed by the unruly dictates of youthful passions. But, "where such (foiled in their attempts, by the impregnable virtue of that female, whose ruin they attempt) come to a sense of their fault, and are determined to repair the insult, though the pride of worldly rank should bend the knee to generosity, and the desire of rewarding virtue," such a story should not go untold: Narration is the smallest tribute due to generous actions; and in such an age as this, where generous actions are so few, it were a pity the world should want the knowledge of a worthy example, when it can be conveyed to them by the small trouble of writing a few sheets of paper, and your kind indulgence in the publication.

Within the third quarter of the present century, one Farmer Reilly lived in a certain western county of this kingdom: He had a large, though young family: Besides a son and three daughters, he had a little niece, of whom he was much fonder than of his own children, and who engrossed the chief of his own, and his wife's attention: When the rest of the children were clad in humble homespun, little Betty was always favoured with something better; her uncle never went to Dublin without bringing her a new cotton gown, or some little token of dress, which distinguished her above the rest of her play-fellows, and never failed to raise the jealousy of her little cousins. At the age of ten she was accounted the best scholar at her book and needle in the whole parish; her manner was pretty; her behaviour mild and engaging; in short, she was the favourite of the surrounding neighbours, and particularly of the parish priest, whose liking she so attracted, during his frequent visits at her uncle's, that he prevailed with her guardians to let her spend a week at his house, now and then. The priest's sister was a knowing woman, and was so taken with Betty as to undertake the sole instruction of her; which, during two years that she spent there, contributed vastly to her improvement. Being one day at her uncle's, Mrs. F——, the lady of the manor, (to whom he was tenant) was going by the house in her carriage, when the horses running somewhat rusty, she was obliged to alight, and wait there, till other horses were sent for. In the half hour she staid there, Betty attracted her whole attention; she asked her several questions, and was much pleased with the readiness and propriety of her answers; she was so taken with her, that she insisted on fetching her home in her carriage. Here she spent about a week, when Mrs. F—— was so much delighted with the pleasing simplicity of her manners, and the dawning brightness of her understanding, that she determined to take the entire care of her; and to that end sent for her uncle and aunt, who, notwithstanding their fondness for her, saw they could not dispose of her to better advantage, and consented the more readily, as it obliged their lady.

Betty pleased, and was perfectly pleased with her new patroness. She had an opportunity of seeing a continual politeness of behaviour, to which she was hitherto wholly unaccustomed, and which gained on her liking, and prompted her emulation. Many girls like her would have been puffed up to impertinence, by so sudden a transition from low rusticity, to the notice and liking of a lady of the first distinction; but on her it had no other effect, than to render her humility still more pleasing. Her lady employed her as her own maid, and every day strengthened her liking. Her fondness for her was little less than that of a mother; she spared no pains in her improvement; she taught her every art of the needle, which might be of use or accomplishment; and also to play on the guitar, spinnet, and to sing; accomplishments, of which herself was perfect mistress; and Betty had a voice which would pay the listening attention of the nicest ear. She instructed her, grammatically, in the French language, and was pleased beyond expression to find, that in every advice or instruction she conveyed, her pupil's attention and capacity met her half way. The rapid progress she made, in the course of three years, was amazing to every lady in the county, whom Mrs. F—— took care to inform, with joy, of her merit.

Betty's mind and person, intrinsically, fit foundations for instruction and accomplishments, like the rough diamond, every day received a brighter polish from the hands of education and example. Such was her disposition, that she seldom spoke, except in answer to a question, or to seek information, and then with such artless modesty, such winning humility, such easy confidence, and seemingly unstudied elegance of expression, as could not fail to please in the one, and amply attain her desire in the other. Such was her female—— bashfulness, (shall I call it?) that she could not speak to a superior, even of her own sex, without blushing: in short, her modesty and accomplishments mutually graced each other; her person was tall enough for a woman, and, without entering into the punctilio of a thorough description, she was really “a very fine girl,” but with some exceptions to the modern picture of that characteristic: that is to say, though her face was pretty, it was free from that affected simper, and air of self-sufficiency, so generally the attendant on our modern beauties; serenity and sensibility sat conspicuous on every feature; her hair borrowed not its charms from the friseur; the auburn ringlets fell with artless, though superior graces, down her neck: in short, she fully answers the poet's description, when he says,

“Grace in her eye, Heaven in her “looks,

“In every motion Dignity and Love.”

About this time Henry, a young gentleman, nephew to Mrs. F——, had just returned from his tour, and came on a visit to his aunt. His father died a few years before, and the fortune that devolved to his son, by his death, was but very small; and was almost entirely requisite for the maintenance of his mother, who then lived in a distant part of the kingdom, so that his chief dependance was on his aunt, who, if I may use the expression, doated on him. He was a young gentleman of a finished education, with all the advantages of travel, which were advantageously visible in his behaviour; but, unhappily! he had not banished from him that unrestrained wildness of youthful passions, to which men of his rank are too much addicted: in short, he was, in the modern stile, “a Man of Gallantry;” in which character, his person gave him a double advantage over the weaker part of the opposite sex. He was formed to please; his age about twenty-six; of a winning politeness, which could scarce fail to give him a double prepossession in the mind of a woman of sensibility. He saw Betty, and saw her with admiration. At first view, he imagined her some young lady on a visit to his aunt; but, being informed of her real situation, he promised himself success on the score of gallantry, as he imagined it a general rule, “that a waiting-maid could be no difficult conquest.” He conversed with her on indifferent matters, and her good sense surprized and charmed him: what before only struck his liking, on examination, he found, laid claim to his esteem. As a man of sensibility and experience, who knew what was valuable in woman, he could not be insensible to Betty's merit; he loved her passionately;—but his love was not honourable. He often attempted to disclose his passion; but as he knew its end, and saw clearly the disposition of her whom he was about to address, his tongue denied its office. The oftner he attempted to introduce the subject, the less he was able:—Admiration—respect—pity—honour—awe—all engrossed his heart. A thousand times he resolved to address her on honourable terms, and as often his “pride rebuked him:—a waiting maid! (would he exclaim) and yet she is lovely—yes!—by H——n, she is charming!—but can't I possess her without dishonouring my family?—and yet, shall I attempt to seduce such a pattern of every thing that is pleasing, every thing that can bless mortal man?—She is but a woman of plebeian birth—I cannot think of marrying her—that would disgrace me, and displease my aunt to my prejudice—yet I cannot live without her.—I'll try persuasion, and if that will not do—avarice is the weak side of woman, and gold will insure me success.” Thus did he argue with himself, and thus did honour's dictates lose their sway, and vicious passion take the lead.—The ruin of the charming, the innocent Betty was concerted.

Henry, who was an experienced campaigner in the field of love, thought it highly requisite to plan the method of attack before he proceeded to action; and on considering the matter, surprize seemed to him a more effectual method than a tedious and doubtful siege, to bring the garri-son to surrender; and accordingly resolved to seize on the first opportunity that offered, which was in the twilight of a Summer's evening, when Betty was alone in one of the gravel walks of the pleasure garden.

garden. He stepped up to her, almost unobserved, and advancing with a respectful bow, he dropt at her feet, and poured out his soul in all the tender eloquence the most ardent love could dictate. She was indeed much surpris'd and abash'd, and strove to withdraw her hand, but he held it fast, and tenderly pressed it to his bosom. At the age of eighteen, Betty (who, till then, had always lived in the family of a widow lady, recluse from the society of the male sex) could not have much experience in love affairs; yet, even on that head, her benevolent patroness did not leave her unadvised: To warn her against the treacherous wiles of man, had not been the smallest part of her care. In spite of every bar, nature and sensibility will have their feelings. Betty, who saw Henry's powers of pleasing, knew their value, and had a heart too full of integrity to view them with an indifferent eye: She felt in her heart a certain warmth towards him, which exceeded the bounds of common liking, and yet, even at such a trial as this, which, from such a man, would affect the most indifferent female, she was not off her guard. After the first flutterings of surprize, her humility represented to her the wide disparity of their situations; and reason told her, that it was improbable that a young gentleman, with all the advantages of rank, fortune, person, and accomplishments, should pay his addresses, in an honourable way, to his aunt's servant; on any other pretence she detested the addresses of any man. To this purpose she spoke to him in a touching, but humble manner, and left him pleased and surpris'd at her prudence.

Henry was (perhaps the first time in his life) daunted by the first repulse: He saw she had too much good sense, and lov'd virtue too well, to be puffed up by flattery, or conquered by the eloquence of a seducer; and as he knew his own intentions, he could not bring himself to a resolution of speaking to her again on the subject.

Betty from that day treated him with the most distant, though respectful coolness, and avoided every occasion of being in the same room with him, out of her mistress's presence. Her being continually in his sight, fanned his flame the more; he could not get rid of his love; and at last determined not to relinquish the pursuit so suddenly.

He now form'd a project to try how the persuasions of one of her own sex would operate with her; and to that end brib'd his aunt's house-keeper to his service. This old wretch was easily persuaded, with the assistance of a little gold, to become an agent in the accursed cause: She broke the matter gradually, by continually lavishing the highest encomiums on Henry, whenever she found Betty alone. One of her penetrations, in such circumstances, could not be ignorant of her wicked intentions; she therefore was cautious to let no word or action escape her, that might be a principle for the old instrument of vice, or her less honourable employer to act on. With this vigilance did she act a long time, till tired with a perpetual continuance of the same subject, she was willing to be assured of the real purport of the old woman's discourse. To this end, she acted one evening a little less reserved, and joined with her in every encomium on Henry. The old wretch having wound her up to a seeming extacy, and judging that matters were sufficiently ripe, thought this the best time in the world to conclude her embassy, and proceeded to tell her, (pursuant to her instructions) that her young master was deeply in love with her, and that if she did not consent to make him happy, he could not live; but if she would, nothing should be wanting to complete her happiness;—that he would take a house for her wherever she liked—that she should roll in her chariot, and have every thing she could wish for. She added, that her master did not make such a proposal without an intention of marriage; for that he declared, he would make her his wife, immediately on the death of his aunt; but, that for both their sakes, he could not do it now, as it might irritate his aunt against them, to their utter prejudice.

When Betty had heard all the old woman had to say, she did not think proper to argue the merits of the affair with her, but told her she would take time to consider the proposals. This was taken for a very promising omen; the news was carried to Henry, who heard it with all the transport of the most ardent and encouraged expectation.

Betty's thoughts were employed in a manner very different from what he supposed. She retired to her chamber, not to consider whether she should consent to the proposal or not, for her innate virtue taught her to despise the infamous offer, but to give her impatient lover a proper answer. She deliberated, whether or not she should acquaint her lady with the affair; but judging that in consequence, the old wretch, who was agent in attempting her ruin, would be discarded, and deprived of the means of earning subsistence, and that Henry would lose that place in his aunt's esteem, which he could never regain; circumstances, which in charity and prudence she would not wish to occasion, notwithstanding their base attempt on her, she thought fit to be secret; and the more so, as it was not improbable, that it might be attended with the worst consequences to herself, in parting her from her patrons, her only friend. She concluded to write a letter to Henry, in which she laid before him the heinousness and dishonour of his proceedings; and touched him on her own situation, with such elegance of style, such pathos of expression, and strength of argument, as would not disgrace the pen of the most learned.

Henry received the epistle with disappointment, admiration, and astonishment; every sentence convinced him of the finished good sense and morality of the writer. His honour was alarmed; his conscience received the home sting of remorse. He was much afraid his aunt should come to the knowledge of his proceedings, and determined to decline his pursuit; but the idea of Betty's good sense, her incorruptible virtue, her every charm, was inseparable from his heart; he was almost ashamed to meet her; he grew melancholy, to the visible prejudice of his health. In short, he really could not be happy without her, and, assured that he could not make a more worthy choice, determined to address her on honourable terms, in spite of the objections which the depravity of custom, or the fear of what the world might say, could start. To that end he went one morning into her chamber, when she was alone, and taking hold of her hand, fell on his knees to ask forgiveness for his base intentions. Betty, unacquainted with his real design, hastily withdrew her hand, and in a fright left the room, and ran to that of her mistress. Without giving her time to deliberate, he wrote a letter to her, filled with the most tender expressions, and assurances of his ardent and honourable love. Betty doubted the truth much; besides she was unwilling (allowing his addresses to be on the most virtuous footing) to consent to a proposal, which, she knew, would highly offend her lady. She gave no answer to the billet, but from that time doubled her coolness and circumspection.

Some short time afterwards, Mrs. F——, who had been a long time sickly, was seized with a malignant fever, which, in a few days put an end to her life. This was the most afflicting loss that Betty ever met with. The old lady's last moments were employed in advising her pupil; and after her interment, on opening her will, the first article that presented itself, was a bequest of 200*l.* with all her clothes, to Betty.

Betty, who was not without apprehensions of her danger from Henry, immediately after her lady's death, repaired to her uncle's, and made him acquainted with the whole of her affairs; the good man promised to protect her with his life and substance.

Henry was sole heir to his aunt's estate; he lived in the house, and every day sent a servant to Farmer Reilly's to enquire after Betty's health.

Six weeks had elapsed when he came there one day, unattended, and wholly unexpected; he desired to see Betty; with much importunity from Reilly and his wife, Betty was prevailed on to appear in his presence: A modest blush overspread her countenance—Henry thought her more charming than ever—he approached her respectfully, and after apologizing in the most humble and satisfactory manner, for the impropriety of his past conduct towards her, told her, that he loved her too tenderly to be happy without her, and was then come to make her a proposal of marriage, which he was ready to execute as soon as she thought proper. The only reason Betty could have to dislike him, was the baseness of his intentions on her; that removed, beyond a doubt, by the proposal he now made, the offer transported her with joy, as much as it was above her expectations—she was wholly unable to speak—she blushed and grew pale alternately—her lips trembled, and limbs tottered. Henry perceived her disorder, and approached to embrace her, and she swooned away in his arms. He bathed her face with tears, and joined the Farmer, and his wife in every endeavour to restore her. When she was recovered, he pressed her to give him an answer; when, with all the humility imaginable, she deemed herself unworthy so great an honour; and observed, that though she had received notions of high life under the patronage of her worthy deceased lady, she had also improved in those of humility, and could contentedly pass her days in the humble sphere of a Farmer's wife. Henry grew importunate—he could not depart with a refusal. Betty dropping on her knees, reached him her trembling hand, and melted into tears. Never was joy greater than Henry's; he raised her tenderly, pressed her to his bosom, and kissed and embraced her a thousand times over. The Farmer and his wife were little less than frantick with joy. In short, the Sunday following was appointed for their wedding; Henry procured a licence, and the ceremony was performed publickly in the parish church. Henry now possessed all he could desire in woman, with the satisfaction faction of being the happy means through whom Providence conveyed its rewards to virtue.

This affair served as a new matter for speculation in the county: "that Mr. F.— had married his aunt's waiting-maid," was the topic at every genteel table;—he was pointed at and ridiculed—but by that sex, from whom he could not demand satisfaction. The man that would be hardly enough to offer an offence to him, on that account, must suffer for his temerity.

His friends would not see him; but as he knew their motives, and was conscious of the moral rectitude of his conduct, he disregarded their displeasure. Those affections which before were scattered among a multiplicity of objects, gradually centered in his Betty; he was never easy from home; domestic happiness was all his heart desired, and all his mind and actions laboured to improve, and success crowned every effort. The first year of their marriage blessed them with a son, which seemed to be the only circumstance that could add to their happiness: every week, as it made the boy more lovely, endeared him the more to his parents; every day was a new scene of felicity to the happy pair, and time, instead of diminishing, seemed rather to ripen and invigorate their mutual affections.

One morning as Henry sat in the parlour window, playing on his flute, while his spouse prepared breakfast, and both were delighted with the engaging prattle of their son Frederick (then a lovely little fellow, about three years old) farmer Reilly and his wife appeared in the avenue, followed by a strange gentleman, richly dressed; the appearance of the two former, as it was very frequent there, could not surprise, but that of the latter excited some curiosity. In a few minutes they all entered; the farmer desired of the servant who opened the door, to see his master; Henry, on being told, desired they might be shewed into the parlour. When they entered, the farmer, addressing himself to the strange gentleman, says, "there, please your honour, is Mrs. Betty."—The gentleman, approaching her, exclaimed, "No, it is not—sure it cannot—no—yet, stay—yes, Oh, gracious Heaven! it must be—it is my Eliza—the very image of my darling wife, my once inestimable Emily." Betty stood astonished and gazed on him with reverend curiosity. "Plague on you, Reilly," says Henry, hastily, you are a very bad gentleman usher; why don't you tell your niece who the gentleman is?" "My niece, Sir!" replied the farmer, smiling;" in troth, Sir, she is none of my niece, but Mr. Williams there is her father."—My father! exclaimed Betty, amazed.—"Yes, said the gentleman, yes, my lovely, dear Eliza, my long lost daughter, I am that father, unworthy those blessings which Providence has bestowed on me, in its cares of you, though wholly independent of me." Betty recollected that she had heard farmer Reilly (her supposed uncle) say, that her mother was dead, and that her father was gone beyond sea, and had never since been heard of, and was now convinced by the evidence of Reilly and his wife, that this must be him. She gave way to the first transports of filial affection her heart ever felt, and falling on her knees, tenderly embraced those of her father; he raised her, kissed and embraced her a thousand times over, till roused from his ecstasy by Henry, who clasped both in his arms, while tears and smiles, like the sun-thine shower, mixed on his cheek. The farmer and his wife were not less affected: little Frederick, thought them all mad, and danced and laughed at the sport; his grandfather took him in his arms, and almost smothered him with kisses; the smiling, playful prattler clung round his neck, and alternately laughed in his face, and hid his own in his bosom. The old gentleman was almost exhausted with extacy; never was scene more affecting, or joy more perfect. New life seemed to shine on every countenance.

(To be concluded in the Appendix.)

Histories of the Tete-a-Tete annexed: or, Memoirs of the Hibernian Patriot, and Miss M——n.

DESCENDED from one of the greatest families in Ireland, our hero possesses all the virtues and great qualities of his progenitors. Generous, hospitable, and humane, he in that country gained the esteem and affection of all his acquaintance, and was almost idolized by his tenants and dependants. The loyalty and patriotism of his much honoured father having raised him to the first rank in Ireland, his son treads in the same paths, and meets with the same royal marks of attention and approbation.

This gentleman gave very early testimonies of his natural genius and disposition for classical pursuits: nevertheless, the man of the world was not overlooked, and he considered the polite accomplishments as requisite objects to form the gentleman. Thus equipped, he started upon the theatre of life with all the advantages of a polite education, which failed not to set off a most agreeable and manly figure.

Such

Such attractions inspired the ladies with the strongest partiality for him. The Irish beauties vied with each other to appear the most amiable in his eyes, and he created more female rivals than were, perhaps, ever known. He was not insensible to their charms, but had hitherto preserved his heart, when he set out from that kingdom upon his travels.

On his first arrival here he found the British fair as much inclined to acknowledge his merit as the ladies in Ireland had been. His company was courted in all the polite circles, where he became an ornament among the most brilliant and poignant geniuses, by whom he was greatly caressed and esteemed.

Soon after this he paid a visit to the continent, and was most graciously received, particularly at Versailles. The French beauties did not, however, excite in him such emotions as his fair country women. Their artificial complexions, of which they made not the least secret, but would often repair in publick with as little ceremony as placing a pin, in a great degree disgusted him: he could not however, resist the charms of Mademoiselle F—tte, who seemed to study nature even in art; and if she endeavoured to heighten her attractions by cosmetics, it was done with so much care as scarce to be perceivable.

This lady had just issued from a nunnery, where she had been immured for some years, and was now released, to be betrothed to the Marquis de L—, who was seized with a sudden illness, and fell a sacrifice to his own rashness, in going abroad before he was perfectly recovered.

In France, though every married woman is intitled to her cher ami, it is thought scandalous for a single woman to give the world the least suspicion of her entertaining too favourable an opinion of any man, let his rank be what it may; and if there is any great disparity in their situations, this suspicions, will unavoidably increase. This was the case at present, our hero's rank and Mademoiselle F—tte's were at so great a distance, that it could not be supposed he would ever offer her his hand in an honourable way. They were however incessantly together, and frequently seen even in tete-a-tete parties. Mademoiselle's friends began to look cool upon her, and she was not invited to many parties, where before she constantly received polite cards. Her conduct at length reached her brother's ears. He was a mousquetaire, and supposed to be one of the best swordsmen in Paris: and, had she not judiciously convinced him that the reports spread to her disadvantage, were no more than the effects of scandal, founded on innocent gaiety, very disagreeable consequences might have ensued.

To pursue our hero in the other parts of his tour, we may readily suppose that he every where met with that attention due to his rank and dignity, and for which foreigners on the bon ton are so celebrated. He also failed not to make proper remarks on the custom and manners of the people, as well as their public edifices, amusements, and even their follies, which in all countries are pretty conspicuous. He conversed with men of letters as well as courtiers, and received all the information they could afford him; for which he amply repaid them by such intelligence concerning his own country, as they were in many respects very ignorant of.

Upon his return home, he found himself more caressed than ever. The antiquated dowagers, as well as the young widows, lavished their compliments upon him, and testified a strong inclination to appear amiable in his eyes. He lost his money through compliment to the first, which in some measure gratified them; the latter were more desirous of playing a deeper game: his heart was the object of their attention; and it is confidently asserted he made several sacrifices at the altar of the Cyprian goddess in their behalf. The ladies here alluded to are well known in polite life; some of them have approved themselves women of complete spirit, and the rest are strongly suspected.

A certain peevish lord, who has been out of temper with himself and the world for some time, took great umbrage at our hero's visits to his lady. This was chiefly occasioned by her proving pregnant for the first time, after being married three years. A divorce was talked of; and the Hibernian Patriot, finding his lordship had planted spies upon him, declined his visits, to rescue the lady's character, and restore the tranquility of the family. But it is generally believed a certain house not far from St. James's-street, afforded them a rendezvous for a considerable time afterwards.

During this lady's confinement by her temporary illness, our hero had occasion to go over to Ireland, where he was received by all his friends and acquaintance in the most agreeable manner.

He had not long been in Dublin ere he made an acquaintance at the Castle with a most amiable young lady. She was the natural daughter of a certain English nobleman, who had figured in that country in a very elevated sphere. Her personal charms charms were not more attracting than her mental accomplishments, as the endowments of nature, which had been lavishly bestowed upon her, were greatly improved by a polite education. She was then about nineteen, and had a number of admirers; but her heart had, hitherto, remained invulnerable.—The accomplishments of our hero, united to his very amiable character, made an impression upon her—but, alas! his heart was not his own; he was not, however, insensible to her charms. By some fatality they always met in the same companies, and often found themselves in the same card parties. These frequent interviews led to a train of consequences, which the world has been rather rigid in commenting upon.

Miss M——n (for that is the name the young lady goes by) being asked by our hero, in a tete-a-tete party concerning her history, innocently told it in a few words. “My mother was the widow of a gentleman of easy fortune, who by gaiety and dissipation out ran it.—He died young, and left her in disagreeable circumstances. Being brought up in an elegant line of life, she had many respectable acquaintances, who contributed to support her in a manner worthy of their friendship. She was still in her prime, I will not add handsome, that may look like partiality in me. She had many suitors as a widow, but her first connubial connection having proved so disagreeable, she refused, perhaps, some proposals to which she should have listened.

Although a widow, she was at the Castle called “the Sparkler,” and was so far qualified for the title, that she dazzled the eyes of the first man there. After this I need not descend to tell you the event. Here I am, to all appearances, in very splendid circumstances.”—A flood of tears stopped her farther detail.

Our hero is a man of too much gallantry, to let the moistened eye of beauty plead without relief: he slipped a pocket book with some bank notes into her hand. He then took his leave for the present, and begged the favour of waiting upon her the next day to breakfast. Silence gave consent, and being recovered, she was conveyed to her chair.

Such is the outline of the history of Miss M——n, who now shines the meteor of a court, and the envy of most of the Hibernian ladies upon the bon ton. It is true no positive proof can be produced, that our hero has any more than a friendly, sentimental affection for Miss M——n; but “friendship with women, is sister to love.”—Her apartments, from an indifferent first floor, are changed to an elegant house. She is no longer compelled to take a common hack: a brilliant vis-a-vis supplies its place. In fine, every circumstance of her situation bespeaks her ease and affluence: let the world conclude what they may.

THEIR hair is black and long, and they have a method of twisting it about their heads so as to make it look very graceful. Their weapons are bows and arrows, which they manage with great dexterity: the strings of their bows are made of sinews of stags, and their arrows are pointed with teeth of fishes, or sharpened stones. The women are very handsome, and well shaped, and withal so active, that they will swim across broad rivers with their children on their backs, or climb with surprizing agility to the tops of the highest trees. In religion, they are bigotted idolators, worshipping the sun and moon, and bearing an extreme aversion to all christians; which, indeed, is not to be wondered at, since the horrid cruelties exercised by the Spaniards on the natives of the island of Cuba, and Mexico, could not fail to excite the utmost abhorrence and dread of them in those savages, instead of recommending their religion, which could not be called christianity, though it might be genuine popery.

There are but few European settlements of any consequence, either in East or West Florida. In the former, the principal place is St. Augustine, standing on the eastern coast of the peninsula, about seventy leagues from the gulph of Florida and channel of Bahama, thirty south of the river Alatomaha, or Alatumacha, and forty seven from the town and river of Savannah. It is situated in lat. 30 north, and lies along the shore, at the bottom of a hill, in the form of a parallelogram, the streets cutting each other at right angles. The port is formed by an island and a long point of land, almost divided from the continent by a river, which falls into the sea two miles south of the town. About a mile to the northward of the town stands the castle, defended by four bastions, and pretty strong. The entrance into the port lies between the island and the point of land, and is about one mile and a quarter over, but very shallow, as is indeed most part of the coast of Florida.

The next place to St. Augustine, at least when the Spaniards were possessed of this country, was St. Mattheo, situated about fifteen leagues to the north of the former, towards Georgia.

Mr. Rolle, a public-spirited gentleman, and and member in the British parliament for Barnstable in Devonshire, having had a grant of a tract of land in this country, hath planned a settlement upon the river St. John, to which he hath already carried over a considerable number of adventurers.

Another settlement has been established here by one Dr. Trummel, at Mosquito harbour, not far from the channel of Bahama.

In East Florida and Louisiana, the only places belonging to the English, worth mentioning, are, Mobile and Pensacola. The first lies on the river of that name, about one hundred miles from its mouth, and seventy from the Mississippi; though but a small place, it is to be hoped, now it is in the hands of the English, it will soon become more considerable. The soil of the neighbouring country is said to be but indifferent, and the harbour inconvenient, yet there is an easy entrance from it into the gulph of Mexico, and consequently an opportunity of carrying on a lucrative trade with the Spaniards. Its situation is also advantageous for the peltry trade with the Indians, the river being large, extending far within land, and yielding as some say, pearls, which are found in a sort of shell fish, between a muscle and an oyster, by the antients called pinna.

Pensacola stands on the west side of the bay to which it gives name, about ten leagues east of Dauphin Isle, at the mouth of the river Mobile. The harbour is the best upon all this coast of the gulph, being large, safe from all winds, with four fathom of water at the entrance, and seven or eight farther in. A fine river enters the bay on the east side of the harbour, which comes about one hundred miles out of the country, after being formed by the junction of two other rivers. The town is not considerable at present; but it is probable from the commodiousness of its situation and harbour, it may in time make a better figure. Besides these two small towns, the English have many forts and harbours among the Indians on the inland lakes and rivers.

New-Orleans, which was the only place of any note in Louisiana that was not ceded to the English by the late treaty of peace, and which the French have since yielded up to the Spaniards, is situated between the eastern shore of the Mississippi and the Fish-river, near the lakes Pontchartrain and Maurepas, and about eighteen leagues from the sea. It is a pretty large handsome town, but subject to most ruinous inundations; besides, the navigation, according to Charlevoix, between it and the sea, is so very difficult, that none but small vessels and flat bottomed boats can get up to it, there being a shelf that lies before the mouth of the river, where there is not above ten feet water. He tells us, that the channel of it is twice as large as that of the Seine, keeping the same breadth all along; and that the stream is rapid, though it be full of windings and turnings for nine hundred leagues.

New Mexico, including California.

NEW-MEXICO, so called because of its being discovered later than Old-Mexico, is bounded on the North by high mountains, beyond which is a country altogether unknown; by Louisiana on the east; by New Spain on the south; and on the west by the gulph of California, and the Rio Colorado; extending, it is said, above one hundred miles from east to west, and about nine hundred from south to north; but the twentieth part of the country, within these limits, is neither cultivated nor inhabited, either by Spaniards or Indians. As it lies in the midst of the temperate zone, the climate, in general, is very pleasant: the summers, though very warm, are neither sultry nor unwholesome; and the winters, though pretty sharp, are far from being insupportable, and, for the most part, clear and healthy.

The greatest encomiums are lavished on the fertility of the soil, the richness of the mines, and the variety of valuable commodities produced in this country.—It is said to be beautifully diversified with fields, meadows, rising grounds, and rivers; abounding with fruits and timber trees, turquoises, emeralds, and other precious stones, mines of gold and silver, a great variety of wild and tame cattle, fish, and fowls. Upon the whole, we may safely affirm, that New-Mexico is among the pleasantest, richest, and most plentiful countries in America, or any other part of the world. There are few great or navigable rivers in it: the most considerable are, the Rio Solado and Rio del Norte, which, with several smaller streams, fall into the Gulph of Mexico. On the coast of the gulph are divers bays, ports, and creeks, which might be easily converted into excellent harbours, if the Spaniards were possessed of any portion of that commercial spirit which animates the other maritime nations of Europe.

The Spanish writers tell us, that New Mexico is inhabited by a great variety of Indian nations or tribes, totally unconnected with each other; but the principal are the Apaches, a brave, warlike, resolute people; fond of liberty, and the inveterate enemies of tyranny and oppression. About the close of the last century, thinking themselves aggrieved by the Spanish government, they made a general insurrection, and did a great deal of mischief; but were at last obliged to submit, and have since been curbed by stronger garrisons. Most of the natives are now christians. When the Spaniards first entered this country, they found the natives well clothed, their lands cultivated, their villages neat, and their houses built with stone. Their flocks also were numerous, and they lived more comfortably than most of the other savages in America. They were so skilful in shooting, that with an arrow they could strike all the grain out of an ear of corn, at a considerable distance. As to religion, they were idolaters, and worshipped the sun and moon, but whether they offered human sacrifices, we are not sufficiently informed.

As to the number of the provinces of this country, we can advance nothing certain: some writers making them only five, others fifteen, eighteen, twenty, and twenty five, but adding no description, either of them or the towns contained in them, excepting the capital, Santa Fe, which, we are told, stands near the source of the Rio del Norte, in 36° . of north latitude, and about one hundred and thirty leagues from the gulph: that it is a well built, handsome, rich town, and the seat of a bishop, suffragan of Mexico, as well as of the governor of the province, who is subordinate to the viceroy of Mexico, or New-Spain.

California, the most northern of all the Spanish dominions on the continent of America, towards the Pacific Ocean, was for a long time supposed to be an island; but, at last, was found to be only a peninsula, issuing from the north coasts of America, and extending into the Pacific Ocean eight hundred miles, from cape Sebastian, in 43° . $30'$. north latitude, towards the south east, as far as cape St. Lucar, in 22° . $32'$. north latitude. The eastern coast lies nearly parallel with that of Mexico, opposite to it; and the sea between is called the gulph or lake of California, or the Vermillion, Purple, or Red Sea.

The breadth of the peninsula is very unequal; towards the north it is near two hundred miles broad, but at the south extremity it tapers away, and is scarcely fifty miles over.

California was first discovered to be a peninsula by Father Caino, or Kino, a German Jesuit, who landed in it from the island of Sumatra, and passed into New-Mexico, without crossing any other water than Rio Azul, or the Blue River, about north latitude 35° . The more southern part was known to the Spaniards soon after the discovery of Mexico, for Cortes discovered it in 1535; but they did not till lately penetrate far into it, contenting themselves with the pearl fishery on the coast. Our Sir Francis Drake landed there in 1578, and took possession of California, for his mistress queen Elizabeth, by the name of New Albion; the king of the country actually investing him with its sovereignty, and presenting him with his crown of beautiful feathers; the people too, thinking the English more than men, began to sacrifice to them, but were restrained. Though the English have never attempted to settle any colonies here, yet they seem to have a better right than the Spaniards, if ever they should think fit to lay claim to it.

Though it lies, for the most part, in the temperate zone, there are great heats in the summer on the coast, but the inland parts are very temperate; and though the winters are severe, they are healthy. The soil is various: to the westward of the river Colorado it is level and fruitful, interspersed with delightful woods, cool refreshing springs and rivulets, and the most enchanting pastures and meadows; but, in other places, the country is mostly wild, rugged, and barren, over-run with rocks, sands, and mountains, and without a sufficient quantity of water to make them yield either corn or pasture: some of the mountains, however, yield a great variety, both of fruit and forest trees, particularly a kind of tree, that bears a fruit called Mescal, which is gathered all the year round; with fine pistachios, figs of different colours, and a tree called by the natives palo santo, which bears not only a pleasant fruit, but an excellent perfume. There is a shrub tree named pitahaya, which bears no leaves but a very delicious fruit, being rich and well tempered, with a grateful acid. It resembles a horse-chestnut externally, but the pulp comes nearer a fig than any other fruit: in some it is white, in others yellow, and sometimes red. Here also are pompions and water melons, of a prodigious size, a pleasant sort of fruit called xicanes, grapes, with a great variety of other fruits, and no less than fourteen sorts of grain. The soil, in many places, is so rich, that the plants bear fruit three times a year.

As to quadrupeds, here are deer, of which two kinds are peculiar to the country; a particular species of sheep, buffaloes, beavers, or animals much resembling them, a peculiar species of wild dogs, lions, wild cats, and many other wild beasts. The horses, mules, asses, oxen, sheep, hogs, goats, and other quadrupeds, that have been imported either from Spain and

K k k k k

Mexico,

Mexico, multiply exceedingly. Of the two species of deer peculiar to California, that called Taye by the natives is greatly esteemed, and eat with the same relish as venison by our epicures. Of the feathered kind here is a great variety; in particular, Venegas tells us, that the coast is plentifully stocked with peacocks, bustards, geese, cranes, vultures, gulls, larger than geese, cormorants, mews, quails, linnets, larks, nightingales, and many other species.

With respect to fish, the multitude and variety with which the gulph of California, the Pacific ocean, and the rivers are supplied, is almost incredible. Salmon, turbot, barbel, skate, mackarel, pilchards, thornbacks, soals, bonettas, and many other species, are caught here with very little trouble; together with pearl oysters, common delicious oysters, cray-fish, lobsters, and a variety of exquisite shell-fish. However, of the testaceous kind, the most remarkable and abundant is the tortoise, caught in the utmost plenty upon the coasts. On the South sea coast also is a shell-fish, the most beautiful that can be imagined, being of an elegant vivid blue colour, like the lapis lazuli.

California affords one of the richest pearl-fisheries in the world, and is likewise thought to have mines.

As to insects, they swarm here, as in most warm countries; yet they are neither so numerous or troublesome as in some, on account of the dryness of the soil and climate.

There are two considerable rivers in California, viz. Rio Colorado, and Rio du Carmel, with several smaller streams, and fine ports, bays, creeks, and roads, both on the east and west side, which is the reason of its having been formerly so much frequented by our privateers in the South Seas.

We had almost forgot to mention a species of manna found here, being a juice which exudates from a tree, and which is as sweet as sugar, though not so white and pleasant to the eye.

In the heart of the country are plains of salt, quite firm, and clear as crystal, which considering the vast quantities of fish of all sorts found here, might be of great advantage to any civilized nation that should possess themselves of the country.

There is a great variety of savage tribes in California. Those that live on the east side of the peninsula are said to be great enemies to the Spaniards; but in the other parts, they seem to be very hospitable to all strangers. The inland country, especially towards the north, is populous. The Indians, in most respects, resemble those we have already taken notice of in other parts of America. They have a great many absurd, ridiculous customs, opinions and superstitions. They go almost naked, and pay great deference to their priests, who also pretend to be magicians and physicians. All their household furniture and property consist of the implements of fishing and hunting, or war, in which most of their time is spent. Except in the two great empires of Mexico and Peru, where there was a greater intercourse and union, and consequently more art and ingenuity, more invention, policy, and refinement, all the other nations of America differ only in the modes of barbarity; being nearly similar in capacity and disposition. Even among these savages, a love of ornament prevails more among the women than the men; this is a female weakness that seems common to all countries. Here the women are set off with pearls, and all the other splendid trinkets, which nature affords, or their ingenuity can invent.—Father Toraval tells us, that the Californians display great ingenuity in their nets: “I can affirm,” says he, “that of all the nets I ever saw in Europe and New Spain, none are comparable to them, either in whiteness, the mixture of colours, or the strength and workmanship, in which they represent a vast variety of figures.”

It is but lately that the Spaniards had any settlement on this peninsula; and what they have is only a village, near Cape St. Lucar, at the south end of it; which they call California. The Manilla-ships touch here sometimes, in their course to Acapulco; and the place is likely to become considerable in time, in consequence of the pearl-trade carried on with the natives.

There are many small islands on the coast of the peninsula, both in the South-Sea and the Gulph: and it is observed, that capt. Dampier proposed seeking a north-west passage, by doubling cape Blanco, at the northern extremity of California.

The Jesuits, before their suppression, were taxed with the design of laying the foundation of an independent hierarchy and empire here, as well as in Paraguay.

Additional Observations on the City and Chapel of Loretto. Continued from p. 755.

ON the other side of the Virgin is a like Statue; this is of silver, was presented at the same time, and offers a heart in the like manner; the gift of Laura, widow of Alphonfus the fourth, duke of Modena, and mother of James the second's queen. Here is also another silver angel, presenting presenting Louis the Fourteenth (who is made of gold) upon a cushion : they told us this golden infant was made exactly of the same weight with the living infant when just born. The niche in which the Virgin is placed, is lined with silver and ornamented with gold ; but I suspect many of the plates that appear to be gold, to be no more than silver gilt. The door case and architraves of the window are ornamented with plates of the same metal : it was by this window, that the angel Gabriel entered to salute the Virgin. There is a fine altar at her feet, and before it a silver balustrade, which separates this Sanctum Sanctorum from the rest of the house, which in size is no more than thirty feet by thirteen, and about eighteen high. The canons who shew this place, were extremely polite and obliging to us ; they admitted us behind the sanctuary to the holy chimney or hearth, which is exactly beneath the niche wherein the Virgin stands, and in which fire-place or hearth is a trunk that belonged to her : here they shewed us the Santissima Scodella or porringer, which is of coarse blackish earthen-ware, broke in two or three places and stuck together with mastic ; this they assert to be the same in which the pap was made for the infant Jesus ; the canon permitted me to take it in my hand, which is a prodigious favour, and I desired him to shake about in it some rosaries, chaplets, &c. which I had purchased to present to some Roman catholic friends in France, and I begged him to do every thing by them, which should render them extraordinarily efficacious ; so they have been shook about in the porringer, rubbed to the holy walls, and to the image and all ; he could not help smiling at my request. There are but eight canons, they are the only gentlemen that inhabit this city ; here also is a widow lady, a marchioness, * * * * ; the other citizens are all common and poor people.

We were much disappointed at the sight of the treasury ; the treasures they keep shut up in presses, and are by no means very valuable : here you find a few indifferent cameos ; the gems in general, and in particular, are but a paltry collection. The famous pearl appears to be formed of three or four grown together ; it is a misshapen mass, not fine, though they have helped it here and there with some colouring, in order to induce the faithful to fancy they discover a rude representation of the Virgin seated upon a cloud.

Her scarlet camlet gown which she wore when the angel Gabriel appeared to her, is inclosed with great care in a glass case.

The pictures are all very indifferent, excepting two ; one of which is by Annibal Carracchi, and represents the nativity of the Virgin. The other is attributed to Raffaello ; the figure of the Virgin is faulty, her head being not well placed on her shoulders, but the infant is so well done and so natural, that at the first view it appears like a living child ; the keeping and clear obscure being admirably conducted. They told us that lord Exeter would have given them sixteen hundred pounds sterling for this picture. We were offered a sight of the cellars, which they said contained one hundred and forty very large tons of wine ; out of one of the tons may be drawn three sorts of wine from the same spicket, but we declined visiting them. Here is a Speziale or apothecary's shop, where all sorts of common drugs, particularly ointments, Venice treacle, plasters, &c. are provided for the pilgrims gratis : here is also a great number of large gallipots of fine earthen ware, painted by Raffaello and Giulio Romano, well worth the attention of the curious. The priest who shewed us the Santa Casa was so obliging, as to present me with some morsels of Nosra Damia's black veil of last year stuck upon a paper, signed and sealed, &c. as indubitable attestations of the identity of the said veil, &c. The great reputation of the Santa Casa has much declined within these few years, from a lack of devotion in mankind ; our conductor and some other holy men we conversed with, owned the Virgin had not received a gift of value from any prince or crowned head, for these sixty years past ; and that few pilgrims came now, compared with the numbers that used to visit Loretto some years past* : it is remarkable that this day, one of the first in the year for the arrival of pilgrims, we saw no more than twelve of them enter Loretto. About ten pilgrims on an average yearly arrive from England, where the people of Loretto believe those of the Roman Catholic religion stick up more strictly to the principles of their faith, than do those of France or Italy ; and I join them in opinion. They assured us that for many years past, scarce any great people had performed the journey ; and added, their pilgrimage need not be considered by them as very painful, as they might perform it in a post chaise or otherwise, provided they walk but a little, when the weather proved favourable. Pilgrims are fed and lodged gratis on the road, and during their stay in the town. Those we saw were all common people, sturdy lazy vagabonds, who preferring sloth and idleness to labour and industry, set out on what they call a pilgrimage, as it costs them nothing; and I make no doubt, fail not to pilfer what they can on their route: I should be as much afraid to meet a posse of these pilgrims, as to encounter a band of robbers in a lonely place. The Adriatic sea is but one mile from the city, and were not the Turks persuaded the treasures of Loretto would not sufficiently reward their trouble, it seems probable they might land and take the town, porringer, santa casa, treasury, and all its trumpery, with the greatest ease.

Some Account of, and Extracts from "A Series of Answers to certain Popular Objections, against separating from the rebellious Colonies, and discarding them entirely: Being the concluding Tract of the Dean of Gloucester, on the Subject of American Affairs."

BEFORE the author proceeds to the body of his work, he has the following material passages in his preface: "Men, who have a bad cause to defend, will catch at shadows, pretending to raise mighty triumphs on imaginary victories, in order to divert the attention of the reader from the main point. But men, who are conscious of having truth on their side, will be the less attentive to mere circumstances; because they know, they are right as to essentials. I have frequently experienced this fact; and particularly in the dispute between Dr. Franklin and myself: Which, as it has an intimate connection with the ensuing treatise, and will serve to throw a strong light on certain manœuvres, now endeavoured to be concealed, I will lay before the public.

"At the very time, when Dr. Franklin opposed the Stamp-Act, as being unconstitutional, and subversive of the liberties of America, he was, by the favour of his present Majesty, continued Post-Master General for the province of Pennsylvania:—An office this! which, according to his own doctrine, was created by an unconstitutional act of a tyrannical parliament in the reign of Queen Ann, and during the administration of the Whigs. However, as he could reconcile it to his conscience to enjoy this unconstitutional, lucrative place; so it seems, that after the Stamp Bill had past into a law, his conscience became less squeamish in regard to that also, as will appear by the sequel.

"Now, in the first and second editions of my fourth tract, unhappily for me, I had charged him with procuring a place for himself in the American Stamp-Office; whereas, alas! it proved to be not for himself, but for his friend. And as poor culprit was thus detected in an offence of so heinous a nature, against the eternal truth and rectitude of things, great were the exultations of the doctor and his patriotic friends. Reader, I plead guilty to the indictment; habes consistentem reum. Therefore I will lay Dr. Franklin's own state of the case before you;—and this the rather, because his republican agents and abettors, the Monthly Reviewers, have dared me to publish his own account; hoping, I suppose, that I had mislaid my voucher.

"In a letter of his to me, dated March 2, 1774, are these identical words:—"Some days after the Stamp-Act was passed, to which I had given all the opposition I could with Mr. Grenville, I received a note from Mr. Wheatley, his secretary, [the same Wheatley, whose papers were afterwards stolen, and confessed to be in the possession of Dr. Franklin, and whose nephew was in danger of being murdered, for endeavouring to trace out the original theft] desiring to see me the next morning. I waited upon him accordingly, and found with him several other Colony-Agents. He acquainted us, that Mr. Grenville was desirous to make the execution of the act as little inconvenient and disagreeable to the Americans as possible, and therefore did not think of sending Stamp-Officers from hence; but wished to have discreet and reputable persons appointed in each province, from among the inhabitants, such as would be acceptable to them. For as they were to pay the tax, he thought strangers should not have the emoluments. Mr. Wheatley therefore wished us to name for our respective colonies, informing us, that Mr. Grenville would be obliged to us for pointing out to him honest and responsible men, and would pay great regard to our nomination. By this plausible, and apparently candid declaration, we were drawn in to nominate: And I named for our province Mr. Hughes, saying at the same time, that I knew not whether he would accept of it, I was only sure, that if he did, he would execute the office faithfully. I soon after had notice of his appointment."

"Now, can any man in his senses really believe, by perusing this letter, that either Dr. Franklin, or any of the Colony-Agents conceived such dreadful ideas, at that juncture, of the enslaving nature and horrid tendency of this Stamp-Act, as have been so artfully imputed to it? No:—I am sure, he cannot in his conscience believe any such thing. Yet the whole band of Mock-Patriots, and Republican-Zealots held this very language in all their harangues both before, and since; representing representing the poor Stamp-Act as a monster more destructive to the human race, than the most terrible, death-doing Giants in romance. All therefore that can be fairly and justly concluded from the tenor of this extract is, that the Colony-Agents, after having made that kind of opposition which is usually made to every new tax, conceived, that they had gone far enough, and that now it was time to acquiesce, and have recourse to other measures of a more pacific turn.

"As therefore peace and harmony were again restored, or at the worst, were very likely to be restored in a short time; from whence comes the present fiend of fury and discord among us? Reader, I will not mince the matter, but declare at once,—it came from the Regency-Bill: That fatal bill has brought on all the calamities, which both Great-Britain and America have suffered, or are likely to suffer in the present war. To make this clearly appear, if it wants any illustration, I would observe, that it had been the constant practice with the Mock-Patriots and Republicans, for many years, to represent the late Princess Dowager of Wales in the most odious colours, and to asperse her character in almost every respect: In which endeavour they had certainly so far succeeded, as to render her extremely unpopular. Therefore, when the Regency-Bill was to be framed, the minister, [Mr. Grenville] thought it the most prudent way to get it constructed in such a manner, as to omit her name, and consequently to exclude her from being regent. This was handle enough for wily, and machiavilian politicians to take hold of. Consequently, they, who had so lately, and so grossly abused and insulted, now as much flattered and cajoled her, offering all their weight and assistance to serve her in this cause. The bait took; her name was inserted in the Regency-Bill; the Stamp-Minister was dismissed; and they of course succeeded in his room. And then indeed, out of mere necessity (for I do not believe it was their inward choice) they were compelled to repeal that Stamp-Act, against which they had so long, and so vehemently exclaimed. But alas! Conscious to themselves, that they had done exceedingly wrong, they endeavoured to mend the matter, tinkering like, by making it much worse; hoping (vainly hoping) to patch up the breach they had made in the constitution, by the foldering of a declaratory law. But the Americans, now taught to know their own importance (a doctrine, which they were always ready to learn) and feeling their own strength in our weakness, rejected the expedient with disdain. The only use, to which they put it, was to swell their catalogue of pretended grievances with this additional one of an enslaving declaratory law. And to be sure, it served admirably well for that purpose, but for no other. For as to any thing else,—to pretend to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever, after having given such a recent proof, that we dared not bind them to pay even an halfpenny tax on a news-paper, was such an instance of Gasconading folly as is hardly to be paralleled. No wonder then, that the colonists should first treat it as a ridiculous bravado; and then make use of it as a weapon against ourselves, by putting it into their list of imaginary wrongs.

"Therefore, let Mr. Burke (or the admirable and excellent Mr. Burke, as Dr. Price styles him) call me court vermin, as long as he pleases; yet as long as I can crawl, I will ever maintain, that the Rockingham administration were the cause, the exciting cause I mean, of the present war, and of all the calamities derived from it.—

*Hoc fonte derivata clades
In patriam, populumque fluxit.*

Moreover if the declaratory law, which enacts, that the British legislature has a right to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever; is so very bad, so tyrannical, and detestable, as Dr. Price, and the rebel Americans now represent it;—I do further assert that that identical patriotic administration, and particularly Mr. Burke, were the authors of this very law. Dr. Price knew, as well as any man living, that such was the state of the case: But he had not the ingenuity to acknowledge it. On the contrary, by inserting this among others, in his recital of pretended grievances, he has led the unwary reader to suppose, that the declaratory act, as well as the rest of the sad oppressions under which the poor Americans groaned, proceeded all from the same hateful cause, from the same wicked, and execrable ministry; or rather from sets of successive, tyrannical ministers, the sole authors of all those evils, of which the colonists have so loudly, and according to him, so justly complained. Whereas the truth is, that at least one of these pretended galling American chains was forged by his own dear patriotic friends and favourites, the Rockingham administration.

"Reader, this learned gentleman Dr. Price has wrote an elaborate treatise on moral obligation: In which he lays down positions, which are sufficiently strict. Compare them therefore, I beseech you, with his own latitudinarian practice, his own law conduct and behaviour in this whole whole affair.—As to the declaratory law respecting the colonies, against which he inveighs so bitterly, as if it were the novel offspring of a modern, wicked administration, and a corrupt parliament; it is, [considered in itself, and not connected with the repeal of the Stamp-act] no other (and that likewise Dr. Price knew perfectly well) than a copy of the declaratory law of the 6th of G. I. respecting Ireland, and the re-enacting of the 7th and 8th of William III. respecting America: all these Whig princes! Whig parliaments! And Whig administrations!"

After this, follows an introduction, considering both the Americans and their friends in Britain for their condemning the proposal of an entire separation. The objections to which, he then proceeds to answer.

Those objections are in number fourteen, "raised (as he says) by the crafty, swallowed by the credulous, and terrible only to the ignorant;" and to each of them a number of answers. In this account of his work we shall state his objections, and give the most striking of his answers to each.

"Objection 1. How shall the merchants and manufacturers of Great Britain recover their property out of the hands of the Americans, or sue for their debts, in case of a separation?"

"Answer 3. In case of a total separation, each colony or province will then become independent, and a jealous rival, of its neighbour. No common cause or common interest will unite them together: and the fears and jealousies of trade will more effectually operate in such case, to ensure their honesty and punctual dealings, than the better principles of conscience and religion. In short, each independent state will then be an independent rival shop: and that shopkeeper, who will use his customers best, will infallibly get the most custom."

"Objection 2. How shall we prevent the West India islands from falling under the power of the growing empire of America, in case of a separation?"

"Answer 4. Suppose, against all probability, that the North-Americans not only took possession of these islands, but also kept them, and cultivated, or rather permitted, and encouraged their new subjects, the original proprietors or planters to cultivate them, and to raise sugars, and every other West-India produce;—what would be the consequence?—Nothing but this, that the British merchants would in that case buy sugars, rum, ginger, cotton, &c. &c. just as they now buy wines, fruit, oils, coffee, chocolate, &c. &c.; that is, at the best and cheapest market.

And it is a fact well known in the commercial world, that were we permitted to enjoy the like liberty at present, we might purchase sugars and rum almost cent. per cent. cheaper than we now do, by being confined to the market of our sugar planters. Moreover in that case, we should probably be obliged through necessity to do that justice, and to make that restitution, to a great part of our fellow creatures, which we ought to have done long ago, by choice, and through a principle of mere humanity,—to say nothing of higher motives:—That is, we should teach the much injured natives of Africa, which might easily be done, and at a small expence, to cultivate their own luxuriant and spontaneous sugar canes, and to manufacture sugars, and several other commodities, and more especially rice and indigo, in their own native country; who would then exchange such produce for our European goods and manufactures:—Instead of this, we make slaves of these poor wretches, contrary to every principle, not only of humanity and justice, but also of national profit and advantage; as I have often proved in several of my writings both commercial and theological:—We, I say, the boasted patrons of liberty, and the professed advocates for the natural rights of mankind, engage deeper in this murderous inhuman traffic than any nation whatever:—And to shew our consistence, we glory in it!"

"Objection 3. How shall we prevent the North-Americans from becoming a formidable maritime power in case of a separation?"

"Answer 1. We may always prevent, if we please, any one of these states from swallowing up the rest:—In the execution of which we shall be sure of obtaining the assistance and good-will, and the execration, of the neighbouring rival states. And this circumstance alone will prevent their becoming a formidable naval power."

"Objection 4. Will not the present war, now carried on with so much rancour and animosity, prevent the English and the Americans from trading with each other in case of separation?"

"Answer 1. If there be any force in this objection, the sooner a separation shall take place, the better; for nothing short of this can be a radical cure. Suppose for instance, that the British legislature had yielded to the late demands of the American congress, before they openly declared for absolute independence: that is, suppose they had granted, that the Americans should always enjoy the rights, privileges, and protection of Englishmen, without being obliged to contribute a farthing farthing towards the general expence:—In that case the whole British nation would have been highly and justly incensed against the authors of such an infamous concession,—a concession, which would in fact have made America the sovereign, and Great-Britain the subject and tributary state. And then even the mock-patriots themselves would have changed their notes, would have exclaimed against wicked ministers for betraying their country to the ungrateful, rebel Americans, and have clamoured for impeachments.

“Granting on the other hand, that the Americans submitted to pay those quotas which the British parliament should require for the general defence of the empire;—still this would be only a pretended submission, which would last no longer than while the rod hung over them. For as soon as ever an opportunity should offer, they would immediately revolt; and then we should have the same work to do over again, with greater difficulties, and increased expences. Indeed the famous American Pamphlet, called Common Sense, hath put this whole matter in so strong a light, that more need not be said on the subject. Therefore in this single assertion, though in few others, I entirely agree with the authors, [supposed to be Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams] it is time to part. Nay, every man of every denomination is so thoroughly convinced, that the colonies will and must become independent one time or other, that the only point to be decided is,—at which time, or at what juncture, can such a separation be made with the most benefit, or, if you please, with the least detriment to the mother country? And the answer to this enquiry is very obvious,—No time like the time present.

“Answer 2. It is now become evident, that it ever was, and ever will be impossible for the parent-state to prevent colonies from trading with other countries, if there is a prospect of trading to advantage. As a signal proof of this, view the present state of things:—We have now the whole force of the British empire collected together:—We have also as much assistance as our money can procure from foreign powers:—all our men of war, frigates, and tenders; and most of our transport ships are completely armed: all of them are stationed on the coasts of America, in order to prevent the Colonists from carrying on any trade of any sort to our detriment. And yet we feel, to our cost, that all is not sufficient to prevent them from trading almost wherever they please. How then shall we be able to restrain their commerce and navigation, when this great and formidable armament shall be removed? (as removed it must be in times of peace) and when there will not be much more than half a dozen frigates (or say, if you please a dozen) to guard a sea-coast of nearly 1500 miles? Moreover, it may be asked in regard to those very frigates, quis custodes custodiet ipsos?”

“Answer 4. It hath been found by experience long ago, that after a separation, even the bitterest and most rancorous animosities are soon forgot. No sooner had the Dutch and Spaniards separated peaceably from each other, than they became mutual good customers, frequenting each other's ports in the most friendly manner, and carrying on a great trade to reciprocal advantage. Nay, in a few years afterwards, they entered into a league offensive and defensive against the French, their common enemy, and have remained very good friends ever since.”

“Objection 5. If we should lose the northern colonies, where shall we get pitch and tar, masts and naval stores for our navy?”

“Answer 1. To what market will the northern colonies send their pitch and tar, their masts and naval stores, if they should refuse to sell them to the English? Some questions are best answered by their opposites: and it is a fact, that were we to withdraw our bounties, it would be an exceeding difficult matter for the colonies to find any vent at all for these articles.”

“Answer 2. The French, Dutch, and Spaniards have ships, which carry masts, and require pitch and tar, hemp, iron, and cordage as well as English ships. And happily for them, they have no northern colonies. Yet these nations are supplied with all these articles at a moderate price, and without bounties. What therefore should prevent the English from being supplied from the same source, and on as good terms?”

“Objection 6. In case of a separation, where shall we get pipe-staves, and other lumber for our West-India islands? and above all, where shall we get provisions?”

“Answer 1. Where, or from whence do the French and Spaniards, Dutch and Danes procure provisions, pipe-staves, and lumber for their respective West-India settlements? The answer to this question will serve for both. Now it is a fact too notorious to be denied, that the North-Americans never ceased supplying the French and Spaniards, not only with provisions and lumber, but with every other article whatever, for which there was a probability of being paid: I say, they supplied them even in times of war, as well as in times of peace: though indeed at both junctures they acted illegally, illegally, and were liable to confiscations and various other penalties for so doing. But what are laws, penalties, and confiscations to an American, when put into the scale against present gain? Even Hancock himself, the nominal head of the congress, and the tool of artful Adams, was one of the greatest smugglers on the whole continent. Tell me therefore, why the North-Americans, after a peaceable separation, will refuse to supply our sugar islands (whilst they supply others) if they shall be as well, or better paid for what they bring? And tell me also, when did they supply them with any one article whatever, without being well paid for it?"

(To be concluded in the Appendix.)

The English Theatre.

DURING the course of this month, the chief dramatic topics of conversation have been, Mr. Foote's disposal of his patent of the Theatre Royal, in the Haymarket, to Mr. Colman. The terms are said to be, the payment of the sum of 1600*l.* to Mr. Foote each season; for which Mr. Colman is not only to have the use of the wardrobe, &c. but also be allowed to perform all Mr. Foote's pieces that remain unprinted. We are likewise informed that Mr. Colman will bring on some new dramatic productions of his own, which he has prepared for the stage: to which end he has already engaged Messrs. Moody, Parsons, Dodd, Bannister, and Baddeley; with Mrs. Wroughten, Mrs. Baddeley, and Mrs. Davies.

The second subject of theatrical conversation has been the dispute between Mrs. Yates and the managers of Drury-Lane theatre. The cause of this altercation was her being announced in the bills, to play the part of Lady Townly; to which she would not acquiesce, on account of not having four and twenty hours notice, as she could not prepare an elegant dress in less time: therefore Miss Young was obliged to supply her place.

Monday, November the 11th, the following letter appeared in the public papers.

"To the unmerited abuse of me in the public papers, of which I have lately had more than my share, I am perfectly indifferent; but the unprecedented manner in which the managers were pleased to account to the audience for my not appearing on Tuesday evening last, and the malevolent turn given to the whole affair in the Morning Chronicle of Wednesday, call upon me to state the transaction to that generous public, to whose indulgence I have the greatest obligations; whom it ever has, and ever will be my study to please, and to whose candour I am not afraid to appeal.

Some time since I was sent to, by one of the managers to play Statira; to which, though not my part, I readily consented. It was accordingly rehearsed on Monday last, November 4, and announced in the bills and public prints for Tuesday. I prepared for it accordingly; but on Tuesday morning, at nine, to my great astonishment, I received a letter from the prompter, informing me the play was changed, and that I was to play Lady Townly that evening.

As this was the only character in my whole cast of parts, for which I solemnly declare I was unprepared, having had no rehearsal, nor any dress in which I could possibly appear (a circumstance known to Mr. Sheridan, who had consented I should wait for one I had bespoke) I was under the disagreeable necessity of declining the part that evening; but offered to play the character, for which I had been announced, and in which I was ready.

As it is my first wish, while I have the honour to appear before the public, to do all in my power to merit their approbation, I took care to have it stipulated in my articles, that I should always have twenty-four hours notice of the character the managers wished I should appear in. I insured myself this little notice, in order to have time to think on the part I was to play; and hoped in some sort to be the better enabled to justify the partiality that public has honoured me with. I hoped too that by this precaution I had cut off one source of that sort of bickering and misunderstanding, which too often interrupt the business of the theatres, and engage the attention of the town, very little to the credit or advantage either of the managers or players: the present case shews the propriety of my having this article of twenty-four hours notice, and which, if it had been observed as it ought, would have saved me the mortification of this appeal to the candour of the public from the injustice of the managers.

With great deference, I hope I may say, that if the managers did not choose to qualify my absence on the 5th of November, with any of the usual excuses for absences, they were at least bound to have stated plainly the reason I had by letter alledged, for not appearing that night.

When I had given them reasons, they were in justice bound to offer those reasons; and leave the town to judge of their validity.

The unkind manner in which they announced my absence, insinuated, that without

without rhyme or reason, I had refused to appear; which would have been reprehensible, but which I may say is not the fact, and therefore I hope that I, who have done nothing but what an article, which this very dispute evinces the propriety of, justifies me in, — shall not incur the displeasure of that respectable public, by whom it is the highest honour of my life to be received with so much partiality.

My only object in this address, is to justify myself; I do not wish to recriminate; — I hope those who have so hastily accused me, will see the injustice and impropriety of the charge they imputed to me.

I have cleared myself to the town, and I am satisfied.

I must however say, that the very unfriendly insinuation of Mr. Yates not playing as often as he ought, is totally groundless. He has even intimated his readiness to do more than he has been called on to do, and even given it as his advice, that plays in which he has had the good fortune not to displease, should be brought on; but it is not enough to accuse me, the managers take offence against Mrs. Yates, and the public therefore is to be incensed against Mr. Yates.

I trust, that when the managers are kind enough to do us justice, it will appear, that we have neither of us ever declined to take our share, as far as lay in us, to forward the satisfaction of the public, and the benefit of the managers.

This being the real state of the transaction, I think the managers owed me the justice of such an apology, as might have exculpated me in the opinion of the public.

I am, Sir,

Your very humble Servant,
M. A. YATES.

The following Letter, which I sent to Mr. Sheridan on Tuesday afternoon, will best explain this affair.

To R. B. SHERIDAN, Esq.
S I R,

After the incivility I received from your prompter this morning, in putting up my name without my knowledge, and contrary both to the usage of the theatre and articles, for a part in which I was not ready, having had no rehearsal, and having mentioned to yourself I waited for a dress which I had bespoke (and which you approved my waiting for); I expected from you, as a gentleman, a letter of apology for his ill-behaviour, instead of a second letter from him in a more extraordinary style than the first.

December, 1776.

To him, I will not reply; to you, I shall state the real situation of this affair.

I with the greatest readiness took the part of Statira for this night, though not mine; and am still ready to play it; but it is not in my power to play Lady Townley, because I have no dress in which it is possible I can appear: and your prompter took care I should not have one, by not giving me the accustomed notice.

But had I a dress, I am not sufficiently perfect to play without a rehearsal; and the only one called, was the morning after I had played Medea, when it was highly improbable I should be able to come out; and when, as all my family knows, I actually kept my bed the whole day.

I repeat, and am ready to play the part in which I was first announced to the public; but that it is utterly impossible for me, for the above reasons, to play Lady Townley.

Your prompter tells me every thing has been done to make my situation agreeable: I have done my utmost to deserve that it should be so; and I did it with pleasure.

I am directed by Mr. Yates to say, that he will be at the house, ready to do his duty.

I am, Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,
M. A. YATES.

November 5, 1776.

Mrs. Yates's Case answered.

Drury-Lane.

Mrs. Yates having given the public her reasons for not playing the part of Lady Townley, in the Provoked Husband, on Tuesday last, in a manner which the managers think, reflects not only on their candour, but justice; — I am ordered by them to state the transaction as far as it came within my office.

The comedy of the Provoked Husband is one of the stock plays, in which Mrs. Yates has for many years played the part of Lady Townley; and I have reason to believe every performer in that play could be ready in their parts at two hours notice. — On Tuesday the 29th of October, after the play of Medea, I heard Mr. Sheridan inform Mr. Yates, that the play of the Provoked Husband was purposed for the Thursday following; Mr. Yates said he would go and inform Mrs. Yates; and soon after Mr. Sheridan having himself spoken to Mrs. Yates desired me to call a rehearsal of the play next morning, for that Mrs. Yates would play the part on Thursday; the play was accordingly rehearsed; when Mrs. Yates sent an excuse that she was not well enough to play the next night.

L I I I I

On

On Tuesday last, the 5th instant, she consented to play the part of Statira, in Alexander the Great; but on Monday night that play was obliged to be changed to the Provoked Husband, of which I was desired by Mr. Sheridan to send Mrs. Yates notice as early as possible the next morning, which I did accordingly; informing her, that the change was obliged to be made too late on the preceding night for me to disturb her: The answer which I received I communicated to Mr. Sheridan by nine o'clock in the morning, and was by him ordered to relate it to Mr. Lacy and the other proprietors who were to meet him that day at the theatre; from whom I received directions to write again to Mrs. Yates and expostulate from them on her refusal, and inform her, that if she continued to refuse to play the part, the real cause of the disappointment would be given to the audience. Mrs. Yates returned a verbal answer, still refusing it. In the mean time Miss Young being applied to, undertook the character, and to provide the dress at six hours warning. Mrs. Yates's letter to Mr. Sheridan, published yesterday, I saw delivered to him a few minutes before the curtain drew up, Mr. Sheridan having put it into my hands immediately after his reading it.

W. HOPKINS.

The managers are extremely concerned to be obliged to obtrude on the patience of the public relative to a theatrical difference;—they are very willing that Mrs. Yates should appear justified, and are ready to believe, that she acted from a misconception of her engagement; but when Mrs. Yates charges the managers with injustice, want of candour, and a positive breach of articles, she compels them to reply. Mrs. Yates says, “If the managers did not choose to qualify my absence on the 5th of November with any of the usual excuses of absence, they were at least bound to have stated plainly the reason I had by letter alledged for not appearing that night.” As it cannot be supposed that Mrs. Yates expected the apology to the public was to be regulated by the letter she sent to Mr. Sheridan, at half an hour past six o'clock,—the managers thus called on, cannot refuse to give the reason which determined what was that evening said to the audience.

TO RICHARD SHERIDAN, Esq;

Tuesday morning, 9 o'clock.

S I R,

“Mrs. Yates has sent a message that she won't play to-night, nor any more; and has sent back the part of Semiramis.”

I am, Sir, &c.

WILL. HOPKINS.”

As nothing after this need be said on the score of the injustice, or untruth of what Mr. Packer delivered to the audience, the managers beg leave to observe, that as they have already declared their intention of with-holding no expence or encouragement to make the stage worthy the patronage of the public, they also think it incumbent on them never to suffer that public to be imposed upon, by permitting causes to be assigned for disappointments, which they do not positively know to be true; or, in Mrs. Yates's words, by qualifying the absence of a performer with any of the usual excuses.

With respect to calling on Mrs. Yates without four and twenty hours notice, contrary to the usage of the theatre, the managers can only say, that on the fullest enquiry, they cannot meet with any person who ever heard of such a usage either under Mr. Garrick, or in any other theatre; and they conceive it impossible to carry on the business on such terms, as the notice of four and twenty hours would not include the time of giving out the play for the succeeding evening, and consequently no play could ever be performed on an exigence, nor without being fixed two days before. As to the more material charge of the managers doing this, in direct violation of an express article, they are sorry to be obliged to remind Mrs. Yates, that this very circumstance is one of the propositions made by her attorney, which have hitherto prevented their agreeing to any articles at all.

The reproach of not having employed Mr. Yates sufficiently, with his advice to get up plays for the purpose in future, needs no comment; as it is obvious that it must ever be the interest of the theatre to represent pieces supported by their principal performers as often as possible; and if any frequenter of the theatre, from hearing that Mr. and Mrs. Yates's income from the stage does not fall short of the sum of 1600*l.* for the season, and from observing that during the time the house has been opened (which is nearly two months) Mrs. Yates has performed but six times, and Mr. Yates five,—should, from these considerations, be induced to believe, that the managers must be interested to prevent their playing, they beg leave to assure him that can never be the case; the fact being, that though a performer should be debarred from appearing for the space of three months, whether by illness, or the delay of a mantua-maker, she would equally continue to receive her salary, without any deduction whatever.

The managers decline saying any thing further on this subject. They can have no

with

wish to impede Mrs. Yates's performing at their theatre; and readily close with her justification, by declaring, that they are far from imputing to her the least intention of behaving disrespectfully to the audience in her hasty resolution of Tuesday last: at the same time, they must repeat their fixed resolution, of never permitting, with their knowledge, the public to be imposed upon in the house they protect and support.

On Saturday November 16th, the tragedy of the Roman Father was performed at Drury-Lane. Previous to the performance Mrs. Yates made a very genteel address to the audience, saying, "She hoped what had appeared in the public prints was a sufficient apology for her not playing the part of Lady Townley; but that it should be, as it ever had been, her incessant study to deserve the patronage of the public." The excuse was received with repeated plaudits from every part of the house; and we may suppose that this altercation being entirely subsided, the town will not be so frequently disappointed as they have been lately in their dramatic entertainments: especially as Mr. Reddish has been obliged to make a proper submission to the audience for a similar transgression.

Drury-Lane.

ON Thursday the 21st. instant, a new Farce called the Hotel, or the Double Valet, written by Thomas Vaughan, Esq; was presented at this Theatre.

The Dramatis Personæ and Fable follow:

Trimwell,	Mr. King,
Sir Jacob Thrift,	Mr. Parsons,
Neville,	Mr. Brereton,
Wentworth,	Mr. Packer,
Sir John Seymour,	Mr. Davies,
Robin,	Mr. Burton,
Irish Coachman,	Mr. Griffith,
Flavia,	Miss Jarratte,
Clarissa,	Miss P. Hopkins,
Tabby,	Mrs. Wrighten.

The author having paid no regard to the unity of the place, the scene is laid in Sir Jacob's house, and at Lowe's Hotel.

Sir Jacob, an old miser, has a daughter (Flavia), whom he has contracted in marriage to a Mr. Montague, who is abroad on his travels: but Flavia has a settled inclination for Sir John Seymour, which she discovers to her father; and as Sir Jacob receives intelligence that Mr. Montague fell in a duel at Rome, he descends to gratify the penchant of his daughter, provided Sir John Seymour will take her without a shilling. At this time Clarissa Montague, sister to the gentleman supposed to have died at Rome, arrives in London, and lodges at Lowe's Hotel. She comes in pursuit of Mr. Neville, her lover, who had just deserted her at Paris, and whom she suspects to be also a suitor of Flavia. The better to carry on her scheme, she appears habited in the dress of a gentleman, and assumes the name and title of her brother. In consequence of which she pays a visit to Sir Jacob, and desires him to discount a note of 100l. Sir Jacob is surprized at the appearance of Montague, and judging Clarissa the real person who was to marry his daughter, he informs the latter, that she must give up all thoughts concerning Sir John Seymour, for she was previously contracted to Montague. In the mean time, Neville, who is likewise lodged at Lowe's Hotel, hires a servant, whose name is Trimwell, who declares, that having the appetites of a gentleman without the fortune, he is forced to hire himself as a valet. Clarissa, or the mock Mr. Montague, meets the same Trimwell, and likewise hires him as her valet, unknown to Neville. This gives birth to several ludicrous mistakes: the first of which is, that Sir John Seymour, being acquainted with Montague's intention, comes to the Hotel to give a challenge to his rival. Accordingly he desires Trimwell to call his master. Trimwell is at a loss to know what master he means, and happens to call down just the wrong person, that is, Mr. Neville. Sir Jacob now has discounted the bill, and brings the cash to the Hotel; but not finding Mr. Montague, he delivers the cash to the valet, who not knowing to whom of his masters the money belongs, makes another mistake, and gives the hundred pounds to Neville, instead of giving them to Montague. Sir Jacob at last meets Montague at the Hotel, and finding that he has not received the cash from the valet, he flies in a very high passion, and says that he will carry Trimwell before a neighbouring magistrate, who owes him money, and therefore he is sure he will hang him for nothing. But on Mr. Neville coming forth, and declaring that he has received the money from Trimwell, the valet's mistake comes to light, and Clarissa is discovered by her lover, which winds up the conclusion.

The business of this little piece turns on a circumstance which is rather improbable; that an English servant should hire himself to two masters at the same time. The improbability of the circumstance is the very thing which occasions surprise in the audience, and helps greatly to support the farce. This being allowed the author, he produces several little incidents and perplexities, which are laughable enough; especially when assisted by the talents of

Mr. King, who acts a very friendly part to the writer, by making it difficult for the public to damn the Farce, without hurting a favourite actor.

On Tuesday the 19th, Congreve's Comedy of the Old Batchelor was revived, with alterations.

This play has been neglected for sixteen years, on account of the obscenity with which it abounds. There is such a lack of wit among the present theatrical Writers, that they have betaken themselves to an avowed piracy on the works of former times. Authors have ever practised plagiarism, but with secrecy and shame. This new business, which we hope Dr. Johnson will christen, and which consists in borrowing whole plays, mutilating, and then exposing them to the public, was reserved for the assurance of modern authors.

We think the Old Bachelor a play unfit for representation before an audience, who would wish to see any thing like decency and honour in the commerce of the sexes. Perhaps the present managers may look further into nature, and the interests of society than we do, and may have reasons we know not of, for discrediting antiquated principles of confidence in the fair-sex; but till those reasons are shewn, we shall think the Old Bachelor is an immoral and mischievous play, not from the licence of particular passages, but from the general effect of the whole on the minds of the audience. This would not be remedied by the alteration of particular passages, which would only have aided a little in the interest of vice.

In the Prologue, which was well written, and well spoken, the best justification which could well be made was offered to the public. It may serve very well for those enervated and sickly beings to whom it was addressed, but will be despised by those who wish to see our public entertainments, not as means of preparing the audience for debauchery, but as means to retard and prevent that licentiousness to which we are so inclined.

In the first representation of this comedy, the character of Vainlove was given to Mr. Reddish, who was so shamefully imperfect, as to be deservedly hissed off the stage, though he told the audience that the managers had not allowed him sufficient time to study the character. It appeared afterwards, however, this excuse was the reverse of the real truth. Mr. Reddish has since addressed the town through a news-paper, and attempted to palliate his negligence by the plea of incapability to study such a character at the short notice given him. Mr. Vernon has played the part with success, and Mr. Reddish remained in his disgrace both with the town and managers; but on making a concession to the audience was re-admitted into favour.

Covent-Garden.

On Thursday the 14th inst. a new Musical piece, called the Seraglio, was performed at this Theatre. The fable and characters are as follow:

Abdallah, a Turkish Bashaw,	Mr. Mattocks.
Frederick, Reef,	Mr. Leoni.
Goodwill, a Fisherman,	Mr. Reinhold.
Venture,	Mr. Dunstall.
Williams,	Mr. Quick.
Hassan,	Mr. Thompson.
Lydia,	Mr. Baker.
Polly,	Miss Brown.
Curtis,	Miss Deyes.
Elmira,	Mrs. Green.
	A Young Lady.

The piece opens with a view of Goodwill's cottage, by the sea-side, near the Seraglio; the family and fishermen are employed in their respective duties. Polly is among them, who has left England in search of her father, who is a slave to the Bashaw, and whom she means to try to redeem by offering herself to captivity in his stead. Frederick then appears, (with the ship's crew) who having had the lady to whom he was betrothed torn from him by violence, and alike condemned to slavery, comes determined to rescue her, or lose his life in the attempt. He dismisses all the crew except Venture, who is to accompany him in his enterprize.—Among the sailors Polly unexpectedly finds Reef, (to whom her father had engaged to marry her) who with the resolution natural to a British tar, resolves to venture into the Seraglio, and redeem Polly's father, even at the expence of his own liberty: Frederick makes the same resolution to get sight of his Lydia. They obtain a means of doing this by a private key, which Goodwill (who supplies the Seraglio with fish) has in his possession.

Abdallah then appears in his pavilion, surrounded by his captives and attendants. He is described of a free and noble disposition; but stricken with his new captive, Lydia, solicits her to return his love, and possess that place in his heart which was once filled by Elmira. Lydia, thro' compassion for Elmira's sufferings, rejects his offer with disdain, and meditates her own escape with her beloved Frederick. The latter endeavouring to accomplish this design by night, is made a prisoner with his attendant, Venture. Reef having discovered these events, escapes from his captivity, and animates his companions to join him in an attempt to redeem them by open violence.

Abdallah being informed of these designs, reproaches Lydia with being accessary to them: she boldly avows her design. The christians are at length brought before Abdallah; who, after having upbraided them for their want of confidence in his honour, bids Hassan convey them to the banks of the Tigris, and so dispose of them as an order, which he gives in writing, shall direct. Hassan is conducting them away, when Reef and his companions rush in to redeem them by force; when, the order being read, it appears that the written directions were to send them to England loaded with riches. The christians were struck with surprize, joy, and gratitude. Abdallah proceeds still further; he gives Polly to Reef, in return for his intention to embrace slavery to redeem the father of her he loved; and with a noble generosity, rewards the faithful affection of Lydia and Frederick, resolving himself to return to Elmira. Thus a general reconciliation and happiness take place.

The above fable will not impress the reader with any high opinion of this piece, which in that is worthy of its author, Mr. Dibdin. The Dialogue and airs are below all criticism; but the music, especially the Overture, deserves commendation. It is said to be the joint production of Dr. Arnold, Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Dibdin.

Mrs. Ward has made her first appearance in the character of Rodogune, in Rowe's Royal Convert, during this month. On her entrance, she acted the part of a young fearful candidate, in such a manner as to give us no great opinion of her talents; for while her bosom was agitated, as if she had been in the agonies of death, her limbs did their office, and her step was firm. She shewed all her powers in the first passage she spoke; which seem to have been employed, perhaps, under the direction of Mr. Sheridan, or some of his disciples in the science of oratory, in the modern insipid art of pro-nun-ci-a-tion. Her figure is good, and her action sometimes tolerable; but her voice has no compass, and her countenance is too stern and masculine.

Opera House.

On Saturday the 2d inst. the theatre opened with a serious opera called Astarto; the music, according to the advertisement, by the most eminent masters, under the direction of Mr. Giardini. The overture was very pleasing, very well performed, and the Orchestra looked assured and happy, conducted by so firm and able a leader as Mr. Giardini. The plot of the opera is simple and affecting, and the dialogue is tolerably sentimental: The music is in general good; but that which received most applause, was the music of two airs set by Rauzzini, and sung with all the advantages of his taste, action, and voice. This performer, however, seems to grow fantastically vain of the public favour, and is not sufficiently guarded and careful in some of his actions. Signora Pozzi (the first woman-singer) received every possible encouragement on her first appearance. She had a little awkwardness in her manner from inexperience; but her youth, her beauty, and her evident desire to please, captivated her generous audience: and though her singing was not comparable to Gabrielli's, she was more applauded, and will be a greater favourite than that haughty Syren, who, while she delighted us by her talents, disgusted us by her behaviour.

Signora Luiggia Farnese is one of the most unanimated Italian singers we have ever seen. She was treated with a civil neglect.

Signor Savoi, Signor Trebbi, are well known. Mons. and Madame Simonet are not superior to our common Ballet-Dancers, and the dances were not in the taste we have been used to at the Opera-House.

The Pantheon

OPENED on Monday the 18th inst. the first subscription concerts for this season. The band was led by Mr. La Motte, whose abilities are well known. The overture was well performed, and was very pleasing. Signor Gabrielli sung the first song with some applause. Mr. de Camp's Concerto on the German Flute was admirably executed. Signor Manzoletto sung three songs which gave universal satisfaction and delight. Signora Agujari exerted her peculiar talents with her usual success; that is, the people gazed and listened with astonishment, at a woman who has no idea of any thing in music but the art of executing difficult passages.

Mr. Crofdill played a Solo on the Violincello with the utmost taste; and Mr. La Motte went through a short Concerto, with the variety of execution for which he is remarkable. The company was very thin, and did not consist of persons of the first fashion.

Edwin and Emma ; or the Twins, a Tale.

They may say what they please, but the Poet's Maxim is uncontrovertible.

"Chance is direction which we cannot see."

Do you demand proof?—It is at the end of my Pen—Take it.

EDWIN and Emma, being at a very early age independent of those domestic ceremonies which make it necessary to weigh love by the ounce, and gold by the pound, tripped arm in arm, to the temple of Hymen, and yielded to the enthusiasm of eighteen. Cupid, Venus, and Juno were equally auspicious: the first inspired reciprocal sweetness, the second bestowed the graces of form, the third crowned their nuptials with as much as could possibly be expected; for, at the end of the first year, the amiable Emma presented him with twins.

What pleasures are the offspring of unabated passion!—what a finishing does the parental give to the conjugal character! Edwin and Emma soon became conscious of the dignity: it shone through the tears, it dimpled in the smiles, it glowed in the blushes of the mother: in the father it was more characteristically conspicuous: one might plainly see the lately-named stripling, gravitate to the family-marr: the fond father was in his looks, his step, manner, and movements; in short, his whole deportment was domestic; every thing declared that he was married and the father of twins.

An embarrassment arose. Emma insisted upon suckling both the children at her own bosom. Edwin opposed it. Their arguments were interesting. I must assert my dear husband, said Emma, all the soft authority both of wife and mother, in order to do my children justice: as nature has not wholly unprovided for the present exigence, both have an equal right, and both must therefore be equally gratified. I must not be denied. Edwin, in opposition urged, the delicacy of her frame, her constitution, the impossibility, the danger, the impropriety! Nothing could satisfy the mother but a permission to indulge herself in the duties annexed to the tender character. Emma's entreaties became at length, so far successful, that Edwin appeared to acquiesce. The beautiful babes were suffered to wanton and cling to the bosom of Emma. Of this, however, the inconvenience soon appeared—the poor Emma became exhausted: and a fever unsettled her senses. During her delirium, Edwin, alarmed for his wife's safety, withdrew one of the children, and entrusted it privately to the care of a nurse. Emma recovered and called for the child, which Edwin pretended was dead and buried; thinking this the only stratagem that could reconcile her to its departure. Emma was a christian, and bore a separation occasioned by its death, much better than she had before borne the idea of parting with it while living. All her hopes were now drawn to a closer point: they all concentrated in the child that survived. The lenitives of time restored to Emma her health and serenity, and Edward (so was her darling called) prospered under her sollicitude. But alas! Edward was, by Emma considered as the only son, for whom fondness commonly runs into extravagance: the consequence of such excessive love and luxury is always a spoiled child. James, mean time (who had been weaned from the breast of his mother, and transplanted to the bosom of a foster-parent, as Edwin allowed him privately, all that could enervate) would have been spoiled too, but destiny prevented it. The woman who had him in charge, was detected in some idle practices with a tribe of itinerant Egyptians, such for instance, as assisting them in furnishing anecdotes to impose upon families by fortune-telling, &c. She grew enamoured of the oracular impostors, and soon joined the sable banditti; she bore away young James in her arms. The grief and surprise of this misfortune so affected Edwin, that he discovered the whole affair to Emma, who, unable to support the intelligence, fainted away. Upon recollecting her spirits, she said, Well, my Edwin, I forgive your deception, because I see its motive, but the very best deception, you see, is bad. I have lost a child by it. Edwin, without making any reply sallied with an air of impatience into the street. It was the third day of the robbery. He could not prevail upon himself to disclose the theft sooner to Emma. Edwin followed the road that was most beaten. 'Twas in the middle of the summer, at an opening in the hedges he observed a circle of women assembled in the next enclosure, under the shade of an oak. He hastened toward the spot, and perceiving an infant in the arms of a female, who was staining its silken skin with the tincture of certain berries, he ran with a father's speed, caught it away from her who held it, and, with equal celerity, carried it home, without giving himself time to examine a feature. Emma preparing to receive her babe restored, shrunk back. It was not James. Astonishment and despair struggled in the countenance of Edwin. He compared the child with the lovely twin, which at that moment was sleeping in the cradle. There was no trace of similitude. Humanity however, pleaded in behalf of the little stranger, who undoubtedly had been a theft likewise. In vain did Edwin search after his own child, or a father for the foundling. He returned to the oak: the company were dispersed. The gentle-hearted Emma adopted it; she fed it out of the same cup, dressed it in similar robes, and rocked it in the same cradle with her Edward. But the foundling was a female, and they named her Rurilla, because they had taken her from the field. As it increased in age, it improved in beauty, and was suffered to assume the name of daughter. Edward and Rurilla were inseparable playmates, and they continued to occupy the same bed, and to learn the same books, till, on account of the difference of their sex, it was judged proper to part them. By this time the beauty of Rurilla, and the elegance of Edward were matters of conversation in the neighbourhood, and the little bosoms of their companions began to flutter in favour of each: their own bosoms, mean time, fluttering in favour of one another. Thus, hand in hand, they trod together the gay paths of youth till the age of fourteen without interruption, about which time Edward fell sick; Rurilla acted the nurse, with ten times more than a nurse's officiousness. He was at the point of death: a person came at this crisis to Edwin's house, hastily demanding an audience—he was admitted. The stranger was at the foot of Edwin in a moment, and spoke thus: The woman who stole from you one of the loveliest children upon earth is no more; the child itself is in the last agony: in search of my own child I found him.—He has lived in my heart. He is informed of his birth and sighs to expire in the arms of a father. I have had him—I rescued him from the robber three years ago. Edward who overheard the discourse as he sat in a chair supported by pillows, exclaimed, My brother, my long lost brother dying! I thought so—we are but one—bring him, and let us die, as we were born, together. The person, looking at Edward, said, Gracious God, sure you are he, else never was such a resemblance; but I must perform my duty. He went away. Emma changed colour. Edwin was silent. Edward cried out, that his pangs were now all for his brother. Rurilla pressed her cheek upon Edward's bosom. The stranger returned, with a young man in a litter. It was James—James, in the misery of fraternal sympathy. Edward saw the dear counter-part of himself, and the poor invalid brothers were put into the arms of one another. Sure there was a panacea in their embraces! They revived. The stranger was in the next moment the most pathetic object—He cast his eye upon Rurilla, and dropped lifeless upon the floor—I claim her, I claim her, said he—She is my daughter, my stolen daughter, my heart confesses her; my eye marks her by the very mole that was pointed out to me by a mother's criterion the moment she was born: O, Providence, Providence!—The old man spoke the truth—Rurilla was his daughter, who had been stolen from him about the time of James, and James fell into his hands by an accident equally fortunate and uncommon. Why should I amplify the story? Why should I keep the reader from the voluptuousness of happy events? The twins recovered, to the joy of the parents. Rurilla was found worthy to adorn the arms of the enchanting Edward. The father of Rurilla became one of the family, and Providence, in the end, fully rewarded the fidelity of Edward and Emma. Is a moral required to this tale? Why need I run into that prolix pedantry of pointing it out? Is it not obvious; humanity is rewarded? When you are endeavouring to redress your own grievances, neglect not the opportunity of redressing that of a neighbour. Edwin enquiring for his own child, found it not, but fostered in the bosom of his wife, the child of another: at that very time another father was upon the search, and though equally disappointed, was equally animated by social sensibility.—Enough—Another sentence would explain away the meaning.

The Contented Cottager: A Tale for those who live in better Houses.

A DRASTUS, a man of deep erudition, a profound reading, and a philosophical turn of mind, chose principally to reside in the country, chiefly for the uninterrupted pleasures of contemplation. He was a man not only of learning and property, but of philanthropy, and equally celebrated in his neighbourhood for wisdom and generosity. It happened that one of his tenants, although he rented the smallest farm, and had a very large family depending on its cultivation, was by far the most cheerful, and well disposed. His cottage though small was dressed by the hand of neatness, and frugality with simplicity were ever the guardians that attended this happy family. All situations and all seasons, from the beginning of spring to the end of winter, were rendered delightful by the happy bias of his constitution, which enabled him to turn all events to his advantage. In sorrow he was humiliated, and in prosperity he was grateful. He had lived as tenant of that very farm when the father of Adrastus first took possession of the estate, of which it was a part; nor had he ever made a failure in the payment of his rent, nor ever had a quarrel in the parish. His toil was sweetened and alleviated by the pleasing thoughts of providing for his offspring; and this constant employment not only inspired him with health, but did not allow him leisure to indulge the whimsical wants of imagination, at the same time that it protected him from all improper, impertinent, or vicious passions. He had in his time put many estranged hands together — reconciled many petty, peevish differences — settled many family breaches — suggested while he was church-warden many a little scheme for the benefit of the poor — and never felt one emotion of envy at surveying the possessions of the rich.

These unassuming, though solid virtues, gained him such a reputation in the country wherein he resided, that he obtained, as it were proverbially, the appellation of the ‘Contented Cottager.’ He was in truth, “Passing rich with forty pounds a year.”

An account of him was transmitted to Adrastus, who went to pay him a visit, in order to see how true report had characterized him; for, though Adrastus lived and did much good in the country, yet his abstracted philosophical and sedentary situation made him personally but little acquainted with even his own tenants, who were generally turned over to the steward for the conversation and business of quarter-day.

A man of the Contented Cottager’s disposition, however, was too important an object not to excite the curiosity of a philosopher; and accordingly he set apart one afternoon, or rather evening, on purpose for this entertainment. Adrastus arrived at the farmer’s about half an hour after sun-set; when “Twilight grey had in her sober livery all things clad.” The farmer, whose name was Matthew Mendland, was sitting at the door of his little cottage smoking his pipe, and surrounded by his children; his wife was leaning over the fire, preparing a decent and wholesome supper. The farmer knew his landlord personally, and rose as to his superior, offering him the best seat in his homely cottage.

“Here your honour finds me (said the farmer) in a small but happy place. I have been upon your ground these many days; and if you think good to renew my lease, which expires at Michaelmas, I shall most likely end my life in your service. If your honour likes me, I like you. Your dues are always ready to the hour; and I have no more reason to complain of my landlord, than he has of his tenant. And so —.” Adrastus interrupted him, by desiring to see the lease, and to have a pen and ink, for the purpose of renewing it upon the spot. “As to pen and ink, sir, (replied the farmer,) I have no use for them, and so I never keep any by me; I never write, and I can’t read, and so such things are of no service. But if your honour wants to write, I can easily send to the shop for paper and ink, and I can easily send one of my boys to the green to pick up a quill; or if your honour is in a hurry, Tom shall borrow a feather from the old gander, who is, I see, just waddling to his bed.” “It don’t signify at present, farmer (said Adrastus); I’ll sign it another time. — But don’t you really know any thing about books? I actually thought you was a scholar; that you had employed all your spare time in study — that you gathered your notions of economy, industry, and paternal propriety from historic examples, or traditionary annals.” “No, really, sir, not I (said the farmer); I am a very illiterate man, and no scholar at all. My father could not afford to give me an education, and I have had neither time nor opportunity since. Nature and the use of my eyes have been my only instructors; and if I have been able to live reputably to the age of threescore, and even to rear up my children soberly, cleanly, and virtuously, I owe it merely to them. Indeed, to say the truth, my business as a farmer, threw in my way a thousand instructive objects. My yard is stocked with improvement. At the end of that small slip of a garden I have a bit of a beehive, filled with little industrious animals, who tell me, what a shame it would be to lead the life of a drone: my maxim upon this is, sir, that he who don’t make some honey, ought to eat none, and so this made me indefatigable to earn my meal before I sat down to it. Nay, in this part of my duty I am farther instructed by the little creatures who inhabit the molehill. Is it possible for a man to see the poor things hard at work for the day of necessity, and not take the hint, and lay up a modicum for his own family? I have rested upon my spade, sir, on purpose to look at their labours; and then I have gone to work again, lest they should have the sense to chide me, for minding other people’s business more than my own. I have an old house-dog, your honour — here, honesty! honesty! where are you, honesty! — Yes, sir, that aged animal has kept my cloaths by day, and my cottage by night, till he has not got a tooth in his head; and he does for me, what I would do for one Thomas Trusty, whom I have loved since

I was a brat no higher than my hand: he once did me a piece of service when it was most wanted, and while I have breath I shall never forget it: he, sir, who has no gratitude, has no nature in him; and an unnatural man is better dead than alive, because when a person does no good to his neighbour, he has no business here. We are all born to do something, and he who does a kindness deserves to be well remembered for it. With regard to my duty as a husband, I learn that from the very pigeons that coo and court around my dove-house: to this dear old dame I have been lawfully married forty six years, and I can't think what our great folks are about; I find such a pleasure in my constancy, that I am sure I could not receive from inconstancy; and the smiles of a good woman are a rich reward. With regard to the love I bear to these little ones, I am taught the duty which, as a father, I owe to them, by every living thing around me; the wren that builds her nest under my hovel, the very hog that litters in my sight, and the mare that foals in my pastures, teach me to be affectionate to their persons, and anxious for the preservation of my own offspring; and in this manner I have learned my lesson of wisdom and worship, truth and tenderness from the beasts of my fields, and the birds of the air."

Here the good man paused, and directed his eldest daughter to draw some of his best harvest-home beer. Adrastus was astonished at his simplicity of manner, and at the soundness of his sense, as well as at the propriety of his remarks. "Farmer, (said he) you have distressed me, as well as delighted me. I came prepared to offer you assistance, and you have left me nothing to bestow. I have nothing that you have not, but a greater proportion of money, and you are so truly contented as you are, that any additions would, perhaps, disconcert the œconomy of your plan. You are a happy Farmer, and a natural Philosopher, without the use either of large systematic folios, or the toils of a sedentary life. Give me, however, the lease, that I may put it in my pocket; I will tear the lease and——"

"How! your Honour, (said the poor alarmed Farmer) tear my Lease instead of renewing it! Has then my freedom or my happiness offended you?"—"Yes, Mr. Mendland, (replied Adrastus) I will tear the Lease, because you have no farther use for it. The little spot of ground you have so long enriched by your care, shall henceforth be a Patrimony to your inheritance; you are the proprietor of it from this day. Call on me to-morrow morning, and the writings of surrender shall be made for you; for the time to come, I must be considered, not as your Landlord, but your Friend. Let me often see you at my table, and in my garden. In short, as frequently as the business of your family will permit, let me get that wisdom and understanding, which surpasseth mere mechanical science, in the society of the Contented Cottager." The Farmer would have dropt upon his knee; but Adrastus prevented him, saying, "Rise, Mr. Mendland, the obligation is on my side: I have been obliged. In exchange for a few acres, for which I have no occasion, you have given me a sett of Maxims and Sentiments that are as the purified thrice-refined gold of Ophir, and shall never depart from me." From this moment Adrastus and the farmer were intimate companions. Oh ye landlords and tenants, "Go ye, and do likewise!"
December, 1776.

Comedian.*

MR. Shuter cannot boast of any great descent, as it is generally believed that his father was a chairman, and plied in the purlieus of Covent-Garden. It cannot, therefore, be imagined that his education was of that kind as to entitle him to move in any elevated sphere in life. It is, indeed, asserted that when he was of a proper age, instead of being sent to school for improvement, he was hired as an ale-house boy to fetch in pots, and such other low vocations. But this circumstance seems doubtful, as we find him, when very young, put apprentice to Mr. Chapman, the actor, who employed him as a marker at his billiard tables, which were kept in Bow-street. Nevertheless, Mr. Chapman put him to school, and finding in him a rising genius for the stage, had him taught to dance under Mons. D'Esfrades, who then belonged to Covent Garden Theatre.—What proficiency he made in his studies, we will not pretend to say; but upon the death of Mr. Chapman, Mr. Macklin took him, and from him Shuter received very considerable instruction, to form the actor. When he had attained the age of maturity he applied to the late Mr. Rich, then patentee of Covent-Garden Theatre, who discovering in him many traits of dramatic humour, engaged him at a low rate; but soon becoming the favourite of the town in his peculiar walk, in which no one has ever equalled him, his salary was greatly increased, and he became an actor of consequence. From this period his company was incessantly sought for by the choice spirits of the age, and having himself a natural turn for mirth and pleasantry, he often yielded to their intreaties, whose vigils often interrupted that time which he should have devoted to theatrical study. Hence it was that he became frequently very erroneous in his part, which induced him so often to supply it by some extempore stroke of humour, which tho' it gained him the applause of the galleries, brought upon him the censure of the judicious, and he repeatedly received severe reprimands in the papers upon this account. But as Shuter seemed only to aim at popularity and characteristic humour, without being the chaste actor, these censures had little or no effect, and instead of losing any part of his reputation from these defects, he seemed daily to gain upon the approbation of the town, and at length in Justice Midas gained the summit of his excellence.

We now see Shuter the peculiar favourite of the town, with a salary of twelve pounds a week, and certain of a crowded and overflowing benefit. With such an income we should imagine, that he might not only have lived in a very genteel manner, but in a few years secured an easy independency. It must be owned that for some time he was tolerably frugal, and had laid by a sum amounting to a few hundreds, which he had placed in the funds. But unfortunately an itch for play prevailed, and several successive runs of ill-luck compelled him to sell out. Add to this an unlucky connection with Nancy Dawson, plunged him into deeper distress, and even obliged him to create debts which greatly embarrassed him.—He was now an incessant dupe to those leeches of society called bailiffs, who had him as their constant customer; and their douceurs alone for what is called civility money, would have ruined almost any other actor upon the stage. Add to this that Miss Dawson's cravings were not small; her avarice was unlimited, and one of her greatest boasts was having ruined a number of generous fellows.

The following anecdote may be depended upon: Shuter and Nancy went out upon a party of pleasure with a third person, in the Easter-holidays. The fore part of the day passed with great pleasantry and good humour—the fineness of the day, and the excellence of the cheer, did not a little contribute towards their cheerfulness. However, after dinner, the glass circulating pretty freely, to which Nancy had not the least aversion, the Champaign began to operate, and as she was very quarrelsome in her cups, she abused Ned in the grossest manner; he retaliated upon her with his usual humour and repartee, when being at coffee, she was so irritated that she could not put him out of temper, that she poured a whole pot of scalding coffee upon his legs: Shuter had the day before broke one of his shins, which rendered his torture so great, that in the violence of his rage, he knocked her down; she screamed out, and presently a party of holiday folks broke in from the next room, and seeing Nancy lying sprawling upon the floor, with the blood issuing from her nose and mouth, they were going to throw Shuter out of the window, which was two pair of stairs high, for his unmanly behaviour to a woman. But being informed of the real state of the case from Ned's friend, they changed sides, damned her, and left the room,—Shuter and his friend went to town without her, and it was some days before a reconciliation took place: but his infatuation was so great for this woman, that he could not withstand a tender billet from her, in which she acknowledged her fault. Jealousy, however, performed what the greatest ill treatment could not effect: he had for some time suspected one Mr. I-l-nd, a limner by profession, to be too much in Nancy's good graces, and having positive proof of her infidelity, he had the fortitude to leave her entirely to his rival.

His affairs daily grew worse, and his creditors more clamorous: notwithstanding, he could not resist the charms of Poll K——y, * who lived in Ruffel-street, Bloomsbury. This might be stiled, according to the vulgar phrase, “being out of the frying pan into the fire.” Poll was famous for fleecing her gallants to the utmost, and not only to glean all she could for herself, but put them to the utmost expence in her power; which the Buffalo's Head, in Bloomsbury square, can testify, where they passed many vigils, to the no small detriment of poor Ned's finances, whilst Poll laughed in her sleeve at him for his folly, calling him her best cake †.

In such a hopeful situation, and with such a connection, our readers must imagine that Ned's ruin was inevitable.—He too late saw his impending fate, which drove him almost to despair, and the only relief left him was the bottle. It was his misfortune when inebriate to be almost deprived of reason, which led him into many situations, that otherwise he would never have been found in.

Hence we may in a great measure account for his very eccentric pursuits amongst the lowest company, even in St. Giles's, where he has been known more than once to treat a dozen or more of the rabble with drams and strong beer. His sober excuse for such absurdities was that in his dramatic walk it was necessary that he should know life from the prince to the beggar, in order to represent either from nature, as occasion might require. How far this will be admitted as an excuse we leave the reader to determine.

His extravagance and dissipation having greatly involved him in debt, he found himself under the necessity, to avoid a prison, of appropriating the greater part of his salary for the use of his creditors. The consequence of which was, that not having a sufficiency to live as he formerly had done, he created fresh debts, which induced him to take the benefit of the act of insolvency preceding the last.

It might be imagined that now being clear of the world, and in full possession of his salary, he would have had no occasion to call in Bacchus to aid his spirits and drive away melancholy. But he had ere now contracted such a habit of drinking, that he could not shake it off. His best friends must acknowledge that he frequently made his appearance at the theatre in a state of intoxication, when he was to perform some capital part; the consequence was the rest of the performers were confounded, and the audience went away greatly displeased. The managers remonstrated, and he parried the remonstrance with some stroke of humour. At length, however, the summer before last being at Liverpool engaged with the company there, he was seized with a violent complaint, which disqualified him from playing any more that season.

Upon his return to town he was still engaged at Covent Garden theatre at his usual salary; but his abilities were so greatly impaired, that the managers were compelled to engage Mr. Wilson, who had performed with applause at the theatre in the Hay-Market, to fill Mr. Shuter's parts. This circumstance greatly chagrined him, as he acknowledged to some of his intimate acquaintance, and probably drove him to greater irregularities than he would otherwise have been guilty of. He now frequently appeared behind the scenes in a state of complete inebriation, or rather insensibility, in despite of all his friends could say to dissuade him from it. He was accordingly laid upon the shelf for the remainder of the season. The managers, nevertheless, generously granted him a benefit, which proved a very advantageous one.

As he found there was little probability of his being reinstated in Covent-Garden theatre, he was resolved to make the most of the remains of his faculties, and engaged at the little theatre at China Hall, Rotherhithe, where he performed several nights, when his name brought many good houses.

At the close of Mr. Foote's season, this last summer, he performed at a stipulated price for the benefit of several of the performers. A benefit under his name, tho' it was in fact that of another actor, brought a prodigious house.—This was the last time of his appearing upon any stage, when he too clearly evinced that all his scenic abilities had subsided, and that nothing but the mere caput mortuum of himself remained.

A very short time after he was seized in a very violent manner; kept his bed for several weeks, and was pronounced past recovery. The managers of Covent Garden theatre behaved upon this occasion with great humanity; allowed him a sufficiency, that he might not any way be in want. But all their assistance was of no avail—he departed this life, Friday, November 1, in the 49th year of his age.

To sum up Shuter's character in a few words, it may be said he was no man's enemy but his own. But an uncommon lust for being thought a humorist and a bon vivant frequently hurried him into such dissipations, as prevented his attending properly to his business. His fondness for play, which may be ascribed to his early initiation at Chapman's, and his extravagant fondness for some of the most artful, Thais's this metropolis ever produced, drained his pocket, and-at length brought him to a jail.—He, however, had some good qualities that should not be overlooked. He was generous, perhaps, to a fault, friendly and charitable. Such was Shuter, one of the greatest comedians this age, or perhaps any other ever produced!

*On the Chin-Cough, alias Hooping-Cough.
By Dr. Cook.*

CHILDREN are often troubled with a convulsive cough called Ferina, as also the Hooping cough, for the singular sound attending it. It generally continues urging a long time, till they discharge, or throw up, by vomiting, a mucous substance out of the stomach, so that it seems to be a stomach cough; then it ceases a while, near half a day, when the coughing fit returns in like manner as before.

That able physician Ettmuller says, "It does proceed from the stomach, as does the asthma also in infants, which is a great difficulty and shortness of breathing." And Waldschmidius observes, "that this kind of cough is almost always from the stomach." "An acid, mucilaginous, and viscid matter, says Doleus, also, is the very cause, as lodged in the stomach, of this violent convulsion, occasioned from a certain infectious salt conveyed by the air and food into their tender stomachs, and conglutinating the lymph there, as it does in the disease called the croup in the wind-pipe, by the stagnation and sharpness of which, the larynx in the last case is affected.

In endeavouring to cure this furious cough, regard is always to be had to the stomach, the proper seat of this disorder; for without emetics it can scarcely ever be cured, but therefrom is easily conquered, as also the aforesaid asthma, and for the same reason. Turnip broth, and spermaceti, are both excellent medicines in these two cases.

Sydenham says bleeding gives relief to infants troubled with a convulsive cough, and far exceeds all pectoral medicines whatever: this I believe, because pectorals prove only clogging to infants, and consequently rather increase than cure such coughs.

It has been cured by bleeding, and repeated purging alone. I have cured it myself by giving to poor people's children five or six grains of gamboge (rubbed very fine first with sugar) more or less according to their different ages, and repeated, if occasion: but gentle cathartics are more proper for some delicate constitutions, and they by spoonfuls till they operate.

Meat and liquid nourishment should be given in less quantities than usual. Cup-moss, so much cried up by Willis, was as much undervalued by Huxham. Whey, fresh from the cheese, makes the best common drink for such cases. The expression of millepedes, from white wine, Cheyne says, infallibly cures the chin-cough. He orders a syrup to be made of it: but with submission to so great a superior, I think the expression is better taken thus: drown half an ounce of live millepedes in half a pint of white wine; let them stand together three or four days, then strain off the wine; squeezing them quite dry, to be bottled up slightly, lest you burst the vessel, for use. A large spoonful or two may be given three or four times a day.

By the bye, I may add here, that this very medicine is excellent for asthmas, jaundice, dropy, and most other chronic diseases. I have cured quickly this violent cough, as I hinted before, with five or six grains of gum gamboge in a bolus of honey in those of ten years of age, which to me is a manifest proof that the chin-cough is a stomach, and not a proper pulmonic one.

To conclude, I shall only add, that the chin-cough, as well as the small pox, never seizes the same person twice; but as for the cause, I cannot account for it: so little are we acquainted with the ultima causa rerum. (The ultimate cause of things.)

The following Letter was sent by one of the People called Quakers, to a Bench of Justices, in reply to a Citation to shew cause why he (the Author) refused the Payment of the Church Rates; it is copied from the Original verbatim & literatim.

Esteemed gentlemen,
YOUR summon respecting my appearing before you, to shew cause for my refusing to pay the several years demands you mentioned came safe to hand, and after taking some thought thereon, I considered, that I should be from home, at the time mentioned for my appearing before you, therefore if you please to give me leave I shall give you my sentiments in writing.

In the first place, I shall signify unto you, that we as a society in general, believe that the true gospel ministry should be performed without recourse to silver or gold, or any weekly, or monthly, or yearly payments, from men for the same; therefore if any minister of our society, was to make such claim on me, for preaching the gospel, I should refuse paying him, believing him to be no minister of Christ, but rather a minister of his own inventions, therefore I conceive, there is but little room to expect that I can be free to pay your ministers, or to support such a ministry, as I disapprove, and for that reason, I don't think it my duty, to support your place of worship; and I conclude if such a change of government was to happen, as I never expect to see, that is if you was to be out of favour, and our society made what is called the established church, and you compelled to pay to the support thereof, in the manner as we are compelled to support yours, I am fully persuaded, that you would think it very disagreeable, notwithstanding the greater plea of law, so much made use of for supporting the cause; and the next I shall observe unto you, is two passages of Scripture respecting the different disposition of ministers, the first being that of Ellys sons, who was not contented with the portion allotted them, chusing to be served in another manner, and if not complied with, threatened to take it by force, but this and other of their irreligious practices, was so displeasing to the Almighty, that he cut them off both in one day; the other is respecting Christ's sending forth his apostles, charging them to provide neither gold nor silver, for their journey, and I don't doubt, but some of them was long ones, such

that would put some people on thinking their might be need enough, for some gould, and silver also, not knowing what might befall them, in visiting an unknown people, but though they was forbid gould and silver, when they returned it was with joy, which seems to imploy, that they wanted nothing, and their farther account was very excellent viz. saying, Lorde, even the divels are subject unto us, through thy name, by which appears, as if they was contented and had discharged their duty, according to their greate Lord's commande, without force or compulchan, and he gives them a caution, that they might not rejoice overmuch in that, but to rejoice that their names was written in heaven, and this must be brave encouragement, and very unlike being cut off in the Lord's anger, and I firmly believe its not knowing of duty, but doing it, that procures the Lords favour, so be it known unto you, that I dont refuse paying the abovementioned demands, to save money only, but to save inward peace and satisfaction of minde, and the continuance of his favour, who is the giver thereof, for was I to comply with such payments, believing them to be rong, I should have but little reason to expect peace and tranquillity of mind but rather codemnation, and sorrow of hart, which concludes from your wellwisher

W. M A N S.

And I shall farther observe, that I can scarce believe that your ministers, are quite in the way of their duty, for want of making use of tender perswasive means, in order to prevail with such they believe to be rong and endeavor to make us fenceable of our errour if they think it such; so that we may be restored to our duty, and enabled, to walk in the way that is well-pleasing unto God.

But nothing convincing hath yet been offered me, but they make use of their greate plee of law, which I conceive caryeth so little wate with it, that it may be supported with a straw.

The above hath been aded since I wrote the other side intended for the justices.

*The Adventures of Miss Sophia Sternheim :
From the German of Mr. Weiland.*

THE following memoirs are sketched from a new work, which has been greatly celebrated abroad. The author in his writings seems to have made Mr. Richardson his model. In all his productions he has evinced himself an able and warm advocate for Virtue; he everywhere exhibits to the reader the amiable-ness, pleasure, and dignity of a virtuous life; and all the ingenious and all the instructive writings he hath published conspire to illustrate this great truth, that Virtue, however oppressed and involved in temporary calamities, appears great and glorious in the midst of them, will providentially emerge from them, and ultimately crown its professor with signal honour and substantial felicity.

P A R T I.

Character of Colonel Sternheim.—Education of Sophia.—Her filial Affection.—Death of her Father.—Her Person described.—She goes to the Court of D.—A Fete Champetre.—A Masquerade.—Sophia's Indisposition.

COLONEL Sternheim was the only son of a professor at W. from whom he received the best education. Goodness of heart, generosity of soul, formed the great outline of his character. At the universality of L. he became acquainted with young Baron P. and entered into so warm a friendship with him, that he not only consented to accompany him in his travels, but the affection he had conceived for him engaged him even in the military service. An unforeseen accident soon after separated them; the Baron, by the death of his elder brother, saw himself obliged to renounce a military capacity, in order to devote himself to the management of his estates. Sternheim remained in the service, in which he obtained the rank of colonel.

On the return of peace, his principal wish was to rejoin his friend, with whom he ever maintained an epistolary correspondence. He had lost his father for some years, therefore repaired to P. in Alsace, to enjoy the calm delights of friendship. He soon after married Miss Sophia P. the sister of his friend, with whom he enjoyed the greatest tranquillity. The Colonel's Lady had brought him a daughter, who grew up according to their most sanguine wishes, and who soon became the only consolation of her father, death having broke those ties which rendered him the happiest of men. His grief was soon augmented by the death of his friend, Baron P. who lost his life by a fall from his horse.

Madam P. mother of the Baron, overwhelmed with grief at the premature death of her son, came to reside with Sternheim, and anxiously watched over his daughter, who had now arrived at her twelfth year.

Miss Sternheim received the best education both in regard to the heart and understanding; and, as she gave intimations of signal abilities and a taste for the Sciences, the Colonel taught her History and Languages. Her progress in Music was extremely rapid. Dancing, of which she learned as much as is proper for a Lady to know, seemed less framed to lend her graces than to receive them from her.

Thus flowed the days of Miss Sophia Sternheim till she attained the age of nineteen, an epoch, in which she had the misfortune of losing the worthiest and tenderest of fathers by a lingering malady. With a heart full of solicitude for a child so dear to him, he recommended her to his wife's brother-in-law, the Count of Loebau, and to the worthy Curate of Sternheim, whom he nominated her Guardians.

When the Colonel was dying, the tender Sophia was unable to shed tears; she fell on her knees at the side of her father's bed, and her attitude and countenance expressed the profoundest grief. The eyes of her father were fixed on her—his hand locked in her's—a deep sigh, followed with pathetical enunciation of, 'My Sophy'!—One of the arms of the young Lady stretched towards Heaven in silence;—but the sight of an afflicted soul, which wings itself to God in secret prayer, was visible in all her features: 'Sophy (said her father) Nature does us no injustice.—Sixty years, the term is not too short. Death is not a calamity to me. It is going to re-unite my spirit to my beloved Creator, and my heart is soon to mingle with the heart of your mother. Do not envy me this felicity, tho' I purchase it at the expense of that joy which the continuation of my life would have afforded you.'

She surmounted part of her sorrows, and attended her father with the greatest serenity and tenderness.

He perceived the efforts she exerted, and intreated her to console his last days, by manifesting by the constancy of her soul the happy fruits of his paternal instructions. She did every thing he required. 'O, said she, thou best of fathers! You have taught me to live, and you now teach me to die! May the Almighty appoint you my Guardian angel to be the intimate witness of all my thoughts and all my actions! I will deport myself in a manner worthy of you!'

When he had fetched his last sigh, a most affecting scene ensued; his house was filled with his tenants all dissolved in tears, his chamber with his domestics kneeling, his daughter at the side of his bed kissing his clay cold hands, sometimes on her knees, sometimes rising up in an agony of despair. How deeply was the remembrance of such a spectacle engraven on the hearts of the beholders? How many useful lessons does a reflecting mind receive at the bed of a dying Christian? The Curate with some difficulty induced her to quit the room.

Sternheim had given orders that every thing should be conducted by night, to spare his daughter the excruciating pangs such a sight as his funeral would occasion. The church, however, was filled with people dressed for the solemnity: Old and young both wept and blessed him, and joined in a fervent supplication to Heaven, that the good they received from the father might be recompensed in the daughter.

A long time afterwards every thing at S. wore the expression of grief; and Sophia had so serious and mournful an air, that the Curate suffered the greatest inquietude concerning it. This redoubled, when he perceived she grew weaker and weaker every day. He recommended Sophia in the strongest terms to the Count and Countess of Loebau, from whom she received a visit before she died.

The Countess wanted to take Sophia with her to her seat; but she excused herself, as it was her intention to pass the year of her mourning in the house of her father. It was there that ties of the strictest friendship were formed between Sophia and Emily, eldest daughter of the Curate, who soon after married the Steward of Sternheim. This marriage, which separated the two friends, gave rise to a literary correspondence between them, which was one of the most agreeable circumstances of their lives; but, before we proceed, it may be thought expedient to present our Reader with the portrait of Sophia.

Her size, which was above mediocrity, was in the exactest proportion; her face was oval and full of expression; she had beautiful hazle eyes, that were refulgent with genius and goodness; a pretty mouth, an exquisite set of teeth; a smooth and even forehead, but rather too large to be the standard of beauty: However, so much agreeableness was diffused over all her features, and her manners were so noble, that, whenever she appeared, she attracted every one's attention, and it was said, a grace resided in every fold of her robe. Such was Sophia, when she was conducted to the Court of D—, in the territories of the Prince of W—, by the Count and his Lady.

But we must not omit a circumstance that preceded her leaving her native seat. She had the portraits of her father and mother painted in enamel, and incircled with diamonds, which she always wore. Two days before her departure, attended by her friend Emily, she went to visit the tomb of her parents; there she took a solemn leave of their beloved ashes, and renewed newed her vows to be inviolably faithful to virtue: At last she untied her bracelets, which were disposed in such a manner, that there was contrived under the painting a little space which was opened by means of a spring. When she had opened it, she filled the space with a portion of earth collected from the tomb, and during this action the tears fell from her cheeks. 'My dearest Sophia, said her friend Emily, for what is this earth?' 'My friend, replied she, what I am doing passed for a virtue among the wisest nations, honouring the ashes of the just: and it was an heart full of sensibility like my own, that in subsequent times invented the worship of relics. This dust, which covers the sacred remains of my parents, is a treasure to me, and, when removing from these abodes, what can I carry with me equally precious to my heart?'

Some days after her uncle came to fetch her, when she took a most affectionate leave of the Curate and his daughter.

She first went to the manor of Loebau, and afterwards to D— with the Countess. It was here the fatal æra commenced, in which the most amiable of women was placed in circumstances so critical that they suddenly subverted the plan of happiness she had formed.

She soon became acquainted with many people at Court, particularly Miss C. Maid of Honour to the Princess of W—, and Lord Seymour, an English Nobleman, with whom she cultivated a friendship.

If we were commissioned to pourtray an image which might exhibit the happy union of an exalted soul, a penetrating mind, and of a heart in which mild Humanity sits enthroned, we should take the person and features of Lord Seymour, in whom might be found the striking original. To say nothing of the sweetness of his voice, the nobleness of his mein, and a certain tincture of melancholy, which deadened a little the sprightliness of his fine eyes.

In the course of his travels, another English Nobleman, the Earl of Derby, had sojourned at the Court of D— some time before Sophia's arrival, and soon enlisted himself among the number of her admirers. He was a young man of an agreeable figure, but of abandoned principles; and had run through all the scenes of dissipation, which our modern men of quality are so liable to fall into.

Lord Seymour had, for some time before he became acquainted with Sophia, professed a particular regard for Miss C. He had not long known Miss Sternheim, before he found a melancholy depressed his spirits. Miss C. was the first who perceived it, and she directly suspended her visits to Miss Sternheim. Sophia soon saw thro' Miss C——'s 'indifference, and guessed the cause; she directly determined never to look at or speak to Seymour again, and resolved to let them see she was above purchasing her own happiness at the price of injustice to another.

Some time after Miss Sternheim had been at D——, the count F. gave a magnificent Fete Champetre at his mansion in the country to all the nobility, who were to appear in village dresses. They were all assembled, and their habits exhibited a splendid demonstration of the superiority that natural graces have over borrowed ornaments. Sophia presented a lively image of rural joy and innocence. Her hair was divided into tresses, and tied up with ribbons to prevent them from descending to the ground. Seymour felt all the power of her charms; but, in consequence of a political compact with her uncle, he took care to conceal his love under the slight veil of the spleen, and the poor nobleman wandered about restless and silent, ever followed by his village maid Miss C. As for Derby, he seized every opportunity to say flattering things to Sophia in English.

The Prince of W—— was perfectly in love with her; his eyes beheld no other object, and he was eternally repeating, 'Does she not dance like an Angel!' Seymour was much hurt at the extravagant expression of his highness.

The ball at length broke up, and every one seemed delighted but the unfortunate Seymour.

Some time after the ball, Derby found means to meet Sophia at a friend's house, where he happened to be left alone with her. He made several affecting speeches, and his physiognomy expressed his dread of having displeased her. 'My lord, said she, looking at him with an air of inquietude, you are the first man that ever spoke to me of love; the first with whom I was ever alone; both the one and the other circumstance distress me, therefore leave me, I beseech you; I shall regard your departure as a proof of the esteem you pretend to have for my character.'

Lord Derby seized one of her hands which he kissed with rapture: 'Adorable girl, celestial maid! said he, I am the first man who talked to you of love. Ah! if I were the first that ever made you feel its power!' On this he left her in the greatest agitation.

About a week afterwards, being the prince's birth day, there was a grand masqued ball given, at which were present all the nobility; the prince intreated leave of the countess of Loebau to use Sophia's dress, that he might have an opportunity of making her a present without hurting her delicacy.

Two days before the ball, a report was spread at court and in town, that the prince gave a set of jewels to Miss Sternheim, and that he himself would wear her colours. Seymour, on learning this, yielded to all the transports of rage and indignation. Derby also had some doubts, and resolved to follow her with more attention than ever.

Nothing could be more enchanting than her entrance into the room; the countess of Loebau appeared first, habited like an old woman, with a lanthorn in her hand and some rolls of music; the count with a flute; and Sophy, with her lute, followed close behind them. They went to place themselves under the prince's box, and, while they were tuning their instruments, the orchestra suspended the music, and the dancing stopt, while Sophy sung an enchanting air.

Seymour in a black domino, leaning against a window, gazed on her with convulsive emotions. The prince, in a Venetian cloak, contemplated her from his box; desire and hope beamed in his eyes: He in transports applauded the strains of the Syren, came down and danced a minuet with her.

The prince's presents, with which she was ornamented, the complaisance of having sung for him, whilst she had known for some time past, that he had loved her; every thing made her to be regarded as his mistress. This opinion was confirmed, when, a quarter of an hour after, the Prince, quitting his first mask, appeared in Sophy's colours. They danced German dances together: He approached her, passed his arms round her, and carried her violently down the whole length of the room; she tried, more than once, to disengage herself from his arms, but at every effort he pressed her closely to his bosom: At length he re-conducted her to her place. Soon after, a white mask approached Sophia: She, all on a sudden, made a frantic gesture, with her right hand against her breast, and stretched out her left toward the white mask. This made its escape in the crowd, and Sophia ran through the room with inconceivable swiftness. Derby followed the white mask to a closet, where it dropt its dress, and discovered to his eyes Seymour in a black domino, who hastened up stairs, disappeared, and left Derby in a strange perplexity concerning his conversation with Sophy. Derby placed his servant John on the watch, who never lost sight of her, followed her, and saw her pass into a room in which were her uncle and aunt.

The moment she entered, she stripped her head of all the diamonds, and flung them to the ground with indignation. Her uncle approached her; she surveyed him with horror, and, in a tone of despair, cried out, 'How have I merited, that you should sacrifice my honour to the prince's detestable passion?'

Her trembling hands untied the string of her mask, and she tore away the lace that adorned her neck. The prince immediately ran to her, attended with count F. and her aunt, while the rest quitted the room. The prince fell at Sophy's feet, and begged her, in the tenderest terms, to explain the cause of her fright: She shed a torrent of tears, and tried to get from him; but he held her, and renewed his intreaties for her forgiveness.

'What signifies this humiliating posture, said she,—does it repair the loss of my reputation?—Oh madam, how cruel you are to your sister's child! (said she to the countess)—O my father, in what hands have you intrusted me!'

An extraordinary tremor seized her, and, though reclined against a chair, she had difficulty to support herself. The prince, with the tenderness of a lover, strove to calm her, and protested to do every thing she wished.

'O! said she, it is not in your power to restore me the repose of my soul, of which you have bereft me:—Aunt, have pity on me, conduct me home!' Her trembling redoubled; the prince was violently alarmed at it, and went himself into the room privately, to give orders for a carriage and his physician.

The countess of Loebau was barbarous enough to reproach Sophia with her conduct. She made no reply, but by the tears which streamed from her eyes uplifted to Heaven.

The prince immediately re-entered with the physician, who, after he had felt her pulse, declared she had a violent fever, which was soon after accompanied with convulsions. The prince recommended her to his care in a manner the most pressing: she gave her hand to the old man, and left the room with tottering steps. The countess staid behind, and wished to begin some conversation about her niece, but the prince obliged her to be silent, and said, in anger, that they had imposed on him, with regard to the character of Sophy: Upon this he withdrew, as the countess did also. The dancing lasted some time after, but not without the masks whispering to each other the whole of this adventure: Almost all blamed the conduct of Sophy: 'one may be virtuous without making all this fuss about their virtue,' said one lady.—'Would not one say that the prince had never loved any woman before?' cried a second.—'One may defend one's honour in a proper manner without taking the public to witness,' repeated a third.

When the ball was ended, the excess of Derby's surprise was not to be expressed on learning, from his emissary, that Seymour had just gone off in a post-chaise and fix, attended by a single servant. He directly flew to Locbau's to learn, if possible, news of Sophy. He found the door open, and slipped into the court, and saw lights in Sophy's apartments; he at length ventured into the servants room, where he heard Sophia's voice, and therefore concluded Seymour was gone alone. He had, soon after, the courage to make a signal to the maid to speak to him. She did not know him; but came out, shut the door after her, and asked him who he wanted?

Derby soon made himself known to her, and intreated her, in the most respectful terms, to inform him how her divine mistress was; and conjured her, on his knees, to give every day intelligence of her health. He told her that he was a witness of the admirable manner in which Miss Sternheim had just supported her character; that he respected and adored her beyond expression; and that he was ready to lay down his life to serve her. After some conversation between them, the girl promised him a second interview the following evening, and he went away in the greatest transports, revolving an hundred projects in his head.

[End of Part I.]

A probable Account of the Quarrel between Spain and Portugal.

IN the course of last year, General Vertis, Governor of Buenos Ayres, repeatedly wrote to the court of Madrid, that the Portuguese daily encroached upon the rights of the Spaniards, and laid violent hands on those who dared to oppose them; but as often as the Spanish minister complained about it to the court of Lisbon, he received for answer, "That it must be some party quarrel among the neighbouring inhabitants, and entirely without the least knowledge of the court." The minister was implicitly satisfied with that answer, and wrote to the general that the two courts were in the best harmony and friendship, and whatever happened between the Spanish and Portuguese subjects in that quarter of the world should be adjusted there, as it did not deserve the particular notice of these courts.

In the month of November 1775, the general sent a very alarming letter to the minister, insisting that the Portuguese, whose forces increased daily, must have some hostile views; upon which the minister complained again to the court of Lisbon, and as the answer did not follow immediately, a reinforcement of three regiments was sent to Buenos Ayres.

In December the Portuguese Ambassador, at Madrid, waited upon the minister there, declaring that his most faithful majesty had not the least hostile intentions, and that dispatches had just been sent to all the chief officers in that quarter, to reprimand them for their past conduct.

The latter end of April the minister received the following intelligence from the above governor:—That on March 17 a Portuguese squadron of 12 ships, commanded by an English officer, attacked, near Las Patos, 5 Spanish vessels, but the wind, (which blew very violently) happened to be in favour of the latter, so that the former were scattered and obliged to retire; however, some hundreds were killed and wounded in the engagement; and that the English officer who had the command, in a fit of despair, threw two English officers (whom he accused of cowardice) over board, and shot himself through the head. This was immediately sent to the court of Lisbon. The answer was, that it might have been done previous to the late orders having been received; but it was without the least knowledge of the court. The court of Madrid, notwithstanding this answer, became suspicious, and orders were given for an armament.

In the beginning of May, the court of Madrid received advice, that, on April 2, 30 Portuguese transports, with 9 regiments, and 300 cannon, commanded by German and English officers, sailed up the river Rio Grande, attacked the fort St. Thecle, which was soon delivered up to them; as were also the forts St. Theresa and Monte Video; general Vertis, in a hurry, went with the garrison of Monte Video, and some artillery, to oppose them, but was defeated; about 400 of his men were killed, and about 100 wounded; and when the dispatches came away, they were marching towards Buenos Ayres.

Upon this alarming intelligence a general armament was ordered throughout Spain, and the matter rests now thus: the court of Lisbon still insists that all this was done without their knowledge; but as the latter two forts, viz. St. Theresa and Monte Video, were not taken before the 27th of April, a time when the above orders ders of the court of Lisbon must have been received, and consequently the officers have acted contrary to the royal order, the court of Madrid insists that these offenders shall be punished with death. And if this be done, the court of Madrid will consider themselves amply satisfied; but if this request is not complied with, the latter will judge that it was done with positive orders from the former court, and consequently they will proceed to an open war, in which they will be assisted by the court of France.

Ceremonies observed at Petersburg, previous to and at the Marriage of the Grand Duke with the Princess of Wurtemburgh Stutgard.

THE Princess of Wurtemburgh Stutgard finished, on Wednesday, Sept. 25, her confession of faith, according to the rites of the Greek church. The ceremony was performed with all possible grandeur. To complete the confession, all the members of the Synod assembled at ten o'clock in the morning, in the Winter palace, with the nobility of the court, the foreign ambassadors, and the persons of the four first classes; at the same time the clergy assembled in the church, and the rest of the audience in the chambres de Parade. A short time after, the Empress, accompanied by the grand Duke and princess, preceded by the whole court, and followed by all the lords and ladies of the first rank, met at the Grand chapel, where her majesty, with the duke and princess, were met and received by the members of the Synod, clothed in their ceremonial habits. The princess received confirmation there from the hands of the Prelate Gabriel, Archbishop of Novogorod and Petersburg, who gave her the name of Maria Fedorowna. Her godmother was the young lady Margaret Alexandrowna, of Duraw, Treasurer to the Convent of the daughters of the nobility of this chapel.

The princess was immediately complimented by the clergy, and afterwards by the empress and the grand duke. The liturgy began next, which was read by the prelate Platoc, Archbishop of Moscow, and Kaluga, assisted by the whole body of the clergy present. At finishing the liturgy, the empress arose, and conducted the princess to the altar for the adoration of the images, after which she received the communion, and divine service was finished with a sermon by Archbishop Blaton, suitable to the occasion. The clergy had afterwards the honour to compliment the empress and grand duke, and kiss their hands. This august assembly returned afterwards in the same order to the palace, where the empress received, in her apartments, compliments of congratulation from the foreign ministers, who also had the honour to kiss hands.

The following day was celebrated, with equal pomp, the espousal of the grand duke, Paul Petrovitz, with the princess Maria Fedorowna. At ten o'clock the members of the Synod, the high clergy, the lords and ladies of the court, with other persons of distinction, with the foreign ministers, met in the Winter palace. The prelate Innocent, and the archbishop of Plesga and Riga, officiated in their pontificals in the grand chapel of the court, where the empress, accompanied by the grand duke and Princess Maria Fedorowna, preceded by the marshals with their staves, and followed by all the lords and ladies, met about eleven o'clock. The empress carried upon her head the small crown, and was habited in her imperial robes. The train of her mantle was supported by five gentlemen of the chamber, and two others supported the mantle of the princess.

Being arrived at the entry of the chapel, they were received by the body of the clergy, clothed in their ceremonials. The empress conducted the grand duke and princess, under a superb canopy, decorated for that purpose in the middle of the church. Afterwards, the archbishop of Novogorod and Petersburg came forwards, and began the nuptial ceremony, according to the rites of the Greek church, and as soon as it was finished, it was proclaimed by a discharge of 51 cannon from the ramparts. Te Deum was then sung, and ended with a discharge of 31 pieces of artillery.

The empress, the grand duke and princess, now duchess of Russia, returned in the same manner to the imperial palace, where this august sovereign, having been first disrobed, received in her apartment the compliments of congratulation from the foreign ministers, who had the honour to kiss her hand. The empress queen dined upon a throne with the grand duke and princess. In the same chamber were 160 covers upon different tables, for the high clergy, the general officers, and the persons of the four first classes. The grand officers of the crown fulfilled their functions near the imperial table, and the health of the empress and princess were drank with a discharge of cannon, and flourish of trumpets and timbrels. During the repast, there was a grand Italian concert, vocal and instrumental. In the evening the court was splendid and brilliant, and balls afterwards in the galleries, at which which the empress, grand duke, and princes attended. During the time of going and returning from chapel the bells were rung, and at night the town was magnificently illuminated, as was also the castle.

The day of marriage being fixed for the 7th, at ten in the morning, the four first classes of the nobility, and the foreign ministers, assembled at the palace, on a signal of five guns being fired from the fortrefs; and soon after eleven the empress, with the great duke and duchefs, proceeded to the chapel, where the marriage ceremony was performed by her imperial majesty's confessor. Prince Orlov held the crown over the head of the great duke, and Monf. Betskey over the head of the great duchefs. After the ceremony a sermon was preached by Platoc, archbishop of Moscow. On account of the length and fatigue of the preceding ceremony, the empress did not receive the compliments of congratulation of the nobility and foreign ministers, as had been intended. Her imperial majesty afterwards dined in public upon the throne, with the great duke and duchefs. Tables were spread in the same saloon for the four first classes of the nobility. In the evening there was a ball at court; and the festivities of the day were concluded by very magnificent illuminations.

Next morning the nobility and foreign ministers had the honour of complimenting their imperial highnesses in their apartments; and in the evening there was a ball at court, and supper for the first four classes and the foreign ministers.

Friendship seldom found: Unparalleled Affection of Brothers.

THERE is nothing more talked of, and less easily found than Friendship; although every person pretends to it, yet not one person in a million possesses this noble passion. Kings are in a manner entirely incapacitated by their station, from being acquainted with it; and we find Hiero of Syracuse, long since complaining that he perceived himself deprived of all mutual friendship, reciprocal society, and familiar conversation, wherein the greatest pleasures of human life consisted; for what real affection can one man shew to another, that is in some measure obliged, whether he will or not, in every word and action, to express to him the greatest respect and courtesy he is master of? The honour that Princes receive from their servants, is rather paid to the majesty they represent, than to themselves; there is too great an inequality and disproportion in their circumstances, for real friendship to have place between them; whatsoever the greater part of their followers say to them is little better than a false gloss, and mere dissimulation. Julian the Emperor, being one day flattered by his courtiers, for administering justice and deciding rightly in a certain affair, "I should very readily grow proud," (said he) if these commendations came from such as durst either accuse or dispraise my faults, if I should commit any."

History furnishes very few examples of real friendship in this exalted station, whether it exists between kindred or otherwise, the affection it produces is always superior to that caused by affinity in blood. Herodotus seems to give an instance to the contrary, in his account of Psammeticus, King of Egypt, who having been defeated and taken prisoner by Cambyfes, King of Persia, and seeing his daughter pass before him, in base and vile apparel, being sent to draw water from a well, he uttered not a word, notwithstanding the complaints of his friends, but held his eyes fixed on the ground; and shortly after beholding his son led to execution, he still preserved the same undaunted courage and resolution, and did not change his countenance, until perceiving a familiar friend of his dragged in chains among the captives, he began to beat his head, and burst forth into extreme sorrow. A person unacquainted with the true workings of nature would at first imagine, that this prince's grief for his friend exceeded that for his children; but his answer to Cambyfes, who asked him how it happened that he so much bewailed the disaster of his friend, and seemed to neglect the misfortunes of his children, shews the contrary. "It is (answered Psammeticus) because tears and complaints are sufficient to express my concern for this last unfortunate spectacle, whereas the two former by much exceeded every human means of testifying my grief."

When unhappy catastrophes make up a part of the history of princes and great personages, who have acted in exalted stations, or are represented in the moving language and well wrought scenes of Tragedians, they do not fail of filling our minds with compassion: but then they affect us only in a transient manner, and pass thro' our imaginations, as incidents in which our fortunes are too humble to be concerned, or which writers invent to display their talents, or at most things more proper to exercise the powers of our minds, than to create new habits to them.

Instead of such exalted passages, it would be of great use to lay before mankind such adventures of persons who are not raised above the common level: This would better prevail upon the ordinary race of men, who are so prepossessed with outward appearances, that they mistake fortune for nature, and believe that nothing can relate to them, that does not happen to such as live and look like themselves.

The ancient poets for want of authentic and real examples of the noble quality of friendship, had recourse to fiction, and told us stories of their Pylades and Orestes; but I shall at present entertain the reader with as great an action of friendship as human nature is capable of performing, and this from an author of unexceptionable * credit, who was himself an eye witness of part of the story.

“ In the beginning of the 16th century, the Portuguese Carrack sailed from Lisbon to Goa, a very rich and flourishing colony of that nation in the East-Indies; there were no less than 1200 souls, mariners, merchants, passengers, priests and friars on board of one of these vessels. The beginning of their voyage was prosperous, they had doubled the extremity of the great continent of Africa, called the Cape of Good Hope, and were shaping their course north-east to the great continent of India, when some gentlemen on board who having studied geography and navigation, (arts that reflect honour on the possessors) found in the latitude in which they were then sailing, a large ridge of rocks laid down in their sea charts. They had no sooner made this discovery, but they acquainted the captain of the ship with the affair, desiring him to communicate the same to the pilot, which request he immediately gratified, recommending him to lie by in the night, and slacken sail by day, until they should be past the danger. It is a custom always among the Portuguese, absolutely to commit the sailing part or the navigation of the vessel to the pilot, who is answerable with his head for the safe conduct or carriage of the King's ships, or those belonging to private traders; and he is under no manner of direction from the captain, who commands in every other respect.

“ The pilot being one of those self-sufficient men, who think every hint given them from others in the way of their profession, as derogatory to their understanding, took it as an affront to be taught his art; and instead of complying with the captain's request, actually crowded more sail than the vessel had carried before.—They had not sailed many hours, but just about the dawn of day a terrible disaster befel them, which would have been prevented if they had lain by.—The ship struck upon a rock. I leave to the reader's imagination what a scene of horror this dreadful accident must occasion among twelve hundred persons, all in the most inevitable danger, beholding with awful astonishment that instantaneous death which now stared them in the face!

“ In this distress the captain ordered the pinnace to be launched, in which having tossed a small quantity of biscuit, and some boxes of marinalade, he jumped himself with nineteen others, who with their swords prevented the coming in of any more, lest the boat should sink. In this condition, they put off into the great Indian ocean, without a compass to steer by, or any fresh water, but what might happen to fall from the Heavens, whose mercy alone could deliver them. After they had rowed four days to and fro in this miserable situation, the captain, who had been for some time very sick and weak, died; this added if possible to their misery, for as they now fell into confusion, every one would govern and none would obey; this obliged them to elect one of their own company to command them, whose orders they implicitly agreed to obey.

“ This person proposed to the company to draw lots, and to cast every fourth man overboard, as their small stock of provisions were so far spent, as not to be able, at a very short allowance, to sustain above three days longer. They were now nineteen persons in all; in this number were a Friar and a Carpenter, both of them they would exempt, as the one was useful to absolve and comfort them in their last extremity, and the other to repair the pinnace in case of a leak or other accident. The same compliment they paid to their new captain, he being the odd man, and his life of much consequence; he refused this indulgence a great while, but at last they obliged him to acquiesce, so that there were four to die out of sixteen remaining persons.

“ The three first after having confessed and received absolution, submitted to their fate; the fourth, whom fortune condemned, was a Portuguese gentleman, that had a younger brother in the boat, who seeing him about to be thrown overboard, most tenderly embraced him, and with tears in his eyes, besought him to let him die in his room, enforcing his arguments, by telling him, That he was a married man, and had a wife and children at Goa, besides the care of three sisters who absolutely depended upon him; that as for himself, he was single, and his life of no great importance; he therefore conjured him to suffer him to supply his place.—The elder brother, astonished and melted with his generosity, replied, That since divine providence vidence had appointed him to suffer, it would be wicked and unjust to permit any other to die for him, especially a brother, to whom he was so much obliged. The younger persisting in his purpose, would take no denial, but throwing himself on his knees, held his brother so fast, that the company could not disengage them; thus they disputed for a while, the elder brother bidding him be a father to his children, and recommending his wife to his protection, and as he would inherit his estate, to take care of their common sisters; but all he could say could not make the younger desist.

“ This was a scene of tenderness, that must fill any breast susceptible of generous impressions, with pity. At last the constancy of the elder brother yielded to the piety of the other; he acquiesced and suffered the gallant youth to supply his place, who being cast into the sea, and a good swimmer, soon got to the stern of the pinnace, and laid hold of the rudder with his right hand, which being perceived by one of the sailors, he cut off the hand with a cutlass; then dropping into the sea, he caught again hold of it with his left, which received the same fate by a second blow: thus dismembered of both his hands, he made a shift notwithstanding to keep himself above water, with his feet and two stumps, which he held bleeding upwards.

“ This moving spectacle so raised the pity of the whole company, that they cried out, He is but one man, let us endeavour to save his life; and he was accordingly taken into the boat, where they had his hands bound up, as well as the place and circumstance would permit.

“ They rowed all that night and next morning, when the sun arose, as if Heaven would reward the gallantry and piety of this young man, they desiered land, which proved to be the mountains of Mozambique, in Africa, not far from a Portuguese colony; thither they all safely arrived, where they remained until the next ships from Lisbon passed by, and carried them to Goa; at which city Linschoten, a writer of good esteem and credit, assures us that he himself saw them land, supped with the two brothers that very night, beheld the younger with his stumps, and had the story from both of their mouths, as well as from the rest of the company.”

I have delivered all the circumstances of this relation according to that writer, except that as his style is every obsolete, it is related in more modern language. It happening between two brothers, makes it to be rather more remarkable, as it hath been in all ages observed, that notwithstanding the ties of blood, they have made fewer friendships than other persons, inasmuch Virgil who had a perfect knowledge of human nature, has thought fit as it were to express himself proverbially on the occasion: Et infidos agitans, discordia fratres.

At the instance of the Writer of the following Letter, (which appeared in the Hibernian Journal of the 4th inst.) and several others of our Correspondents and Friends, we republish it in our Magazine, in order to give the most extensive circulation to the matter contained therein, which we deem, exclusive of the private Good it may effect, of the highest Concern to the Public.

SOME time ago, at a friend's house, I met with a printed address to the public from a Mr. Magee, soliciting subscriptions to enable him to establish a Brewery, for the purpose of brewing a light, pale, palatable Table Beer, manufactured of hops and malt only, and proposing to furnish his subscribers and the public with it at eight shillings per barrel, with a promise of returning to the former (within the course of the first year) value in this commodity to the amount of their respective deposits.—If a proposal, offering an accommodation so much wanted, and heretofore unattempted in this city, preposessed me in its favour, an authentic representation of the proposer's claims to public protection, has since deeply interested me in its success.

This James Magee, it seems, had formerly been engaged in, and carried on with the fairest repute, the brewing business, until (for even the good are not from ill exempt) a variety of unforeseen, irremediable misfortunes reduced him to the sad necessity of quitting it under the most melancholy, distracting circumstances, but not without a reflecting honour ever recollected by his creditors, and which must now recommend him to the public. When heavy, inevitable losses obliged him to stop payment, he endured the event with a becoming fortitude and resignation; nor could the painful heart-rending situation of a beloved partner, with ten children, influence him from preserving inviolate that sacred integrity, for which, as a man and a trader, he was answerable to his friends and the community;—he sent for his creditors, and, without hesitation, delivered them his All, in which, together with the fruits of many an effort of industry, a little annuity got by his wife was comprehended in order to satisfy their amplest demands. The rare instances of examples like this, it is that so frequently impede the stream and turn away the current of commercial, as well as moral life in this city.—But to avoid digression:

Mr. Magee, soon after his failure, became clerk to a gentleman of eminence in town;—but experiencing the emoluments of his service insufficient for even the exigencies of his family, he, in anxiety for them, bethought him of the already mentioned project, which his friends approved and subscribed to; they encouraged him also to extend his applications; and not doubting but the public in general would the more readily patronize a plan productive of common benefit, as its promotion tended to administer aid to private calamity.

Actuated by these double motives, many gentlemen, in consequence, combined in a scheme of humanity for the relief of Magee, and he received by subscriptions between three and four hundred guineas, which, though very inadequate to his purpose, made him enter, in grateful expectation of more encouragement, with confidence and ardour on an undertaking which he is now embarked in, but yet under difficulties, such as I fear, he can hardly surmount without farther public favour.

That I may shew these difficulties the more worthy of redress, I must remark, that prior to the communication of his plan to the public, this well meaning man waited on the gentlemen concerned in the brewing trade, to satisfy them that his success did not interfere with their's.—Eight Shilling Beer, and (what I had before forgot to note was mentioned in his proposal) thirty and forty shilling Ale, were qualities of drink heretofore out of their line: besides, he confined himself to serve private families only. In fine, the gentlemen appeared perfectly pleased, and on conviction that he clashed not with their interests, wished him success.

Poor Magee, however, afterwards experienced an opposition he little expected.—So soon as he had agreed for his Brewery in James's-street, advertisements followed each other in the News-papers from gentlemen in the trade, proposing to supply eight shilling beer, and thirty and forty shilling ale, the former (in Magee's own words) “to be brewed of hops and malt only.” This their proclamation, I confess, surprised me the more from its being so contradictory with their reply to the interrogation of that committee who, some sessions ago, sat on their petition to the Commons for relief on account of the dearthness of hops and malt. On enquiry whether they could not brew light, wholesome table drink by itself, and to be better than the miserable dreg they now vend to the public, they declared it could not be done, being wholly incompatible with their business. Rather than, on ready credit of this answer, that the committee should (as I am informed) come to a resolution for their aid and what seemed the public good, I lament they asked not these gentlemen what materials they did use in the composition of their beer: This, in my opinion, had been an interesting question, and would probably puzzle them equally as the one I now take the liberty of proposing—Why that identical measure which was then incompatible with their business, should be now their publicly avowed purpose to prosecute?

God knows but the laborious and solicitous individual of this wealthy and powerful opposition had too many other hardships to encounter. Independent of such combination against him, his predicament was sufficiently difficult and perplexing.—The almost treble advance in the price of casks, now not to be got by reason of the scarcity of staves, and turning out of the journeymen Coopers, adding the absence of the subscribers, and the excessive expence of repairing his concerns, were circumstances that might provoke his yet farther obtrusion upon his friends and the public.

To the public then I appeal, in behalf of a man struggling in the most pious exertions for a deserving wife and ten, now eleven children. A man proved to be of exceeding honesty, and to whom (I venture to say it without apology) the public are indebted, for any reformation likely to take place amongst the Brewers of this city, derives immediately from Mr. Magee. This gentleman was incontestibly the first who accommodated us with pure, genuine, and wholesome beer, the unadulterated extract of malt and hops only; and it was (as is evident by their report to the committee before-mentioned) merely on a principle of opposition that any of the other Brewers adopted his plan.

The public being now acquainted with the circumstances of this man's case, it remains only to add, that if upon trial Magee's beer is found superior in quality to any other brewed for sale within this kingdom, justice and humanity must strengthen the public opinion and convince the people of Dublin, that it is a praiseworthy, self-interest to serve another when they can serve themselves.

Case of Mr. James Rivington, Printer, at New York.

THIS case has been communicated to the public in evidence of the oppressive principles of the leaders of the American opposition. It is, indeed, a deplorable case, as it exhibits a melancholy proof of the malignancy of mankind when acting under the influence of passion or prejudice.

Dead

Dead to the feelings of humanity, and forgetful of the precepts of religion, they seem to delight in the oppression of others, while freedom from oppression is the great object for which they themselves contend. It is not, however, our design, in selecting this case, to aggravate or inflame. Our views are very different. We look upon Mr. Rivington as a much-injured citizen, and we wish to be instrumental in procuring him redress. Every one who reads his case, must commiserate the condition of a man deprived of his livelihood, and exiled from his family for no crime; on the contrary, for the noblest of all principles, that of opposing the torrent of popular delusion, and standing firm in the cause of constitutional freedom and his country.

This gentleman, when every other press was under the controul of the Congress, with a candour and firmness which will ever do him honour, admitted into his paper the performances of all parties. This impartiality was, however, very displeasing to the leaders of faction. They perceived, that the prejudices of the populace were removed, and their resentments abated by the arguments of their opponents. They, therefore, attempted first by threats to intimidate the printer from publishing any thing in defence of the British Legislature; but this proving ineffectual, they withdrew their subscriptions, and persuaded others to imitate their example. The clergy in the interest of the Congress, made the liberty of Mr. Rivington's press, a topic for invective in their pulpits, and applied the influence of their characters, and the motives of religion, to induce their congregations to stop the circulation of his paper.

The multitude in New Jersey were so inflamed by these arts, that they carried his effigy about their streets, accompanied with every mark of ignominy, hung it a whole day on a tree, and at night cast it into a bonfire, in terrorem to the offender. Their resentments, at last, were directed, not only against the printer, but against such as should dare to read his papers.

The following extracts from some of those arbitrary decrees, passed by the committees of New Jersey, Rhode Island, &c. will be a sufficient specimen of their spirit and manner.

“Resolved, That this committee will henceforth take no more of his (Rivington's) papers, pamphlets, or any other public performance of his press, neither will we deal with him in any other way; and we heartily recommend that our constituents may take this matter into serious consideration, and as far as it shall carry conviction to them, treat him with a correspondent conduct.”

After a profusion of abuse, the committee of Newport, in Rhode Island, declare, “Wherefore we think it our bounden duty to hold up that infamous parricide, James Rivington, to the continent, in this odious light;

“Resolved, therefore, that it is the opinion of this committee, that no further dealings or correspondence ought to be held with the said Rivington, and we recommend it to every person who takes the paper called Rivington's Gazetteer, immediately to drop the same; and also take the liberty to recommend a similar conduct towards him to the other towns in this colony.

HENRY WARD, Clerk.”

This was a language well understood in America. To contradict the express pleasure, or to differ from the sentiments of committee-men, were sufficient evidences of disaffection; on a mere suspicion of which many have, to their cost, found themselves exposed to the severest punishment. Accordingly, the printer was deprived by these manœuvres of many hundreds of his customers, and had great difficulty, or found it impossible, to obtain his legal dues from many others. Some of the people of Connecticut, not content with this exercise of their resentment, stopped the post-rider, and took his Gazetteers out of the mail, and committed them to the flames.—Mr. Rivington, being undismayed by their threats and violence, continued to print and circulate performances which opposed their measures, and exposed their reasonings, giving at the same time the fullest and freest admission to whatever was written on the side of the Congress.—The factious, not being able to withstand their antagonists in argument, determined to secure the press to themselves; and, in order to this, projected a plan to seize the person of the printer, and oblige him to comply with their demands. With this view, a body of armed russians concealed themselves at night in the neighbourhood of his dwelling-house, whilst two of them in sailors habits knocked at his door, enquired for him under the plea of business, and as soon as he was within their reach, seized on him, and attempted to carry him off by force to the armed body: but, fortunately for the printer, his cries brought some of his neighbours to his relief, who rescued him from their hands. His house was also beset by a great mob, threatening immediate destruction if he did not surrender himself. To elude their search,

search; he was obliged to conceal himself in a neighbouring house, in the chimney of which he continued many hours in despair of surviving until the morning. Unable to find him, the mob dispersed, and he escaped on board his Majesty's ship the Kingfisher, the commander of which capt. James Montagu, gave him a generous reception. On the departure of the Kingfisher, he was removed on board the Asia man of war, capt. George Vandeput, who afforded him a kind and hospitable asylum. While he was on board these ships, the Provincial Congress at New York took his case into consideration, and, on his making a submission, recommended to the people, that he should be permitted to return unmolested to his family, and to carry on his business. But, notwithstanding his submission had been accepted, and he had thrown himself into their power, on the faith of the resolve of the Congress, the republican faction were determined to deprive him of the capacity of offending them any longer; and having expressed much indignation at his newspaper of the 16th of November last (containing an explanation of Lord North's motion for accommodating the American disputes, the address of the town of Manchester to his Majesty, and a computation of the whole force employed by Great Britain in the last year of the late war, amounting to 499,000 men,) a body of 75 light horse, armed with firelocks and bayonets, came suddenly, about noon-day, on the 23d of November, into the city, surrounded his house, whilst a detachment took possession of it, seized all his printing-materials, and, after plundering and destroying many copies and other property, they carried away the printing-types in bags upon a cart to the town of Newhaven, in Connecticut: at once putting a stop to the exercise of his profession, and forcing him to quit his house and a large family, and seek an asylum in his native country.

Four days after this robbery, he received a letter by post from the army at Cambridge, of which the following is a copy:

"Master Rivington,

"Will you never have don printing Tory. I swear now your 499,000 papermen are strong marks of your tory principles, and if you don't leave off, some of us will very soon pay you a visit, which perhaps will not be friendly. Take advice before it is too late from a person who owes you no ill-will, but who loves his country.

JEDIDIAH YANKEE.
Cambridge."

"To Mr. Rivington, Printer in New York, these."

It appears, from undoubted evidence, that the avowed design of the republican mob was to secure his person, and by torture and mutilation (as an amputation of his ears and slitting his nose) to force him to a discovery of the several authors of a long list of books, and other political pieces published in his newspapers, in defence of the rights of the British parliament, which must inevitably have involved many respectable persons in misery and destruction. Finding, from such frequent attacks and avowed plans against him, that he must either lay aside his business, risk his property and life, or forfeit his honour, and renounce his principles; and being apprised of the designs of the Congress to seize on the friends to government; he determined to leave the place, and accordingly embarked for England. Some time before his departure, two persons deputed by the faction, came to him with overtures, proposing, that, if he would discover the names of the writers in his paper, and of some political pamphlets which he had published, he should have ample protection, be received into favour, and be supported in a most profitable manner in his profession. He rejected these proposals with the indignation becoming a man of honour.

By these cruelties he is now driven from America, without business, and deprived of the means of maintaining a family, consisting of twelve persons, whom he left behind him in New York. Added to all this, he has been proscribed and proclaimed an enemy of America; of many thousand pounds due to him, he has no prospect of collecting a sixth part; and the odium which has been excited against him, by his opponents, is so high that it will be difficult for him, even when the present disputes subside, to recover his former extensive business. His greatest enemies can assign no other reason for the punishment inflicted on him, and the hardships he has undergone, than that, acting agreeably to the principles which ought to govern a person in his profession, he published impartially performances written on both sides of the present American question.

Let every Englishman who may read this plain narrative, learn to value as he ought the blessings of equal liberty and law, which he enjoys in this country.

CORIOLANUS.

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

Containing the Lives of the most eminent Natives of Great-Britain and Ireland, in an alphabetical Series. With a succinct Account of their Writings. (Continued from our last, p. 751.)

The Life of Mr. Anthony Bacon.

BACON (ANTHONY) elder brother to sir Francis, was educated at home, and afterwards sent abroad for improvement. At his return, he distinguished himself by his extraordinary abilities: but though he was deeply skilled in politics, and the best versed in foreign affairs of any man in his time, yet he was reserved in conversation, and remained contented with the reputation he acquired among the circle of his private acquaintance, and the interest he had with some persons of the first distinction, who valued and made use of his abilities. He had the misfortune to be so very lame, that he was unable to move about his room; on which account the earl of Essex, who relied much upon his advice, and consulted him in affairs that required the greatest secrecy, took him into his house, and gave him a handsome allowance for his services. He was diligent in his endeavours to serve that unfortunate nobleman, when he most required his assistance; and preserved a sincere friendship towards his brother the lord Verulam, to whom he left his estate.

The Life of Sir Nathaniel Bacon.

Bacon, (Sir Nathaniel) knight of the bath, and an excellent painter, was one of the sons of the lord-keeper Bacon, and half-brother to the viscount St. Alban's. He travelled into Italy, and studied painting there; but his manner and colouring approaches nearer to the style of the Flemish school. Mr. Walpole observes, that at Culsford, where he lived, are preserved some of his works; and at Gorhambury, his father's seat, is a large picture by him, in oil, of a cook-maid with dead fowl, admirably painted, with great nature, neatness, and lustre of colouring. In the same house is a whale length of him, by himself, drawing on a paper. Mr. Granger says, he was ancestor to the present lord Townshend.

The Life of Mr. John Baconthorp.

Baconthorp, or Bacondorp (John) surnamed the Resolute Doctor, was one of the most learned men of his time. He was born at Baconthorp, an obscure village in Norfolk, and flourished towards the end of the thirteenth century. He spent some of his early years at a convent in Norfolk, from whence he removed to Oxford, and after that to Paris, where he had a degree in divinity and laws conferred upon him, and was in high reputation for his learning, being esteemed the head of the Averroists, or followers of the philosopher Averroes. Upon his return to England, he was chosen twelfth provincial of the Carmelites, in an assembly of that order held at London in the year 1329. Four years after, he was invited by letters to Rome, where he was held in great esteem. During his residence in this city, he had several disputations on the subject of marriage, in which he gave great offence to many, by ascribing too much to the papal authority in dispensing with the laws of God in regard to marriage; but he afterwards retracted his opinion on this subject, and proved by the strongest arguments from reason and scripture, that, in degrees of consanguinity prohibited by the divine law, the pope had no dispensing power. Baconthorp died at London in the year 1346. He wrote, 1. Commentaria, seu Questiones super quatuor libros Sententiarum 2. Compendium legis Christi. 3. Tractatus duo de regula ordinis Carmelitani, &c. 4. Commentaries on all the Books of the Bible, and on St. Austin's Book De Civitate Dei. 5. A Treatise against Pope John, concerning the Vision of the Blessed; and many other works.

The Life of Dr. John Bainbridge.

Bainbridge (John) an eminent physician and astronomer, was born at Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, in the year 1582. He received the first tincture of learning in the public school of this town, and afterwards studied at Emmanuel college in Cambridge, under the tuition of Dr. Joseph Hall. When he had taken his degrees of bachelor and master of arts, he returned to Leicestershire, where he kept a grammar-school for some years, and at the same time practised physic. He employed his leisure hours in the mathematics, especially astronomy, which had been his favourite study from his earliest years. By the advice of his friends, who thought his abilities too great for the obscurity of a country life, he removed to London, where he was admitted a fellow of the college of physicians. His description of the comet which appeared in 1618, considerably raised his character. It was by this means he got acquainted with sir Henry Saville, who, in the year 1619, appointed him his first professor of astronomy at Oxford; upon which he removed to that university, and was entered a master-commoner of Merton college, the master and fellows whereof appointed him junior reader of Linacre's lectures in 1631, and superior reader in 1635. As he resolved to publish correct editions of the ancient astronomers, agreeable to the statutes of the founder of his professorship; in order to make himself acquainted with the discoveries of the Arabian astronomers, he began the study of the Arabic language when he was above forty years of age. Some time before his death, he removed to a house opposite Merton college, where he died November 3, 1643, in the sixty second year of his age. His body was conveyed to the public schools, and, an oration having been pronounced there in his praise, by Mr. Strode, the university-orator, it was carried from thence to the church of Merton college, and there deposited near the altar. He wrote, 1. An astronomical Description of the late Comet, from the 18th of November, 1618, to the 16th of December following. 2. Canicularia; a Treatise concerning the Dog-star, and the Canicular Days. 3. Antiprognoticon, &c. 4. A Theory of the Sun. 5. A Theory of the Moon. 6. A Discourse concerning the Quantity of the Year. 7. Two volumes of astronomical Observations.

yations. 8. Nine or ten volumes of Miscellaneous Papers relating to the Mathematics; and other pieces.

The Life of Mr. David Baker.

Baker (David) an English Benedictine monk, of whom Mr. Wood has given us a very circumstantial account, and particularly of his miraculous conversion from atheism to Christianity, was educated at Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke-college, in the university of Oxford. He afterwards studied at the Temple, where his excellent natural abilities enabled him, in a short time, to make a great proficiency in the law. Soon after his conversion, he went to Italy, where he entered into the order of St. Benedict, having changed his name from David to Augustin. In the reign of James I. he was a considerable time resident in England, in the quality of a missionary; but being much given to retirement and abstraction, he was, by some of his brethren, thought a very improper person for that employment. He was for several years the spiritual director of the English Benedictine nuns at Cambray, and afterwards their confessor. He spent the latter part of his life in London, where he died in the year 1641. He is said to have been much employed in mental prayer; and was author of several books relating to the exercises of a spiritual life. He wrote an exposition of the famous mystical book, entitled Scala Perfectionis, by Walter Hilton. These, and the rest of his works that are extant, are conserved in nine large tomes in folio, MSS. in the monastery of English Benedictine nuns at Cambray. He made large collections for an Ecclesiastical History of England, and other subjects of antiquity, in which he was assisted by the most eminent of our antiquaries; but these, which were in six folio volumes, are lost; as are also three large volumes of his translations of the works of spiritual authors. None of his books were ever printed.

The Life of Sir Richard Baker.

Baker (Sir Richard) author of the Chronicle of the Kings of England, was born at Sissingherst, in Kent, about the year 1568. In 1584, he was entered a commoner at Hart hall in Oxford, where he remained three years, which he spent chiefly in the study of logic and philosophy. From thence he removed to one of the inns of court in London, and afterwards travelled into foreign parts, in order to complete his education. In 1594, he was created master of arts at Oxford; and in May 1603, received the honour of knighthood from king James I. at Theobald's. In 1620, he was high-sheriff of Oxfordshire, having the manor of Middle-Aston, and other estates in that county. He married a daughter of sir George Manwaring, of Ightfield, in Shropshire, knight; but having become surety for some of that family's debts, he was thereby reduced to poverty, and forced to take shelter in the Fleet-prison, where he died on the 18th of February, 1644-5. He was buried about the middle of the south aisle of St. Bride's church, Fleet-street. He was a person tall and comely, says Mr. Wood, of a good disposition, and admirable discourse; religious, and well-read in various faculties, especially in divinity and history, as appears from the books he composed. He wrote, besides his Chronicle, 1. Cato Variiegatus, or Cato's Moral Distichs varied in verse. 2. Meditations and Disquisitions on the Lord's Prayer. 3. Meditations and Disquisitions on several of the Psalms of David. 4. Meditations and Prayers upon the seven Days of the Week. 5. Apology for Laymen writing on Divinity. 6. Theatrum Redivivum, or the Theatre vindicated; in answer to Mr. Prynne's Histrio-mastix. 7. Theatrum Triumphans, or a Discourse of Plays; and other works. He also translated the Marquis Virgilio Malvezzi's Discourses on Tacitus, and Monsieur Balzac's Letters. Mr. Granger observes, that "his Chronicle of the Kings of England was formerly in great vogue; but was ever more esteemed by readers of a lower class, than by such as had a critical knowledge of history. The language of it was, in this reign, called polite; and it long maintained its reputation, especially among country gentlemen." The author seems to have been sometimes more studious to please than to inform, and with that view to have sacrificed even chronology to method. In 1658, Edward Phillips, nephew to Milton, published a third edition of this work, with the addition of the reign of Charles I. It has been several times reprinted since, and is now carried as low as the reign of George I.

The Life of Mr. Thomas Baker.

Baker (Thomas) an eminent mathematician, was born at Ilton, in Somersetshire, in the year 1625. In 1645, he was entered at Magdalen-hall, Oxford; and, in 1645, was elected scholar of Wadham college. On the tenth of April, 1647, he took his degree of bachelor of arts, and soon after quitted the university. He afterwards became vicar of Bishops-Nymmet, in Devonshire, where he lived a studious and retired life for many years. He chiefly applied himself to the study of the mathematics; and he gave a proof of his great knowledge in this branch of learning, in the book he published under the following title: The Geometrical Key, or the Gate of Equations unlocked; or, a new Discovery of the Construction of all Equations, howsoever affected, not exceeding the fourth Degree. viz. of Linears, Quadratics, Cubics, Biquadratics, and the finding of all their Roots, as well false as true, without the Use of Melolabe, Trisection of Angles, without Reduction, Depression, or any other precious Preparations of Equations by a Circle, &c. Of this performance there is an account in the Philosophical Transactions, vol. xiv. No. 157. p. 549. A little before his death the Royal Society lent him some mathematical queries, to which he returned such satisfactory answers, that they presented him a medal.

N O T E.

* Sir Richard's own encomium of his Chronicle, in his preface to that work, is supposed to have recommended it to many of his readers. He says, that it is "collected with so great care and diligence, that if all other of our Chronicles were lost, this only would be sufficient to inform posterity of all passages memorable, or worthy to be known."

dal, with an inscription full of honour and respect. He died at Bishops-Nymmet, on the 5th of June, 1690, and was buried in his own church.

The Life of Sir John Balchen.

Balchen (Sir John) an English admiral of approved valour and great experience, was born on the 2d of February, 1669, and during his youth properly instructed in the several arts necessary to form a complete seaman. At this early time of life he gave many indications of a tenacious memory, sound judgment, and the most intrepid courage. He was alarmed by no dangers, intimidated by no difficulties. He pursued his purposes with the greatest perseverance, steadiness, and resolution, and rarely failed of seeing them succeed according to his wishes. But though he was thus resolute and intrepid, he was far from being petulant, nor ever willingly affronted any. When he had attained the knowledge of the arts and sciences requisite in a seaman, he was placed on board the royal navy, where he served several years in very inferior stations. On the 25th of July, 1697, he was appointed captain of the Virgin prize, and from that time was always considered as one of the most active commanders in the British navy. He never sacrificed the honour of his country to the designs of a party, or his own private interest, nor sought stations that might be attended with greater advantage than those where his superiors thought proper to place him. The true interest of his country, and the honour of the British flag, were the grand motives that influenced his conduct, and to promote these was the greatest pleasure of his life. The merchants were highly sensible of the advantages which the commerce of the nation derived from his care and vigilance; and the privateers of the enemy felt so often the effects of his courage and intrepidity, that they dreaded even the name of the ship which Balchen commanded.

In 1718, he commanded the Shrewsbury in that memorable action near Sicily, in which the Spanish fleet was almost totally destroyed by that of Great Britain, under the command of sir George Byng. In this engagement captain Balchen behaved, as he did in all others, with the greatest intrepidity. In 1728, he was made rear-admiral of the Blue; and, in 1731, commanded under sir Charles Wager, when Don Carlos was placed in possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia. In 1734, he was appointed rear-admiral of the White, and commanded a large squadron at Plymouth, which was intended to join the grand fleet under sir John Norris; and, in 1739, he was raised to the rank of vice-admiral of the Red.

The Spaniards had for some years made it their practice to take the English merchant ships in the West-Indies, under pretence that they carried on a contraband trade. Representations were often made to the court of Spain on this subject, but to no purpose; the depredations were still continued: in consequence of which, war was declared against Spain on the 23d of October, 1739, and admiral Vernon dispatched with a strong fleet to the West-Indies. In the spring of the succeeding year, the ministry received intelligence, that the assogue ships were soon expected in Old Spain, under the convoy of admiral Pizarro; this determined them to send a squadron under the command of an officer that could be depended upon, to intercept them. Accordingly Balchen was named, and dispatched with four ships of the line, to cruise for them off Cape Finisterre. He punctually obeyed his orders, and reached his station on the 20th of April, where he was joined by two other men of war. But his vigilance was rendered abortive by an advice-boat sent from Old Spain, which had the good fortune to meet Pizarro and acquainted him of the danger. On receiving this intelligence, the Spanish admiral altered his course, and instead of standing for Cape Finisterre, steered to the northward till he made the Lizard point, and from thence directed his course to St. Andero, a Spanish port in the Bay of Biscay, where he safely arrived with an immense treasure.

On the 9th of August, 1743, Mr. Balchen was appointed admiral of the White, and soon after knighted by his majesty, and made governor of Greenwich hospital; a station very proper to a person of his advanced age, and where he expected to spend the remainder of his days in tranquility, free from the dangers and fatigues of a seafaring life. But these pleasing expectations soon vanished; his country once more demanded his service, and he with alacrity obeyed the summons. Sir Charles Hardy had been sent with a large convoy of store-ships to admiral Rowley in the Mediterranean, who was in the utmost distress, his ships being almost destitute of provisions, and their rigging in a very wretched condition; nor were the French either ignorant of this circumstance, or careless to profit by it. They sent out a fleet, consisting of fourteen ships of the line, and six frigates, under the command of M. de Rochambault, to intercept the fleet, or at least to prevent sir Charles from joining admiral Rowley, well knowing that the latter could attempt nothing without these stores. Sir Charles, however, arrived safe at Lisbon, where the French discovered him, and blocked up his fleet in the Tagus. There was now an absolute necessity of relieving sir Charles, and consequently of sending an admiral, whose courage and conduct could be relied on. In this extremity the ministry cast their eyes upon admiral Balchen, who accordingly repaired to Portsmouth, and took the command of a large fleet, rendezvoused at Spithead, consisting of fourteen ships of the line, and six Dutch, besides two fire-ships, and a sloop. On his arrival he hoisted his flag on board the Victory, one of the largest and finest ships in the royal navy; and, on the 7th of August, 1744, sailed from Spithead to relieve Sir Charles Hardy. He arrived in safety at Lisbon on the 9th of September, and being joined by the squadron of Sir Charles, proceeded to Gibraltar; the French at his approach retiring into Cadiz, and leaving the sea open to the British flag. This important service being performed, Sir John was desirous of shewing the French what they had to expect from a powerful English fleet, and accordingly cruised for some time on the coast of Portugal, in hopes of meeting with some of the Brett fleet; but in this he was disappointed, the French commander taking care to prevent his design, by keeping his whole fleet in the harbour of Cadiz.

Sir John Balchen finding it in vain to wait any longer for the enemy, left the coast of Galicia on the 28th of September, steering for England; but on the 3d of October he was overtaken by a violent storm, which dispersed the whole fleet. The Exeter lost her main and mizen masts, and was obliged to throw twelve of her guns over-board to prevent her foundering: the Duke, on board of which vice admiral Stuart had hoisted his flag, had all her sails and rigging blown away, and ten feet water in her hold; the rest of the fleet also received considerable damage, though all, except the Victory, arrived safe at St. Helens on the 10th of October: but that unfortunate ship had a very different fate; she was separated from the fleet on the 4th of October, and driven on the rocky coast of Alderney, where she struck on the Caskets. The inhabitants of Alderney heard the guns which the admiral fired as signals of distress: but the tempest raged with such uncommon violence, that no assistance could be given. The signal guns were continued during the whole night, but early in the morning the ship sunk, and every person on board perished. She was manned with eleven hundred of the most expert seamen in the royal navy, exclusive of fifty gentlemen of family and fortune, who went as volunteers. Thus one of the most experienced admirals, with eleven hundred and fifty men, were lost in a moment, and passed together through the gloomy valley that separates time from eternity.

The whole nation expressed a deep and generous concern for this terrible misfortune; and his late majesty settled a pension of 500*l.* per annum on the admiral's lady during her life; and to perpetuate the memory of this brave commander, a small, but elegant monument was erected for him in Westminster-abbey, in which his bust is well executed in the finest marble: the enrichments, arms, and trophies, are admirably wrought, and in the front is a fine baso-relievo of a ship in a storm, below which is the following inscription: "To the memory of Sir John Balchen, knight, admiral of the white squadron of his majesty's fleet, who, in the year 1744, being sent out commander in chief of the combined fleets of England and Holland, to cruise on the enemy, was, on his return home, in his majesty's ship the Victory, lost in the Channel by a violent storm; from which sad circumstance of his death we may learn, that neither the greatest skill, judgment, or experience, joined to the most firm unshaken resolution, can resist the fury of the winds and waves; and we are taught from the passages of his life, which were filled with great and gallant actions, but accompanied with adverse gales of fortune, that the brave, the worthy, and the good man, meets not always his reward in this world. Fifty-eight years of faithful and painful service he had passed, when being just retired to the government of Greenwich hospital, to wear out the remainder of his days, he was once more, and for the last time, called out by his king and country, whose interest he ever preferred to his own, and his unwearied zeal for their service ended only with his death; which weighty misfortune to his afflicted family, became heightened by many aggravating circumstances attending it; yet amidst their grief they had the mournful consolation to find his gracious and royal master mixing his concern with the generous lamentations of the public, for the calamitous fate of so zealous, so valiant, and so able a commander; and, as a lasting memorial of the sincere love and esteem borne by his widow to a most affectionate and worthy husband, this honorary monument was erected by her."

Admiral Balchen married Susannah, daughter of colonel Apreece of Wasingly, in the county of Huntingdon. He left one son and one daughter: the former of whom, George Balchen, survived him but a short time; for being sent to the West-Indies in 1745, commander of his majesty's ship the Pembroke, he died at Barbadoes in December the same year, aged twenty-eight.

The Life of Mr. John Bale.

Bale (John) in Latin Baleus, or Balzus, bishop of Ossory in Ireland, was born at Cove, a small village in Suffolk, in November 1495. His parents being in poor circumstances, and encumbered with a large family, he was entered at twelve years of age in the monastery of Carmelites at Norwich, and from thence removed to Jesus college, Cambridge. He was educated in the Romish religion, but afterwards became a Protestant. He himself tells us, "that he was involved in the utmost ignorance and darkness of mind both at Norwich and Cambridge, till the word of God shining forth, the churches began to return to the true fountains of divinity. That the instrument of his conversion was not a priest or a monk, but the most noble earl of Wentworth." His conversion, however, greatly exposed him to the persecution of the Romish clergy, and he must have felt their resentment, had he not been protected by lord Cromwell, a nobleman in high favour with king Henry VIII. But upon the death of this nobleman, Bale was obliged to fly into Holland, where he remained six years, during which time he wrote several pieces in the English language. He was recalled into England by king Edward VI. and presented to the living of Bishops-Stoke, in the county of Southampton; and, on the 15th of August, 1552, he was nominated to the see of Ossory. Upon his arrival in Ireland, he used his utmost endeavours to reform the manners of his diocese, to correct the vicious practices of the priests, to abolish the mass, and to establish the use of the new book of Common Prayer set forth in England; but all his schemes of this kind having proved abortive by the death of king Edward, and the accession of queen Mary, he became very much exposed to the outrages of the Papists in Ireland: once in particular we are told, that five of his domestics were murdered, whilst they were making hay in a meadow near his house; and having received intimations that the priests were plotting his death, he retired from his see to Dublin. He afterwards afterwards made his escape in a small vessel from that port, but was taken by the captain of a Dutch man of war, who stripped him of all his money and effects, and when he arrived in Holland, he was obliged to pay thirty pounds before he could procure his liberty. From Holland he retired to Basil in Switzerland, where he continued during the reign of queen Mary. On the accession of queen Elizabeth he returned from his exile, and rather chose to accept of a prebend of Canterbury, than to sue for his former see of Ossory. He died in November, 1563, aged sixty-eight, and was buried in the cathedral of Canterbury.

This prelate has left a celebrated work, containing the lives of the most eminent writers of Great-Britain, besides several other pieces. The intemperate zeal of this author, in his accounts of the Papists, often carries him beyond the bounds of decency and candour: he is therefore styled, by Anthony Wood, "the foul-mouthed Bale." He is the earliest dramatic writer in the English language, or at least author of the first pieces of that kind that we find in print; and his writings in that way, that we have been able to trace, are very numerous, as will be seen in the subsequent catalogue of them, viz. 1. Against Momus's and Zoilus's. 2. Against those who adulterate the word of God. 3. Two Comedies of Baptism and Temptation. 4. Of Christ when he was twelve Years old. 5. Of the corrupting of God's Laws. 6. Of the Councils of Bishops. 7. God's Promises. 8. Image of Love. 9. Impositions of Thomas Becket. 10. Of St. John Baptist's preaching in the Wilderness. 11. The Life of St. John Baptist. 12. Of John King of England. 13. Concerning the Laws of Nature corrupted. 14. Of Lazarus raised from the Dead. 15. of the Lord's Supper, and washing of Feet. 16. On both Marriages of the King. 17. Two Comedies of the Passion of Christ. 18. Two Comedies of the Sepulture and Resurrection. 19. Of Simon the Leper. 20. Of the Temptation of Christ. 21. Treacheries of the Papists. Of these, only those numbered 7, 10, and 13, have been seen in print; the first of which was reprinted by Doddsley, in the first volume of his Collection of old Plays. As to the rest, they are mentioned by himself as his own, in his account of the British writers. He also translated the tragedies of Pammachius.

His comedy of John Baptist's Preaching, and his tragedy of God's Promises, were acted by young men at the market-cross of Kilkenny, upon a Sunday.

The Life of Archbishop Bambridge.

Bambridge, or Bainbridge, (Christopher) bishop of York, and canonical-priest of the Roman church, was born at Hilton, near Appleby, in Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. Having finished his studies, and taken holy orders, he was collated to the rectory of Aller, in the diocese of Bath and Wells. In 1485, he was appointed prebendary of South Grantham, in the cathedral church of Salisbury, but resigned it the same year for that of Chardstock; and the year following he was made prebendary of Horton, in the same church. In 1493, he was elected provost of Queen's college, being about the same time created doctor of laws. In 1503, he was admitted prebendary of Strenshall, in the cathedral church of York; and, in the same year, installed dean of that church. In 1505, he was made dean of Windsor, master of the rolls, and one of the king's privy-council. In 1507, he was preferred to the bishopric of Durham, and the year following translated to the archiepiscopal see of York. He was employed by Henry VII. in several embassies, but chiefly distinguished himself in that from king Henry VIII. to pope Julius II. who, in the year 1511, created him a cardinal, with the title of St. Praxedes, and appointed him legate of the ecclesiastical army, then besieging the fort of Bastia. In return for these favours Bambridge sent dispatches to the king, urging him to espouse the cause of his holiness, and not to suffer a pope, who had been such a friend to the liberties of Christendom, to fall a sacrifice to his enemies. The king, influenced by the cardinal's zeal, laid the affair before his council, in which, after long debates, it was at length resolved to undertake the war.

This prelate died at Rome on the 14th of July, 1514, having been poisoned, as it is said, by one of his domestics. Being one day in a violent passion, to which he was naturally subject, he fell upon Rinaldo his steward, and beat him severely. In revenge of this usage, the steward took an opportunity of administering poison to his master; for which crime being apprehended and imprisoned, he prevented the execution of public justice by hanging himself. The cardinal was buried at Rome, in the English church of St. Thomas, and the following epitaph is inscribed on his tomb: "Christophoro Archiepiscopo Eboracensi, S. Prædixis presbytero cardinali Angliæ, a Julio II. pontifice maximo, ob egregiam operam S. R. Ecclesiæ præstitam, dum sui regni legatus esset, assumpto, quam mox domi et foris castris pontificiis præfectus tutatus est."

The Life of Sir John Bankes.

Bankes (Sir John) lord chief-justice of the Common-pleas, in the reign of king Charles I. was born at Kewick, in Cumberland, in 1589, and educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to Gray's-Inn, where he applied himself to the study of the law, and soon became eminent in that profession. In 1634 he was knighted, and made attorney-general, and in 1640 was raised to the office of chief-justice of the Common-pleas. He followed king Charles to York, and there, in 1642, signed the declaration of the lords and gentlemen then with his majesty. The same year, the university of Oxford shewed their respect for him, by creating him doctor of laws; and his majesty caused him to be sworn of his privy council. In the summer-circuit he lost all his credit at Westminster: for having declared from the Bench at Salisbury, that the actions of Essex, Manchester, and Waller, were treasonable, the commons voided him, and the rest of the Judges who were of that opinion, traitors. In the mean time, lady Bankes, with her family, being at Coise castle, in the Isle of Purbeck, in Dorsetshire, gave an instance of female male bravery that deserves to be handed down with honour to posterity.

The friends of the parliament had already reduced all the sea coast, except Corfe-castle, and were resolved to reduce that likewise; but Sir John's lady, though she had about her only her children, a few servants and tenants, and little hopes of relief, refused to surrender that fortress; upon which Sir W. Earl, and Thomas Trenchard, Esq; who commanded the parliamentary forces, had recourse to very rough measures: they thrice attempted the place by surprise, and were as often repulged with loss, though the first time lady Banks had but five men in the place, and during the whole time her garrison never exceeded forty. They then interdicted her the markets, and at length formally besieged the fortress with a very considerable force, a train of artillery, and a great quantity of ammunition, which compelled the little town dependent on the castle to surrender. The besiegers now imagined the business was done, when the lady, taking advantage of their remissness, procured a supply of provisions and ammunition, which enabled her still to hold out. At last the earl of Caernarvon, with a considerable body of horse and dragoons, came into the neighbourhood of Purbeck, when Sir W. Earl raised the siege, on the third of August, 1643, so precipitately, that he left his tents standing, together with his ammunition and artillery, which all fell into the hands of lady Banks's household. Sir John was at this time at Oxford with the king, where he continued to discharge his duty as a privy counsellor, till the last day of his life, December 28, 1644.

The Life of Mr. John Banks.

Banks (John) a dramatic writer, was bred an attorney at law, and belonged to the society of New Inn. The dry study of the law, however, not being so suitable to his natural disposition as the more elevated flights of poetical imagination, he quitted the pursuit of riches in the inns of court, in order to pay his attendance on the Muses in the theatre. Here he found his rewards by no means adequate to his deserts. His emoluments at the best were precarious, and the various successes of his pieces too feelingly convinced him of the error of his choice. This, however, did not prevent him from pursuing with cheerfulness the path he had taken, his thirst of fame, and warmth of poetic enthusiasm alleviating to his imagination many disagreeable circumstances, which indigence, the too frequent attendant on poetical pursuits, frequently threw him into. He wrote seven tragedies, viz. 1. The Rival Kings, or the Loves of Orcondates and Statira. 2. The Destruction of Troy. 3. Virtue betrayed, or Anna Bullen. 4. The Unhappy Favourite, or the Earl of Essex. 5. The Innocent Usurper, or the Death of the Lady Jane Grey. 6. Cyrus the Great. 7. The Island Queens, or the Death of Mary Queen of Scotland.

The writers on Biography have not ascertained either the year of the birth, or that of the death of Mr. Banks. His last remains, however, lie interred in the church of St. James's, Westminster.

The Life of Mr. Alexander Barclay.

Barclay, Barclay, Barklay, or de Barklay, (Alexander) an elegant writer in the sixteenth century. There is some reason to believe that he was born in Somersetshire, where there is a village called Barclay, and an ancient family of the same name. There is no account of the exact time of his birth, nor where he received the first part of his education. It appears, however, that he was entered at Oriel college, Oxford, at the time when Thomas Cornish, afterwards bishop of Tyne, was provost of that house, which might be about the year 1495. When he had studied some time in this university, and distinguished himself by his quickness of parts, and great affection for literature, he went over into Holland, and from thence travelled into Germany, Italy, and France. He studied the languages of those countries with great assiduity, and made a most surprising proficiency in them; as appeared by many excellent translations which he published. Upon his return to England, the provost of Oriel college, who had been his patron at the university, having been promoted to the bishopric of Tyne, made him his chaplain, and afterwards appointed him one of the priests of St. Mary, at Ottery in Devonshire, a college founded by John Grandison, bishop of Exeter. After the death of his patron, bishop Cornish, he became a monk of Ely; and upon the dissolution of the monastery at Ely, which happened in 1539, he was left to be provided for by his patrons, of which his works, it is said, had gained him many. On the death of Thomas Eryngton, he had the vicarage of St. Matthew, at Wokey, in Somersetshire, bestowed upon him; and on the 7th of February, 1546, being then doctor of divinity, he was presented to the vicarage of Much-Badew, or Baddow-Magna, in the county of Essex. On the 30th of April, 1552, he was presented by the dean and chapter of London to the rectorship of Allhallows, Lombard-street: but he did not enjoy this living above six weeks; for he died, in a very advanced age, at Croydon in Surry, June, 1552, and was interred in the church there.

The writings of Barclay are very numerous, and no perfect catalogue of them is any where to be found; but the following list contains his principal pieces: 1. Eclogues on the Miseries of Courtiers. 2. The Lives of several Saints, translated from the Latin, particularly those of St. George, St. Margaret, St. Catherine, and St. Ethelreda. 3. Five Eclogues, from the Latin of Mantuan. 4. A Treatise against Skelton. It is conjectured that one cause of the animosity between these brother-bards, was the ill-will that Skelton bore to those of the ecclesiastical character. 5. Of the French Pronunciation. 6. The Bucolic of Codrus. 7. The Castle of Labour. Translated from the French into English. 8. A Treatise of Virtues. This was originally written in Latin by D. Mancini. 9. The Figure of our Mother Holy Church, oppressed by the French King. 10. The History of the Jugurthine War. Translated from the Latin of Sallust. Barclay translated translated this at the desire of the duke of Norfolk. 11. Navis Sultifera, or the Ship of Fools. This is the most celebrated of all our poet's writings. It expresses the characters, vices, and follies of all degrees of men. It consists partly of verses of his own composition, and partly of translations from the Latin, French, and Dutch. It is, indeed, a kind of version of a book written under the same title by Sebastian Brantius; adorned with a great variety of pictures, printed from wooden cuts. It was first printed at London, by Richard Pynson, in 1509, in small folio; again in the same size in 1519; and in Quarto in 1570. It was dedicated by our author to his patron, Dr. Thomas Cornith, bishop of Tyne.

The Life of Mr. William Barclay.

Barclay (William) a learned civilian, was born at Aberdeen, in Scotland. He was much in favour with queen Mary Stuart, and had therefore great reason to expect preferment; but the misfortunes of this princess having disappointed all his expectations, he went to France in 1573; and though he was then thirty years of age, applied to the study of the law at Bourges. Soon after, he took his doctor's degree there; and, as he was a man of ingenuity and great assiduity, he soon became able to teach the law. About this time the duke of Lorrain having founded the university of Pontamousson, gave Barclay the first professorship, and appointed him counsellor in his council, and master of the requests of his palace. In 1581, Barclay married a young lady of Lorrain, by whom he had a son, who became afterwards the cause of animosity between his father and the Jesuits. The youth being endowed with a fine genius, they used their utmost endeavours to engage him in their society, and had nearly succeeded when the father discovered their intentions. He was greatly displeased at the Jesuits, who resented it as highly on their part, and did him so many ill offices with the duke, that he was obliged to leave Lorrain. He repaired to London, expecting that king James would give him some employment; his majesty accordingly offered him a place in his council, with a considerable allowance, on condition that he would embrace the religion of the church of England; but this he declined from his attachment to the Romish persuasion. He returned to France in 1604, and accepted of a professorship in civil law, which was offered him by the university of Angers. He read lectures there with great applause till his death, which happened about the year 1605, when he was buried in the Franciscan church. The most famous of his works are, his Treatise on the Power of the Pope, and that on the Power of Kings. He was father of John Barclay, the celebrated author of the Argenis.

The Life of Mr. Robert Barclay.

Barclay (Robert) one of the most eminent writers among the Quakers, was the son of colonel David Barclay, and was born at Edinburgh, in the year 1648. The troubles in Scotland induced his father to send him, while a youth, to Paris, under the care of his uncle, principal of the Scots college, who, taking advantage of the tender age of his nephew, drew him over to the Romish religion. His father being informed of this, sent for him in 1664. Robert, though now only sixteen years of age, had gained a perfect knowledge of the French and Latin tongues, and had likewise improved himself in most other branches of learning. Several writers among the Quakers have asserted, that colonel Barclay had embraced their doctrine before his son's return from France, but Robert himself has fixed it to the year 1666. Our author soon after became a proselyte to that sect, and in a short time distinguished himself greatly by his zeal for their doctrines. His first treatise in their defence appeared at Aberdeen, in 1670. It was written in a sensible manner, that it considerably raised the credit of the Quakers, who began now to be better treated by the government than they had ever been before. In a piece which he published in 1672, he tells us, that he had been commanded by God to pass through the streets of Aberdeen in sackcloth and ashes, and to preach the necessity of faith and repentance to the inhabitants; he accordingly performed it, being, as he declared, in the greatest agonies of mind till he had fulfilled this command. In 1675, he published a regular and systematical discourse, explaining the tenets of the Quakers, which was universally well received. Many of those who opposed the religion of the Quakers, having endeavoured to confound them with another sect, called the Ranters, our author, in order to shew the difference between those of his persuasion and this other sect, wrote a very sensible and instructive work.

In 1676, his famous Apology for the Quakers was published in Latin at Amsterdam, in quarto. His Theses Theologicae, which are the foundation of this work, had appeared some time before. He translated his Apology into English, and published it in 1678. This work is addressed to king Charles II. and the manner in which he expresses himself to his majesty is very remarkable. Amongst many other extraordinary passages we meet with the following: "There is nothing in the world, who can so experimentally testify of God's providence and goodness, neither is there any who rules so many free people, so many true Christians, which thing renders thy government more honourable, thyself more considerable, than the accession of many nations filled with slavish and superstitious souls. Thou hast tasted of prosperity and adversity, thou knowest what it is to be banished thy native country, to be over-ruled as well as to rule and sit upon the throne; and being oppressed, thou hast reason to know how hateful the oppressor is both to God and man: if, after all those warnings and advertisements, thou dost not turn unto the Lord with all thy heart, but forget him who remembered thee in thy distresses, and give up thyself to follow lust and vanity, surely great will be thy condemnation."

Though these pieces of his greatly raised his reputation among many persons of sense and learning, yet they brought him into various disputes, and one particularly with some considerable members of the university of Aberdeen, an account of which was afterwards published. In 1677, he wrote a large treatise on universal love.

love. Nor were his talents entirely confined to this abstracted kind of writing, as appears from his letter to the public ministers of Nimeguen. His last tract was published in 1686, and entitled, The Possibility and Necessity of the inward and immediate Revelation of the Spirit of God towards the Foundation and Ground of true Faith, proved in a Letter written in Latin to a Person of Quality in Holland, and now also put into English. By his writings he did great service to his sect over all Europe. He travelled with the famous Mr. Penn through the greatest part of England, Holland, and Germany, and was every where received with the highest respect; for though both his conversation and behaviour were suitable to his principles, yet there was such liveliness and spirit in his discourse, and such serenity and cheerfulness in his deportment, as rendered him extremely agreeable to all sorts of people. The great business of his life was doing good, and promoting what he thought to be the knowledge of God. When he returned to his native country, he spent the remainder of his life in a quiet and retired manner. He died at his own house at Ury, on the third day of October, 1690, in the forty-second year of his age.

The Life of Dr. Thomas Barlow.

Barlow (Thomas) a very learned English bishop, was born at Langhill, in the parish of Orton, in Westmoreland, in the year 1607. He was educated at the free-school at Appleby, and sent from thence, in 1624, to Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degree of master of arts on the 27th of June, 1633, and the same year was chosen fellow of his college. In 1635, he was appointed metaphysic reader in the university; and his lectures were received with the greatest applause. In 1652, he was elected head-keeper of the Bodleian library. On the 23d of July, 1657, he took his degree of bachelor in divinity; and in the same year was chosen provost of his college. After the restoration of king Charles II. he was nominated one of the commissioners for restoring the members that had been unjustly expelled during Cromwell's usurpation. On the 2d of August, 1660, he was created doctor in divinity, and in September following was chosen Margaret professor of divinity; and this same year he wrote the Case of Toleration in Matters of Religion. In 1661, he was appointed archdeacon of Oxford; and, in 1675, was promoted to the see of Lincoln.

Mr. Granger observes, that "this learned prelate, whom nature designed for a scholar, and who acted in conformity with the bent of nature, was, perhaps, as great a master of the learned languages, and of the works of the celebrated authors who have written in these languages, as any man of his age." The greatest

* The ingenious earl of Anglesey, in his Memoirs, says, "I never think of this bishop, and his incomparable knowledge both in theology and church history, and in the ecclesiastical law, without applying to him in my thoughts the character that Cicero gave Crassus, viz. part of his writings, of which Mr. Wood has given us a catalogue, are against popery; and his conduct, for some time, like that of other Calvinists, appeared to be in direct opposition to the church of Rome. But after James ascended the throne, he seemed to approach much nearer to popery than he ever did before. He sent the king an address of thanks for his declaration for liberty of conscience, and is said to have written reasons for reading that declaration. His compliances were much the same after the Revolution. His moderation, to call it by the softest name, was very great; indeed so great, as to bring the firmness of his character in question. But casuistry, which was his most distinguished talent, not only reconciles seeming contradictions, but has also been known to admit contradictions themselves. He was, abstracted from this laxity of principles, a very great and worthy man." He died at Buckden, in Huntingdonshire, on the 8th of October, 1691, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

The Life of Mr. William Barlow.

Barlow (William) son of William Barlow, bishop of St. David's. was born in Pembroke-shire. In 1560, he was admitted at Baliol college, Oxford, and four years after took a degree in arts. In 1573, he entered into holy orders, and was made prebendary of Winchester. On the fourteenth of December, 1588, he was appointed prebendary of Collwich, in the cathedral of Litchfield; but he quitted it for the place of treasurer in the same church. He afterwards became chaplain to Henry prince of Wales, son of king James I. and on the twelfth of March, 1614, was collated to the archdeaconry of Salisbury. He is remarkable for being the first who wrote on the nature and properties of the loadstone, twenty years before Dr. Gilbert published his book on that subject. He was the first that made the inclinatory instrument transparent, and to be used hanging, with a glass on both sides; he also suspended it in a compass-box, where, with two ounce weight, it was made fit for use at sea. It was he likewise who found out the difference between iron and steel, and their tempers for magnetical uses. He also discovered the right way of touching magnetical needles, and of piecing and cementing loadstones: finally, he was the first who shewed the reasons why a loadstone, being double capped, must take up so great a weight. He died on the 25th of May, 1625.

This ingenious gentleman was author of the following treatises: 1. The Navigator's Supply, containing many Things of principal Importance belonging to Navigation. 2. Magnetical Advertisement, or divers pertinent Observations and Experiments concerning the Nature and Properties of the Loadstone, &c. 3. A brief Discovery of the idle Animadversions of Mark Ridley, upon a Treatise, entitled, Magnetical Advertisement.

The Life of Sir John Barnard.

Barnard (Sir John) lord-mayor of London in 1738. His first appearance on the public stage, on which he afterwards made so distinguished a figure, was in the year 1722, when he was chosen one of the representatives in parliament for the city of London; a trust, which he continued to enjoy during the six succeeding parliaments, and which he always discharged with equal integrity and ability. In 1725, he received the thanks of the common-council, for opposing a bill introducing a change in the method of conducting elections in the city of London. In 1727, he was chosen alderman of Dowgate ward; and the next year he prepared and presented to the commons a bill for the better regulation and government of seamen in the merchant service. In 1730, the court of Vienna having begun a negotiation in England for a loan of four hundred thousand pounds, a bill was proposed, and passed, prohibiting all his majesty's subjects from advancing any sums of money to foreign princes or states, without having obtained licence from his majesty, under his privy-seal, or some greater authority. Violent opposition was made to this bill, by a great number of members; among whom Mr. Barnard (for the dignity of knighthood he obtained afterwards by his own merit) made no inconsiderable figure. He observed, that if the bill should pass in its present form, it would, in his opinion, open a channel for the Dutch to carry on a very lucrative branch of business to the prejudice of England: that the bill ought absolutely to name the emperor as the power prohibited to borrow; for that, otherwise, all the other states of Europe would think themselves equally affected by this act, which would give it the air as if England was at war with all the world: that he was by no means for making the Exchequer a court of inquisition; he conceived it to be equally odious and unconstitutional, that subjects should be obliged to accuse themselves, and thereby incur the most severe penalties*, he knew, indeed, there were such precedents already, but that was so much the worse; precedents could not alter the nature of things; and he thought the liberties of his country of more consequence than any precedents whatever.

In the debate upon the famous excise-scheme, projected by Sir Robert Walpole, in 1733, Sir John Barnard shewed himself not more zealous for the trade of his country, than jealous of the honour of those by whom it was principally conducted. While this affair was depending in parliament, the merchants of London, having been convened by circular letters, repaired to the lobby of the house of commons, in order to solicit their friends to vote against the bill. Sir Robert Walpole, piqued at the importunity of these gentlemen, threw out some reflections against the conduct of those whom he supposed to have been the means of bringing them thither; and at the same time insinuated, that the merchants themselves could be considered in no other light than that of Sturdy Beggars. This expression was highly resented by all those in the opposition, and particularly by Sir John Barnard, who made the following answer: "I know (said he) of no irregular or unfair methods that were used to call people from the city to your door. It is certain that any set of gentlemen, or merchants, may lawfully desire their friends; they may even write letters, and they may send those letters by whom they please, to define the merchants of figure and character to come down to the court of Requests, and to our lobby, in order to solicit their friends and acquaintance against any scheme or project which they may think prejudicial to them. This is the undoubted right of the subject, and what has been always practised upon all occasions. The honourable gentleman talks of Sturdy Beggars: I do not know what sort of people may now be at the door, because I have not lately been out of the house; but I believe they are the same sort of people that were there when I came last into the house; and then, I can assure you, I saw none but such as deserve the appellation of Sturdy Beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himself, or any gentleman whatever. It is well known, that the city of London was sufficiently apprised of what was this day to come before us: where they got their information I know not; but I am certain, that they had a right notion of the scheme which has been now opened to us; and they were so generally and zealously bent against it, that, whatever methods may have been used to call them hither, I am sure it would have been impossible to find any legal methods to prevent their coming hither." In a word, he made so strenuous an opposition to this unpopular and unconstitutional scheme, that, in conjunction with other members, he obliged the ministry entirely to lay it aside.

In 1735, Sir John Barnard moved for leave to bring in a bill for limiting the number of play-houses, and retraining the licentiousness of players, which was now increased to an amazing degree; and though the bill miscarried at that time, it was nevertheless, about two years after enacted into a law, which still continues in force. In 1736, he served, with his brother-in-law Sir Robert Godschall, knight, the office of sheriff of the city of London and county of Middlesex. The next year he formed a scheme for reducing the interest of the national debt; a project, which, though it did not at that time succeed, was, nevertheless, afterwards carried into execution, to the great emolument of the trading part of the nation. In 1738, Sir John served the high office of lord-mayor of London. During his mayoralty he had the misfortune to lose his lady, who was buried in a magnificent manner at Clapham church; the children belonging to Christ's Hospital, of which he was many years president, attended the funeral through the city. Upon the death of Sir John Thompson, knight, in 1749, he removed, pursuant to an act of common council, and took upon him the office of alderman of Bridge-ward-without, and then became in name, as he might already be considered in reality, the father of the city. In July 1758, to the inexpressible regret of his brother aldermen, and of all his fellow citizens, he resigned his gown.

In the same year, upon the motion of Sir Robert Ladbroke, then father of the city, the thanks of the court of aldermen were given to Sir John

Barnard,

Barnard, and expressed in the following terms : " It is unanimously agreed and ordered, that the thanks of this court be given to Sir John Barnard, knight, late one of the aldermen, and father of this city, for his constant attendance and salutary counsels in this court; his wife, vigilant, and impartial administration of justice; his unwearied zeal for the honour, safety, and prosperity of his fellow citizens; his inviolable attachment to the laws and liberties of his country; and for the noble example he has set of a long and uninterrupted course of virtue in private as well as in public life." It was likewise unanimously resolved, upon the motion of John Paterson, Esq; " That Sir John Barnard, knight, so justly and emphatically stiled the father of this city, having lately (to the great and lasting regret of this court) thought proper to resign the office of alderman, the thanks of this court be given him for having so long and faithfully devoted himself to the service of his fellow citizens; for the honour and influence which this city has, upon many occasions, derived from the dignity of his character, and the wisdom, steadiness, and integrity of his conduct; for his firm adherence to the constitution both in church and state, his noble struggles for liberty, and his disinterested and invariable pursuit of the true glory and prosperity of his king and country, uninfluenced by power, unawed by clamour, and unbiassed by the prejudice of party."

Upon his resigning the office of alderman, he retired, in a great measure, from public business, and continued to live chiefly in a private manner at Clapham; where, after having attained to the age of eighty, he died on the 29th of August, 1764. His character was composed of every amiable quality: he was a dutiful son, an affectionate husband, an indulgent master, a generous benefactor, an active magistrate, an intelligent merchant, and uncorrupt senator; he discharged all the duties of social life with equal honour to himself, and advantage to his country: never man was more universally esteemed while living, or more sincerely regretted when dead.

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonies, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. Continued from p. 779.

THE following Letter from Sir Guy Carleton was this day [Nov. 23.] published in the London Gazette;

" My Lord,
" Maria, off Crown-Point,
Oct. 11, 1776.

" THE rebel fleet upon Lake Champlain has been intirely defeated in two actions; the first on the 11th instant, between the island of Valcourt and the Main; and the second on the 13th, within a few leagues of Crown-Point.

" We have taken Mr. Waterburgh, the second in command, one of their Brigadier-Generals, with two of their vessels, and ten others have been burnt and destroyed; only three of fifteen sail, a list of which I transmit, having escaped. For further particulars I refer your Lordship to Lieut. Dacres, who will be the bearer of this letter, and had a share in both actions, particularly the first, where his gallant behaviour in the Carleton schooner, which he commanded, distinguished him so much as to merit great commendation; and I beg to recommend him to your Lordship's notice and favour. At the same time I cannot omit taking notice to your Lordship of the good service done, in the first action, by the spirited conduct of a number of officers and men of the corps of artillery, who served the gun-boats, which, together with the Carleton, sustained for many hours the whole fire of the enemy's fleet, the rest of our vessels not being able to work up near enough to join effectually in the engagement.

" The rebels, upon the news reaching them of the defeat of their naval force, set fire to all the buildings and houses in and near Crown-Point, and retired to Ticonderoga.

" The season is so far advanced, that I cannot yet pretend to inform your Lordship whether any thing farther can be done this year.

" I am, &c.

" GUY CARLETON."

G. C.
Admiralty-Office, Nov. 23, 1776.

Lieut. Dacres, of the royal navy, arrived here early this morning from Quebec, and brings the letters and accounts, of which the following are copies.

Copy of a letter from Capt. Douglas, of the Isis, to Mr. Stephens, dated at Quebec, October 21, 1776.

" HAVING for the space of six weeks attended the naval equipment for the important expedition on Lake Champlain, I on the 4th instant saw, with unspeakable joy, the re-constructed ship, now called the Inflexible, and commanded by Lieut. Schanck, her-rebuilder, sail from St. John's, twenty-eight days after her keel was laid, towards the place of rendezvous; taking in her 18 twelve-pounders beyond the the shoal which is on this side the Ile aux Noix, in her way up.

"The prodigies of labour which have been effected since the rebels were driven out of Canada, in creating, re-creating, and equipping, a fleet of above thirty fighting vessels, of different sorts and sizes, and all carrying cannon, since the beginning of July, together with the transporting over land, and afterwards dragging up the two rapids of St. Terefe and St. John's, thirty long-boats, the flat-bottomed boats, a gondola, weighing about thirty tons, and above four hundred battoes, almost exceed belief. His Excellency the Commander in Chief of the army, and all the other Generals, are of the opinion that the sailors of his Majesty's ships and transports have (far beyond the usual limits of their duty) exerted themselves to the utmost, on this great and toilsome occasion; nor has a man of that profession uttered a single word expressive of discontent, amidst all the hardships they have undergone; so truly patriotic are the motives by which they are actuated.—To crown the whole, above two hundred prime seamen of the transports, impelled by a due sense of their country's wrongs, did most generously engage themselves to serve in our armed vessels during the expedition, and embarked accordingly. Such having then been our unremitting toils, I am happy beyond expression in hereby acquainting my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that the destruction of almost the whole of the rebel fleet, in two several battles on the 11th and 13th instant, is our reward. I have received a letter from Capt. Pringle, of the Lord Howe armed ship, who commands the officers and seamen on the Lake, and who bestows the highest encomiums on their behaviour in both engagements. The rebels did by no means believe it possible for us to get upon Lake Champlain this year; were much surprized at the first sight of the van of our force: but ran into immediate and utter confusion the moment a three-masted ship made her appearance, being a phenomenon they never so much as dreamt of. Thus have his Majesty's faithful subjects here (contrary to a crude but prevailing idea,) by straining every nerve in their country's cause, out-done them in working as much as in fighting. The ship Inflexible, with the Maria and Carleton schooners, all re-constructions, did the whole of the second day's business, the flat-bottomed radeau called the Thunderer, and the gondola called the Loyal Convert, with the gun-boats, not having been able to keep up with them. The said gondola was taken from the rebels the day the siege of Quebec was raised.—The loss we have sustained, considering the great superiority of the insurgents, is very small, consisting of between 30 and 40 men killed and wounded, seamen, soldiers, artillery-men, and all; eight whereof were killed out-right, and six wounded, on board the Carleton. As to farther particulars, I must refer you to Lieut. Dacres, who, in justice due to his merit, for the part he bore in destroying the rebel fleet, I am happy in sending upon this occasion to their Lordships, in the Stag transport, as also in thereby complying with the General's desire, who, for the same reason, is pleased to honour him with the conveyance of his dispatches."

A List of his Majesty's naval force on Lake Champlain.

Ship Inflexible, Lieutenant Schanck, 18 twelve-pounders.

Schooner Maria, Lieut. Starke, 14 six-pounders.

Schooner Carleton, Lieutenant Dacres, 12 six-pounders.

Radeau Thunderer, Lieutenant Scott, 6 twenty-four, 6 twelve-pounders; 2 howitzers.

Gondola Loyal Convert, Lieut. Longcroft, 7 nine-pounders.

Twenty gun-boats, each a brass field-piece, some twenty-fours to nines, some with howitzers.

Four long boats, with each a carriage-gun, serving as armed tenders.

Twenty-four long-boats with provisions.

Extract of a letter from Capt. Thomas Pringle.

"UPON the 11th I came up with the rebel fleet, commanded by Benedict Arnold: they were at anchor under the island Valicour, and formed a strong line, extending from the island to the West side of the continent. The wind was so unfavourable, that for a considerable time nothing could be brought into action with them but the gun-boats; the Carleton schooner, commanded by Mr. Dacres, (who brings their Lordships this,) by much perseverance at last got to their assistance: but, as none of the other vessels of the fleet could then get up, I did not think it by any means advisable to continue so partial and unequal a combat; consequently, with the approbation of his Excellency General Carleton, who did me the honour of being on board the Maria, I called off the Carleton and gun-boats, and brought the whole fleet to anchor in a line as near as possible to the rebels, that their retreat might be cut off; which purpose was, however, frustrated by the extreme obscurity of the night; and in the morning the rebels had got a considerable distance from us up the Lake.

"Upon the 13th I again saw eleven sail of their fleet making off to Crown Point, who, after a chase of seven hours, I came up with in the Maria, having the Carleton and Inflexible a small distance a-stern; the rest of the fleet almost out of sight. The action began at twelve o'clock, and lasted two hours: at which time Arnold, in the Congress galley, and five gondolas, ran on shore, and were directly abandoned and blown up by the enemy; a circumstance they were greatly favoured in, by the wind being off shore, and the narrowness of the Lake. The Washington galley struck during the action, and the rest made their escape to Ticonderoga.

"The killed and wounded in his Majesty's fleet, including the artillery in the gun boats, do not amount to forty; but, from every information I have yet got, the loss of the enemy must indeed be very considerable." Lond. Gaz.

From the New York Gazette, Oct. 7.

His Majesty's forces are now in possession of the city of New York, with all the Harbour and Sound of Long and Staten Islands, and nearly of New York Island. They are also in possession of Powles Hook, and command the East River and Connecticut Sound.

In this Gazette pardon is offered to all deserters from the King's service, who shall surrender themselves on or before the 31st of October, then instant, otherwise the heinousness of their crime will exclude them from the smallest claim to mercy.—The arrival of the Lapwing with several transports, having on board the 17th regiment of light horse, Lieut. Col. Harcourt commander, is likewise declared.—The restoring to New York the liberty of the press is one advantage, among the many, of the King's troops being in possession of that city.

Historical Facts extracted from the Votes and Resolutions of the American Assemblies, and other authentic Materials. (Continued from p. 761.)

THAT a letter from General Washington to the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts-Bay, setting forth, that on the news of the landing of the King's forces in Long-Island, four of the New-England regiments had formed a resolution of returning home, and that he was obliged to order some battalions from the southern provinces to watch them, had very much disconcerted the measures of that assembly; and occasioned great divisions amongst them.

A private letter from New-York, says, that all from the west of the New-Exchange of that city, along Broad-street, to the North-river, as high as the City-Hall, and from thence along the Broad-way and North-river to King's college, are in ruins. St. Paul's church and the college were saved with much difficulty. Trinity church, a principal object of Independent and republican malice, was set on fire in three different places; the Lutheran church, the parsonage and charity-school, are destroyed. Many of the incendiaries were seized with matches in their hands, and instantly put to death. A New England captain was apprehended with matches in his pocket, who said it was the express order of the Continental Congress to burn the city, if not found tenable.

The representatives of the State of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations have passed a Resolve,—“That, if any person within that State shall, under pretence of preaching or praying, or in any other way or manner whatever, acknowledge or declare their late King to be their rightful Lord and Sovereign, or shall pray for the success of his arms, or that he may vanquish and overcome all his enemies, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall, therefore, be presented by the grand jury of the county where the offence shall be committed, to the superior court of the same county, and, upon conviction, shall forfeit and pay, as a fine, to and for the use of that State, the sum of five hundred pounds, lawful money, and pay all costs of prosecution, and shall stand committed to gaol till the same be satisfied.”

That the Greyhound man of war has fallen in with five sail of American transports, from Boston, bound to Georgia, under convoy of a privateer of 18 guns; that the Greyhound sunk the privateer at the first broad-side, and could save only 24 of her men, and that the transports, being deeply laden, are all made prizes. They were laden with military stores, and had, besides, three companies of artillery for the troops under Gen. Lee.

By a proclamation, published at Montreal, and dated Aug. 30, leave is given to the Canadians, by Governor Carleton, to export wheat without limitation; but the exportation of cattle and live stock is by the same proclamation strictly prohibited, as are likewise flour and biscuit, except to the fisheries, Nova-Scotia, and the West-Indies.

History of the Proceedings of the British Parliament. (Continued from p. 784.)

SIR Hugh Palliser denied the facts relative to the deficiency of seamen, and said, that all the ships gone to America were perfectly well manned and equipped for service. As to the vagrants, he said he knew nothing of them; but was clearly of opinion they ought not to be received aboard.

Governor Johnstone strongly condemned the measure of admitting on board his Majesty's men of slovenly, profligate, slothful habits, to vitiate the good discipline and order of the generality of the lower order in the profession.

Lord North said, a vagrant or two might accidentally have been admitted; and censured Mr. Luttrell as disorderly, for repeating what passed in the other house.

Hon. T. Luttrell said the vagrants gone from Winchester gaol, were an inconsiderable part of a great number that he could prove to have been sent on board the King's ships from other quarters; and as to referring to the debates of the other House, he appealed to the gentlemen present, whether he was not justified in so doing, from the example of that pattern of good order, wisdom, and rectitude, the Earl of Sandwich, who had in the House of Lords reviled him in the most indecent terms for what had been said in the House of Commons; and falsely imputed the part he had taken in the present distracted condition of navy affairs, and misconduct of ministers, to personal spleen, ignorance and rancour.

The bill was committed.

March 22.] In committee on the bill.

The Hon. T. Luttrell offered an amendment, to except the natives, and naturalized subjects of France and Spain. He observed, that though this bill was almost verbatim the same as that in 1755; yet it should be considered, that from the nature of that war, the French seamen were of course almost out of the case, and so were those belonging to the whole House of Bourbon; and as the Genoese, who carry on the greatest coasting trade of any of the Italian powers, their natural or bigotted attachment to France, put them also out of the case; as a proof of this, it was well known that M. de Gallioniere's fleet, in 1756, was almost half manned by the natives of that republic. This bill, he said, was giving better encouragement to our natural enemies, than our own mainers; for the former might enter into our merchants service, without a risk of being pressed, as we could by no means compel them to serve on board the King's ships: and it was this apprehension that deterred the seamen of this country country from agreeing with the merchants; for they would find it more to their advantage to go over to Holland, or any remote trading country, and accept of the current wages there, than serve against their fellow-subjects of America, carrying slaughter and unprofitable plunder along the coasts of that fated continent, for the hire of 24 shillings per month.—So, in fact, if this bill passed in its present form, so far from increasing our naval strength, it would only weaken it, by exchanging British seamen for French, Spaniards, and Russians.

Right Hon. T. Townshend seconded the motion.

Sir Grey Cooper said, when a similar bill so this passed 1755, at the breaking out of the late war, not one of the consequences stated by the hon. gentleman who moved the clause, were complained of, felt, or imagined.

The Committee divided; for the amendment 22, against it 35.—Adjourned to March 25.

March 25.] A bill having been brought in by Mr. Jolliffe, for laying a tax upon dogs, in order to ease the poor rates, the order of the day was to go into a Committee on the bill, and the motion being made for the Speaker to leave the chair, it passed in the negative, and the bill of course was dropt.

March 26.] Third reading of the bill for the better supply of mariners' and seamen to serve in his Majesty's and merchants ships.

Hon. T. Luttrell said the bill would destroy the British nurseries for seamen (of late years confined by acts of the legislature within narrow limits) and establish nurseries for foreigners, who are our rivals in commerce, and in them the sovereignty of the seas. He stated the bad policy of instructing the Russians to excel in seamanship, and making our natural enemies of France and Spain perfectly acquainted with our ports, our fortresses, and arsenals in Great-Britain and the colonies: he said, that this bill, added to the measure of employing foreign vessels to carry the German mercenaries to America, effectually repealed all the navigation acts, unless it were admitted that such foreign vessels were seizable, and would become legal captures. This bill was directly counter to our treaties with the African powers, and to our passes for the Mediterranean, and Levant trade; which passes state, that two-thirds of the crew shall be natives or naturalized subjects of Great-Britain.—That from the continued communication with the Barbary-rovers, which must be the consequence of this bill, and the admission of Levant-seamen, there would be much danger of the plague, the only calamity wanted to perfect the present picture of distress, and of sinister fatality to the nation, when we have battle, murder, famine, and nearly a state of bankruptcy; but nothing ever so impolitic, ever so rash, ever so desperate, as to check our career in prosecuting the most unjust, barbarous, disgraceful and destructive war to be found in the annals of any civilized nation since the commencement of the world.—Foreigners were to compose our army in America, foreigners to take charge of our most important garrisons in Europe; two-thirds of our commercial fleets to be manned by foreigners, and foreigners

(the Scotch-Dutch) to have possession of Portsmouth, Plymouth, and the very centre of your empire.

Sir George Young said, two things struck him, which he could not help taking notice of: The first was, the necessity that drove administration to adopt the present expedient; the other, that it went directly to weaken that species of strength, which was our only sure protection against any schemes of ambition, revenge, or national envy, which might be formed on the continent. The first did not barely furnish an argument, that the present war carrying on against our brethren in America, was an unpopular war; it carried demonstration with it, that the body of the people condemned it; and that it was unaccompanied by that degree of conviction and approbation sufficient to rouse the spirit of the English nation, which must be always convinced of the justice of the cause they are called to support, before they engage in it with firmness and alacrity. On the second point, he insisted, that as soon as we became dependent on rival nations for seamen to serve on board our ships of war, or mariners to navigate our trading vessels, at that instant our maritime power, and consequently our great commercial importance, would be at an end. He lamented the present state of our public affairs, and the impolitic measures pursuing against America. He foresaw nothing but inevitable destruction. He feared there were many violent spirits on both sides of the Atlantic. A faint prospect of conciliation appeared on the opening of the session: that, however, through the means of some dangerous, dark, over-ruling influence, was quite vanished; and all hopes of any sort of healing measures were now entirely over.

Lord North said, the same sort of law was passed at the commencement of the late war, and that very singular advantages were then derived from it to the naval strength and commercial interests of this country.

There was no division, the bill passed.

March 27.] Mr. Burke moved for leave to bring in a bill "to prevent the inhuman practice of plundering ships wrecked on the coast of Great Britain, and for the further relief of ships in distress on said coast." He said, he thought something ought to be done to prevent such shameful and horrid practices as had been frequently committed on the several coasts of this kingdom, scarcely a winter passing but our public prints contained accounts which were a disgrace to any civilized country; such matters ought not to pass unnoticed and unpunished. He said, that commercial countries, particularly this, which prided itself so much on its national honour, should take care to do every thing possible in its power to discourage such outrageous proceedings.

The Lord Mayor [Mr. Sawbridge] opposed the motion. He thought the remedy would be worse than the disease: that the laws in being were sufficient, if well executed; and observed, that the same bill had been brought in last session, but after it was read a second time, was, in his opinion, very properly thrown out.

Lord Mulgrave said, he had no objection to the the bill. He thought some remedy ought to be applied to prevent an evil which must be a disgrace to any country where it was permitted; but he doubted of the efficacy of any law brought in on the plan now proposed.

Mr. Rashleigh said, he lived near the sea-coast, where such melancholy accidents, he was sorry to say, too frequently happened; yet he could affirm, from his own knowledge, as well as by every thing he could learn concerning the matter, that the plundering ships was generally prevented by the assiduity and exertions of the neighbouring gentlemen.

Mr. Rice said, the laws in being were sufficient to prevent mischief, and no new law would answer any effectual purpose, if the gentlemen of property and consequence in the neighbourhood were remiss in their duty.

Sir Grey Cooper said he would vote for the motion, because, if negatived, it would have a very strange appearance in the votes, that a bill bearing such a title should be stopped in the first instance but desired it might not be understood that he meant to vote for or support the bill after it was brought in.

Sir George Younge said, he lived in a maritime country, and insisted the execution of the present laws depended on the magistrates; whenever any injury therefore was sustained, it was owing to their neglect: hence it followed, that framing new laws, without ensuring their punctual execution, was doing nothing.

Mr. Burke said, it seemed very extraordinary, that the first magistrate of the first trading city in the world, should oppose a bill designed to protect the property of persons concerned in trade and commerce. He hoped, however, before the matter was further pursued, that gentlemen would rise, declare their sentiments, and take a decided part. For his part, he had no particular reason for pushing such a law. It is true, he thought it might be of service, but if the House disapproved of it, there his task ended, and he should cheerfully acquiesce in whatever it determined. He entreated, therefore, that gentlemen would speak out, and not permit the bill to be brought in, merely for an opportunity to throw it out, after trouble and time had been spent in framing and bringing it in. The question being put, the bill was ordered in by a majority of 56 to 13.

March 28.] No debate; thin house.

March 29.] No debate; only 36 members.

Adjourned to April 1.

April 1.] Lord North moved for leave to bring in a bill to authorize, for a time to be limited, the punishment by hard labour of offenders, who for certain crimes are now liable to be transported to any of his Majesty's colonies and plantations.

Mr. J. Johnstone said, he saw no reason why felons might not be sent to the West India islands, or to Falkland's island; but he forgot, for he supposed a pusillanimous administration, who had betrayed the honour and character of this country, to every petty, shabby state in Europe, and reserved all their spirit for the purpose of oppressing and massacring their fellow-subjects in America, probably in the prevailing rage of ministerial cringing and subsidizing, had given up that island, which cost this nation some millions, by private agreement to Spain. The motion was agreed to, and a bill ordered in.

Mr. D. Hartley. The noble Lord, who presides in the department of the revenue, having announced to the House, that he intends to lay the state of the nation before us on the 5th day of business after the recess; I hope that it will not appear foreign to that purpose, if I suggest to them the necessity of some proper materials being laid upon the table, by the help of which we may be better prepared to enter upon so important a discussion. The state of the national revenue and expenditure, together with the sufficiency of the national powers, are very properly termed by the very noble Lord, to be the state of the nation. It is a subject of such infinite importance, that I need not make an apology to the House, in the present state of things, for recommending a prudent forecast of the ruinous consequences, which must inevitably attend the civil war with our colonies, into which this nation is so blindly and precipitately driven by its ministers. The enormity of the expence, which I shall endeavour to explain to you under the several branches this day, is but the least part of the evil. Even what administration would call success, would be more irrecoverable ruin, by destroying the very source of wealth and strength to this country, than almost any anticipation of the revenue in the first instance.

These are matters of such importance, that I should think myself highly criminal, and a deserter of the trust reposed in me as a member of Parliament, if I did not offer to the house, with great deference, such materials and information as have fallen in my own way, in the course of my best endeavours to obtain information for myself, on the subject of the public revenue. Reposing myself upon that candour of the House which I have so often experienced, I will endeavour to state a few plain facts and plain consequences, without partiality or bias, without respect of persons, and without fear or favour.

It is so much the more necessary that we should come to some explicit understanding of these matters, as the most profound secrecy and concealment have been practised to keep alarming truths from the public eye, and false pretences have been thrown out to amuse the credulous confidence of this House. It is not many months ago, (no longer than the last session) that any member, who got up to warn you of the ferocious and fatal consequences of the war then recommended against America, was laughed at in his place; the very suggestion was treated as being so ridiculous, that the minister proposed to you to begin by disarming; by voting four thousand seamen less than you had kept the year before; and not many days after the meeting of the new parliament, a vote of a three shilling land-tax, was proposed, with a view to soothe the landed men into a confidential compliance with the measures of administration, and into the adoption of this fatal war. That this step was taken with no other view than to quiet and prevent the alarms of the landed interest is past dispute, because the vote for the three shilling land-tax was passed before Christmas, though the bill was not brought in till after the holidays; the vote therefore was studiously thrown out beforehand, to prevent the discontents that might happen, and to mislead the public into fallacious dependence, that a few superficial and unimportant discontents in America, as they were then represented to be, would soon be subdued. Under this deception, the landed gentlemen in this house have been trepanned by every artifice, and the public out of doors have been way-laid by every insidious practice to induce them to acquiescence, in the dependence that ministry would guarantee their country against the evils only suggested by groundless fear. Where are we now? Have not our forebodings been more than realized? Has it been arrant folly in administration, to plunge us into our present situation? or, has it been downright treachery afore-thought, to lead their unsuspecting country, step by step, into an irreconcilable civil war, to dip Great Britain and America in blood, and to cut off the retreat to peace and safety?

History of the present Session of the British Parliament. (Continued from p. 767.)

THE next important debate in this Assembly was on Wednesday, Nov. 6, when Lord John Cavendish rose with a News Paper in his hand, and desired the attention of the House to a subject of very great moment: He then mentioned that a Declaration * said to be by

N O T E.

* The following declaration was published on the 19th of September, by lord Howe and general Howe, addressed to the provincials:

By Richard Viscount Howe, of the Kingdom of Ireland, and William Howe, Esq. General of his Majesty's forces in America, the King's Commissioners for restoring Peace to his Majesty's Colonies and Plantations in North America, &c.

DECLARATION.

"Although the congress, whom the misguided Americans suffer to direct their opposition to a re-establishment of the constitutional government of their provinces, have disavowed every purpose of reconciliation not consonant with their extravagant, inadmissible claim of independency, the king's commissioners think fit to declare, that they are equally desirous to confer with his majesty's well-affected subjects upon the means of restoring the public tranquillity, and establishing a permanent union with every colony as a part of the British empire; the king being most graciously disposed to direct a revision of such of his royal instructions as may be construed to lay an improper restraint upon the freedom of legislation in any of his colonies, and to concur in the revival of all acts by which his subjects there may think themselves aggrieved; it is recommended to the inhabitants at large to reflect seriously on their present condition, and to judge for themselves, whether it be more consistent with their honour and happiness to offer up their lives as a sacrifice to the unjust and precarious cause in his Majesty's Commissioners in America, general Howe and lord Howe, and signed by them, had appeared in the greatest part of the papers of the day, which his lordship was in some doubt about, and wished to know first, from authority, whether he was to consider it as an authentic paper avowed by government, before he proceeded to complain of it. Lord North, thus called upon, said, he believed it to be an authentic paper. Lord George Germaine said the same; and then lord John Cavendish proceeded. He complained of the extreme negligence of the ministry, in not publishing this declaration either in the Extraordinary Gazette of Monday morning, or in the common Gazette of Tuesday night; it appeared to him from this conduct, that the ministry wished only to communicate to parliament, or to the public, the successful operations of the war, and to conceal from both, as long as possible any overtures, however poor, of conciliation, to which they were so averse. His lordship was glad, however tardy, to see some disposition on the part of administration to offer peace to America, and he thought the only way to give effect to this declaration was, for that house to enter immediately into the views of it, and to concur with his majesty in his gracious offer made to the Americans, of revising all acts of parliament by which his subjects there may think themselves aggrieved; and after reflecting on the intentional concealment of this declaration, by not publishing it in the Gazette, his lordship made the following motion: That this house will, on a certain day, resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, for the revival of all those acts of parliament by which his majesty's subjects in America think themselves aggrieved. The motion was seconded by Mr. Burke; and a warm debate ensued.

Lord North replied, and objected to the motion, observing that the declaration had issued from the council, and was most certainly a very merciful and gracious offer on the part of the crown, but he should not enter into the discussion of it; as to the not publishing it in the Gazette, he did not know that it was owing to neglect, but he was well assured no contempt of parliament was, or could be meant, by not publishing immediately all the advices received from New-York. His lordship remarked, that the declaration was publicly agreeable to the sentiments of both houses in their address to the throne upon the speech; that the first opportunity had been embraced by the admiral and the general to declare the king's most gracious intentions; and that now they had been made known publicly at New-York, by these his commissioners, who had been authorised by an act of parliament to restore peace to his majesty's colonies in North America, it would be a very ridiculous measure indeed, to take the negotiation, already which they are engaged, or return to their allegiance, accept the blessing of peace, and to be secured in a free enjoyment of their liberty and properties, upon the true principles of the constitution.

"Given at New-York,
Sept. 19, 1776.

HOWE.
W. Howe."

dy begun, out of the hands of the commissioners, to bring it back again to discussion in that house, and thereby not only to retard, but perhaps to prevent, the happy effect it might speedily have.

Mr. Charles Fox answered the minister, and was very severe; he said that the conduct of administration was perfectly consistent, for throughout the whole fatal American dispute they had treated that house with the utmost contempt; he was always with the majority of the house in one point, though not upon other occasions, in supporting the dignity and privileges of the British house of commons, which in almost every measure relative to America had been shamefully violated. He remarked, that the success of the war against America was readily communicated both to parliament and to the public, in an authentic official manner; but the negotiations for peace, in which they were more deeply interested, as the welfare of this country more immediately depended on them, were concealed, as if the ministers were ashamed to own, as well they might, that after all the expences, and after all the bloodshed in this unhappy contest, they are obliged in the end to offer those very conditions, to which they had turned a deaf ear when proposed by the Americans some years since. For what was the purpose of their petitions, or their remonstrances which you refused to hear, but that you would redress their grievances by a repeal (for as to revivis it is an equivocal term) of all the acts of parliament by which they thought themselves aggrieved? But you did not then think they were aggrieved, therefore you rejected their petitions; and now, after all your victories, you return to an offer of revising these oppressive acts; and the royal instructions to the governors in North America are likewise to be revised. Is not this a plain acknowledgment, that there were many things in them injurious to the freedom of American legislation? He therefore highly approved of the motion, and thought it would greatly forward the reconciliation, by shewing the Americans, that the two other branches of the British legislature concurred with his majesty in the declaration made by his commissioners.

The Solicitor General replied in an animated manner; he seemed to think the motion brought in by surprize, and to have been the joint result of a conversation on Tuesday night at the opera, and of the declaration printed in the morning in the common news-papers; he believed most of the members expected little or no business to be done, and it was only late in the day he heard some extraordinary motion was to be made. He opposed the motion, and warmly justified all the measures pursued against America; declared it was incompatible with the honour of that house, to go into such a committee, now America had assumed independency; he asserted that the declaration was in fact that of both houses of parliament, and founded on their own act, appointing the commissioners; he stated the ill policy of having misrepresentations of the proceedings of the house sent over to America; and said, if once it was known there that the parliament, instead of letting the commission operate, which commission was founded on their own act last session, entered into a full discussion of the conditions offered in the declaration, it would prevent all the good effects that might be expected from it.

Mr. Burke answered the honourable member, and congratulated him, not upon the recovery of his health, but of his voice, which he had lost the other night, (Thursday) and had for once been charmed into silence by the power of reason, and by the elegance and brilliancy of his worthy friend's speech (Mr. Charles Fox.) He then entered at large into the American contest—recapitulated and arraigned the conduct of the ministry from first to last, and amongst other things he said, after having massacred the Americans first by the Hessians and then by lawyers; they now talked of a revival of the acts they had complained of seven years ago; after burning their towns and ruining their commerce, the ministry cry out, “Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest”—But what sort of rest? You shall have magistrates not of your own choosing, taxes without your assent, and laws made for you in England.

He complained bitterly of some expressions in the proclamation for the general fast: he said the purposes of religion were to be inverted; for, we were to go to church in a most impious manner to accuse our American brethren of being deluded into acts of treason by specious falsehoods. This he condemned as blasphemous, and converting the house of God into the tabernacle of Satan. He was called to order, but afterwards proceeded, and justified the resistance of the Americans, but not their declared independence—but the blame of it he laid at the door of the ministry, in delaying so long to send out commissioners to receive the submission of those who were willing to return to their allegiance; and in leaving even the friends of government unprotected.—He also made administration accountable for all the blood that had been shed, and all the horrors of the war; these were the sins we were to atone for, and to deprecate the wrath of Heaven by a general fast; and surely no people ever had more reason to humble themselves before God: he spoke about an hour.

Lord George Germaine apologized for not inserting general Howe's declaration in the Gazette: The ship that brought it came to Falmouth; he only got it on Monday morning; and as it was but part of a negotiation, he thought it of no great consequence to the public. He did not understand that the preliminary negotiations of any peace, before they came to any effect, had been made public by former ministers; he was sure the conferences between Mr. de Buffs and Lord Chatham were never put into the Gazette.

He justified the declaration, and stated the absurdity of agreeing to go into a committee on a subject that had been already discussed, and an act passed to enable the commissioners to make the present declaration; his lordship added, that such a measure would certainly put a stop to the negotiation happily begun by the commissioners, who would not dare to proceed, if they found parliament had taken it out of their hands.

Mr. Dunning replied chiefly to the solicitor general, and to lord George. He told the former, that he had not been to the opera on Tuesday night to collect intelligence of the intended motion, nor had he seen the news-papers; but attending his professional duty on the first day of term, he had been apprized of it, and thought it his duty to give it his support.

The question being called for, on a division the motion was rejected, 109 against 47.

A very interesting though short debate ensued on Friday, November 8, when Mr. Butler moved for 45,000 seamen for the service of the year 1777, including 10,129 marines. Mr. Temple Luttrell did not oppose the motion, but complained in strong terms of the mal-administration of our naval affairs; alledging, that notwithstanding the liberal supplies granted last year, the fleets had not protected our trade, nor any naval force been sent in proper time to the different nations where they were most wanted; that this bulwark of our national defence was shamefully neglected at home, and we were not now in a proper state of defence; in short, he thought the conduct of the first lord of the admiralty so highly culpable, that he should move the house to address his majesty to remove him from the head of the admiralty.

The attorney-general supported the motion for the supply; seemed to give little heed to Mr. Luttrell's complaint; thought the operations of our naval force a flat contradiction to his assertions, but that at all events the intended motion for an address was improper, the house being in a committee. Mr. T. Townshend joined issue with Mr. Luttrell as to the bad management of our naval affairs.

Lord North rose to justify Lord Sandwich; he said he had been a very good servant to the public; and that he was well assured nothing would please the noble lord so much as a proper enquiry into his conduct, because he well knew it would turn out greatly to his honour.

Lord Palmerston, as one of the lords of the admiralty, thought himself called upon by Mr. Luttrell and Mr. Townshend's remarks, to vindicate the conduct of the first lord and of the board; and this he did by expatiating on the great care and expedition that had been used in fitting out the fleets for different stations, in granting convoys the moment they were required, and the humanity of deferring press warrants, till the obliquity of the seamen in refusing to enter voluntarily had made them necessary.

The resolution being then put, it passed; as also another for allowing 4l. per man per month for the maintenance and wages of every seaman.

Mr. Luttrell then moved for an account of the number and force of the ships in commission in Great Britain and Ireland.

The attorney-general objected to this as highly improper at this critical juncture, because it might be conveyed to the maritime powers now arming, and be of bad consequence both at home and abroad.

The question was put on Mr. Luttrell's motion about six o'clock, and negatived without a division.

An Address to the Deity, by the Rev. Robert Baillie, Prebendary of Lattin in the Diocese of Cashell.

THOU! — invisible to mortal sight!
Veil'd in recesses of unfathom'd light!
Yet in thy works, in earth, air, sea and sky,
Seen all around, a present Deity!
Behold a breathing particle of dust,
With mercy's softest eye; who with firm trust,
Yet reverential awe, presents his pray'r,
An homage, tho' imperfect, yet sincere!
Since a sincere, and contrite heart supplies,
In thy esteem, the place of sacrifice,
And th' incense of true worship yields perfume
Of greater value than an hecatomb!
Thy glories rais'd above my feeble tongue,
"Yet not uncelebrated, or unsung," Shall strike my sense, while I've a tongue to praise,

An eye to see, or heart to feel their rays,
Their rays — reflected here with milder grace,
Which angels may contemplate face to face!
Unerring wisdom, and unbounded pow'r,
Who but with prostrate reverence must adore?
Yet pow'r unbounded, wisdom infinite,
View'd in themselves, no pleasure can excite,
For mortals too astonishingly bright!
But when with goodness infinite combin'd,
Goodness — pour'd out upon the human-kind!
Thy attributes grow lovely, nor employ
My wonder only, but my hope and joy;
The doubts and terrors of my soul subside,
And in almighty pow'r I can confide.

December, 1776.

Thy justice no respect of persons knows —

Yet from this spring but little comfort flows;

For tho' impartial justice we admire,

Justice must sinners with despair inspire;

But since harmonious, on thy judgment-seat,

Justice, and mercy, in perfection meet,

Of both, the praise, and glory is complete,

And sinners may for mercy sue, nor fail,

If penitent, tho' justice holds the scale.

When on the sons of men the joint display,

Of justice and of mercy I survey,

That justice join'd with mercy, which decreed,

To save a sinking world, thy son to bleed,

Who cheerfully its ransom undertook,

And bore of wrath divine the dreadful stroke,

The weight of which by none could be sustain'd,

But by the strengthen'd man of thy right hand,

By uncontroul'd benevolence inspir'd,

Oh! may my soul, with holy rapture fir'd,

In gratitude, and awe, and wonder lost,

Of sin aton'd revolve the mighty cost!

Attend his steps to CALV'RY, and improve,

In patience, faith, humility and love!

Hence up to Heav'n on soaring pinions rise,

And join the alleluiah's of the skies!

When cheerful morning climbs the eastern sleep,

And with recruited strength I rise from sleep,

Ere worldly cares their wonted task assume,

My morning worship waits to Heav'n, perfume

And to evening down the western skies

Descends, and of thy gifts brings new supplies.

Q9999

To

To serious thoughts the sober evening bend —
 And pray'rs, an evening sacrifice, ascend !
 And, shutting up the scene, when silent night
 Indulges rest, or to the wakeful sight,
 The heaven's profuse magnificence displays,
 The silent night affords new funds of praise !
 And, in succession, as the seasons roll,
 Th' harmonious round to praise attune my soul !
 If spring breathes fragrance, the perfume is thine ;

If summer glows, thy sun matures the vine ;
 If autumn yields her harvest, thine the heaps ;
 And the refreshment thine, if winter sleeps.
 Does plenty smile, and health her blessings pour ?
 Or famine, hand in hand with plague, devour ?
 Rages the sword ? or to a plow-share bends ?
 Thy mercy these, and those thy vengeance sends ;
 Grant I may either dispensations own,
 By these compell'd, by those to virtue won !
 Whate'er of good is in my portion here
 To thee I owe, to thee the praise refer ;
 Whate'er of ill, or grievous I sustain
 Is but a trial, or perhaps a grain
 Of bitter, from the world to wean my heart,
 Or else correction's salutary smart ;
 The eye of faith can see a gracious GOD,
 Tho' hid in clouds, holding the lifted rod ;
 And conscience, if unprejudic'd her view,
 Must own a heavier stroke were justly due,
 And yet for peace, and pardon I presume to sue. }

Behold ! O LORD ! if foes invade my peace,
 Or debtors are insolvent — I release —
 And to my neighbour if I give offence,
 I own the trespass, and make recompense,
 And ev'ry known propensity to vice,
 Without reserve, to thee I sacrifice.
 Thus are the stipulated terms embrac'd ;
 Each trespass, then, from my account be ras'd !
 That when the final trumpet's awful sound,
 Runs the wide circuit of creation round,
 And hoary time his destin'd course has sped,
 And earth and sea deliver up their dead,
 And plac'd before the JUDGE, the books unfold,

My pardon fully may be found enroll'd.
 Mean-time since weak and frail the human will,
 And here the scene is varied, good and ill,
 Thy pow'r protect me, and thy wisdom guide !
 Temptations foil, and dangers turn aside !
 Each good that suits my present state bestow !
 And blunt the keener edge of ills below.
 But, chief, of moral ills ward off the dart, }

And moral goods, without reserve, impart,
 And thy good SPIRIT purify my heart !
 If pleasure o'er my path her roses spread,
 With cautious fear, and trembling may I tread !
 If virtue point the way, with thorns beset,
 With more than strength herculean may I meet
 The toils, and dangers of the dreary road,
 And gain the true reward — the blest abode !
 In ev'ry circumstance — in sickness, health,
 Success, disasters, poverty or wealth,
 My business in the city, or the field,
 Th' ETERNAL PROVIDENCE my sev'n-fold shield !

And o'er all mine its ample shade extend !
 To our most gracious king protection lend,
 And to my neighbour, relative and friend !
 Nor are my wishes to the narrow sphere
 Of self confin'd or those connected near,

But in an orb, large as the world, would move,
 And only with its limits bound my love !
 Nor mis'ry would permit to enter in,
 If the desire be quite exempt from sin.
 What ! is He then who planted in thy breast
 This sympathetic pain for the distress'd,
 Less tender, less compassionately kind
 Than thou ? Was not this sympathy design'd
 Loudly to speak the great Creator's scope,
 And prove the widow's and the orphan's hope ?
 True—but alas ! how few this refuge find,
 So small the city, and so large mankind !
 What can I then do for them, but implore
 A goodness only equal'd by the pow'r ?
 What—but to thee, Father of Mercies, fly,
 To wipe their tears, and hear their mournful cry !

Behold then, Lord ! the melancholy train,
 Who, with a sad variety of pain,
 Languish away their lives in loathsome cells,
 Where Poverty, in all its horrors, dwells,
 And Charity ne'er reach'd her hand, th' abode
 In desarts buried where she never trod ;
 Or, shut from human converse, and the light,
 Are doom'd, in prisons, to perpetual night ;
 Or, fainting, on the bed of sickness lie,
 To live not hoping, yet afraid to die ;
 Or sink—while for its prey the ocean raves—
 With thoughts more troubled than its wildest waves ;

Or groan, fast bound beneath the tyrant's chain,
 In all the fierce extremity of pain ;
 While the rack'd soul, now faint, and almost spent
 Beneath the horrid arts of punishment,
 And hov'ring, doubtful, o'er the throbbing heart,
 Is, cruelly, not suffer'd to depart,
 But to its shatter'd tenement confin'd,
 To linger out in tortures more refin'd ;
 Behold !—and needful consolation give,
 And, in thy own good season, a reprieve.

But wherefore, Lord ! this dismal shade of woe,

That seems to darken half thy works below ?
 Are these things for thy glory ? or do we
 But a small part of the great system see,
 Which may appear imperfect, while the whole
 Would ev'ry cavil, ev'ry doubt controul ?
 As, in some drama, incidents are seen
 Without connection oft' to intervene,
 Nor can we clearly see the author's view,
 Till the last act unwinds the mazy clue ;
 Then the light rushes in,—the parts agree—
 And bring about some grand catastrophe.
 And in the structure of some princely dome,
 The parts, tho' well proportion'd, may give room
 To some objections, while but half compleat,
 And seem not just, nor beautiful, nor great,
 But when the finish'd pile attracts the sight,
 Each part on each reflecting mutual light,
 To form a perfect whole the parts conspire,
 And all the plan, and workmanship admire ;
 What in thy dealings, thus, may seem severe,
 Will gracious prove, and what mysterious clear,
 And what ill-suited happily dispos'd,
 When the whole scheme of Providence is clos'd,
 Mean time vouchsafe to lend some cheering rays
 Of thy celestial light—teach me thy ways—
 To see their rectitude enlarge my views—
 And, while my soul the arduous path pursues,

The clouds of ignorance and vice remove,
Till all is resignation, joy, and love!

Do not the winds and seas thy word obey?

Oh! teach the moral world to own thy sway;
Behold a scene of far more dreadful woes!

Worthy Omnipotence to interpose;

Of mankind bid the wild disorders cease,
And calm their boist'rous passions into peace;

Their passions—which alone more evils bring
Than from all other sources jointly spring!

Oh! set a barrier to this maddening flood,

And stop th' effusion dire of civil blood;

Say to the vengeful sword, "enough of death;"

"Be thou return'd into thy peaceful sheath;"

That universal amity may reign,

With happiness, and virtue in her train,

Nor man, endued with liberty and choice,

Alone refuse to hearken to thy voice.

But whate'er evils, from restraint let loose,

The rage of human passions may produce,

Or to myself, or to the public weal;

Whate'er distresses I may fear or feel;

To thee, my great Creator! I resign

All my concerns—Oh! let thy grace divine,

Thro' ev'ry storm of life securely pass,

Conduct me to true happiness at last!

'Tis thine, to chuse the path, thro' which it lies,

Mine—thankful to pursue, and grasp the prize;

The glorious prize—which claims such high esteem,

'Twere wise to part with all, to gain the gem.

And can I hope from Heav'n the least regard,
Or grasp at an unspeakable reward?

I—who no greater consequence can boast,

Amid the worlds of life o'er-look'd and lost,

Than can a drop receiv'd into the main,

Or, added to the earth, a single grain!

Nay, who am less than nothing, if a state

So low can be, and sin can uncreate!

Yes—I may hope the bliss that Heav'n imparts,

Since it is not the price of my deserts,

But a free gift, in solemn form bestow'd,

Th' unlimited munificence of God!

Whose all-discerning eye a point surveys,

Plain as the wide expanse of earth and seas,

Which, if compar'd, are but a point—no more—

A grain of sand upon creation's shore!

And tho' this speck of life, to virtue dead,

Be less than nothing, in the balance laid,

Yet to new life—a life of grace—restor'd,

The costly purchase of its suffering Lord!

The new creation must in value rise,

Since born to a reversion in the skies;

Nor can it, thus enhanc'd, be thought so mean,

Amid ten thousand worlds to lie unseen;

Nor yet unheard—since Heav'n vouchsafes to own

The ransom'd captive, an adopted son,

And the Redeemer's pow'rful merits prove

His claim to favour here, and bliss above!

The Heads: Or the Year 1776.

YE wrong heads, and strong heads, attend to my strains;

Ye clear heads, and queer heads, and heads without brains;

Ye thick skulls, and quick skulls, and heads great and small;

And ye heads that aspire to be heads over all.

Derry down, &c.

Ye Ladies—(I would not offend for the world)

Whose bright heads, and light heads, are feather'd and curl'd;

The mighty dimensions dame Nature surpris'd,

To find the'd so grossly mistaken the size.

And ye petit maitres, your heads I might spare,

Incumber'd with nothing—but powder and hair,

Who vainly disgrace the true monkey race,

By transplanting the tail from its own native place.

Enough might be said, durst I venture my rhymes,
On crown'd heads, and round heads, of these modern times;

This slippery path let me cautiously tread—

The neck ellie may answer, perhaps, for the head.

The heads of the Church, and the heads of the State,

Have taught much, and wrought much, too much to repeat;

On the neck of corruption uplifted 'tis said,

Some Rulers, alas! are too high by the head.

Ye schemers and dreamers of Politic things,

Projecting the downfall of kingdoms and Kings;

Can your wisdom declare how this body is fed,

When the members rebel and wage war with the head?

Expounders, confounders, and heads of the Law,

I bring case in point, do not point out a flaw;

If reason is treason, what plea shall I plead?

To your Chief I appeal—for your Chief has a head.

On Britannia's bosom sweet Liberty smil'd,

The parent grew strong while the foster'd the child;

Neglecting her offspring, a fever she bred,

Which contracted her limbs, and distracted her
head.

Ye learned State-Doctors, your labours are vain,

Proceeding by bleeding to settle her brain;

Much less can your art the lost members restore,

Amputation must follow—perhaps something more.

Pale Goddesses of Whim! when, with cheeks lean or full,

Thy influence seizes an Englishman's skull,

He blunders, yet wonders his schemes ever fail,

Tho' often mistaking the head for the tail.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

L O N D O N.

Tuesday, November 5.

AN order was sent from the Admiralty to the Lieutenants of the Navy, not to imprefs the masters of any of the small boats employed in the fishery of the river Thames; but at the same time it was ordered, that no apprentice who had served upwards of four years, should be exempted from serving his Majesty.

This day the States General caused notice to be given at all the sea-ports belonging to the republic, that the report of a peace with the King of Morocco is without foundation.

His Majesty's proclamation was issued, charging all seamen, natural-born subjects of this realm, now in the service of foreign states, to return, on pain of being proceeded against with the utmost severity of the law, and of forfeiting their right of being reclaimed, if taken by Turks, Algerines, &c.—also, offering a reward of 2l. for every able, and 30s. for every ordinary seaman, to any person who shall discover such seamen secreting themselves, so that they may be taken into the King's service by any officer employed for raising men; the said reward to be paid by the Commissioners of the Navy, naval officer, or collector of the customs, as the case may require.

9.] Being Lord-mayor's day, Sir Thomas Hallifax, the Lord-mayor Elect, went as usual to the Court of Exchequer in Westminster-hall, and was sworn into that office for the year ensuing; after which his Lordship returned in procession to Guildhall, where a magnificent entertainment was provided, at which were present the Lord Chancellor, four of the Judges, Lord North, many of the Nobility, and eighteen Aldermen, with a more numerous company of persons of distinction than has been present on the like occasion for many years.

11.] The Lord-mayor gave orders to the city marshal to search the public-houses throughout the city and its liberties, and to take into custody all suspected persons, that such as can give no account of themselves may be sent to serve his Majesty. This method has been judged more effectual than the ordinary method of pressing.

14.] Their Majesties went to the Earl of Derby's house, in Grosvenor-square, and stood sponsors, in person, with the Countess of Carlisle, to his Lordship's new-born daughter, who was baptized by the name of Charlotte.

This day came on, at Holyrood-house, the election of a Peer for Scotland, in the room of Lord Cathcart, deceased, when the Earl of Caithness was unanimously chosen.

15.] The Lord Provost and Magistracy of Edinburgh have added two guineas to the King's bounty, to encourage able-bodied seamen to enlist in his Majesty's service, and one guinea to every ordinary seaman, provided they are resident in, or belonging to Edinburgh, Leith, Newhaven, or to the other liberties of the first mentioned city.

19.] Upon a motion in the Court of King's Bench a rule was moved for to shew cause why an information should not be granted, upon the prosecution of the Right Hon. Lord Viscount Mount Stuart, against Mr. Teafall, late of Tavistock-street, now a money-broker. Mr. McDonald, on the part of the prosecution, stated many facts in aggravation of the offence, with a warmth that made it clear to the whole auditory. He acquainted the court, that some time ago the defendant applied to Mr. Barford, an auctioneer, and a person much concerned in the purchase and disposal of annuities, for the sum of 2100l. which he said he wanted for the use of the prosecutor, Lord Mount Stuart, who was satisfied to grant an annuity at the rate of six years purchase.—Mr. Barford accordingly applied to Mr. Ireland, in Bond-street, who said he had some money disengaged, and acceded to the proposal. Before matters were quite settled, a second application was made by the defendant for another sum to the like amount, which was also consented to. For some days several letters were produced by the defendant, which he said were from his lordship, apologizing for delays; and at length Mr. Barford growing impatient, the defendant proposed a journey down to the seat of lady Windfor, where, he said, his lordship was upon a visit; this was assented to, and the scene of the farce removed to Maidenhead-bridge, where Mr. Barford was left by the defendant, who said he would go to lady Windfor's, and acquaint his lordship of their arrival. Upon his return, he said he had been treated with the utmost politeness by his lordship; but as the conduct of such business would occasion suspicion in the family, his lordship begged it might be deferred for a few days, when he would execute the writings at his house in Hill-street; Mr. Barford was satisfied. Several other letters were produced for many days, when at length his lordship received a card from the defendant, acquainting him, that understanding he had immediate occasion for a sum of money, he took the liberty of offering his services: This was the first moment his lordship ever had the least intimation of the business; and upon enquiry it appeared, that his name had been handed about in a most scandalous manner for several weeks; and that it had come to the knowledge of lord Bute, his lordship's father, who, though greatly concerned at the account, had not mentioned it. Upon these grounds it was presumed the court would interpose their authority, and bring so atrocious an offence to due punishment. The rule was immediately granted.

20.] On Monday night Mr. Clay, high constable for Middlesex, assisted by a number of petty officers, made a general press throughout the parish of St. Giles's, when near 80 men were taken, the greater part of whom were persons in no visible way of livelihood.

The same night, Mr. Lucas, high constable for the city and liberty of Westminster, by the assistance of other peace officers, made a general press throughout this division, when near 100 men were secured.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Buckinghamshire kissed his Majesty's hand at St. James's, on being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of Earl Harcourt.

Same day there was a very numerous general court of the Proprietors of East India Stock, at their house in Leadenhall-street, at the request of ten Proprietors, on special matters, as well as for the consideration of an Advocate General for Bombay, and the salary to be annexed thereunto.

As soon as the Clerk had read over the minutes of the last meeting, the letter for calling the court was read; after which Governor Johnstone, as one of the Proprietors who called it, got up in his place, and stated very particularly his reasons for so doing, which were, "That notwithstanding the several general courts that had been called relative to the dispute between Governor Hastings and the council of Bengal, and notwithstanding that gentleman, by the exertion of his friends, and the justice of his cause, so far received the approbation of the Directors, that they rescinded a resolution of their's for discontinuing him in office, yet he was informed, that on the 10th of last October Mr. Maclean had signified to the Directors Governor Hastings's resignation, which was not only accepted of by the Direction (though not officially made), but recommended, according to the tenor of the late East India Act, to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to appoint Edward Edward Wheeler, Esq; as one of the Council of Bengal, in his room, which was agreed to by his Majesty, and confirmed under his sign manual for that purpose."

The Governor then descanted on the designs of certain persons on the East India Company for some years back, and said they were now bringing them to a point, by confirming the removal of Mr. Hastings. He complimented the gentleman (Mr. Wheeler) who was to succeed him; and said he judged, from the obliging disposition of that gentleman when Chairman, that he would have been repaid in some such manner. The Governor concluded by asking, whether those things were true or not? that according to the answer he should receive, he might be enabled to put a motion on the proceedings.

He was answered by Mr. Maclean, informing the court of the hand he had in the transaction alluded to, who entered into all the particulars of his justification.

After some conversation on this subject, the minutes of the Directors, which contained the process of this business, were read, which essentially agreed with Mr. Maclean's account.

Governor Johnstone then, after prefacing it with some pointed reflections on the precipitate conduct of the Directors, and their not legally having it in their power to accept such a resignation, made the following motion:

"That all the evidences relative to the supposed resignation of Governor Hastings, together with the appointment of Edward Wheeler, Esq; to be one of the Council in Bengal, should be laid before the Council retained in the East India Company's affairs, to know whether the same were warranted by law."

This was seconded by Mr. Baker, and opened a fresh field of debate, which lasted for several hours.

These debates were at last closed, by putting the previous question; when the original question was lost by 107 to 38.

Mr. Rous then made a motion to the following purport, which, after some debate, was agreed to go to ballot on that day se'night: "That as Mr. Hastings has signified to the Court of Directors his wish to resign, and as, in consequence of such resignation, a vacancy will be occasioned in the council at Fort William, in Bengal, it was proper to have the number completed by a new appointment." This was followed by another motion, which was carried unanimously, that the whole of the proceedings should be printed for the use of the Proprietors before the ballot.

Mr. Baker then rose, and said, as the court was made special, he was anxious to know from the chair, whether a report, which was very confidently circulated, was true or not, relative to an agreement being on the tapis between the Directors and the Ministry, for enlisting such Americans as should be taken in arms, as soldiers for the East. Mr. Baker made some pertinent observations upon this (allowing it to be true), as well as general observations on the conduct of Ministry in this American war; but was called to order by the other side of the house, who did not seem to relish the last part of this subject.—The Chairman, however, satisfied Mr. Baker and the court, "that though such a scheme was talked of, it was totally laid aside, on account of the impracticability of it."

These subjects being all got rid of, the appointment of an Advocate General for Bombay, with an annexed salary, came under consideration; but the hour being late, the Proprietors fatigued with debate, and by the 27th bye-law, another general court being necessary for every new appointment above 100l. a year, the court, after forming the following motion, "That it be recommended to the court of Directors to appoint John Day, Esq; as Advocate General for Bombay, with a salary of 3000l. a year," postponed the further consideration of it, and then adjourned.

23.] A copy of the Marquis de Grimaldi's letter to the governor of Bilbao, is handed about, in the Spanish language, relative to the American corsair, which had taken five English ships, and was detained at Bilbao, at the request of the English Vice Consul, the substance of which letter is nearly as follows:—"That having received advice from the governor of Bilbao respecting the detention of an American ship, named the Hawke, Capt. John Lee, and the several attestations of the persons concerned, which had been laid before his Majesty, he had been pleased to declare, 'that in consequence of the amity subsisting between his Catholic Majesty and the King of Great Britain, he should maintain a perfect neutrality during the present war; that he should not give any aid to the colonists; but should not deny their being admitted into any ports of his dominions, while they conformed to the laws of the country. In consequence of which the governor was ordered to set at liberty the American vessel, to deliver back his papers, and to supply him with provisions, water, &c. (care being taken that no prohibited goods be sent on board) as should enable him to proceed on his voyage. Dated at St. Ildefonso, O^c. 7, 1776.

(Signed)

Et Marquis de GRIMALDI."

Yesterday was held a court of Aldermen at Guildhall, to take into consideration a letter from Philip Stephens, Esq; secretary of the admiralty, relating to the application of that court on Tuesday last, for the release of one of the city watermen, who had been impressed into his majesty's service. The letter being read, a motion was made, and carried, that the solicitor of this city do move for a Habeas, to bring the waterman from on board; and that no magistrate shall give power to impress in this city.

25.] At the court of common council held last Friday at Guildhall, the Mayor acquainted the court, that the occasion of calling them together was to lay before them a letter the town clerk received from Philip Stephens, Esq; secretary to the lords of the admiralty, in answer to a letter he wrote to their lordships, by direction of the court of aldermen, concerning John Tubbs, one of the city watermen, being impressed. The proceedings of the court of aldermen thereon were read; William Dawson, Esq; water-bailiff, was called in and examined concerning the same.—The opinion of Mr. Wedderburne, Serj. Glynn, Mr. Dunning, and Mr. Common Serjeant, on a case stated concerning the legality of press warrants, by the direction of Ald. Crosby, Lord Mayor in the year 1770, was read. The court agreed that the city solicitor should take such steps as may be necessary to obtain a Habeas Corpus for John Tubbs, to procure his discharge. A committee of six aldermen and 12 commoners were appointed to manage and conduct the same. The committee was empowered to pursue such other measures as they shall think proper, for procuring the immediate discharge and liberation of John Tubbs, and that the solicitor-general do follow their directions therein. The court resolved unanimously, that they would at all times be ready to assist government, by every legal and constitutional measure, to raise an armament to oppose our natural enemies, whenever due information shall be given that it be necessary. A report of the committee of the city lands, respecting Mr. Hartley's plates for securing buildings from fire, was agreed to. The court agreed, that the freedom of this city be presented to David Hartley, Esq; in consideration of the advantages likely to accrue to the public by his inventions for securing buildings from fire, and for his respectful attention to the city in his repeated experiments, performed before many of the members of that court. The copy of the freedom, with the resolutions of the court inserted therein, to be delivered by the chamberlain to the said Mr. Hartley, and the report and resolution to be fairly transcribed and signed by Mr. Town-Clerk, and by him presented to Mr. Hartley.

The following are true copies of the Town-Clerk's letter to the lords of the admiralty, by order of the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, and the answer of Philip Stephens, Esq; secretary to their lordships:

"My Lords, William Dawson, Esq; this city's water-bailiff, having this day informed the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, that lieutenant Tate, of Gravesend, did, on the 3d instant, impress John Tubbs, one of this city's watermen, I am directed by the said court to desire your lordships will give orders for the immediate discharge of the said John Tubbs. I have the honour to be, my lords, your lordships most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM RIX, Town-Clerk."

Town-Clerk's office, Guildhall, Nov. 19.
To which letter the Town-Clerk received this answer:

"Sir, Admiralty Office, Nov. 20, 1776.

"Your letter of yesterday contains a demand on the part of the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, of the immediate discharge of John Tubbs, who has been impressed, and is stated to be one of the city's watermen.

"This is a solemn demand of his discharge as a matter of right, as to which I am directed by the lords commissioners of the admiralty to observe to you, that the condition of John Tubbs makes him clearly liable, in law, to be impressed, inasmuch, that if he had absconded to avoid the press, he would have been punishable by the court of aldermen for so doing.

"As matter of right, therefore, it is impossible to give him up; and the demand being made in that form, renders it equally impossible to shew that degree of attention to their application which it might otherwise, if circumstances would have allowed it, have been their lordships inclination to have done.

I am, Sir, your very humble servant,

"PH. STEPHENS."

30.] The gangs now press in the city, and carry the men on board the tenders. Several were pressed yesterday, and the gangs say they are authorized so to do.

The following is the American Account of the Action on Long Island.

Extract of a letter from New York, dated Sept. 1.

"LAST Monday morning we went over to Long Island, and about midnight we were alarmed by the return of some of our scouting parties, who advised us that the enemy were in motion, and coming up the island with several field pieces. It was generally thought not to be the main body, but only a detachment, with a view to possess themselves of some advantageous heights. Upon which near 3000 men were ordered out, consisting chiefly of the Pennsylvania and and Maryland troops, to attack them on their march. About sun-rise we came up with a very large body of them; the Delaware and Maryland battalions made one party. Colonel Atlee, with his battalion, a little before us, had taken post in an orchard, and behind a barn, and on the approach of the enemy he gave them a very severe fire, which he bravely kept up for a considerable time, until they were near surrounding him, when he retreated to the woods. The enemy then advanced to us; upon which Lord Sterling, who commanded, immediately drew us up in a line, and offered them battle in the true English taste. The British army then advanced within about three hundred yards of us, and began a very heavy fire from their cannon and mortars; for both the balls and shells flew very fast, now and then taking off a head. Our men stood it amazingly well, not even one of them shewed a disposition to shrink.

"Our orders were not to fire until the enemy came within fifty yards of us; but when they perceived we stood their fire so coolly and resolutely, they declined coming any nearer, although treble our number. In this situation we stood from sun-rise to twelve o'clock, the enemy firing upon us the chief part of the time, when the main body of their army, by a route we never dreamed of, had entirely surrounded us, and drove within the lines, or scattered in the woods, all our men except the Delaware and Maryland battalions, who were standing at bay with double their number. Thus situated, we were ordered to attempt a retreat, by fighting our way through the enemy, who had posted themselves, and nearly filled every field and road between us and our lines.

"We had not retreated near a quarter of a mile before we were fired upon by an advanced part of the enemy, and those upon our rear were playing upon us with their artillery. Our men fought with more than Roman virtue, and I am convinced would have stood until they were shot down to a man. We forced the advanced party, which first attacked us, to give way; through which opening we got a passage down to the side of a marsh, seldom before waded over, which we passed, and then swam a narrow river, all the time exposed to the fire of the enemy. The companies commanded by captains Ramsay and Scott, were in the front, and sustained the first fire of the enemy, when hardly a man fell.

"The whole of the right wing of our battalion, thinking it impossible to march through the marsh, attempted to force their way through the woods, where they were almost to a man killed or taken. The Maryland battalion has lost two hundred and fifty-nine men, amongst whom are twelve officers: captains Veazy and Bowey, the first certainly killed; lieutenants Butler, Sterrett, Dent, Courley, Mufe, Prawl; ensigns Coats and Fernandes: who of them are killed, or who prisoners is yet uncertain. Many of the officers lost their swords and guns. We have since entirely abandoned Long Island, bringing off all our military stores.

"Generals Sullivan and Sterling are both prisoners; colonels Atlee, Miles, and Piper are also taken. There are about a thousand men missing in all.

"We took a few prisoners. By a lieutenant we took, we understand, they had about 23,000 men on the island that morning. Most of our generals were on a high hill in our lines, viewing us with glasses when we began our retreat; they could see the enemy we had to pass through, tho' we could not. Many of them thought we would surrender in a body without firing. When we began the attack, general Washington wrung his hands and cried out, good God! what brave fellows I must this day lose! Major Guest commanded the Maryland battalion, the colonel and lieutenant colonel being both at York. Captains Adams and Lucas were sick. The major, capt. Ramsey, and lieut. Plunket, were foremost, and within 40 yards of the enemy's muzzles, when they were fired upon by the enemy, who were chiefly under cover of an orchard, save a few that shewed themselves, and pretended to give up, clubbing their firelocks until we came within that distance, when they immediately presented and blazed in our faces."

Kilcullen, Dec. 8. The following melancholly accident happened on Wednesday night last at Kill, near Naas. One Lallin, a carman, who lived at Kill, on his way home from Dublin, with four empty cars (on the last of which he sat) opposite the Cross-keys inn jumped from the car, and was entangled with a rope, which got round his leg in such a manner as to throw him on the ground, and render his separation from it impossible. Thus suspended, without any possibility of rescuing himself from his impending fate, he was dragged to his house, for the length of two miles, by which his thigh, side and ribs, (next the ground) from his knee to his head, were entirely rubbed away to the bone. He languished about 20 hours, and then expired in the greatest agony.

There is in the hot-house of Mr. Shields, nursery-man at Lambeth, near London, a plant lately brought from China, which has a very wonderful motion in the leaves; they grow in pairs, one of which keeps regularly moving upwards, and the other at the same time downwards. The quickness and strength of the motion, depend a good deal on the heat of the sun; and in the night there is none at all. It is reckoned by naturalists to be the strongest proof of the analogy between plants and animals, of any that has yet been known. It is a hot-house plant, and will not in this climate bear the open air.

December 9.] On Friday se'nnight the Sophia, a large smuggling cutter, bound from Gotteburgh to Ruff, with a very valuable cargo of silks, teas, brandy, rum, &c. was lost off the Banks of Lurgan Green; the hands were saved by taking to their boat. Information was immediately given to the revenue officers on that part of the coast, who attended as soon as the tide was out, when the vessel was left nearly dry on the said Banks, and seized as much of the cargoes as they possibly could take out of the wreck before the beat to pieces; they lodged their seizure in an adjoining house, under the guard of a serjeant and twelve men, until cars could could be provided to convey it to the stores in Dundalk; before this could be completed, a great number of armed smugglers joined the crew, attacked the said guard, and rescued 16 ear-loads of the goods so seized, which they effectually carried off.

Admiralty Office, Dec. 9, 1776.

Advice was received by express, that a fire broke out in the Rope House in his majesty's yard at Portsmouth, about half an hour after four o'clock, on Saturday in the afternoon, which burnt with great violence, and consumed the same, except the outer walls, which are standing; but by the timely assistance and vigorous efforts of the workmen of the yard, the seamen of his majesty's ships, the marines quartered at Portsmouth, and the men belonging to the ordnance, with their respective officers, it was happily prevented from extending to any other of the buildings in the yard, and was totally got under at ten o'clock last night, nothing but the embers being left burning. The loss sustained by this accident, except the damage done to the Rope House, is not considerable, consisting chiefly of part of the implements belonging to the rope-makers and Rigging-house, a small quantity of cordage, and some toppings of hemp. It is not yet discovered by what means the accident happened.

The fire broke out in three different places in the Rope House, which is occasionally used for the Rigging House, and was so fierce that in a few minutes the said house, which was 364 yards in length and 21 broad, was on fire from one end to the other, and the whole building is entirely consumed.

On Thursday evening, December 5, in London, about ten o'clock, died her Grace Elizabeth Duchess of Northumberland, in her own right Baroness Percy, Lucy, Poyninges, Fitz-Pain, Bryan, and Latimer. She was heiress and sole representative of many great families, being the only daughter of Algernon Seymour, the last duke of Somerset of his branch, and through him descended from the illustrious family of Percy, antient earls of Northumberland; her grandmother being the only child of Joceline Percy, last earl of Northumberland, who died in 1670. By the most happy marriage with his grace the present duke of Northumberland, she has left two surviving sons, viz. 1st. Hugh earl Percy, one of the members for Westminster, who is at present a lieutenant general in his majesty's service in America, and who succeeded her grace in her baronial honours; and 2d. Lord Algernon Percy, one of the knights of the shire for Northumberland.

With a most princely fortune, devolved to her from her ancestors, her grace sustained her exalted rank through her whole life with the greatest dignity, generosity, and spirit; and will ever be considered as one of the first characters of this age. Her extensive charities to the poor, her encouragement of literature and the polite arts, and her generous patronage of every kind of merit, not to mention her tender affection to her family, her warm attachment to her friends, and her goodness to her servants, make her death a public loss, and will cause it to be long lamented.

Her grace died on her birth-day, having just completed her sixtieth year.

An ox was killed lately at Jedburgh, England, by Mr. Spinner. It never had any turnips; the four quarters weighed 140 stone, the tallow weighed 17 stone 2 pounds. His hide was sold for three guineas.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For the YEAR 1776.

Extract of a Sermon preached at St. Paul's, New-York, the Day subsequent to the Attempt to destroy that City by Fire. By the Rev. Mr. O'Beirne, Chaplain to Lord Howe.

Jeremiah xii. 15.

"And it shall come to pass after that I have plucked them out, I will return and have compassion on them, and will bring them again every man to his heritage, and every man to his land."

THIS Sermon is suitably adapted to the occasion on which it was preached, viz. the restoration of the free exercise of the public worship in the episcopal church of New-York, after the reduction of the city by Gen. Howe, and the attempt to reduce it to ashes by the incendiaries.

Who, says the preacher, that was witness of the cruel and disastrous deed of the night before last, could promise himself that you should be assembled this day in the house of God, to praise him for your wonderful deliverance? Who could have hoped that this temple would remain a monument of the returning favour of Heaven, amidst the horror of the ruins through which you must have passed to approach it? Which of you could have said to himself, that he should see these doors opened once more for the reception of the faithful,

Appendix, 1776.

"though as yet but as the shaking of an olive tree, and the gleanings grapes when the vintage is done?"

After some pertinent reflections on the sensations of grief and joy that had so rapidly succeeded each other; and after warning his hearers against prophets prophesying lies, in the name of the Lord, who sent them not, he opens the subject of his discourse by the consideration of the grateful sense they should entertain of the goodness of God in their deliverance.

The immediate impressions of gratitude for the present benefits, says he, are strong, lively, and affecting. We feel them with warmth; we express them with rapture. But when the first sense of our deliverance is past, when our enemies are suppressed, and the danger removed, we are too apt to forget the resolutions we formed in the hour of distress; the God of our salvation is forgotten, and repaid with ingratitude, neglect, and disobedience.

All that is sacred or dear upon earth—your religion, your civil rights and liberties, the enjoyment of your property, the freedom of your persons, the worship of your your God, the comfort of the sacraments, the preference and exhortation of your ministers—all that you possessed, and gloried in, as British subjects and as Christians, wrestled from you by violence and oppression, while “the shepherds were smitten, and the sheep of the flock scattered abroad”—all these blessings, valuable surely, if there be any so on this side the grave, and the dearer to you now for having been so cruelly deprived of them, hath your God begun to restore to you in this your day; and with his stretched-out arm, in a manner visible to every eye, brought you back to a prospect of happier days, and placed you again under the protecting care of the ancient guardians of your religion and liberty. And can it be possible that you should ever suffer the remembrance of the divine mercies, thus extended to you, to be blotted out from your minds? It were doing wrong to those who have suffered with the fortitude and perseverance, the loyalty and attachment to their sovereign, which have distinguished the friends of government in this colony, even to suppose it. And I should hope that they who have endured so long and painful a trial, rather than renounce their loyalty, or the religious principles on which that loyalty is chiefly founded, will never hereafter be guilty of any action, or pursue any conduct, that can disgrace them as good subjects, or as virtuous Christians.

Having thus pathetically exhorted them to persevere in their grateful acknowledgments to the God of their redemption, he next proceeds to point out to them the ~~see~~ they should make of returning mercy; that they should humble themselves beneath the divine chastisement; and that from the excesses of others they should learn meekness and moderation; nor presume to deal out the bolts of Almighty vengeance against those whom his justice may arraign as guilty of such a profanation.

Having enlarged upon this affecting subject, he then considers the steps that led their country into its present calamitous state.

“My son, fear thou the Lord and the King, and meddle not with them that are given to change”—was the excellent rule laid down by the wisest of men. Against those who transgress it, he denounces a sudden and inevitable destruction: nor is it possible to foresee the miseries they may entail on themselves and their descendants—“their calamity shall rise suddenly, and who knoweth the ruin of them both?” The words are remarkable, but they are dictated by wisdom, and supported by experience.

Call then to mind the happy and prosperous days this colony enjoyed, when loyalty to your Sovereign, affection to the constitution of your parent-state, and obedience to the laws you enjoyed under its protection, distinguished it above all the other provinces of America. Your condition was then an object of envy to nations corrupted by the refinements of luxury. Peace was in your dwellings, plenty in your streets—industry diffused her blessings through your fields with an increasing profusion, giving life to all the useful arts, and nurturing them daily into maturity and perfection. The produce of your country flowed from your port in a constant, uninterrupted stream, and you received in return the conveniencies and comforts of life, and all the elegancies which a free and extensive commerce can bestow on a prudent and contented people. A friendly, hospitable, and social intercourse united you together as the members of one family, to the admiration and delight of strangers who resided among you; you were blessed beyond the usual lot of men; happy, completely so, did you but know how to value your happiness, and to preserve it!

Alas! what a change of prospect will the reverse exhibit! where shall we seek for that treasure of happiness which you could boast when every man sat under his own vine, and eat his bread with cheerfulness? Is it not wasted all, and consumed in visionary schemes, empty and fanciful as the dreams of the morning? Is it not squandered away in lawless and ungrateful attempts, repugnant to every principle, divine and human? In pursuits which plain sense and reason condemn, and at which even the impulses of nature must recoil? Peace, frightened from the seats where once she loved to dwell, long since took her flight from among you. Dissentions, party-rage, public enmities, and private animosities, usurped her place, and brought with them a horrid train of mutual fears, distrusts, and endless jealousies. By these were the confidence and harmony of all social intercourse destroyed? by these were the bands of love and friendship torn asunder; by these were even the ties of consanguinity and nature dissolved. Self-interest, self-preservation, the welfare of posterity, principles ingrafted in the human mind by the beneficent Creator, were all confounded and lost in this dark and dismal night of confusion, anarchy, and licentiousness.

From what cause your sufferings may have have originated, this is not the time, nor the place, to consider. Too certain it is, that they have now risen to such a height of aggravation, as needs no words to represent to you—you feel it beyond the energy of words. Whatever the principles of your persecutors may be, their unrelenting malice is but too notorious. To what a scene were you witnesses the night before last: when just escaped from the storm, and imagining yourselves arrived at a port of rest—to awake at the midnight hour, and find your city in flames! to see your all perishing before your eyes, and to know that your destroyers were secretly among you, spreading the ruin, and exulting in the success of their infernal scheme!

Yes, my friends, ye were witnesses of it—Ye saw the treacherous adherents of these pretended guardians of your rights and possessions, who came to rescue you from tyranny and oppression, armed with firebrands, and, under cover of the darkness, wrapping your city in flames. Ye saw the brave and generous servants of your King—that King whom you have so often heard represented as a tyrant, who sends forth his fleets and armies to enslave, ravage, destroy—flying to the assistance of their fellow-subjects, in the midst of the flames, at the hazard of their lives, exerting every nerve to preserve your dwellings and possessions, and tearing from the hands of the dark incendiaries the instruments they had prepared for your destruction.

Having pathetically described the ruin and destruction of that fatal night, the preacher proceeds to administer some consolation to the sufferers, by shewing what God had already done in their favour, and animating them to perseverance in their duty, and reliance on the Divine Being.

Let a reciprocation of kindness and humanity distinguish you, says he, in this season of distress, to soften the rigour of each others sufferings, and lighten the universal burthen of affliction. Be of one heart, and one mind; cleave together, commend yourselves to the protection of God, and doubt not but he will complete the work he hath already so graciously begun.

I must not finish as if I meant to disappoint your expectations, and not adopt a conclusion which I am convinced you have already anticipated. The allegiance they had sworn to their lawful sovereign, and an affectionate attachment to his virtuous character, compelled your clergy to shut these doors rather than omit the dutiful addresses which the church enjoins them daily to offer to Heaven for his safety. Let us, therefore, conclude the service of this day, when the freedom of your worship is restored to you, by uniting together, with one heart, and one voice, to implore the divine favour and protection for our Sovereign Lord, King George; that God would be pleased to give him length of days, and increase of happiness—to prosper all his undertakings for the good of his people, and to bless him with what his actions prove, and his words assert to be, the “* favourite wish of his heart, the restoration of harmony, and the re establishment of order and happiness in every part of his dominions.”

The Passions; or, 'Tis all Machinery: They do what they will. Translated from a posthumous Fragment of Helvetius.

DISPUTE it not, said I, Sophronius; 'Tis all machinery. We are wrought upon entirely by our feelings, our appetites, our passions; and even these are agitated by every breath of accident, every caprice of fortune, every vagary in nature. The examples are hurrying so rapidly to my memory, and soliciting so strongly for communication, that—that—that—'Tis all Machinery: the whimsy urges, and every body feels, or hath felt, that our passions are irresistible—They do what they will.

Poor Carius! Why so 'disconsolate? Thou, whose temper inclineth to every thing airy, every thing light, wherefore seekest thou, even in the middle of a summer morning, the dark recesses of the closet? Why are the shutters of the window closed, to interrupt the cheerful sunbeams? Why that sombre solemnity of brow?—Heavens, man! the tear is swimming in thine eye—Ho, ho, now I perceive the cause: Chloe has sent thee an angry letter; she chides, she complains, she resolves to banish thee from her presence for ever. Well may'st thou sigh, well may'st thou seek the solitary corner. Well may'st thou crush the cruel epistle; now tremble over the contents, and now tear it to pieces.—The whimsy urges, and 'tis all machinery. The passions play on him—they do what they will.

But soft! the scene changes; Carius's servant enters, and presents a paper: it seems superscribed in the same character. Wafer, by your leave. If smiles, pleasing tremblings, agreeable agitations evidence any sensations, the news is good.

R r r r r 2

Ha,

N O T E.

* See his Majesty's speech at the conclusion of the session of parliament.

Hia, ha, ha! open, open the shutters this moment; throw up the shades; admit the now welcome light of heaven; lay out my most brilliant suit; prepare my chariot, and look to the pliant springs, that they may carry me thither with the speed of thought. Hoity-toity! Whither in such a hurry, my impetuous friend?—Not a word?—Is't then so? Dost thou permit me to peruse it?—Now for it then.

To Carius.

My anger is past. I have been to blame. I charge thee to come this moment, and seal my pardon; seal it upon my lips.

Chloe.

No wonder the young gentleman flew; the passions prompted, and they do what they will. Poor fellow! he leapt from the ground into the carriage, light of heart, light of heel; 'tis all machinery. The whimsy urges me to follow him—Fancy flies faster than the swiftest pair of horses; she enables me to see him rush from the chaise into the fair arms of Chloe. Delicious moment, enriched by the rapture of reconciliation! The little transient cloud is blown over, and it is love's meridian. Oh, roguish nature! how she colours the cheek! how she plays with the heart! What a precious palpitation! Poor Carius, how art thou fixt upon the lip! Poor Chloe, how prettily thou fallest upon the young man's shoulder! They are both subdued by those passions which do what they will; and the victorious extacy shews, 'tis all machinery.

The hour of returning is come. They recover from one passion, to fall a victim to another. And must we part? Oh, insupportable! Ah, Chloe! Ah, Carius!—Farewell, farewell. In his way home, the carriage is, by the carelessness of the driver, overthrown; the arms of Carius are both broken. From the gaieties of love, he is carried to the sorrows of a sick chamber. The shutters are again closed, the curtains are again drawn. The surgeon appears with a pedantic face, and the instruments of torture; the burning-fever, the irregular pulse, the insupportable agony succeed. The soul sympathises with the body. 'Tis all machinery. Chloe, mean time, not yet having heard any thing of the matter, is secretly rejoicing at the many little tokens of tender fidelity discovered in the behaviour of her lover; she gives, therefore, innocently loose to the luxury of the sweet suggestion. She hummed an air, of which every trill denoted the happiness of the singer. She played a tune upon the guitar, and suited it to the enchanting hopes of her situation. A neighbour came in, somewhat hastily; but she, in a still greater hurry, insisted upon drinking a glass of good wishes to her friend Carius. She ran to the side-board, and presented the glass—I must insist on your congratulating me on my reconciliation with my friend Carius, with whom I had a little quarrel: but I am now all life, joy, and transport, for Carius has been with me, and all is over. 'Tis all machinery, you know, Sir. All is over, indeed, madam, for I fear Carius is dead—The glass and Chloe fell upon the floor, 'Tis all machinery. The gentleman was much affected, applied all his endeavours to recover the lady: he flung, he soothed, he swore, he cursed himself for his rashness, though he was the most deliberate of men.—Carius was not dead. The lovers were both languishing, and messages were every hour dispatched to make enquiries. One day the tidings were bad, and then they were both worse—'Tis all machinery; another day brought better news, and then the hopes of both revived—'Twas all machinery. Gradually, both recovered. The village bells rang, the cottages made a holiday, and the hey-day of health returning, 'twas all machinery: Carius and Chloe were married. At the end of the first year, the wife became a parent. Good heaven! what rejoicings on the morning of the child's birth! the mother's pains were soothed by her hopes. The father prayed, sung, went and laughed by turns; he kissed his suffering Chloe ten thousand times, in token of gratitude; and he sat by the side of the bed—'Twas all machinery. The child made up a wry, discontented face, on its first entrance into this wicked world. The gossips congratulated the parents on its roaring stoutly. 'Twas in fact, nothing but machinery. About the middle of the day, the child fell into fits; gloom overspread the whole family—the father wept, the mother sobbed.—'Twas all machinery. In the evening, the poor little one, being unable to support the convulsions, died.—All was silence, solitude and sorrow; the gossips went away. The curtains were a third time drawn; sadness presided over the whole ceremony: but still 'twas all machinery. Time is a certain lenitive, and yet, neither Carius nor Chloe ever believed they should taste another day's pleasure. Never—no never, my dear, shall we again be happy; our first-born, our darling, is in the grave: happiness, farewell. About six weeks after this, when Chloe had got again into her parlour, a man, on a panting, hard-riden horse, brought a letter for Carius.

Your rich uncle William is dead. You are, unexpectedly, heir to his whole fortune, tune, amounting to several thousand pounds a year. His horses, his parks, his every thing are yours.—

Only think of this, Chloe: we can now have our town house, and our country house, our coach and our chariot, our phaeton, and our vis-a-vis; aye, and what is better, if you and I should again be blessed with a babe, we can make him as rich as Cræsus.—Heigho! sighed Chloe. Pshaw, replied Carius, we are both young, and we love one another: let us enjoy our new possessions; children will come of course. Will they? Ah, Carius, I wish we had such another as poor dear Billy.—Can you doubt it, Chloe?—He gave her a kiss of promise, and she appeared to have more faith. Nature and Cupid sat laughing. Imagination saw them. 'Twas all machinery.

In two or three months afterwards, they were the happiest couple in the universe; the increase of person in Chloe, encreasing their happiness: now and then, however, they quarrel'd, now and then made it up; now and then they kissed, and now and then they cried: they were now and then disposed to repine, and now and then inclined to be satisfied; now and then trifles pleased them, now and then teased them: twenty hours produced twenty changes; but in every change, it was still machinery. Upon the whole, Carius and Chloe were very good sort of people; they buried three children, yet still lived to have happy hours; they brought up four, yet could fairly have parted with three of them, who were good for nothing. In a word; it was all a wonderful motley mixture of health, and sickness, joy and grief; it was human life: 'twas the constant whimsical workings of those passions, which do what they will; it was all machinery.

Anecdote of Wallis, Dean of Derry.

IN the reign of that unfortunate monarch whose abdication put a period to the regal honours of the house of Stuart, Doctor Wallis was then dean of Waterford, in Ireland; and during the troubles of that unhappy country at that period, suffered greatly in his private fortune, from his strong attachment to the protestant faith. After peace was restored, and our religion firmly established by the accession of king William, Wallis was presented at the court of London, as a gentleman who had well merited the royal patronage: the king had before heard the story of his sufferings, and therefore immediately turning to the dean, desired him to choose any church preferment then vacant. Wallis (with all the modesty incident to men of real worth) after a due acknowledgment of the royal favour, requested the deanery of Derry. "How!" replied the king in a transport of surprise, "ask the deanery! when you must know the bishopric of that very place is also vacant?" "True, my liege," replied Wallis, "I do know it, but could not in honesty demand so great a benefice, conscious there are many other gentlemen who have suffered more than myself, and deserved better at your majesty's hands; I therefore presume to repeat my former request." It is needless to add his request was granted. They parted;—the dean highly satisfied with his visit, and the king astonished at the noble instance of disinterestedness, he had just been a witness of.—What a mind did this man possess! How praise-worthy! How laudable an example to his cloth! How different from the greedy pluralists of this age! How many of our dignified clergy can lay their hands upon their hearts, and say with the dean of Derry—"I am satisfied?"

Anecdote of Mr. Whiston.

THE late king being fond of old Whiston, (celebrated for his various strictures on religion) happened to be walking with him one day in Hampton-Court gardens, during the heat of his persecution; as they were talking upon this subject, his Majesty observed. "That however right he might be in his opinions, it would be better if he kept them to himself." "Is your Majesty really serious in your advice?" answered the old man. "I really am," replied the king. "Why then," says Whiston, "had Martin Luther been of this way of thinking, where would your majesty have been at this time?"

*The Adventures of Miss Sophia Sternheim :
From the German of Mr. Weiland.*

P A R T II.

The Villainy of Lord Derby.—Sophy imposed upon.—Leaves her Uncle's.—Derby's Perfidy.—Sophy retires to her friend Emily.—Lord Seymour's Distress at the Intelligence he hears.—Sophy assumes a new Character.

LORD G—, who was minister from the British Court, and uncle to Lord Seymour, had resided for some time at D—, and had greatly interested himself in the welfare of Sophia, who had been recommended to him by one of her relations, Count R—, at Florence. He had been present at the Masquerade, and conjectured the white mask to have been the cause of her indisposition, as he overheard him tell her, in a low voice, she trampled under foot all the laws of honour, in publicly exhibiting herself in a dress and jewels the Prince had chosen for her, and which were going to be the price of her virtue.

During Sophy's illness, Lord Derby contrived to send a number of letters to Sophia in a feigned hand, in which he informed her the Count Leabeau was resolved to sacrifice her to his interest; and, at length, by his intrigues, convinced her that neither he nor the Countess were worthy of her confidence.

His Lordship, according to appointment, met the maid servant the next evening: His Lordship, after he had put several questions to the girl, asked her if she thought her mistress would accept the offer of his hand? 'I hazard a great deal in this proposal, said he; but no matter, I will risk every thing to tear her from the hands of her odious family, and give to her, in England, relations more worthy of her.' The servant, at length, promised to convey a letter from him to her mistress, which was succeeded by several, in which he every day renewed the offer of his hand, leaving it to her own choice to marry in private or public. Fifteen days this correspondence continued; and had it not been for the apparatus they were making at court, for the reception of the two Princes of —, perhaps Lord Derby's operations would have proved abortive. Sophia, however, at length consented to be married privately, in her uncle's house; the day of another grand Fete Champetre was fixed for their nuptials: When she wrote a long letter to her aunt, where, in the sublime style of exalted virtue, she declared she fled, with a husband worthy of her, from the danger that menaced her; moreover, that she left to her uncle, during the space of three years, the disposal of all her revenues, that they might be employed in prosecuting his law-suit.—On her arrival at Florence, where she intended to seek an asylum with Count R—, her relation, she promised to give them intelligence;—and made a present to the Curate of her parish of all her rich clothes, in order that what they produced might be distributed to the poor. Finally, she made two copies of this letter; one to be sent to the Prince, and the other to Lord G—, whom she highly esteemed.

The day arrived, on which they celebrated the Fete Champetre: To prevent suspicion, Derby appeared the whole day at court, and shared in all the amusements. He chose the moment the tumult augmented, to step into his coach, and fly to the Count's. John, his valet, was ordered to get the marriage-liturgie by heart, and act the part of the English Ambassador's chaplain: For this purpose he procured a clergyman's gyman's wig and dress, and spoke bad German. The moment arrived, John repaired with Derby to Sophia. He saw her come forward, with a staggering pace, supported on the arm of her maid, elegantly dressed, and armed from head to foot with the most enchanting graces. In advancing towards the door she appeared to have lost her courage; she made a pause.—Derby threw himself at her feet with a real emotion of tenderness; he pressed her hand: 'Is this hand mine? Do you consent to make me happy?' said he to her in the tenderest tone. She answered, hesitatingly, 'Yes, pointing to her heart with a gesture of her left hand. John, attentive to his signals, then entered, and pronounced a little discourse in English, muttered over the service, and gave them the nuptial benediction. During some time, Sophia seemed buried in surprise and silence; at length, raising her eyes, and pressing the hand of Lord Derby against her breast, she said, 'My Lord, I have now no one on earth but you, and the testimony of my conscience to support me. Heaven will recompense you for the consolation I receive from you, and my heart will preserve an eternal acknowledgment of it.' He embraced her, and tendered to her all the protestations that could fortify her. She then retired, with her maid, to disguise herself in men's apparel. They at length got out of the house unperceived: Derby put his lady and her attendant in his chariot, and John, who had quitted his disguise, served as their conductor, and they departed from the village of Z——.

Lord Derby hastened to return to the hall, where no one remarked his absence. He gaily mixed in a crowd of choice spirits, and laughed at seeing the Prince turn away his looks from the English dances, so much was he tormented with the remembrance of Sophia.

When Sophy was missed, Lord Seymour, who had reproached her with her conduct at the ball, was disturbed with doubt and suspicion: 'I have brought the noblest and best of women to a desperate resolution: I have occasioned the misery of the adorable girl,' said he: 'No one can inform me of her situation, but my heart tells me she is wretched.' Seymour immediately set out for his uncle's seat, who received him with paternal goodness. Lord G—— informed him of the letter she had written him, and told him Sophia was still virtuous, that every thing they had said against her was false, and, in a letter written to the Prince, she blesses a white mask, which revealed to her the whole of that diabolical intrigue which sullied her reputation. 'O my Lord,' cried Seymour, 'I was that mask; 'twas I who reproached her; but after the conversation, I took my flight.'

Seymour and his uncle immediately agreed to dispatch a courier to Florence, as did the Prince also, and transmitted to Count R—— the history of his adorable niece. They learned, from his answer, that he was a stranger to the place of her abode, and that all his enquiries had been of no avail to give him the least information of her situation. From some torn papers, which were found in Sophy's chamber afterwards, the Countess suspected, from their contents, she was united to an English gentleman.

Lord Derby, as soon as he could conveniently leave the court, flew to Sophia, who inhabited a sequestered village, ignorant of those about her, in daily expectation of going to Florence, to her father's relations. At the sight of Derby, he perceived her welcome him with faltering accents, and anguish and constraint marked in every feature: 'Smile, Lady Sophy, smile, if you are not willing to make me lose my senses,' he cried, throwing himself at her feet.—A torrent of tears gushed from her eyes: 'My Lord, said she, be not irritated at still seeing me sensible to my misfortunes; your goodness, I hope, will make me lose the remembrance of them.'

The following days she studied to appear gay. He soon after presented her with some English literary productions, in which pleasure was painted with all its fiery darts; he hoped this would throw some bright sparks into her imagination; but, after having read them over, her rigid virtue condemned them to the flames. The loss of these books, and the bad success of his project, greatly lessened Derby's esteem for her, which she bore with tranquil courage. A thousand trilling circumstances, even the efforts it cost her to appear happy and tender, convinced him he was not beloved. The death of Derby's brother soon gave a different turn to his ideas, as jealousy had intirely taken possession of him; he remarked in what lively colours she painted the virtues of Seymour; he therefore resolved to go to England, promising her to return in a short time.

For several days she heard nothing of him; his servant had left her to rejoin his master, and, five days after, came and delivered her a letter. She turned pale and motionless, after having run it over; without speaking a word, she with precipitation tore the letter, and a note of exchange for six hundred carolines, which he had inclosed: 'Go, go,' said she to the servant, with an expression of the most violent violent grief; at the same time slowly sinking on her knees, with her hands clasped together, and for more than two hours remained almost insensible. At last, she said to her maid, in a feeble voice, 'Derby has deserted me;—our marriage was false,—and I have nothing now to wish for but death.

Scene, in the fortress of Harleck in Wales, and the Saxon camp adjacent.

THE Saxon army under the command of Rinaldo, a fierce and bloody warrior, had long besieged the fortress of Harleck, the capital of Merionethshire, in north Wales; when finding the Britons too valorous to be subdued by force, he turned the siege into a blockade, in hopes to starve the garrison into a surrender.

Famine had raged in Harleck, and made great havock amongst the besieged. Yet notwithstanding all they suffered, they had too great a detestation of slavery, to submit on the only terms which Rinaldo would afford, that of surrendering at discretion. Albertus, who governed Harleck for Cadwallo, king of the Britons, had twice offered to give up the fortress; first, on the terms of each man carrying off his private property; and again, on having their lives spared, and permission given to retire unmolested to join their sovereign. These offers were haughtily rejected by the Saxon, who hoped to purchase the town at a cheaper rate, and glut his revenge on the inhabitants, by giving them to the sword, or selling them for slaves. He, indeed, was astonished that the town held out so long, as he had, he thought, cut off all means of its receiving any supply of subsistence: and the tragedy commences with his declaration of his surprize, and his obstinately refusing to follow the counsel of some of his warriors, who advised the granting terms to the besieged.

Appendix, 1776.

Just at this juncture, he is informed by Elmar, one of his officers, that he had perceived in going his rounds without the camp, a youth dragging a kid towards the mountains of Harleck, but that having pursued him, the boy fled, and entangled himself so in the rocks that surround the fortress, that he could not find him. Rinaldo, enraged at the bare possibility of the garrison receiving the smallest relief, that might prolong their resistance, offers great rewards to whoever should seize the boy.

The next scene discovers Albertus in council, in which the miseries the inhabitants of Harleck had underwent from scarcity of food, are pathetically depicted. They all resolve, since the Saxon had refused to grant them an honourable capitulation, to surrender the place only with their lives, but still to defend it in hopes of receiving succours from their king, Cadwallo. When all have departed but the select friends of Albertus, he acquaints them with the secret means by which some supply of provisions, though scanty, had been procured. These means took their first rise from accident, for prior to the siege, his young son Alfred, in boyish play, had ventured down the rocks; at once he disappeared from the eyes of his anxious parents, but some time after he returned, and reported he had found a subterraneous passage, which led to a space left vacant by the tide at each ebb; and thence to a cot inhabited by Ruedig, a recluse old Briton. This cot being situated without the place in which the Saxons had pitched their camp, furnished a thought that it might be of service during the siege. Accordingly Alfred had daily ventured to the cliff, and with incredible fatigue to one so young, had dragged through it, and up the rocks, such kids and lambs as Ruedig had, by his means, been instructed to purchase and bring to the place. It was in one of those excursions that Elmar had beheld him, but unconscious of the passage, had lost him amidst the rocks.

Still the supply brought by young Alfred was quite insufficient for the numerous inhabitants of Harleck, however it might enable the soldiery to continue the defence. On this account another council is ordered to be held, and whilst it is debating, Gerilda, wife to Albertus, is presented to the audience, with her son Alfred sleeping on a couch, to recruit his spirits, worn by fatigue, and oppress'd by his fright from the pursuit of Elmar. It is soon discovered that Gerilda is a woman of a most heroic spirit, who patiently submits to all the inconveniencies around her, and the daily peril of her only child, from a consideration of the public good. Yet she is not stoically insensible of the dreadfulneſs of their situation; ſhe has ſtrong feelings as a wife and as a mother, which are greatly augmented, firſt by her ſon's waking in terror, from dreaming of death from his late purſuers; and then by her huſband's returning from the council, in wrath with his deareſt friend Ethelwin, whom he reproaches for ingratitude, in joining in the opinion of the council againſt his. Their altercation, and the incertitude of Gerilda are interrupted with an account of a mutiny in the garriſon, and that the mutineers were about to open the gates to the invaders. Albertus departs to quell the tumult, and Ethelwin being left with Gerilda, it ſoon appears that the council had reſolved all the women and children, with the old and defenceleſs, ſhould be put out of the fortreſs, that the ſmall remains of proviſions might enable the defenders to maintain it.

This reſolution could be defended only by the ſtrong reaſon of neceſſity. It was expoſing an helpleſs multitude to the ſwords of the ſavage Saxons; yet even inſtant death was preferable to the lingering deſtruction of famine. The inhabitants had acquieſced in this hard, but neceſſary meaſure; yet they inſiſted that the governor ſhould not enjoy a bleſſing of which they were deprived, but that his wife and child ſhould ſhare the common lot. It was this cauſed the mutiny; and when we ſee Albertus next, it is in his oppoſing it. But oppoſition was in vain, entreaties and menaces were equally uſeleſs, and the governor, endeavouring to force the people to obedience, a ſkirmiſh enſues, which is ended by Gerilda ruſhing between Albertus and his few friends, and the multitude oppoſed againſt them. ſhe quiets the tumult by aſſuring them ſhe will willingly ſacrifice herſelf to the public good, the mutineers retire appeaſed; and ſhe with the greateſt firmneſs and maſtery of reaſon combats the tender partiality of her afflicted huſband, and departs to head the expelled helpleſs band.

The garriſon returned immediately to their duty, and their thoughts were only bent on making a moſt vigorous defence, and avenging their wives and children on the cruel foe. But Albertus had other thoughts: he had quitted his command in the night, and departed from Harleck, leaving a letter for Ethelwin, on whom the command then devolved. Cardic now enters, having in diſguiſe paſſed the Saxon camp, aided in his paſſage, by the attention of the Saxons being chiefly engroſſed by the miſerable, half famiſhed wretches, that had been driven out of the town, many of whom they had put to the ſword, when Cardic paſſed them. This Briton gives an affecting picture of the miſeries the poor people endured, but gives joyful news to Ethelwin, that their king was marching, with a numerous army, to raiſe the ſiege.

Gerilda had happily eſcaped the Saxons, and got to the cavern of Ruedig, and preſently after young Alfred enters the place, purſued by a party of Saxon ſoldiers, headed by Elmar, whom the hopes of the promiſed reward, had rendered particularly vigilant. The mother, to aid her child's flight, oppoſes herſelf to the Saxons, who take her priſoner, and carry her to Rinaldo.

Yet the unfortunate Alfred cannot eſſect his eſcape: he is purſued and ſlain by Elmar, juſt as Albertus, in the diſguiſe of a Saxon ſoldier, comes to the place in ſearch of his wife and child. Albertus follows the murderer, and, on his return, finds Ruedig mourning over the corps of Alfred. This gives a new edge to his reſentment, and leaving his breathleſs child to the care of Ruedig, flies to the Saxon camp.

Gerilda being brought before Rinaldo, on her braving him, and reſuſing to perſuade her huſband to yield the town, ſhe is ordered to be placed on the ſummit of the rock, ſtrongly guarded, to prevent her receiving any food, till ſhe periſhes from hunger, and the inclemencies of the weather.

She is ſcarce carried off to undergo this ſavage ſentence, when Albertus, ſtill in his diſguiſe, enters, and attempts to ſtab Rinaldo, but is prevented, and diſarmed by his guards. He then acknowledges who he is; and as the Saxon chief is about to pronounce his doom, he receives news that the Britiſh army is in ſight, and the ſieged now making a ſally to get the Saxons between the two forces. On this Rinaldo departs to put himſelf at the head of the troops, leaving Albertus in the cuſtody of his guards.

Hareb, the ſecond in command in the Saxon camp, had, in a former battle, funk under the arm of Albertus, who had ſpared his life. Gratitude had ever poſſeſſed Hareb's breaſt, and he takes this opportunity to acquit the debt. This he now doe

does by restoring Albertus's sword, and giving him his freedom.

The battle is now joined, in which Albertus meets with, and kills Rinaldo, and the British arms are victorious.

But, alas! though victory declares for the Britons, and Harleck is relieved, the distresses of Albertus are augmented. The soldiers who had the guard of Gerilda, being called off their post by the alarm to battle, before they quitted her had given her several stabs. She enters, fainting with her wounds and want of sustenance. The conquering Albertus meets her in this unhappy situation: her departure is hastened by finding her child was slain—She dies, and her husband, in a fit of hasty despair, stabs himself.

This is the story of this Tragedy, which was well received by the audience. We do not presume to pronounce on its merit; equally averse to partial panegyric, or ill-natured criticisms, we respectfully leave the decision to the judgment of the public, which we will not undertake to guide. Those who have been present at the representation, have formed their opinions; those who have not, will see the plot from the above recital; and of the language and sentiments, they may judge from the following specimens.

In the first act, Ethelwin makes the following judicious reflexion:

'Ye Gods, what miseries those monarchs cause

Whose only aim is the extent of pow'r!

To add an empty title to his name,

And twist a barren wreath around his brow,

Is a pretext for an aspiring man:

To bring destruction on our peaceful homes,
To mark our walls with blood, our fields with carnage,

And plague, with boundless ills, a hapless people.

The following pictures of famine and Saxon cruelty, the first by Ethelwin, in the first, and the other by Cardec, in the third act, are particularly striking:

'Among us meagre famine takes her stand,
And dims each sinking eye with wan despair.
Already hath her deathful trade began;
As hither, cross the square I bent my steps,
A hoary veteran sunk feeble down:
A tall, spare youth, erst of a brawny frame

Attempted, but in vain to hold him up.
They fell together—where with quiv'ring lips

The famish'd father blest'd the fainting son,

And in his helpless arms breath'd out his last.'

'The situation of our suffering friends!
A tongue more vers'd in language should attempt

The tear-distilling story—their approach
Once noted by the brutal rout—revenge
With all her horrid train, death, terror, pangs

Rag'd wildly round; nor sex, nor infant cries

Could stop the madd'ning carnage—spectres wan,

Meagre and faint, with scarce an oozing drop
To tinge the thirsty steel, expiring sunk;
Poor bloodless morsels to the jaws of war.'

The speech of Gerilda, when she is persuading her husband to yield her up, deserves particular notice.

'I am a wife, and harbour in this bosom
The warmest feelings of connubial love:
I am a mother, and possess as strongly
The tender yearnings of maternal fondness,
As e'er the dearest, doating parent bore,
Yet have I giv'n up thee, my Alfred too,
To all the peril that my fears could form.
Have I not arm'd thee for the doubtful fight,
And, anxious, watch'd thee in the conflict's rage?

Have I not fitted for his nightly toil
My darling child, still waiting his return
In dread suspense? What tortures then were mine?

Repine not in thy turn to feel its woes
By me so often known—with firmness bear
What reason bids

What Harleck claims, and what thy honour wills.'

The sentiments of Albertus respecting national prejudices are very just—speaking to Hareb, he says:

'Hence prejudices false from off my mind,
Imprinted there by this Rinaldo's baseness,
This action has effac'd them, proving thus
That deeds of honour, and the name of Saxon

May yet unite within a human frame:
I thank thee for those shining seeds of virtue Expell'd I thought, from ev'ry ruthless form,

That wears thy country's garb—how are they sown?—

An Account of the City of Limerick, extracted from ancient History, and from authentic Annals preserved in a Family that has resided there for several Centuries, with an engraved View of that City.

IF we consider the ravage and devastation, and of course the ruin of flourishing cities, and loss of all public records, occasioned by all consuming time, intestine broils and foreign invasions, even in civilized nations, we should be surprized to find Ireland exempt from these calamities, as few nations have more than this, felt the rage of long continued and bloody civil wars.

No people could be more exact in recording their most remarkable transactions, than were the ancient Irish, or fonder of transmitting to posterity, by means of public monuments, the knowledge of their most memorable achievements; yet why so few of these ancient writings are now extant, or the sites of many of their public works and remarkable cities, cannot now be even pointed out, may be well accounted for, if we consider, that besides the ruin consequent on a length of time, what great care and industry the Danes made use of, to destroy all public records, and deface every monument of antiquity.

It is not therefore to be admired at, that of 5550 towns said to be formerly on this island, the vestiges of but few can now be traced out, and Limerick's having escaped the almost general destruction, is chiefly owing to the happiness of its situation, which is so well adapted for defence, and for carrying on both foreign and inland trade, which the Danes greatly followed.

The island on which the principal part of Limerick is built, was formerly resorted to by a set of outlaws and vagabonds, who subsisted by plundering the adjacent countries, and who drove hither the horses they thus unjustly acquired, from whence it first acquired the name of Lum-neach, or a place bare, from the feeding of horses.

There being no ford or place of passing the Shannon, from the sea to this island, but here alone, by degrees it became much frequented, and of more and more consequence every day, till at length it increased to a town of note, and so early as the year 2870 was so remarkable, that the country south from Drogheda to Limerick fell to the lot of Cearmna, and the northern division of Ireland became the share of Sobhairce; in the year of the world 3940, mention is likewise made of it, when all the country from Lum-neach to Fiodhach was granted by Eochaidh Fiodh Lioch, monarch of Ireland, to his relation Fiodhach.

We read in the life of Saint Patrick, that about the year of Christ 434, this great apostle on his way to Connaught passed the Shannon at Lum-neach, and they shew in the south suburbs of this city, at a place called St. Patrick's well, a large rock which they say was his bed; at Mungret, two miles from this city, he founded a famous monastery, which in process of time became a renowned seminary for learning.

In the year 540, Guaire, king of Connaught, invaded Munster, to assert his right to the territories from mount Eachtuid to Limerick, but was defeated by Dioma, king of Cashell.

All these foregoing testimonies shew that Lum-neach was, from the earliest times, remarkable, and a place of note, which is further confirmed by its being an episcopal see in the beginning of the seventh century, for St. Munchin its first bishop died in 652; his cathedral, now a parochial church, dedicated to him, he built on the north end of the town, and it is evident from the ancient canons of the church, that no episcopal see could be established, but in a large and principal town or city.

In the year of our lord 853 we find Lum-neach to be in possession of the Danes, who first fortified the English-town, the Irish-town being then only a suburb; Ivorus or Ivar the Dane, who ruled there, on the death of Amlave his brother, became king over all Ireland; but the possession which the Danes held of Limerick was not entirely peaceable or undisturbed, for in the year 960, Mahon king of Munster, after defeating the Danes in the battle of Sulchoid, killed many of their chieftains, and among the rest Muris the Danish governor of Limerick. He pursued the fugitive enemy into the city, and without shewing them any mercy, or giving any quarter, killed them in their houses; he bestowed the plunder of the place to his soldiers, where they found an immense booty of jewels, gold, silver and rich furniture: After rasing the houses, the soldiers set them on fire, burned the fortifications, demolished the walls, and rendered the city incapable of any defence.

Bryan, commonly known by the name of Boru, succeeded his brother Mahon in the crown of Munster, and entirely completed what Mahon had begun, for he subdued all the Danes in Munster, and was acknowledged over all Ireland as monarch. We may easily conceive in what a flourishing condition Limerick was at this time, when the Danes of Limerick, who were only permitted to reside there for sake of carrying on trade, were obliged to pay, as a yearly tribute to this Bryan, 365 tuns of claret or red wine, and the Danes of Dublin, though equally under tribute to him, paid only 150 pipes of wine.

THE following Papers are published by order of the Congress.

Extract of a Letter from General Washington to the President of the Congress, dated New York, Aug. 18, 1776.

I have the honour to inclose you, for the perusal and consideration of the Congress, sundry papers, the whole of which, except No 2 and 7, I received yesterday evening, by a flag, and to which I beg leave to refer the Congress.

I.

"Sir, Aug. 17, 1776.

"BEING deeply interested in the welfare of America, I think it my duty to communicate a matter of intelligence, which I flatter myself may be rendered conducive to the restoration of a desirable peace. And in this view I request your Excellency's permission to land at New-York, to go directly to Philadelphia, in order to lay the same before the Congress.

"In the course of the conversation I have had with Lord Howe, I perceive that the powers he is vested with, as well as his disposition for establishing an equitable and permanent peace, are altogether misunderstood by the Colonies.

"For in consequence of a sketch of some propositions being offered for his consideration, he very frankly assured me he was willing to confer upon those grounds, with any Gentleman of the greatest influence in this country.

"As I am at liberty to declare his sentiments, I have the honour to inclose for your Excellency's information, a copy of my correspondence with his Lordship, and of the propositions referred to in his letter, which are the motives of my present request.

"Attending in the boat to be indulged with your answer, I have the honour to be

"Your Excellency's

"most humble servant,

"DRUMMOND.

"To General Washington, &c. &c."

II.

"My Lord, New York, Aug. 17, 1776.

"I HAVE your Lordship's favour of this day, accompanied by papers on subjects of the greatest moment, and deserving the most deliberate consideration.

"I can allow much for your Lordship's well-meant zeal on such an occasion, but I fear it has transported you beyond that attention to your parole, which comprehends the character of a man of strict honour. How your Lordship can reconcile your past or present conduct with your engagement, so as to satisfy your own mind, I must submit to your own feelings; but I find myself under the disagreeable necessity of objecting to the mode of negotiating proposed, while your Lordship's line of conduct appears so exceptionable.

"I shall, by express, forward to the Congress your Lordship's letter, and the papers which accompanied it. The result will be communicated as soon as possible. I am sorry to have detained your Lordship so long, but the unavoidable necessity must be my apology.

"I am, my Lord,

"Your Lordship's most obedient,

"and very humble servant,
G. WASHINGTON.

"To Lord Drummond."

III.

"My Lord,

"I take the liberty of sending inclosed the sketch of propositions referred to in my late conversation with your Lordship, which propositions, I have understood, the Colonies were disposed, not many months ago, to make the basis of a reconciliation with Great Britain.

"I have the honour to be,

"With great respect,

"Your Lordship's

"most obedient humble servant,

"DRUMMOND.

"Sloop Polly, August 12, 1776.

To Lord Howe."

IV.

Sketch of Propositions communicated to Lord Howe on the 12th of Aug. 1776.

I. "That it shall be ascertained, as far as can be determined by calculation, what supply towards the general exigency of the State, each separate colony can furnish, consistent with its ability.

II. "When such supply is thus ascertained, that each colony shall, by acts of their own assembly, impose such taxes as they shall find expedient for the raising of the said supply.

III. "In consideration of the fluctuating state of all young countries, that such taxes may not, in their operations, become partially or accidentally burthenome on the one hand, nor on the other hand gradually become deficient in producing the aid intended by the Colonies towards the general exigencies of the State, such articles shall be chosen as the objects of imposition as they shall deem the most likely to keep pace with the growth or decline of the said Colonies.

IV. "That these taxes, so imposed, shall, as in the Customs, be levied by officers of the appointment of the King; and that a perpetual grant, of the produce of these taxes, shall be made by the respective assemblies to the crown of Great Britain.

V. "As the direct means of removing the fatal grounds of this contention, by establishing a security against the apprehended invasion of property by parliament a formal relinquishment shall be made, on the part of Great Britain, of all future claim to taxation over those her Colonies.

VI. "To remove all future suspicions from the minds of the colonists, that, under the appearance of regulating commerce, duties may be imposed for the farther purposes of revenue, an application of the produce of all duties, imposed on articles of trade by the British legislature, shall be made towards defraying the expences of collection, and the surplusses in each Colony to be paid into their separate treasuries, and to be subject to the disposal of the respective Houses of Assembly.

"DRUMMOND."

V. "Eagle,

V.

"Eagle, off Staten-Island, August 15, 1776.

"My Lord,

"I HAVE received the honour of your Lordship's letter of the 12th, inclosing a sketch of the propositions mentioned in your late conversation, which I return herewith.

"As I think they contain matter, that, upon a conference and cool discussion, might be wrought into a plan of permanent union; I shall with great satisfaction embrace the first opportunity that may be offered upon those grounds, to promote so desirable an event.

"I have the honour to be,

"My Lord, your Lordship's

"Most obedient servant,

"HOWE."

"Right Hon. the Lord Drummond."

The following is the Purport of the Message sent from Lord Howe to the Congress, by General Sullivan:

"THAT, though he could not at present treat with the Congress as such, yet he was very desirous of having a conference with some of the Members, whom he would consider, for the present, only as private Gentlemen, and meet them himself as such, at such place as they should appoint.

"That he, in conjunction with General Howe, had full powers to compromise the dispute between Great Britain and America, upon terms advantageous to both, the obtaining of which delayed him near two months in England, and prevented his arrival at this place before the declaration of independency took place.

"That he wished a compact might be settled at this time, when no decisive blow was struck, and neither party could say that they were compelled to enter into such agreement.

"That in case the Congress were disposed to treat, many things, which they have not as yet asked, might, and ought to be granted them; and that if, upon the conference, they found any probable ground of an accommodation, the authority of the Congress must be afterwards acknowledged, otherwise the compact could not be complete."

Extract from the Minutes:

CHARLES THOMPSON, Sec.

VII.

In consequence of the above letters, on the 5th of September, the Congress resolved, "That General Sullivan be requested to inform Lord Howe, that being Representatives of the free and independent States of America, they could not, with propriety, send any of its Members to confer with his Lordship in their private characters; but that, ever desirous of establishing peace, they would send a Committee of their body, to know whether he had any authority to treat with persons authorized for that purpose.

On the 6th of September, three of their body, Messrs. Franklin, Adams, and Rutledge, were appointed, who on their return reported that they had met Lord Howe on Staten Island; that his lordship opened the conversation by acquainting them, "that, though he could not treat with them as a committee of the congress, yet as his powers enabled him to confer and consult with any private gentleman of influence in the colonies, he was glad of this opportunity of conferring with them. His lordship then entered into a discourse of considerable length, which contained no explicit proposition of peace except one, viz. That the colonies should return to their allegiance and obedience to the government of Great-Britain. The rest consisted principally of assurances, that there was an exceeding good disposition in the king and his ministers to make that government easy, with intimation, that, in case of submission, they would cause the offensive acts of parliament to be reviled, and the instructions to government to be reconsidered, that so if any just causes of complaint were found in the acts, or any errors in government were perceived to have crept into the instructions, they might be amended or withdrawn."

Upon the whole, it did not appear to the committee, that his lordship's commission contained any other authority of importance than what is expressed in the act of parliament, viz. "That of granting pardons, with such exceptions as the commissioners shall think proper to make, and of declaring America, or any part of it, to be in the king's peace, upon submission."

The following is an exact state of what passed at the interview between his Excellency General Washington and Colonel Paterson, Adjutant-general of the army under General Howe, July 20, 1776.

AFTER usual compliments, in which, as well as through the whole conversation, Col. Paterson addressed Gen. Washington by the title of excellency, col. Paterson entered upon the business by saying, that gen. Howe much regretted the difficulties which had arisen respecting the address of the letters to gen. Washington; that it was deemed consistent with propriety, and founded upon precedents of the like nature by ambassadors and plenipotentiaries, where disputes of difficulties of rank had arisen; that gen. Washington might recollect he had, last summer, addressed a letter to gen. Howe, To the hon. Wm. Howe, Esq.,—that lord Howe and gen. Howe, did not mean to derogate from the respect or rank of general Washington; that they held his person and character in the highest esteem; that the direction with the addition of &c. &c. &c. implied every thing that ought to follow.—He then produced a letter which he did not directly offer to general Washington, but observed that it was the same letter which had been sent, and laid it on the table, with the superscription to George Washington, &c. &c. &c. The general declined the letter, and said, that a letter directed to a person in a public character should have some description or indication of it, otherwise it would appear a mere private letter,—that it was true the &c. &c. &c. implied every thing, and they also implied any thing; that the letter to general Howe alluded to, was an answer to one received under a like address from him, which the officer on duty having taken, he did not think proper to return, but answered it in the same mode of address; address; that he should absolutely decline any letter directed to him as a private person, when it related to his public station. Col. Paterfon then said, that gen. Howe would not urge his delicacy any farther, and repeated his assertions, that no failure of respect was intended. He then said he would endeavour, as well as he could, to recollect general Howe's sentiments on the letter and resolves of the congress, sent him a few days before, respecting the treatment of our prisoners in Canada.

That the affairs of Canada were in another department, not subject to the controul of general Howe, but that he and general Howe utterly disapproved of every infringement of the rights of humanity. — Colonel Paterfon then took a paper out of his pocket; and, after looking it over, said he had expressed nearly the same words. General Washington then said, that he had also forwarded a copy of the resolves to general Burgoyne. To which colonel Paterfon replied, he did not doubt but a proper attention would be paid to them, and that he (general Washington) was sensible that cruelty was not the characteristic of the British nation. Colonel Paterfon then proceeded to say he had it in charge to mention the case of general Prescott, who they were informed was treated with such rigour, that, under his age and infirmities, fatal consequences might be apprehended.

General Washington replied, that general Prescott's treatment had not fallen under his notice; that all persons under his particular direction, he had treated with kindness, and made their situation as easy and comfortable as possible; that he did not know where general Prescott was, but believed his treatment was different from their information. Gen. Washington then mentioned the case of colonel Allen, and the officers who had been confined in Boston jail. As to the first, colonel Paterfon answered, that general Howe had no knowledge of it, but by information from general Washington, and that the Canada company was not under his direction or controul; but as to the other prisoners at Boston, whenever the state of the army at Boston admitted it, they were treated with humanity and even indulgence; that he asserted this upon his honour, and should be happy in an opportunity to prove it.

General Washington then observed, that the conduct of several of the officers would well have warranted a different treatment from what they had received; some having refused to give any parole, and others having broke it when given, by escaping or endeavouring so to do. Col. Paterfon answered, that, as to the first, they misunderstood the matter very much, and seemed to have mistook the line of propriety exceedingly; and as to the latter, Gen. Howe utterly disapproved, and condemned their conduct.

That, if a remonstrance was made, such violations of good faith would be severely punished, but that he hoped general Washington was too just to draw public inferences from the misbehaviour of some private individuals; that bad men were to be found in every clats and society; and such behaviour, was considered as a disho-nour to the British army. Col. Paterfon then proceeded to say, that the goodness and benevolence of the king had induced him to appoint lord Howe and general Howe his commissioners, to accommodate this unhappy dispute; that they had great powers, and would derive the greatest pleasure from effecting an accommodation; and that he (colonel Paterfon) wished to have this visit considered as making the first advances to this desirable object. General Washington replied, he was not invested with any power on this subject, by those from whom he derived his authority and power. But from what had appeared or transpired on this head, lord Howe and general Howe were only to grant pardons; that those who had committed no fault wanted no pardon; that we were only defending what we deemed our indisputable right. Colonel Paterfon said that would open a very wide field for argument. He then expressed his apprehensions, that an adherence to forms, was likely to obstruct business of the greatest moment and concern.

He then observed, that a proposal had been formerly made of exchanging governor Skene for Mr. Lovell; that he now had authority to accede to that proposal. Gen. Washington replied, that the proposition had been made by the direction of congress, and having been then rejected, he could not now renew the business, or give any answer, till he had previously communicated it to them.

Colonel Paterfon behaved with the greatest attention and politeness during the whole business, expressed strong acknowledgments that the usual ceremony of blinding his eyes had been dispensed with. At the breaking up of the conference, general Washington strongly invited him to partake of a small collation provided for him, which he politely declined, alledging his late breakfast, and an impatience to return to gen. Howe, though he had not executed his commission so amply as he wished. Finding he did not propose staying, he was introduced to the general officers, after which he took his leave, and was safely conducted to his own boat, which waited for him, about four miles distant from the city.

Made public by order of the congress.

JOHN HANCOCK, President.

Account of the Proceedings of the American Colonists, since the passing the Boston Port-Bill. Continued from p. 852.

THE success of his majesty's arms in America, already begins to shew its effects on the minds of the distressed inhabitants. Those who opposed the measures of government, but wished to preserve their dependance on the mother country, increase in number daily, while those who were mad for independence lose ground. The rage for independence chiefly prevailed among the multitude: the men of property were for adhering to the old constitution. The last legal house of assembly of Pennsylvania conclude their instructions to their delegates in congress in these remarkable words:

“ Though

“ Though the oppressive measures of the British Parliament and Administration has compelled us to resist their violence by force of arms, yet we strictly enjoin you, that you, in behalf of this colony, dissent from, and utterly reject, any propositions, should such be made, that may cause or lead to, a separation from our mother country, or a change of the form of this government”.

The instructions of the House of Assembly of Maryland to their delegates were still more peremptory; and except those of Massachusetts Bay, hardly any of the legal Assemblies chosen by the people after the antient and accustomed mode, gave countenance to a separation; but the popular conventions were of another mind; and being composed for the most part of the lower classes of the people headed by men of desperate fortunes, they carried all before them; and the circumstances of the times proving favourable to their views, they accomplished the subversion of government under the specious pretence of reforming the constitution, in opposition to those who having a high veneration for their civil and religious rights as secured to them by their charters, never conceived, when they engaged, for the support of the chartered rights of others, that they themselves would be called upon to make a sacrifice of their own. Such was the language of the men of property in America, previous to the late successes with which the arms of Great-Britain have been crowned; and such is now the language of all but those who have adopted a desperate plan, determined at all hazards to support it, let the consequences be ever so ruinous.

In the former part of our Magazine we have given an account of some preliminary steps that had been taken to lay the foundation of a treaty of accommodation. Perhaps the events that have since happened may tend to make the leaders of the opposite party more tractable, the accounts we have lately received are to the following effect:

That on the 12th of October the guards, light infantry, and reserve, together with Col. Donop's corps of Hessian grenadiers and chaffeurs, marched from the advanced posts on New York Island, and embarking in boats at Turtle Bay, passed up the East River through Hell-Gates, and landed on Frogs-Neck. That having crossed the Neck, they found the bridge, which joined it to the main, had been broken down by the rebels, who had thrown up some works on the opposite side. That being joined by the first, second, and sixth brigades from Long-Island, the troops embarked again in boats, and landed in Pelham's Manor the 18th without opposition; and marching on, through a random fire of the rebels from behind stone walls, gained the road which leads from Connecticut to King's Bridge. The rebels, apprehending their communication to the eastward would be cut off, moved from their camp at King's Bridge, and extended their left to the White Plains, a chain of stony hills so called. On the 21st his Majesty's light troops took possession of the heights of New Rochelle. Colonel Rogers, with his New York companies, having taken post at Maramack, was attacked by a party of the rebels, which he drove back with considerable loss.

On the 25th the advanced corps moved forward to the road which leads to the White Plains, where the rebels appeared determined to make a stand; but, on the 27th, the party that was posted there struck their tents in the night, and moved off to the entrances of the White Plains, where the main body of the rebels was entrenched, having the Bronx's River in their front, the banks of which are swampy, and the river steep, except at the ford, where the banks are steep and rocky. On the 28th in the morning, our army marched in columns to attack the rebels, who, seeing the troops in motion, a body of 8000 came out of their lines, and posted themselves on the top of a very steep hill above the ford. The second brigade, consisting of the 5th, 28th, 35th, and 49th regiments, with a battalion of Hessians, and a party of light dragoons, marched down, and crossing the ford, though much annoyed by the rebels grape-shot, ascended the hill with the greatest intrepidity, attacked and routed the body of the rebels that were posted there, driving them to their entrenchments in the entrances to the White Plains, where General Howe was preparing to attack them on the morning of the 1st of November; but being prevented by a very heavy rain, the rebels quitted their entrenchments in the night following, and retired towards Connecticut and the Highlands, abandoning their camp at King's Bridge, after setting fire to the huts and barracks which they had built for their winterquarters. The lines were immediately taken possession of by a detachment of the King's troops, where they found between 60 and 70 pieces of cannon, large quantities of provisions which the rebels had spoiled, and a great number of hogheads of rum, which the General ordered to be destroyed. There is no exact return of our loss in the different attacks, but it is supposed to have been between 190 and 200 killed and wounded.

The following declarations from the late committee of the county of Suffolk, and from all the Town Committees in that county, were delivered to his Excellency Governor Tryon, by Major Richard Floyd and Mr. Thomas Fanning, who were deputed by the inhabitants of the county to present the same to his Excellency:

Brook-Haven, Oct. 24, 1776.

WE the Committee of the County of Suffolk, being assembled by permission of his Excellency the Hon. William Tryon, Esq; Governor of New-York, and the territories depending thereon in America, do hereby dissolve ourselves, and do disclaim and reject the orders of the Congress and Committees; and totally refusing obedience to them, revoking all our proceedings under the Congress, and being desirous to obey the legal authority of Government, rely upon your Excellency's clemency, hoping that you will pass by our former conduct, and be graciously pleased to protect us, agreeable to the laws of this Province.

Signed by order of the Committee,
JOHN BRUSH, Chairman.

The Declaration from Brook-Haven Township, and that from several others are expressed in the same form of words as the above.

Female

tered myself, he flew in a violent rage; called me a beggarly, fortune-hunting scoundrel; and asked me, if I meant to dishonour him, by making such audacious use of the friendship of that family, to which he introduced me; he desired me to be gone from his house, and never come there again, and withal added, that he would go immediately and acquaint the Baronet with the affair, and desire him to horsewhip me the first time I should dare to enter his door.—Intreaties were in vain, he swore vehemently to his resolution, and I departed, filled with fears that my proceeding would be attended with very ill consequences to Emily.

“I went next day to the Baronet’s, in hopes that my uncle had not fulfilled his threat, but found to my utter mortification that he had been as bad as his word. I enquired for Emily, but was informed she was not at home. I asked for the Baronet, and received the same answer, which I knew to be false, as I saw him standing at the parlour window, just before I rapped at the door; but the servant gave me a billet, which he said, his master desired him to give me the first time I called there. This was written by the Baronet himself, acquainting me that my uncle had been there the day before to acquaint him with an affair, which needed not be explained to me, and in consequence, he requested I would come no more to his house, and thereby avoid any disagreeable consequences that might attend a non-compliance with his desire. This was a dagger to my heart, however I was resolved to make use of that love which Emily had expressed for me. I had not gone many paces across a meadow which led to the high road, when I was overtaken by a female servant, who delivered me a letter, by the superscription of which, I knew it to be Emily’s hand; I opened it eagerly, and the contents informed me, that she had been closely confined by her father, since the morning before, on my account, and desired I would not be uneasy: she told me of a place where I might leave a letter, which would be conveyed to her with secrecy; and that we might carry on a mutual correspondence by the same channel, until such time as affairs should change. I punctually obeyed the directions, and enjoyed a correspondence for about a month, when our regiment received orders to march to other quarters, at about fifty miles distance. Of this I acquainted Emily, and received for answer that her father heard of the intended march of our regiment, and in order to guard against her elopement watched her motions more closely than ever. Emily’s elopement was the sole circumstance which supported my hopes of happiness, and if I could gain her consent, I had contrived a stratagem to baffle the watchfulness of her father, which was, to feign sickness and stay after the regiment, till such time as his suspicions were lulled, and opportunity should more conveniently serve to execute my design. To this she consented, and matters were so well managed that one night about a month after our regiment marched, I prepared a post coach at the end of her father’s garden, where she met me, attended by her own maid, and, our conveyance was so expeditious, that we arrived at our destined place (within about two miles of my quarters) about six o’clock next evening. Here we were married, and I took lodgings about a mile farther at the house of farmer Reilly here, in order to be more secure in case of a search. Here we remained undisturbed for several months, till the Baronet came to my quarters, attended by my uncle, and made the strictest enquiries after his daughter; I denied any knowledge of her, and though he knew of no circumstances to prove she came with me, yet he was certain she was with me. He called me many opprobrious names, and the morning following I received a formal challenge to fight him: this, for Emily’s sake, I would not accept, and in consequence of my refusal, he posted me as a coward, in every public place in town, that evening. This was told to our commanding officer, who was no friend of mine; he upbraided me, and I being a good deal piqued, told him, if he would step out with me, I was ready to convince him I was no coward. This challenge was the foundation of a court-martial, by which I was deprived of my commission.

“All my resource now was my little income, on which Emily and I, by strict economy, lived tolerably genteel, but our happiness did not continue very long interrupted.

“As we sat one morning at breakfast, we were surprized with the appearance of Emily’s brother, the navy captain, whom I before mentioned: he entered the room without ceremony, and treated us with the most opprobrious and abusive language. It seemed he had found us out by the malice of the commanding officer, by whose means I lost my commission. I told him, that, on his sister’s account, any ill language he offered me should pass unnoticed; but that if he offended her, it should not go unpunished. Upon this he ran furiously towards Emily, who was in the last month of her pregnancy, and before I could prevent vent him, struck her on the face: this was insufferable.—I flew to the Russian and levelled him to the floor. He immediately got up, drew his sword, and made a pass at me, which wounded me in the arm; I snatched mine, which hung over the chimney piece.—Emily shrieked violently, and called out for help—I desired her brother several times to sheath his sword, and defer his satisfaction to another opportunity, for his sister's sake; but my requests were only answered by attacking me more furiously.—Finding intreaties in vain, and my life in danger, I engaged with him, and after a few passes, he received my sword through his body, and dropped dead at Emily's feet, just as farmer Reilly entered the door. She swooned away, and continued in fits without intermission until next day, in which situation she was delivered of a child.—It was you, my dear Eliza! but it cost my Emily her life."

Here he wept plentifully, and after a long silence he proceeded.

"Though I had now lost all I esteemed valuable on earth, and wished not to survive her, yet her dear offspring lived, and indispensable duty obliged me to take care of it. The rumour of the captain's death soon reached his father's ears, who immediately came to that part of the country in pursuit of me; and my uncle, who came with him, was more strenuous in his endeavours to find me out. Though my conscience justified me in the unfortunate action, yet I thought it better to fly a place where every little circumstance reminded me of the cause of my grief, and live to be of service to my little daughter, than risque a trial, which might be attended with the worst consequences. Accordingly I gave farmer Reilly the little monument of my love in charge, with money to buy necessaries, until such time as I could be settled in some place, whence I could remit more, and set out for Galway, where I embarked for France, and sailed from thence to the East Indies. Here I met with a gentleman, a particular friend of my father's, by whose interest I procured a very considerable employment in the company's service. I wrote to my agent in Ireland, and inclosed a letter to farmer Reilly with a draught for some money: in my agent's next letter he assured me that he made the strictest enquiries after Reilly and could hear no account of him, only that he had left that part of the country a year before, and no person knew where he went to. In my letters for six years afterwards, I constantly made the same request, and always received the same answer, till at length he told me Reilly went to live in Connaught, where he and his family died of a fever. This news convinced me that my little Eliza was no more. I determined never more to visit Ireland. By my friend's directions I wrote to my agent there, to sell my little estate and remit me the purchase money, with which, and what I had already saved, I began trade on my own account, and in a very few years acquired a very considerable fortune.

"A gentleman called on me one day whom I knew to be an officer in the same regiment with me, and who had often dined with Emily and I, at farmer Reilly's. He informed me that he had seen Reilly in Dublin, a few days before he left Ireland, who told him that Eliza was married to a young gentleman of fortune, in the county of —, where he lived. This intelligence gave me inexpressible joy; I determined to embark for Europe in the first homeward bound ship, which I did, leaving my affairs there under the care of my friend, and arrived at London about six weeks ago, and have now found my long lost child."

Here he embraced Eliza tenderly, and requested she would now gratify his desire; but first desired Reilly to let him know by what means he escaped his agent's enquiries. Reilly told him that he had been driven from his land by his landlord, who was a near relation of one of the gentlemen who came to search for him (Mr. Williams) after the death of Emily, and her brother: that Mrs. F—— was then in that part of the country, and pitying his distress, encouraged him to come and be her tenant. He also informed him of her kindness to Eliza; who was then going to finish the relation, but Henry insisted on that part belonging to him. He then related the whole affair between Eliza and him, without concealing a single circumstance. Mr. Williams was rejoiced beyond description at his generous behaviour; he embraced them both; "and now, Sir," says he to Henry, "since you have been so generous to reward virtue, without any other expectation, I thank Heaven that 'tis in my power to reward your generosity." "Sir, says Henry, I think myself amply rewarded in the possession of Eliza, and still more so in this morning's happy adventure."

Mr. Williams considered with the most lively gratitude, the tender behaviour of Reilly and his wife, towards Eliza, and gave them a gratuity for their fidelity, much above their most sanguine expectations; and the sum of forty thousand pounds was a very pretty addition to Henry's fortune. The news of this happy affair soon spread abroad, and gave things another appearance. Eliza, who had been hitherto neglected, began now to receive the most pressing invitations for the pleasure of her company, at the houses of all the ladies of the surrounding neighbourhood, but her good sense told her the true value of such sudden acts of friendship, and taught her to treat them as they deserved. Nothing has been able to alter her love of domestic happiness, or lessen her assiduity to promote it. She is blessed with a lovely, numerous offspring, to whom she is a blessing, and the poor have enjoyed, in her, the comforting friend and physician they lost in Mrs. F——.

Let it not be concluded from this, that I would recommend it to gentlemen to marry waiting maids or persons of low rank, who have been so fortunately virtuous as to escape their snares. Such a happy concurrence of circumstances seldom happens to justify such a proceeding in the eye of the public world, as those in the example of Henry. But I would have gentlemen consider, that virtue and a good name (morally speaking) are equally valuable to the daughter of affluence, and her of low fortune: and to remember that he who would forfeit his own honour and veracity, and the fame, virtue, and happiness of a female, (because poor and unprotected) for the gratification of one criminal passion, would stop at nothing to gain his evil ends in any matter, provided he could avoid the punishment of the law: and as such, he forfeits every just claim to the regard of mankind, and deserves to be lashed from society with disgrace. And he who sets a value on incorruptible virtue, though it be beneath him to reward it in one way, should not fail to do it in another. I am, Sir, your very humble servant.

A C A S T O,

Some Account of, and Extracts from "A Series of Answers to certain Popular Objections, against separating from the rebellious Colonies, and discarding them entirely: Being the concluding Tract of the Dean of Gloucester, on the Subject of American Affairs." (Continued from p. 816.)

OBJECTION 7. In case of a separation, from whence shall we procure rice and tobacco?"

"Answer 1. This objection turns on two suppositions, viz. 1. That after a separation the Virginians and Carolinians will not sell tobacco and rice to English merchants for a good price, and ready money:—and, 2dly, that tobacco and rice can grow in no part of the globe, but Virginia and Carolina. Will any man in his senses dare to affirm either of these things?"

"Objection 8. In case of a separation, will not the North-Americans set up various manufactures of their own, and lay heavy, discouraging duties on the importation of ours?"

"Answer 1. Daily experience proves beyond contradiction, that we do actually send vast quantities of British manufactures to Spain, to Italy, Germany, Russia, Holland, and even to France:—Though each of these countries have long established similar manufactures of their own, and have laid discouraging duties on ours. Nay some of them are seemingly so heavy as to amount to a prohibition. Yet, let the manufacturers in Birmingham, Manchester, Norwich, &c. &c. tell the rest. So that the threat, that the Colonists may, or will set up manufactures in opposition to ours, proves very little in proving too much."

"Objection 9. Will not a separation from the northern Colonies greatly decrease the number of our seamen?"

"Answer 2. The obvious reasoning on the case suggests just the contrary. For after a separation has taken place, the act of navigation will operate as effectually against the North-Americans, as against the French, Hollanders, or any other nation. Consequently they (the Americans) will no longer be permitted to be the carriers of sugars, rum, cotton, coffee, pimento, mahogany, logwood, and all other woods and articles for dyeing, &c. &c. from our own islands, from the Musquito shore, or the Spanish main, into Great Britain or Ireland:—Nor will they be permitted to carry any of our manufactures, salt-fish, or provisions, any of our malt liquors, cyder, or any wines, from Great Britain or Ireland to the Sugar Colonies, or to any of our settlements in any part of the world. Judge therefore from this enumeration of facts certain and indisputable, on which side would the naval balance preponderate in case of a separation. But this is not all; for we have at least 150,000 lamps burning every winter in Great Britain and Ireland, more than we had 60 or 70 years ago, and their number is every year increasing. Now the North-Americans used to supply us with at least one third, if not one half of the oil [extracted from fishes] used and consumed in these lamps: All which, together with several articles depending on them, will for the future be supplied by British and Irish sailors. Therefore what a nursery is here! How growing and extensive! And yet how little attended to, till the North-Americans obliged us, as it were, whether we would or not, to see our own interest!

"Answer 3. Our former predilection for for our colonies not only caused us to neglect several branches of trade, which we ought to have cherished: But, what is still more extraordinary, and hardly credible, it induced us to check, and in some instances almost to prohibit them, by means of heavy duties. Thus for example, we gave for many, very many years, a most profuse bounty (and at one time no less than 8l. sterling per ton) to the importation of hemp from America, as if on purpose to nurse up that country into a rival, naval power: But we neglected to give even the smallest bounty for the growth of hemp in Ireland, as if that branch of trade was not worth regarding: Though it is evident to a demonstration, that it ever was more our interest to have promoted the culture of hemp in Ireland, than in America; and though the fertile soil of that island, particularly near the borders of the Shannon, seems destined by nature for the growth of that commodity. Again, as to positive checks and restraints by means of heavy duties, we have laid a tax, not only on foreign hemp, but also on foreign iron, pitch, and tar: All which we ought not to have done; and which we ought now to undo, in order to promote our own welfare, and to encrease our own shipping and navigation, instead of those of North America. Therefore we have at present the means in our power of treating with the Northern potentates of Europe on very advantageous terms: That is, we may signify to each of them (as we did formerly to Portugal) that in what proportion soever they will favour the introduction of the English manufactures into their territories by the repeal or diminution of taxes; in the same proportion we will admit their bar iron, hemp, pitch, tar, turpentine, &c. into Great Britain. Now, reader, I ask, supposing these measures were pursued, what loss shall we sustain in our breed of seamen? And who will be the sufferers in case of a separation?"

"Objection 10. Would it not be better to continue some kind of union with the colonies at any rate, rather than to throw them entirely off? Suppose both parts of the British nation, the European and the American, were to remain united under one and the same prince, but to act as distinct and separate states, independent of each other in all other respects; Would not even this be more desirable than a total separation?"

"Answer 1. As this scheme of independency respecting the parliament, but not respecting the king, was the favourite topic of the congress till of late, when they entirely threw off the mask, and entered into open rebellion against both; and as the same notion had been advanced over and over by their advocates here at home, who have quoted the case of the Electorate of Hanover, as an example and illustration; I shall therefore examine this matter with more attention than it would otherwise have deserved.

"Here therefore I ask one plain, decisive question,—Are Englishmen and Hanoverians the same people, or the same nation? Are they the subjects of the same prince by one and the same title? And do Hanoverians enjoy any one privilege either at home or abroad, belonging to the English nation? Certainly not: How then can these cases be pretended to be parallel?—And to what purpose are they brought, but to perplex the cause, and to draw off the attention of the reader? To make the cases parallel, we are to suppose an American to be as much an Alien, and to be as incapable by law of enjoying any honours, places, or preferments in these realms, as an Hanoverian is: We are also to suppose him excluded from all those commercial benefits and protections by sea or land, which are possessed, and have by treaties been acquired, by the English government, for the sole use of English subjects: Nay, we are to suppose still further, viz. That the Americans never owed any allegiance to his Majesty by virtue of his being King of Great Britain, and of the dominions thereunto belonging; but as being King of America by a separate, distinct, and independent title. All this, I say, must be previously supposed. But alas! this is not what the congress and their republican advocates ever meant to say, or wished to suppose. Their business was, to play the legerdemain of cups and balls with common sense and common honesty. For when any English benefit was to be enjoyed, then we were gravely told, that Americans were as much Englishmen as ourselves, and therefore ought to be permitted to enjoy the same privileges and advantages in common with us: But when any English taxes were to be borne, or any English taxes to be raised, for the maintenance of these privileges, then truly the Americans were no longer Englishmen, but a distinct and separate people, who ought not to have been taxed without their own consent.

"Answer 2. Let us now suppose another case, viz. That the Americans are declared by law to be as much aliens and foreigners, as the Hanoverians are: But to be, like them, subject to the same prince, under a separate and independent title. What would be the consequence of such heterogeneous system? Nothing surely very desirable, if we can rely either on experi experience of what is past, or on reasoning as to what may come.

"By experience we learn, that our junction with Hanover was far from being a blessing to either country. For it is well known that the innocent inhabitants of that Electorate have been involved, for our sakes, in all the calamities of war, whilst we ourselves enjoyed no sort of advantage from the misery, unless the lavishing of our blood and treasure in defence of a country not to be defended, can be called an advantage. The words of the American pamphlet, Common Sense are here very true, and very apropos,—“The miseries of Hanover [in the] last war ought to warn us against connections.” Nay, we are farther taught by long experience, that the genius of the English is peculiarly unfit to be joined with any other people, upon an equal footing, or in a co-ordinate state; of which their behaviour towards the Scotch and Irish, as well as towards the Hanoverians, is too striking an example to pass unnoticed. Though indeed, properly and strictly speaking, Scotland is not co-ordinate, but united and incorporated with England, at the earnest request of the English: which circumstance renders the daily and bitter reproaches of the English against the Scotch still more inexcusable; for the Americans have declared, one and all, that they never will be united or incorporated with Great Britain. And in respect to Ireland, till the much-wished-for union can take place, this country is not co-ordinate, but a sub-ordinate state. For the proofs of which see the declaratory act of George I. made to quell the tumults excited by the seditious * writings of Mr. Molineux. See also my address and appeal to the landed interest, pages 80—84. Now after a due consideration of these facts, I ask, doth experience and past trials warrant us to say, that a junction with Hanover, is found to be such a national advantage, that we ought to attempt the like plan in regard to America?

"But this is not all: For our reasoning on the case still strengthens the argument against a junction with America.—Thus for example, Hanover is but a little way off, and is indeed but a little country if compared to America; nor can it ever be a greater: But above all, the mass of the inhabitants of that electorate have never been instructed in any notions, as a rule of duty, but those of submission and obedience. Whereas America is an immense country, the nearest part of which is 3000 miles distant from Great Britain: And the Americans in general are described by some of their own friends and advocates, as some of the most litigious, turbulent, and ungovernable people upon earth. [See Mr. Burke's speech, and my answer to it, pages 15—26.]

"Answer 3. Hanover can never wrest from England the seat of empire; for every thing conspires to prevent the very possibility of such a project: Whereas it has been the unanimous opinion of the North Americans for these 50 years past, that the seat of empire ought to be transferred from the lesser, to the greater country, that is, from England to America, or as Dr. Franklin elegantly phrases it, from the cock-boat to the man of war. Moreover the famous American pamphlet, Common Sense (in the composition of which Doctor Franklin and Mr. Adams are supposed to be principally concerned) declares it to be preposterous, absurd, and against the course of nature, that a great "Continent should be governed by an island. In no instance hath nature made the satellite larger than its primary planet: And as England and America, with respect to each other, reverse the common order of nature, it is evident they belong to different systems; England to Europe, and America to itself."

"Objection 11. Will not the severing America from England have the same effect in our political constitution, as that of cutting off, or striking away a main prop, a massy pillar, or a strong buttress from an antient, crazy building?

"Answer 1. Metaphorical objections are best confuted by metaphorical replies. The English constitution is by no means crazy in itself: It is built of materials the best, the strongest, and the most durable of any yet discovered in the world. Moreover it hath this peculiar excellence, that every part of it strengthens the other parts, at the same time that it supports itself.—Ponderibus librat suis, was a just compliment paid it by an excellent Judge, Mons. de Lolme, in his admirable treatise on the English constitution. But as all things may be impaired by time, and more especially as the best of things may be injured by unskilful treatment, so it hath happened, that ignorant undertakers have endeavoured to repair, and perhaps, as they imagined, to decorate this goodly fabric, by sticking many additional buildings to it, which had no real use, symmetry, or proportion; but which have weakened the original structure, by drawing it out of its true perpendicular.

Answer

“ Answer 2. Metaphor apart:—As our constitution is composed of three different powers, the regal, the aristocratical, and the democratical; and as the mock-patriots and republicans are in full cry, that the crown hath too much power already by the disposal of so many places; I ask, with what face can these men oppose a separation, if they really think what they say? The places in North-America lately in the disposal of the crown (or if you please, of the ministry) were (great and small) some hundreds. And yet you, a staunch patriot! You, who are for ever crying out, O liberty! O my country! You, who desire to counter-act the influence of the Crown by legal and constitutional means, wish nevertheless to retain dear America with all its evil appendages of places, pensions, sine-cures, contracts, jobs, &c. &c. &c. What absurdity! What inconsistency is this!

“ Objection 12. If it be right to separate from North-America, will not the same arguments lead to prove, that it will be right to separate from Ireland also? But can such a scheme be consistent with common sense, or common prudence?

“ Answer 1. Such a scheme, as here proposed, would assuredly be inconsistent with common sense, and common prudence: But certainly it hath no manner of connection with the arguments in favour of a separation from North-America. Ireland is in a manner at our own doors, and almost in sight of our coasts; whereas America is 3000 miles off. To make the case parallel, you must set Ireland afloat; and then if you can push it but 1000, instead of 3000, miles from our shores, I will allow that all the former arguments will stand good, and be very conclusive. Nay, I will allow, that we ought to have no more connection with Ireland, in reason and good policy, than we have with Sicily or Sardinia, with Madeira, or the Canaries. But Providence hath fixt Ireland to be our nearest neighbour; and as the country is too small to be a separate, independent state of itself, it must depend either on Great-Britain, or on some other governing and protecting power. Therefore the only proper question is, to whom, or to what country, for its own sake, as well as for ours, ought it to belong? And surely this question is soon answered.

“ Answer 2. Ireland is, very unluckily for the republican faction, lugged into this debate; for whenever they have recourse to the case of Ireland, they are sure of receiving a signal overthrow. The only proper inference to be drawn from the defection of North-America is, that it ought to accelerate our union and incorporation with Ireland; lest the same malignant spirit of discord and rebellion, which hath so grievously spread itself over the one country, should infect the other also; and where indeed, with sorrow be it spoken, there are not wanting already a number of noisy pretenders to patriotism, who would run any lengths, assert any falsehoods, and would plunge their country into any distresses, for the sake of becoming men of consequence themselves, and of gratifying their revenge upon others.

“ Answer 3. The trade from Great-Britain to Ireland, considered merely as a nursery for seamen to man the British navy, is more than double to that from Great-Britain to the rebellious provinces of North-America. And yet this trade at present is little better than in its infancy, if compared to what it might be, in case of an union, and a thorough incorporation. This assertion, I know, like several others which I have ventured to make, will be looked upon at first as very extravagant and absurd. But be it so, I am accustomed to hear my opinions treated as paradoxes, 'till they have undergone a thorough examination: And then they have met with a very different fate. The present case is plainly this:—Divide the whole coast of Great-Britain into four parts or portions: Let the first division be from the Land's End in Cornwall up to Bristol, and from Bristol to Milford-Haven: The second from Milford-Haven to Liverpool, and from Liverpool to White-Haven: The third from White-Haven to Glasgow, and from Glasgow to the farthest port in the North of Scotland: And the fourth from the North of Scotland all round to London, and from London to the Land's End in Cornwall again.—Now tho' the ports of Bristol, of Liverpool, Glasgow, and London do [did] certainly employ more hands in the American, than in the Irish trade; yet if you will take all the intermediate ports into the account, and more especially the coal-ports on the coasts of Wales, and on the North-West of England, and of Scotland (from all which hardly a single ship goes to North-America) you will then find, on striking the balance, that my computation, instead of being exaggerated, is greatly deficient. Nevertheless I here repeat (what I have often said, and proved before) it by no means follows, that we shall lose our trade to North-America by a separation: Whereas it is obvious to common sense, that we may double our trade to Ireland, if we will incorporate with that kingdom, and if, by removing our absurd, prohibitory, and and restraining laws, we will make of both countries, one grand system of civil government, and commercial polity."

"Objection 13. If we should separate from North-America, what recompence shall we be able to make to those faithful Americans, who have suffered for their loyalty to the king, and their allegiance to the British government?"

"Answer 2. The best, the most effectual, and in the end the least expensive method would be,—to order a fair and reasonable estimate to be made of their losses; and then to indemnify the sufferers out of the current services of the year. A public lottery or two, or even a million taken out of the sinking funds, would perhaps be more satisfactory to the sufferers, than any other mode of compensation. Which sums, nevertheless, if they should prevent the costs of but one year's campaign by sea and land, would be a great and desirable saving of the expence of blood, and by much the cheapest in regard to treasure. But above all, we ought always to remember, that we can better spare seas of treasure, than rivulets of blood: And that there hardly ever returns a moiety of the men who first go out, fit for service at the end of two campaigns, even tho' there should not be one pitched battle fought. Not to mention, that many of these sufferers may be fully and properly indemnified, and at no expence to the public, by such promotions in church, or state, in the revenue, the army, and navy, as their respective talents, occupations, or professions have rendered them fittest for."

"Objection 14. Who will dare to move in either house of parliament for the separation here proposed?"

"Answer 1. None ought to move for it, but those who are convinced in their consciences, that the measure is in itself just and expedient, and that it evidently tends to promote our happiness in general; and still more particularly, that it will frustrate the design of those machiavelian politicians, who have been labouring hard, and long endeavouring to overturn the constitution in church and state. Real patriots, who are persuaded of these important truths, ought to move for a speedy separation, but no others. As to how many or how few there are of this persuasion; that is another question, which cannot be so easily determined, whilst there is such a variety of motives for a man's concealing his sentiments. However, one thing is certain, that this doctrine is making converts every day; and that many persons, even of great eminence and distinction, avow it at present, who formerly treated it with marks of levity and ridicule."

Dean Tucker having gone through his answers, adds a few pages by way of Conclusion, in which, to manifest his disinterestedness, he inserts the following solemn oath:

"As a Clergyman, it is often objected to me, that I am a mercenary wretch (or as Mr. Burke was pleased to phrase it, a Court Vermin) writing for preferment. This is very hard and cruel, after so many solemn declarations to the contrary. Let it therefore be observed, that whereas I had often said before, I would never directly, or indirectly seek for preferment; I will here add, once for all, that I will never accept of any, even tho' offered to, and pressed upon me.

"So help me God."

A Description of the Town of Lisburn.

LISBURN, by many esteemed the handsomest inland town in Ireland, (Kilkenny excepted) is situated 7 miles S. W. of Belfast, and 73 N. of Dublin, on the river Lagan, which is navigable to Belfast. In 1707 the town was intirely consumed by fire, whence it has the name of Lisburn, its antient name being Lisnagarrey. At present it contains about 700 houses, mostly built of brick in an handsome manner, forming three good streets; at the junction of which stands an handsome Market-house, with a Ball-room over it, where an assembly is held every fortnight. The Church is no way remarkable, except for having a large and very genteel congregation, the principal inhabitants being of the established religion. There are likewise a reputable body of the people called Quakers in this town, who have a Meeting-house, and at a short distance from it a great Boarding-school for the education of youth of all denominations, established by a considerable legacy left by the late John Hancock, Esq; of Lisburn, a member of that community. There are also a considerable body of Presbyterians and Methodists, who each have a good Meeting-house, and a few Roman Catholics. The Infirmary is a good building of brick. The Linen-hall, lately erected at the expence of Lord Hertford, is a large square court, surrounded by a piazza of brick: here is held weekly a very great market for linen cloth. The trade of the town is considerable both in the manufacturing of linen cloth, and in the shopkeeping way. When the Canal is finished from Belfast to Loughneagh, it will (as generally supposed) add greatly to the trade of this town. The streets are well paved, and lighted with globe lamps at proper distances. Lisburn is what is called a potwalloping borough, in which every protestant inhabitant has a vote for the members which the town returns to parliament: but by the manner elections are carried on here, a stranger might imagine the landlord had the only vote.

The Political Character of General Conway.

WE professed at the outset of this undertaking, to confine our enquiries and observations on the political conduct of the several eminent personages, commencing with lord Chatham's entrance into office, but not entrance into power, in the year 1766: We have, nevertheless, when peculiar circumstances justified such a departure from the rule, more than once deviated from it, in order to illustrate the subject, and point out previous transactions, without which many matters, as well motives of conduct as change of sentiment and situation, must have remained obscure, and in some degree unintelligible. Urged by these reasons, we must seek for the causes which brought this gentleman forward as an official man, as a subordinate leader of a powerful party, and an active member of the administration formed and composed of men, who avowed principles of genuine whiggism, in opposition to the closet mandates of the first Minister, the intrigues of a junto of his immediate creatures and confidential advisers, or the more ostensible phantoms in office, who servilely obeying the secret instructions of their political creators and principals, have turned the committee of counsel into a committee of supply; and have improved upon the star-chamber system, as much as framing laws (the execution of which may be previously insured) are preferable to the extemporary interpretations of prostitute priests, profligate courtiers, and traitorous ministers, without even a colour of law to support their arbitrary decisions.

General Conway early experienced the friendship of the late duke of Devonshire. When that nobleman (then Marquis of Hartington) was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland in 1755, he procured the general to be appointed his secretary, which is, in fact, unless where the viceroy is a man of extensive talents, or great interest, efficient minister. He leads and directs the house of commons; and the court is always sufficiently strong to carry any question in the house of lords, without any particular management or singular address, by the aid of the number of

Appendix, 1776.

Englishmen appointed bishops in that kingdom.

From that period we may date the political union which subsisted between him and the noble duke, till dissolved by his grace's death in 1764.

We must now recur to the incident which particularly gave rise to the political elevation of our hero. Whether from accident or design, the late prince of Wales, father to his present majesty, and the late king his royal father, were known to be on very indifferent terms; we shall leave the private anecdotes which it was said gave rise to this misunderstanding, to be explained by those who may think such matters worthy public attention. It is sufficient for our purpose to observe, that on account of the open coolness which subsisted between St. James's and Carleton-house, two descriptions of men began immediately after the prince's marriage to be well received by his royal highness. Their principles, though they voted in the same minorities, were as opposite and contradictory to each other as possible. They united only in one thing, a disapprobation of Walpole's measures, and a personal dislike of the man. These were the moderate whigs, and the professed tories who had been proscribed since the accession of the present royal family. This heterogeneous composition did not stick long together, because, in truth, it never cemented. When Walpole, therefore, was drove from the helm, in 1742, the moderate whigs fell off one by one, and the tories were left in full possession of Carleton-house. The late prince of Wales, who was certainly amiable and well-disposed, who loved the constitution as described by his partizans, died in ignorance that he left his son in possession of the real tories. It is true he knew that they affected the name; but he imagined that they were revolution tories, a solecism in terms and politics, as described in the fascinating fallacious works of that unprincipled impostor, the late Henry St. John lord Viscount Bolingbroke: he imagined that they were in earnest, and consequently was happy in the idea that his beloved son, like a few of his predecessors, might arrive to the glorious pre-eminence of a patriot king. Whatever his expectations might have been, the tories now surrounded every avenue to Carleton-house.—Their interest, their revenge, a recollection of their former sufferings, stimulated them to inspire the heir apparent with strong prejudices against the whig party. The sufferings of his royal parents, the contemptuous flights thrown upon them by every ministter and ex-minister, from Walpole to Pelham, from Newcastle to Pitt and Legge, were exaggerated and held forth in colours too glaring, and at the same time too artfully laid on, not to excite in a tender inexperienced bosom every sentiment of resentment, and fixed intention to retaliate, which filial affection and personal indignation are capable of. This party was farther strengthened by a certain description of men, who have the prudence to look forward, and the wise, precautions, sagacious spirit of seeing things at a distance, and in the familiar phrase, of providing for a rainy day. Those worthy attendants of all courts beheld an old king approaching to his exit with regret, because it threatened their political dissolution; and they looked with pleasing expectation of gratifying their own personal views, by looking towards the east, and worshipping the rising sun. An incident happened, however, about this time, which brought on events much earlier than they would have happened in their natural course. A cry was raised in the nation against the then administration, on account of their want of success at the commencement of the late war. The Tories were called in, in a body, to support the measures then pursuing.

To the memorable year 1756, we are obliged for our present chief justice of the court of king's bench, while the nation is obliged to his lordship * for the conducting that treaty, by which such an extraordinary coalition of parties was effected.

This coalition, instead of strengthening, weakened administration; it was an augmentation in point of numbers, it is true; but what was it composed of?—of secret enemies, not steady friends. This patched-work administration did not long stand; some public miscarriages revived the old spirit, which manifested itself the two preceding years. In 1757, Mr. Pitt and his chancellor of the exchequer were re-admitted into power, after having been publicly thanked and presented with gold boxes, by almost every corporation in the kingdom.

N O T E.

* Talking of the state of the Colonies, and of the sentiments of Sir Josiah Child and lord chancellor Talbot on the subject, in the debate on the duke of Grafton's motion the 15th of November, 1775, his lordship says, "so matters continued till the year 1756, when a new administration was formed, in effecting which I had the honour to be an instrument."—See Almon's parliamentary debates, vol.

The administration of those gentlemen is too well known to call for a single observation; all parties now subsided, or were apparently melted down into one mass; but under this serene expanse, this smooth surface, rocks and quick-sands, political storms and whirlwinds were gathering or concealed.—The old worthy, honest king was hardly cold, when the language of Carleton-house was transferred to St. James's.—The situation of the poor changeling, just deceased, as they were pleased to call him, was lamented with an insolent and contemptuous pity; he was described to be a prisoner in his own house, a slave to his own servants, a dupe to his unfaithful friends, and an instrument employed by a vindictive, daring faction, to proscriber the most loyal and valuable part of his subjects, as well as to wreak their vengeance on the parents of the present monarch. In fine, we were presented with a view of St. James's, describing a political millennium, or the government of the just upon earth, in which his majesty was depicted as just having broke the bonds of a whig faction, who had the audacity to attempt to pinion him, as well as his royal predecessor; while the author of this curious device caused a breast-plate to be placed on this creature of their imagination, with the following motto, "This is the patriot king."

The possessors of power treated the whole as a mere chimera; but they soon found themselves mistaken. The first thing which alarmed them was the sudden dismissal of that able and faithful servant, the Chancellor * of the Exchequer. His punishment was of the first impression; he opposed the descendant † of a Scotchman in a county ‡ election, because he was invited by the freeholders. It was looked upon to be an unparalleled piece of presumption in the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain; and he was very properly dismissed § from his high post.

Administration remained still in a state of delusion. The First Lord of the Treasury || gave up his Chancellor without grumbling; and the great popular Minister nister ¶ resigned his co-patriot and box-partner without a sigh: neither of them foresaw their own ruin in this slight beginning. Mr. Pitt and Lord Temple resigned in six months after.

Nothing, however, was sufficient to dispel the many fogs in which the whole Whig party were enveloped. The Duke of Newcastle was harshly superseded in his office of First Commissioner of the Treasury in seven months after, the 29th of May, 1762; and the Duke of Devonshire, on the 22d of the following November, resigned his place of Lord Chamberlain.

Thenceforward we are to look for the Duke of Devonshire in opposition, and we find him accordingly at the head of the Whigs during the sessions of 1763 and 1764, under the successive administrations of Lord Bute and Mr. George Grenville. We shall not go into the detail of the measures discussed during those two sessions: it is enough to observe, that the first conspicuous part taken by General Conway in the British parliament, was on the question relative to general warrants. He was then Colonel of a regiment of horse, and one of the grooms of the bedchamber to the King. He voted against the court on that important question; the consequence of which was, that he had his regiment taken from him, and lost his place in the bedchamber. His noble friend  dying in a few months after, at Spa, left him a very considerable legacy, to compensate in some measure for his sufferings in the cause of his country.

He was now esteemed by the whole Whig party, as suffering a state of political martyrdom, for his resistance to a system which was thought to supersede law and justice, in order to gratify the personal resentments of the first Minister. Accordingly, when the Whig arrangement took place, in 1765, he was appointed one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, in which post he remained during the short lived administration of Lord Rockingham. He continued to occupy the same post under the arrangement of Lord Chatham, and maintained his weight till the defection of the secret enemies of his Lordship, with the weight of the House of Bedford, which his Lordship was obliged to call in, in order to form a balance to the over-ruling secret influence of the junto. As soon as that power was fixed, a †† certain creature of that illustrious House was appointed to succeed the General in the northern department; and he was sent back to his original profession, that of a soldier, †† with a regiment, and the appointment of Lieutenant General of the Ordnance.

It is needless to remind the generality of our readers, that he was, in the spring session, 1766, one of the most zealous promoters of the repeal of the Stamp Act, and that he has continued uniformly ever since, whenever the question came in any shape before the House, to adhere with steadiness to his former opinions. In every other respect, he has generally voted with the King's servants; but on the point of American taxation he has been inflexible, both as to the principle, and to the justice of the resistance of America, arising and growing out of that principle, not to pay taxes where they are not represented; on the ground of inexpediency, though the measure were just and practicable, on the solemn promises pledged by ministers, in the name of the Sovereign, of parliament, and themselves; and finally, the utter impracticability of subduing America without running risques in relation to foreign powers, and incurring expences, though no such impediment stood in our way, that must render such an attempt probably impracticable, but most inevitably ruinous in its consequences, and destructive to the state.

In the present dearth of political principle, or any uniformity of public conduct, founded in impartial opinion, and supported by free discussion, General Conway's is a valuable character; it exhibits an example worthy imitation, reverence and esteem. There are besides several collateral circumstances, which concur, at this degenerate season, to render his steadiness of principle, his honest candour, his unreserved opposition to the favourite measures of a court, the more conspicuous. The General is, in a great measure, an annuitant, in respect of his domestic affairs.—His lady *, it is true, has an ample jointure, but it is equally true that it will die with her; and it cannot be supposed that she is very young, when we recollect that she is mother to the Duchess of Richmond. The General's appointments under the crown are very considerable; he has the Blues, and the government of Jersey, which we may compute to be a good 3000*l.* per annum. Now, if we contemplate his very precarious situation, as to his private fortune, and his still more precarious situation, ation, in respect of his military emoluments, dependent on the pleasure of the crown, and the will of its ministers, we stand astonished at an instance of public spirit, of an avowal of public opinion, in the days of George the Third, which would have done honour to John Hampden or Andrew Marvel. Hampden risked part of an ample private fortune, in asserting the liberties of his country, and securing the remainder. Marvel, always necessitous, spurned the wages of iniquity, because he preferred a private heart-felt approbation to any thing it was in the power of the grand seducer † or his emissaries to bestow.—We need not remind our intelligent readers, how much more dreadful it is to fall from an elevated situation, than from principle, to remain in a narrow and obscure one.—Another consideration, well deserving the attention of those who would wish to discriminate public virtue, from a more spurious resemblance, and interested affectation of it, is the secondary temptations, which lie in our hero's way, to pervert his understanding, and mislead his judgment. His domestic virtues, his feelings as a man, as a friend, as a relation, are in fact so many temptations to error. His brother ‡ is Lord Chamberlain; his brother-in-law § is nearly connected with the court; and in receipt of considerable military emoluments; in a word, he is ultimately allied to several of the followers of the House of Bedford, to some of the apostate Whigs, and to many of those who insolently claim the appellation of King's friends, because they have proved themselves enemies to the constitution of their country.

General Conway, as a parliamentary speaker, may be reckoned one of the most pleasing in the House. The ground he goes over, is pretty much the same as that taken by Lord Camden in the other house. Taxation he looks upon to be a special privilege to which every native subject of the British empire is entitled, where a possibility of exercising it exists. Every matter urged by him in debate, carries a certain air of sincerity, earnestness, and honest boldness with it, which, accompanied with a peculiar modesty and mildness, where he is not hurried by an indignant warmth, renders his speeches little inferior, in point of effect, to any delivered in either House of Parliament. On the other hand, we could wish, that he had not been so inactive from 1762 to 1774, because his acquiescence in several measures, fully as exceptionable in principle as those respecting America, hath furnished his enemies with a plausible objection to his popular pretensions, by attributing his public conduct to motives rather of personal justification, than of sound patriotism.

Political Character of Lord Suffolk.

HIS Lordship was little known in the political world till he went into opposition, under the guidance and patronage of the late Mr. George Grenville. In the year 1770 in particular, he was one of the most violent partizans against the measure of expulsion and incapacitation of Mr. Wilkes, in relation to the affair of the Middlesex election. Some of the severest speeches made against the court system, then carrying, or supposed to have been carried on, were made by his Lordship, on the following several motions: “For the account of the expenditure of the civil list: That the House of Commons is bound in matters of election by the law of the land. On American affairs; Lord Chatham's bill for reversing the adjudication against John Wilkes, Esq; on the Middlesex election. On Lord Chatham's motion, relative to his Majesty's answer to the city remonstrance; and finally, the same noble Lord's motion for an address to his Majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to dissolve the parliament.

On some of those questions his Lordship rendered himself remarkably conspicuous; and was one of the forty-one protesting Lords, who pledged themselves to each other, and to the public at large, on the motion of the 2d of February, in the following words: “We do hereby solemnly declare and pledge ourselves to the public, that we will persevere in availing ourselves, as far as in us lie, of every right and every power, with which the constitution has armed us, for the good of the whole, in order to obtain full relief for the injured electors of Great Britain, and full security for the future against this most dangerous usurpation upon the rights of the people, which, by sapping the fundamental principles of this government, threatens its total dissolution.”

In the following November, Mr. Grenville died, and on the 22d of the succeeding January, about two months after the decease of his political Chiron, (though, it is said, the bargain was struck up before he was cold) his Lordship was appointed keeper of the privy seal, in the room of the Earl of Halifax, appointed one of the secretaries of state. The June following the Earl of Halifax dying, he succeeded him in the office of Secretary of State for the Northern department; department; which high post he still occupies, much to his own credit, honour, and emolument, and to the full satisfaction of an indulgent Prince and an admiring public.

There are some characters that inspire the biographer with horror, others with veneration and respect; others again with astonishment; and not a few with a certain gaiety of heart, pleasantry, and good humour, easier to be imagined than described. We would not give his Lordship the option, because we are compelled to be merry, gay, and sprightly, whenever we recollect that he occupies a responsible cabinet appointment, in which the most extensive talents, and the best informed understanding, have full room to exercise and display themselves.

As his Lordship, while he remained in opposition, declared the utmost contempt and abhorrence for the last parliament; and, supported, with all his abilities, a motion for its dissolution; an opportunity at length arrived, which furnished the means of gratifying himself more effectually than barely shewing his resentment against it in mere words. He avowed openly in parliament, on Lord Chatham's motion in January 1775, for withdrawing the troops from Boston, that he was the principal adviser of its immature dissolution. It is true his modesty was so great, that he did not claim the merit of this act of political justice, as urged to it on principle; but barely informed the House, that he advised the measure merely to prevent the bad effects which a popular election might produce, on the natural demise of the former parliament, were it permitted to live six months longer.

His Lordship's official career is not marked with any shining proofs of the able statesman: the only treaties of his making, which have yet reached the light, are those entered into with his Majesty, as Elector of Hanover, and with the Landgrave of Hesse, Duke of Brunswick, and the Princes of Hanau and Waldec, for bodies of troops to be employed in America against the Provincials there in arms. We do not wish to say a syllable concerning the justice or expediency of the American war; nor much as to the mere ministerial manufacture of the treaties. The double subsidy might have originated in a spirit of true national œconomy. Each company being double officered, might have arisen from motives of military foresight, on account of the great difficulty of recruiting commissioned officers. A double staff, including an executioner, might likewise have been a precedent precaution. Paying for soldiers killed, paying afterwards for recruiting them, and letting the dead men's pay augment the military chest, might be a very proper proof to exhibit to every careless butcher in Germany, the profound wisdom and extensive generosity of an English administration, and an English parliament. We do not pretend to decide one way or the other; and though we should, we dare not condemn the conduct of the noble Lord, because he might exculpate himself by this compendious answer, "that he was commanded; and that all his merit or demerit in the course of the whole negotiation, till its final completion, consisted entirely in a punctual, passive obedience to the orders he received."—We should be gladly contented with this apology, so far as the views of his masters and employers were concerned, or where the approbation and emolument of the mercenaries were to be continually attended to; yet we cannot approve of his Lordship's neglect and want of foresight in one particular, in not giving General Howe his rank earlier, and not to reduce the nation to the disagreeable alternative of either permitting a foreigner to command our troops in America, or superseding the rank of the Hessian Lieutenant General, by putting a young Major General over his head.—These are the general leading features of his Lordship; and we freely confess, that we never waded with more pain, through any dull, uninteresting detail in our life; nor could any other consideration, but a faithful discharge of our engagements with the public, have compelled us to so disgusting a task.

His Lordship's talents as a parliamentary speaker, are confessed on all hands to intitle him to the place we have here assigned him. He speaks with great facility. His language is pointed and well chosen, and he gives his harangues a strength of colouring, and infuses into them a warmth and energy of expression, scarcely excelled by any one Lord in the house. He affects a bold explicit manner of declaring his sentiments; and never fails to accompany it with an earnestness and personal responsibility, bearing the strongest appearance of self-conviction. His voice and manner are rather pleasing; and by blending a certain species of candour and boldness in every thing he says, and in general disclaiming all personal allusion, he is equally heard with pleasure, and is sure to meet the approbation of those who vote with him. His Lordship's speeches on the other hand, seldom contain any solid matter. If he be well informed in his office, or in the great line of politics in which he is engaged, he is certainly one of the best secret-keepers we know in parliament. The strength strength and power of his oratory consists chiefly in round assertions, or flat contradictions to those of his antagonists, and in exterior and interior advantages, that are derived from nature, habit, and education, but which are totally independent and unconnected with that species of argument and fair deduction, that leads to rational conviction.

On the Longitude.

To the Rev. Mr. Maskelyne, Astronomer Royal.

S I R,

THERE is no person to whom an address on this subject so properly belongs. You, like a skilful pilot, have marked out the three probable channels which lead to the desired haven, and have pointed out some shoals, and set buoys to direct the course.

There are several spacious, large openings, which, at first view, one should imagine, lead immediately to the point; but, pursuing them, we find ourselves presently disappointed. One of these openings, which promise a discovery of the Longitude, is the difference of the moon's southing, which, in twenty-four hours, will be from forty to sixty minutes of time.—One would presume that this afforded data sufficient to divide into three hundred and sixty degrees with that most useful of all instruments, the pen.

If the moon's southing was accurately calculated at London, (for in your nautical almanack it is brought only to the nearest minute) and likewise at the place where the Longitude was required, the difference would point out the Longitude; but at sea this method is rendered impracticable, for, during the interval required to find your apparent time, if the log should give you ten miles of westing, and a current during the time should have actually carried you five miles east, the difference would be a minute in time, which would make a difference in your Longitude of above seven degrees, therefore any method that can be affected by currents, and continue so in its consequences, must be rejected at sea. Another large opening which promises fair is, that in some parts of the moon's orbit, the declination increases or decreases about five degrees in twenty-four hours, but at sea the following difficulty arises. In order to find the moon's declination, you must know exactly the latitude you are then in, which is seldom observed nearer than two miles; this alone would cause a difference of near three degrees in Longitude. In the method by the variation of the compass, there are not data enough, nor is the theory sufficiently established to trust it; however, encouragement ought to be given to all such researches.

We now come to the first probable method, that of an equal time-keeper.—There is nothing against this method, but the uncertainty of it. If it should go true, you are as much in doubt during the whole voyage, as if it went false. If you should have several on board, you cannot tell but the same reason which would cause an error in one, might equally affect the whole. In short, you have no approximate certainty, (if I may use the expression) and are kept in suspense, until you arrive where the Longitude is known. It is true, an error in this method affects the Longitude the least of any other, for two minutes is only an error of thirty miles, while two minutes in the distance of the moon from a fixed star, produces an error of a degree.

The next probable method of discovering the Longitude is by Jupiter's Satellites. This I have explored, and presume to say, that my method will answer the ends proposed (at least on shore); it is not by the natural eclipses of Jupiter's Satellites, but by artificial ones; the natural eclipses seldom happen, and then it is an equal chance that they are not visible at the place we are in. Add to this the difficulties attending the calculation arising from the situation of Jupiter, and that of its cone, the aberration of light, by my new-invented micrometer, the immersions and emersions are so frequent, that you will never want opportunity of observing, unless Jupiter is so near the sun that it cannot be seen. I have constructed tables of the synodical motions of the Satellites, but I must defer the use of this instrument at sea, until telescopes are contrived, which can be more conveniently used.

The last, and, indeed, the best method for use, at sea (especially for long voyages) is, as you recommend, by the moon's distance from the principal fixed stars. This plan I have pursued; and, I hope, I have discovered a method to clear up all difficulties of the moon's parallax; and have likewise invented a quadrant more convenient to take the moon's distances from the fixed stars; and truer than any yet made public. These, Sir, are my pretensions; how justly founded, time must discover; in the interim, I am,

Your most obedient,
humble servant,
GAMALIEL SMETHURST.

To the Honourable the Commissioners of Longitude.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

AS I was not permitted to attend your Honourable Board on Saturday the 2d of last March, especially as I attended for that purpose: and not being favoured with any answer to the many letters I have written to your Secretary, John Ibbetson, Esq; for more than eight years past, on the subject of the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea, and particularly of my two last letters of the 6th of April and the 22d of May; inclosing three examples and solutions for the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea according to my method; therefore I hope you will not be displeased for my addressing you in this manner.

More than thirty-four years since, my thoughts turned on the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea; my first plan was by a time-keeper, which I then projected, and consulted a watch-maker thereon. I wrote to Doctor Bradley, Astronomer Royal, and Martin Folkes, Esq; President of the Royal Society, that I had a plan to offer. Mr. Folkes very politely sent me his answer, dated Crane Court, Jan. 5th, 1744-5, which answer is now before me, wherein he was so obliging as to give me his opinion: however, when I came to consider that different sorts of metals were to be used in the construction of my time-keeper, and those metals would be subject to expansion, and contraction in different climates, by heat and cold; likewise to rust, damps, dews, and cankers; therefore I gave up my plan, for the discovering of the Longitude by a time-keeper; and I advised the Rev. Mr. Maskelyne of my opinion of a time keeper, the 11th of April 1769, that it could not answer; I wrote him many letters since, relative to Longitude, and that I should be glad to correspond with him on this subject; but I have not been favoured with an answer to any one of my letters! However, what I then wrote him has been verified by the time-keepers on board his Majesty's ship the Racehorse, commanded by the Hon. Capt. Phipps, in his voyage towards the North Pole: one of these time-keepers lost about three hours, and another four-teen minutes.

Notwithstanding I had given up my plan by a time-keeper, I could not divest myself from thinking sometimes, that the Longitude might be discovered by some other method; on which my thoughts suggested that this earth on which we live, has a perpetual, regular, uniform, and equable motion or rotation round its axis; this rotation would not do alone without taking something else to its aid and assistance, therefore I thought nothing could be more suitable for my purpose, than the fixed stars, or points of the equinoctial; in consequence of which I determined on this plan for the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea, and which is entirely new.

I have made out a catalogue of sixty-six principal stars in both hemispheres, extracted from Mr. Flamsteed's Historia Cœlestis, and Doctor Bradley's catalogues, and inserted their names, characters, constellations, right ascension, in degrees, minutes, and seconds, and hours, minutes, and seconds of time; likewise their declination, annual variation in the right ascension and declination, and reduced them to the beginning of the year 1773.

I have calculated siderial tables for the same stars, shewing that the meridian of London, which I shall call the first meridian, doth pass under the meridian of every one of these stars nearly at noon on a given day; and what degree of Longitude of the equator passes under the meridian of any star at noon, and after, for every day in the year in degrees, minutes, and seconds, and in hours, minutes, and seconds of time; from which it is easy to calculate and know, what point of right ascension or equinoctial the meridian of London is upon for any day, hour, minute, or second of time. These tables and their requisites will serve for seventy years and upwards; but it is very necessary to print the lunar tables in the nautical almanack every year: indeed, had my siderial plan met with the same encouragement from your Honourable Board, as the lunar which cannot answer, I believe it would have saved the nation many thousands of pounds.

I had the honour three times to attend your Honourable Board with a sketch of my plan for the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea; and I apprehend the only objection or obstruction to it, has been the lunar, as the professors seemed to be of the opinion that the lunar was preferable to mine as thirteen is to one; this I could not, nor did admit; therefore I shall desire leave in the following to reverse their opinions; shew and demonstrate, that mine is preferable to the lunar as 27²/₃ or as 30 is to one.

I have often, and I think, rightly considered, the lunar principles, and have as often been surprized and astonished, that ever Sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Halley, and many of our modern professors of the mathematics and astronomy, should ever entertain a thought or an idea to believe, that the Longitude should ever be discovered by the moon, so as to be brought into into common practice, when I do aver, that there is not a single, simple, regular, uniform, or equable principle in the whole theory by the moon, as far as the process depends upon the moon: this I have often mentioned to your astronomer, Mr. Bayly, which he has acknowledged: he, and many other persons eminent in the sciences, have likewise acknowledged, that my fidereal method is on true principles; some of those persons have given me their certificates as a proof. But if you should disbelieve any thing in the foregoing relative to the theory of the moon, I shall refer the Honourable Professors of your Board to the Nautical Almanack, to prove and demonstrate my assertions; but if this is not satisfactory, then please to let them call upon me to prove it.

I believe I can with as great a certainty aver, that there is not a single second of time, space, or motion, from the very moment of time in London separates from the first point of right ascension, or equinoctial, on the 20th of March, until the observation at the ship, but what is taken into the process for the Discovery of the Longitude by my fidereal method; and there is not a principle but what is regular, uniform, and equable, in all the theory and process; this cannot be said of the method by the moon.

If it is rightly considered, it will be found that the earth's equal motion is the primitive, or first cause of true time, therefore as this motion produces true and equal time, this motion and time will produce equal space or distance; in consequence of which, whoever discovers the Longitude, so as to bring it to perfection, must be assisted by these three regular, uniform and equable principles, motion, time, and distance; these three principles are the basis of my plan: in consequence of which, these three principles do actually combine, unite, coincide, co-operate, and are co-equal in my plan and process: but the moon was never known to have these principles inherent in her.

The moon changes her situation in the heavens more in one minute and a half, than the fixed stars do in one whole year of 365 days. Some days there are 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 degrees of Longitude that never passes over the moon in 24 hours solar time; and I believe there is not a single degree of Longitude or Meridian, but what passes over some star or other, twice in 24 hours solar time.

As the Honourable Professors seemed to be of an opinion, when I attended your Honourable Board, that the lunar method was preferable to mine, the fidereal, as 13 is to 1, which is the mean daily separation of the moon from a fixed star, or its mean diurnal motion: In answer to this, if they will please to suppose London to be on the meridian of the moon, and any fixed star at the same instant of time; London will separate 360 degrees, whilst the moon separates only about 13 degrees; and therefore, as 360 degrees is to 13 degrees, so is $27\frac{2}{3}$ minutes to 1 minute or mile; in consequence of which, in this case, my method is preferable to the lunar as $27\frac{2}{3}$ is to one.

While the earth passes over a space, or distance in the heavens equal to sixty miles, the moon passes over a space of no more than about two miles; therefore as sixty is to two, so is thirty to one is favour of my method in this case. In consequence of which, Mr. Smethurst has truly observed in the foregoing letter, that "an error of two minutes in the distance of the moon from a fixed star, will produce an error of a degree." To the same effect I wrote to your Secretary some time ago; which I again repeat, as it is evident an error in my method of two miles is no more than two miles.

In the lunar method you have three motions to contend with; the sun, moon, and earth's; the first two of these are very irregular, at all times of the year, respecting the earth; whereas the earth's motion, which is the chief principle in my plan, is regular, uniform and equable at all times of the year; therefore it passes over equal space in equal time, in consequence of which I have but very few impediments or obstructions to contend with.

In the lunar method it is necessary to have three observers, two to take the altitudes of the sun and moon, or star, and one the distance. In my method, one observer to take a single altitude of a star is sufficient for common practice; but when great accuracy is required, the altitudes of two stars, one East and the other West of the meridian, may be taken, the result of Longitude will probably be the more accurate: the process for the time is the same in both methods, which your astronomer, Mr. Bayly, has acknowledged.

In the foregoing letter Mr. Smethurst has mentioned thus: "We come now to the first probable method, that of an equal time-keeper. There is nothing against this method but the uncertainty of it," &c, &c.

If my method is rightly considered, it will be found that it is upon the principle of a universal, simple, perpetual, regular and equable time-keeper; the motion of the earth respecting the fixed stars, and points of the equinoctial. This perpetual time-time-keeper was never known to alter its motion since Joshua's days; nor is it subject to friction; expansion or contraction; neither to rust, damps, dews, or canker, as metal are, so as to prevent its regular motion. A meridian drawn from its axis through London, the first meridian, and subtended to the equinoctial, will intersect the equator and equinoctial at right angles, and the like at the ship or place of observation: therefore London and the ship will have two corresponding points on the equinoctial, which produces an arch; the distance of this arch measured on the equator is the difference of the meridians which produces the Longitude of the ship; as, by the examples and solutions for the Discovery of the Longitude, I transmitted to your Secretary, Mr. Ibbetson, in a letter to him of the 22d of May last, for the result of the solutions of these examples, and some others, which I had to produce, had I been permitted to have attended your Honourable Board, and which produces the Longitude under thirty miles: therefore I did by that letter claim the greatest reward, as by the late act of parliament, which I still continue to claim, and which, I make no doubt, I shall be able to support, by the true principles and accuracy of my plan.

In some of my former letters I made an offer to you, of going to Lisbon or the West-Indies to make the necessary experiments; and that I should be obliged, to be permitted to correspond on this subject of Longitude with any one of the Honourable Commissioners, or any other person you should approve, meaning one of your Professors, or Astronomers, to which I never received any answer.

Had I been permitted to have attended your Honourable Board, it was my intention to have desired permission to have had recourse to Mr. Wale's or Mr. Bayly's manuscript observations, taken in their last voyage. These observations, I believe, would have ascertained my plan, and might have been a saving in trying of experiments.

In my last letter to your Secretary of the 22d of May last, I mentioned therein, that if I should not be able to attend the next Board, or be permitted, I desired you would be pleased to give leave that the Rev. Mr. Hornsby, and Dr. Smith of Oxford, may be permitted to examine into the whole of my proceedings for the Discovery of the Longitude at Sea, should I go to Oxford for that purpose, which I do now again repeat and request.

Why your astronomer, Mr. Bayly, should wish me to give up my plan, is somewhat mysterious, unless he was defired so to do, by one of the Rev. Professors, for fear it should interfere with, lessen, or explode the lunar method. This seemeth to me to be the only obstruction and objection to my plan.

I am, with all dutiful respect,

My Lords and Gentlemen,

Your most obedient,

humble servant,

SAMUEL WEBB.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

S I R,

IN the Gazette Littéraire of Berlin, of January 1769, I find the following extraordinary story pretty well attested, and as such I give it you, without being answerable for the truth of it.

A Father and Son of the town of Gand, were accused with having murdered the Rector of a Parish Church, and stealing from it the plate, to a considerable value; for which supposed offence, they were hastily tried, and condemned to lose their heads on a certain fixed day. It happened, however, that the executioner was too ill to attend his duty, and as the sentence, by the law of the country, could not be deferred to another day, the magistrates ordered the life of one, to become the executioner of the other. The father rejected the proposal with horror; but the son, without any hesitation, acquiesced. The father was accordingly led out to execution, but did not know by whose hands he was to suffer, till he saw his son armed with a naked sabre on the scaffold, where he embraced him, and poured out affliction like a flood. It is not, said he, the fear of death, but the unnatural hand by whom I am to die, is what afflicts me; for being innocent of the crime laid to my charge, I have more to hope than to fear. He then took a tender leave of his son, and laid his head on the billet to submit to the fatal blow; but to the astonishment of all present, when the son was lifting up the sabre, the blade, without any violence, broke in the middle: a circumstance so extraordinary, that the multitude, with one voice, cried out for grace (pardon), and the civil magistrates conducted the father and son to their former confinement, and informed the Prince with what had happened upon the scaffold, who, in consequence thereof, pardoned them both: soon after which, a criminal was executed, who confessed being the real murderer of the Curé, and the plunderer of the Church.

Whether this story be true or not, I cannot affirm; but that there is upon a little bridge near the fish-market, in the town of

X x x x x

Gand,

Gand, two statues in bronze, where one is represented in the very action of cutting off the head of the other, is very certain: and the same story seems to be represented, in a picture still preserved in the Hotel de Ville of Gand. I cannot, however, (being an enemy to superstition, and an unbeliever of whatever seems supernatural) help observing, that as this event is recorded to have happened in the year 1371, that perhaps the story was made to account for the figures on the bridge, instead of the figures being made to commemorate a story, which seems to be a provincial stain and blemish on the people. Yet if ever the hand of Providence stooped to the hand of man, this was surely, according to human judgment, a time when the grace of God, as well as that of man, might unite to save the innocent father, and withhold the unnatural arm of the son.

I am yours, &c.

A TRAVELLER.

Paris, Nov. 20th, 1776.

A Curfory View of the present State of Liberty in Europe; In a letter avritten by the celebrated Mr. Rousseau, to his Friend at Amsterdam.

IF it is true that despotism and arbitrary power were originally intended for savage nations only; if it is true that nations among which industry, agriculture, commerce, navigation, and all arts and sciences are flourishing in the highest degree, come under the appellation of, and actually are civilized nations; and if it is true that from the very nature of civilized nations it follows that they should be free; all Europe then (the exterior part of Russia and a part of Turkey excepted) ought, by the unquestionable right of mankind to be free, and no such name as arbitrary power or despotism to be known in it.

Nevertheless, we find poor civilized Europe groaning under the heavy yoke of oppression; and her being thoroughly civilized and well versed in the natural rights of mankind, only serves to make her the more sensible of the insupportable chains which she wears, and from which to be released, there is, alas! not the least prospect; the princes, as it seems, are all putting their heads together, in order to establish an universal slavery amongst mankind, vulgarly called an universal monarchy, for the support of which, they actually keep no less than one million of mercenaries; all which stand watching with drawn swords, to destroy every one who should dare to say the least thing against it.

Liberty, it seems, was in expectation, during these two centuries, to take up her residence in Europe; but finding herself grievously disappointed at last, all of a sudden took a flight across the Atlantic, with an intent to settle in America, where there are no haughty, proud, ambitious emperors, kings, or princes, to oppose her; no giddy dissipated nobles to slight her; no slanderous, cringing courtiers to prejudice her; and no luxury, pension, nor bribe, to corrupt her.

In the course of her travels through Europe, she left here and there a shadow behind her, which shadows dwindled away gradually at the approach of the horrid night of oppression, and but a little while, not the least mark will be seen of her.

Perhaps you will interrupt me here, and cry out, does not liberty in her full glory reside amongst us Dutchmen? But, my dear friend, if you come to examine it, you will find a mere shadow instead of reality. It is true you have no king; your stadtholder has not the least prerogative; your national affairs are conducted by your own council; nay, there are even some of your senators along with the army in a time of war, without whose order nothing can be done. These are blessings, I readily confess; but what is all this to the individual? Is he happy?—Free? Your government, although a republican one, is as despotic as the court of Constantinople. A chief magistrate at Amsterdam has it in his power to send a letter de cachet to any citizen, respectable and opulent however he may be, ordering him to leave the city within four and twenty hours, under pain of imprisonment, and large pecuniary penalties. Liberty indeed!

Your police is the most corrupted one in Europe, being only calculated to fill the pockets of its officers: your civil laws are so complicated, that a suit in law is never decided before two or three years, by which both parties are generally impoverished before it is ended: your criminal laws are as barbarous as they were under the Spaniards: you keep on the torture, whilst it becomes abolished in the most obscure countries: your press, that great standard of liberty, is far more confined than at Paris; even your poor paltry news-papers are read over and curtailed several times by a stupid magistrate, before they can go to the press. The poor printer of the Leyden paper has but lately been summoned before the states, for having glanced at the natural abilities of the grand duke of Russia, and was obliged to kneel down before the Russian ambassador, and beg pardon. Your clergy have far more power, and are more spiteful than the Sorbonnes at Paris: your taxes are chiefly, and indeed all, levied on the most necessary articles of life, by which the poor and industrious are burthened, whilst the great men of landed property make it as easy for themselves as possible. Your governors in the West-Indies exercise the most despotic and tyrannical authorities over individuals, although Dutch subjects: your governors, council, and officers in the East Indies are totally destitute of all human feelings, and acknowledged to be the greatest tyrants that ever disgraced the human race: in a word, you have adopted in your government the slowness of a democracy, the selfishness of an aristocracy, the mercilessness of a republic, and the oppression of individuals of a monarchy. So far for Dutch liberty.

But what say you of your own country? You will reply: "Does not liberty shine in her perfect lustre at Switzerland?" Alas! my dear friend, whatever I said against your government, is doubly applicable to that of my own country, with the addition that Switzerland is in every respect the European coast of Guinea; their freedom consists therein, that every nation may come thither, and purchase slaves; with the only difference, that the slaves purchased on the coast of Guinea are sent to the West Indies or America, to cultivate the different plantations, or to do other business, calculated for the general good of mankind; whilst the slaves purchased in Switzerland are sent to France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Austria, &c. to lay waste or ruin the best countries, or to do other business calculated for the general destruction of mankind.

Scarcely did a petty tyrant on the continent send a few thousand men to quell rebellion (a technical term in some language for liberty) but all the sons of freedom exclaimed against it; whilst our free and independent united cantons of Switzerland make it their sole business to sell their sons to cut throats for France, Spain, &c. or to whoever wants common destroyers, of the human race. If you ask a Swiss what is the production of your country? he will directly answer, "Good cattle and stout men." Argue with a polite Swiss about the shameful practice of selling their free-born subjects to fight for other nations, they will answer you, "It is the remarkable martial spirit which characterises the Swiss, and prompts them to fight for any body."

Martial spirit, seems to be, in our refined age, the technical term for public murder and plunder. It is true that it is highly consistent with a virtuous citizen to take up arms in defence only, when his country and property is in danger of being invaded. The law of nature gives that right, but to be hired to fight for another country, whether the cause be right or wrong deserves our contempt. An officer or soldier who places himself at the head of a battle, and gives proofs of his intrepidity in his own country's cause, deserves our admiration, if it is from motives of zeal to a good cause; but if it proceeds from motives of Interest and preferment (although for his own country) we should look upon him with equal contempt, and brand him with the just epithet of a mercenary. How can we look upon him in any other light? (says the truly learned Marmontel) "s'exposer a la mort pour gagner la vie;" (he earns his livelihood by exposing himself to death.)

Being in the neighbourhood of Italy, I will just mention the republics of Genoa, Venice, Ragusa, and Malta. All I have to say on these free governments, is, that for the good of mankind I would sooner wish the subjects of these states to be governed by the present humane Dey of Algiers, than by those haughty, proud, and insignificant Italian nobles. Aristotle, in his definition of a monarchy, says, "That one man is free, and all the rest slaves;" but he forgets that in his own form of government he institutes, instead of one tyrant, a number of tyrants. It is the happiness and freedom of the governed, but not that of the governor, which is to be considered.

Corfica was crushed by the irresistible force of a neighbour, and by the treachery of the chief officers. The head of them (as report says) was winked at by the conqueror to strip the treasury of a considerable sum, and to escape; but I am happy to find that a true spirit, and even enthusiasm of liberty, still prevails among that handful of people; and I suppose that after the conquest cost above 20,000 men, and nearly as many millions of livres, the conqueror will at the end be obliged to give it up.

A shadow of liberty existed in Sweden, but it soon vanished away at the approach of despotism; and all the states of Europe, free as well as despotic, congratulated the usurper on the glorious revolution.

The extensive kingdom of Poland was in some respect free. It was a mixture of all kinds of governments with a king at the head. They had an advantage even over Great Britain, because their kings were electable; and according to the latest constitution, even the third generation of the king was not to be intitled to offer himself a candidate for the crown. Three neighbouring powers, in spite of all nations, dismembered the country, and divided it amongst themselves; the feeble fragments which were left, carry still the mere name of freedom; and their affairs are to be conducted by a council permanent (elected by the diet) and by the diet itself.

There are no less than 21,000 men, viz. 7000 Russians, 7000 Austrians, and 7000 Prussians, ordered to encamp close to Warlaw; and the business of the diet (or rather of the 21,000 cut-throats) as I am informed from the best authority, is to render the king entirely despotic in that part of Poland now called the republic; and thus poor liberty will be banished from that spot too.

You will be curious to hear my opinion of the people of Great Britain, that most antient seat of liberty. The people there, I am told, are perfectly happy in being indulged to speak and write, to abuse king and ministry in what manner they please, which they consider as an ample satisfaction for paying exorbitant taxes, and supplying the enormous exigencies of government. I must acknowledge the people to be perfectly free, viz. the cities, towns, boroughs, and corporations, are entirely free to elect their representatives in parliament, either according to their consciences, or to the highest bidder. The members of both houses of parliament are entirely free to discharge their duty, either according to their consciences, or according to the places and pensions they hold. The king is entirely free to choose ministers: the minister is entirely free to propose constitutional or unconstitutional measures. But how far all these freedoms are exercised, I am not a skilled historian enough to decide.

Old-Mexico, or New-Spain.

OLD-Mexico, or New-Spain, lies between 19° , 30° , and 30° , 40° north latitude; and is bounded on the south-south-east by the Isthmus of Darien, or Panama; and on the north-west by New-Mexico; the North and South Seas washing it on both sides. Along the Pacific Ocean it stretches above two thousand miles, and the coast towards the north sea cannot extend less than one thousand six hundred miles, but the breadth is very unequal.—Towards the north-west it is said to be between six and seven hundred miles over, while, towards the south-east the breadth does not exceed sixty miles. It is governed by a viceroy, and divided into the three audiences of Guadalajara, Mexico, and Guatemala; the first of which contains the provinces of Cinaloa, Culiacan, Chiametlan, Xalisco, Guadalajara Proper, Xacatecas, and New-Biscay; the second, those of Mechoacan, Mexico Proper, Panuco, Tlascala, Guaxaca, Tabasco, and Yucatan; and the third, those of Chiapa, Soconusco, Guatemala Proper, Verapaz, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Veragua.

Though the greater part of Mexico lies within the torrid zone, yet the air is temperate and healthy. As you approach the equinoctial, it necessarily grows hotter; but in no place is the atmosphere heated to such a degree as to render the climate insupportable. This arises from the land and sea breezes, which blow alternately; and the great number of lakes and rivers, the vapours from which cool the air, and render it mild, soft, and pleasant. The greatest heats are during the months of February, March, and April, when the sun is seldom obscured by clouds, and the waters are dried up in such a manner, that it is difficult to meet with any in many places. The rainy season begins towards the close of April, and continues until the month of September; being always preceded by tempests or tornadoes, thunder, lightning, and hurricanes, when the wind blows almost from every point of the heavens, increasing daily in fury till the month of June, at which time the rain falls, as if a second deluge were to ensue. No country under heaven abounds more with grain, delicious fruits, roots, and vegetables; many of which are peculiar to it, or at least to America. Of these the most remarkable are, bamboes, mangroves, and logwood, which grow on the coasts; red and white cotton trees, cedars, blood-wood, and maho, of which the natives make ropes and cables; light-wood, of which they make floats, being as light as cork; white-wood, the cabbage-tree, the calabash, cacao, and vanilla, which the Spaniards call bexuco or banilla; plantains, bananas, pine-apples, sapadillo, avogato pear, mammee, mammee-sapota, grape, prickly, bibby, and other curious fruit-trees; besides which, the Spaniards have introduced most of the European fruits. Mexico also produces the poisonous manchineel-apple, gourds of a prodigious size, melons, silk-grass, tamarinds, and locust-trees; the little, black, white, and borachio sapototees, the last of which takes its name from the inebriating quality of the fruit. To these these we may add the grenadillo de China, creeping-plant, and the may-he-y, which furnishes the natives with thread for linen and cordage, and also a balsam and liquor, which, when fermented, is as pleasant and strong as wine: from this too is distilled a strong spirit, not unlike brandy.

Other valuable productions of New-Spain are, copal, aninie, tacamahaca, caranica, liquid amber, and oil of amber.—Balsam of Peru is also found in Mexico, guaiacum, china-root, sarsaparilla, and the root mechoacan, which are well known to druggists and apothecaries, and of excellent use in a variety of distempers. Besides the maize or native grain of Mexico, the Spaniards have introduced the use of barley, wheat, pease, beans, and other grain; pulse, roots, and vegetables, which are now common in every province. Rice grows abundantly, and flourishes extremely, on account of the long wet seasons.—Trees are all the year in leaf, blossom, or fruit: and every month in the year presents an appearance of spring, summer, and autumn, altogether.

The most remarkable animals of New-Spain are, the pecaïre, a little black short-legged animal, that has some resemblance of a hog, but his navel grows on his back; the warce, like the former, but something less; the opossum; the moose-deer; the guanoë, of the shape of a lizard, but as big as a man's leg; the flying-squirrel, which has a small body, and a loose skin, which he extends like wings, and is borne up by the wind a considerable time; the sloth, which is about the bigness of a spaniel, and feeds on the leaves of trees, but is so long in getting down one tree and up another, that he grows lean on the journey, the armadillo, so named from his shell, resembling armour, in which he can inclose himself; the racoon, pretty much resembling a badger; the ounce, or tyger-cat; beavers, the manatee, a kind of fish, as big as an ox, and excellent eating; five or six species of tortoises; the gar-fish, which has a sharp bone at the end of his snout like a spear; and the paracood, a fish about an ell long, and well tasted, but unwholesome at some seasons.

Of the feathered kind, the most remarkable are, the macaw, the quam, the curasoe, the cardinal, and the humming-bird.

Among many other reptiles and insects are, the rattle-snake, the migua, and the cochineal-fly. The migua is an insect so small that it cannot easily be discerned, and usually strikes into a man's legs. If it is let alone, it will get deep into the flesh, where it lays a great many nits or eggs, which increase to the bigness of a pea; and if the part is scratched, it immediately festers, and endangers the loss of a limb. The cochineal fly is bred in a fruit, that grows on a shrub about five feet high; when the fruit opens, these insects take wing, and hover a little while over the tree, and then fall down dead on the sheets that are spread for them.

There are some high mountains on the western coast of New-Spain near the Pacific Ocean, most of which are said to be volcanos: Several rivers rise in these mountains, and fall some into the gulph of Mexico, and some into the South-sea, on both of which there are several capes and bays. Among the bays on the gulph, are those of Campeachy and Honduras.

The principal commodities of New Spain are, wool, cotton, sugar, silk, cochineal, chocolate, feathers, honey, balsam, drugs, dying woods, salt, tallow, hides, tobacco, ginger, amber, pearls, precious stones, jasper, porphyry, exquisite marble, and gold and silver.

The gold and silver mines are found in the rocky barren parts of the country.—There are several, it is said, of the former, and no fewer than a thousand of the latter. Gold is also found in grains, or dust, in the sands of rivers and torrents. Whoever discovers a mine of gold or silver, is at liberty to work it, paying the king a tenth of the product, and limiting himself within fifty yards round the place upon which he has fixed. All the silver and gold dug or found in grains, is entered in the royal exchequer; and it is reported, that, notwithstanding great quantities are run and concealed, no less than two millions of silver marks, weighing eight ounces each, are entered yearly, out of which they coin seven hundred thousand marks, into pieces of eight, half-pieces of eight, quarter-pieces, rials, and half-pieces; the value of the latter being about three-pence sterling.

The people of Mexico, and the rest of the Spanish West Indies, are prohibited trading with any but the subjects of Spain, nor are foreigners suffered to visit their coasts. The traffic of Mexico is one of the richest and most extensive in the world, for they trade with the Philippine Islands, near the coast of China, through the South Sea, or Pacific Ocean; with Peru and Chili, through the same sea; and with Old Spain, and the Spanish islands and settlements on that side, through the North-Sea and Atlantic Ocean; all which trades are held lawful. There is also a very considerable smuggling, or clandestine trade, carried on by the Spaniards and Indians in America, with the English, French, and Dutch.

The whole of the trade between Old-Spain and the Spanish dominions in America, is carried on by annual ships, usually divided into three classes, the flota, the register-ships, and galleons.

The flota is a fleet of three men of war, and fourteen or fifteen merchant-ships, from four hundred to one thousand tons burthen; they are loaded almost with every sort of goods which Europe produces for exportation; all sorts of woollens, linens, silks, velvets, laces, glass, paper, and cutlery; all sorts of wrought iron, watches, clocks, quicksilver for the use of their mines, horse-furniture, shoes, stockings, books, pictures, military stores, wines, fruits, &c. so that all the trading parts of Europe are highly interested in the cargo of this fleet. Spain itself sends out little more than the wine and fruit: this, with the freight and commissions to the merchant, and the duty to the king, is almost all the advantage which that kingdom derives from her commerce with the Indies.—— This fleet is fitted out at Cadiz, and destined for La Vera Cruz, situated on the gulph in the kingdom of Mexico; they are not permitted to break bulk, on any account, till they arrive there. When all the goods are landed and disposed of at Le Vera Cruz, the fleet takes in the plate, precious stones, cochineal, indigo, cocoa, tobacco, sugar, and hides, which are the returns for Old-Spain. From La Vera Cruz they sail to the Havannah, which is the place of their rendezvous, where they meet the galleons. These are another fleet, which carry on all the trade of Terra Firma, by Carthagena, and of Peru, by Panama and Porto Bello; in the same manner as the flota serves for New-Spain. When the flota arrives at the Havannah, and joins the galleons and register-ships, which assemble at the same port from all quarters, some of the cleanest and best sailing vessels are dispatched to Old-Spain, with advice of the contents of these several fleets, as well as with treasure and goods of their own, that the court may judge what indulto or duty is proper to be laid on them, and what convoy is necessary for their safety.

Register-ships are sent out by merchants at Cadiz and Seville, when they judge that goods must be wanted at any particular ports in the West-Indies. Their way is, to petition the council of the Indies for a licence to send a ship of three hundred tons burthen, or under, to that port: they pay for this licence forty or fifty thousand dollars besides presents to the officers, in proportion to the connivance necessary to the design; for though the licence runs only to three hundred tons at most, the vessel fitted out is seldom less than six hundred. This ship and cargo are registered at the pretended burthen: it is required too, that a certificate be brought from the king's officer at the port to which she is bound, that she does not exceed the size at which she is registered; all this passes of course. These are what they call register-ships, and by these the trade of Spanish-America has been carried on principally for some years past; which practice has been thought as much to the prejudice of their trade, as it is contrary to all their former maxims for carrying it on.

The fleet which is called the galleons consists of eight men of war, of five hundred tons each, designed principally to supply Peru with military stores; but, in reality, laden not only with those, but with every other kind of merchandize, on a private account, so as to be in too weak a condition either to defend themselves, or to protect others. Under the convoy of these are twelve sail of merchant ships, not inferior to the galleons in burthen. This fleet of the galleons is regulated in much the same manner as the flota; and is destined for the exclusive commerce of Terra Firma, and the South Sea, as the flota is for that of Mexico.

As soon as this galleon fleet arrives at Carthagena, expresses are dispatched to Porto Bello, and to all the adjacent towns, but particularly to Panama, that they may get ready all the treasure, which is deposited there, to meet the galleons at Porto Bello; at which place all that are concerned in the various branches of this extensive trade assemble. There is no part of the world, where business of such great importance, is negotiated in so short a time; for sometimes in a fortnight the fair is over. During the fair, heaps of wedges and ingots of silver are thrown about upon the wharfs, as things of no value. The display of gold, silver, and precious stones, on one hand, and of the curious workmanship of the various ingenious fabrics of Europe on the other, is truly astonishing.

The whole trade between the East-Indies and Spanish America, is carried on by one great galleon, which arrives at Acapulco on the South Sea, from the Philippine Islands, in the month of December. They see no other land in the whole voyages of three thousand leagues, which they perform in five months, than the little Ladrone. The ship is laden with all the rich commodities of the East, as cloves, pepper, cinnamon, nutmegs, mace, tea, china, Japan wares, calicoes, plain and painted muslins of every sort, silks, precious stones, rich drugs, Persian carpets, benjamin, camphire, ivory, and gold-dust, all which amounts to a prodigious value, this one ship having more riches in it than some whole fleets. At the same time the rich ship from Lima comes in, which is computed to bring no less than two millions of pieces of eight in silver, or four hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling.—

Several other ships from the different ports of Chili and Peru, meet upon the same occasion; and besides the traffic for the Philippine commodities, there is very large dealing for every thing, which these countries have to exchange with one another, as well as for all sorts of European goods. The fair at Acapulco lasts sometimes for thirty days. As soon as the goods are disposed of, the galleon prepares to set out on her voyage to the Philippines, with her returns, chiefly in silver; but with some European goods, and other commodities of America. We speak here as though there were but one vessel in the trade with the Philippines, and in fact there is only nominally one trading vessel, the galleon itself, of about two thousand tons; but another attends her commonly as a sort of convoy, which generally carries such a quantity of goods as, in a great measure, disables her from executing that office.—The galleon has often one thousand people on board, either interested in the cargo, or merely as passengers; and there is no trade in which so large profits are made, the captain of the vessel, the pilot, the mate, and even the common sailors, making in one voyage what, in their several ranks, may be considered as easy fortunes. The Jesuits, before their suppression, are said to have had the profits of this ship to support their missions.

New-Spain produces a vast quantity of sugar, especially towards the gulph of Mexico, and about Guaxaca and Guatimala; so that here are more sugar-mills than in any other part of Spanish America, but the sugar is chiefly consumed in the city of Mexico and the monasteries, in chocolate, sweet-meats, preserves, and confectionary wares; a great deal is also sent from Guaxaca, Guatimala, and other provinces, to Mexico and Panama, and from thence is conveyed by sea to Lima, Guaiquil, and Baldivia. There is a great trade also in goods manufactured of cotton, and in indigo, and cochineal. It is said, the people of Nicaragua and Honduras employ three hundred thousand mules and horses, to carry corn, sugar, cocoa, &c. into the inland provinces, and particularly to the city of Mexico. When the galleons came to Vera Cruz, the number of carriages, men and horses, mules, and asses, employed to carry the treasure of the country, with the tobacco, sugar, and other productions of Guatimala and Guax-aca, to Vera Cruz, is incredible. The carriage also of the European goods, that come by the galleons, back again to the different parts of the kingdom, is a considerable article of trade; the silver alone brought from Xacatecas is said to employ six thousand mules.

By an article of the last treaty of peace, the king of Spain gives up all claim or right to molest the English in cutting logwood in the bays of Campeachy and Honduras.

New-Spain is at present inhabited by a mixed people; consisting of the native Indians; the Spaniards, and other Europeans; the unmixed descendants of the Spaniards, who are called Creoli; the Mestizos, or issue of the Spaniards by Americans; the Mestiches, or the issue of such issue; the Terceroons des Indics, or the children of the last, married to Spaniards; and the Quarteroons des Indics, whose descendants are allowed the same privileges as true Spaniards. The negroes are likewise pretty numerous, being imported from the coast of Africa for various purposes, and many of them admitted to their freedom. The issue of an European and a negro constitutes another distinction, called Mulatto; besides which there is a mixed breed of negroes and Indians, which is generally deemed the lowest rank of the people.

There are some tribes of Indians, both in the open country and the mountains, that still preserve their freedom; but most of them are subject to the Spaniards, and have embraced the popish religion. Among the free Indians are those on the Musquito shore, where the English have a governor, and some settlements; these Indians being implacable enemies to the Spaniards, but firm friends and allies to the English. Great numbers of Indians are employed by the Spaniards in working in their gold and silver mines.

These natives in general are tall, clean, well proportioned, and handsome: their complexion is a deep olive, and both sexes have long, black, lank, coarse hair on their heads; but they will suffer none on the other parts of their bodies. Some tribes look upon flat noses as a great beauty. Almost all the Mexicans paint their bodies with the figures of various birds and beasts, and anoint themselves with oil or fat. Some tribes are clothed; but the men of others go almost naked. The Mexicans, in general, have their noses, lips, ears, necks, and arms, adorned with pearls and other jewels, or trinkets made of gold, silver, or some other metal.—The free Indians are said to be a brave, generous, and humane people, except in the article of human sacrifices; but but the others are become cruel, treacherous, cowardly, mean, thievish, and altogether vicious. Though the free Indians discover a great veneration for the sun and moon, they have no image of them, but a great many of human form. They cultivate but little spoil, and live chiefly by hunting and fishing. Besides all the domestic offices, the women spin, weave, and dress cotton, and linen cloths, for their own and their husbands apparel.

The English Theatre.

SEVERAL new performances have already been represented at the theatres, an account of which we shall here lay before our readers.

A new musical entertainment, or Persian Tale, was performed on the 6th of December, at Drury-Lane theatre.

Dramatis Personæ.

Azor,	Mr. Vernon.
Scander,	Mr. Bannister.
Ali,	Mr. Dodd.
Lefbia,	Mrs. Scott.
Fatima,	Mrs. Collett.
Fairy,	Miss Jarrat.
Selima,	Mrs. Baddeley.
Genii, fairies, spirits, &c.

Scene: Persia, sometimes in the palace, at others in a country mansion, &c.

The fable is as follows: Scander, a Turkish merchant, and his servant Ali, quit their own country, and travel into Persia, in search of treasures. On their arrival at the Persian territories, they are benighted in an extensive wood, and a dreadful thunder storm comes on. Seeing a light at a distance, they walk up to it, and it conducts them to a palace of prince Azor, who, for his amours and infidelity, was transformed by a fairy from the handsomest man, to a most hedious monster, and doomed to reside there till he should be loved by some fair one, which might atone for his crime, and restore him to his former figure and enjoyments. The travellers are astonished to find so superb a palace uninhabited, which is increased by an elegant repast arising by magic. Ali approves of the regale; but thinks that seats would be more commodious, and they instantly fly on the stage. After the repast Scander recollects the commissions with which his three daughters had charged him; two desiring that he would bring them gewgaws and jewels; but his favourite Selima, desired only a rose, that he might recollect her in the plucking of it. Accordingly espying a rose-tree, that grew round a pillar, he approaches it, and plucks one of the roses, when the pillar and tree disappear, and Azor appears in his state of deformity. He threatens Scander with immediate punishment, unless he agrees to deliver up one of his daughters to him. At length Scander, with great reluctance consents to send Selima; when Azor dispatches them home in a car, drawn by dragons for expedition. On Scander's return, his anxiety and form is perceived by Selima; but he will not reveal the secret; she prevails, however, with Ali to disclose it, and she resolves to go, and engages him to accompany her. Upon their arrival at the palace, the following inscription strikes them: "Selima's Apartments;" and upon their farther approach Cupids advance, attended by the Graces, who dance round her. Azor next appears, and though his deformity is horrible, his manner and address are so engaging, that she soon testifies a prepossession in his favour, and pities his misfortunes. He then tells her that palace, all its appendages are hers, and every thing she can desire shall be complied with. She now requests to see her father and sisters, upon which he waves his wand, and presents her with a view of them in a shade through a pier-glass; but the vision soon closes to her great mortification. She next requests to visit her father, and promises to return ere the setting of next day's sun. He complies with her request, after declaring his passion for her in the strongest terms, and gives her a ring, which delivers her from his power. Whilst Selima is absent, the fairy, who had fixed the spell on Azor, discovering Selima's partiality for him, appears, and restores him to his former agreeable figure. Selima returns according to her promise, though contrary to the will of her father and sisters, and is no less astonished than charmed at the metamorphosis of her lover, and his restoration to his throne, which speedily brings about her consent to give her hand. Selima's father and sisters now appear, and a happy reconciliation ensues.

This piece is translated from a favourite French ballet comedy, written by Marmontel. The dialogue of the English is in some places defective; but the airs are well adapted, and that particular song by Mr. Baddeley met with great applause, we shall therefore present our readers with it in this place.

The vocal parts by	Reinhold, and
	Mrs. Farrell.
Evelina,	Mrs. Hartley.

Scene: Mona, the habitation of the Druids.

Caractacus, king of the Silures, defeated by the Roman præfect Ostorius, finding his queen made prisoner, and supposing his son Arviragus either slain or fled, retires from his conquering and insulting foes, with his only daughter, the lovely Evelina, to Mona, the sequestered habitation of the Bards and Druids. Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantines, fearing next the arms of the Roman conqueror in the northern part of Britain, submits to a disgraceful truce with him; one of the servile conditions of which was, that she should assist him in securing the British king Caractacus, that he might forthwith be carried away to Rome, to grace the triumph of Claudius; and her two sons Vellinus, and Elidurus, are given up by her as hostages, to be carried themselves to Rome, if they cannot succeed in seducing the brave and royal Briton from his sacred sanctuary, to which place they were accompanied by the Roman general, Aulus Didius, with a sufficient force to effect this enterprise.

The tragic drama opens upon their arrival in the consecrated grove near midnight, the time when the Bards and Druids were preparing the ceremonial of Caractacus's admission into their order; the whole solemn chorus, slow-descending from Mount Snowdon. Caractacus and Evelina join in the procession, the aged Briton alternately lamenting the loss of his long loved queen, and his promising son Arviragus,—and comforting the only remaining pledge of the first treasure he had lost. Just as the chorus are singing the invocation, previous to the performance of the solemn rites, they perceive by an ominous smoke that surrounds the altar, and the shaking of the central oak, that their grove is polluted by some unholy steps: the semichorus confirm their suspicions, by bringing forth Vellinus and Elidurus, whom they had made prisoners in a shadowy dell. After a severe reprimand for their presumption, the former gains permission to be heard, and assures the reverend seers, that so far from seeking their abode through treachery, they came only to call forth, if possible, the great Caractacus, to head their northern bands, to expel the Roman savages, and fight the cause of liberty, and Britain!

Caractacus at the sound of these joyful tidings, steps forth from behind the altar, where the Druids had concealed him, and prepares to be led to the charge. Vellinus now adds a still stronger spur to his resignation, by giving him a forged signet for their fidelity; and further informs him, that Cartimandua has in reserve a still nobler pledge of her friendship for him, no less than Guideria, his queen, whom Vellinus, in a sally against the Romans, had recovered from her cruel captivity. Caractacus now goes instantly forth with them, after some moral advice of the chorus, who discourages not the feelings of an exalted soul that flames for freedom, but cautions him against that zeal, that headlong rushes on when slaughter calls.

Evelina, sent by her father to the Bards, &c. expresses her doubts of the sincerity of Vellinus, as her mother had sent no token of her safety, either to her father or her; adding, that the younger brother, Elidurus, sighed always at the recital, and pensive hung his modest head. The chorus now send to summon Elidurus to their presence, and Evelina requests them to use the gentlest inquiries. Caractacus returning, apologizes for sending Evelina to their altar, and is informed that due inquiries had been made of their gods into the truth of the young man's intelligence; but no assent whatever had been given. Vellinus attempts to brave the oracle; but they in return point to a rock of living adamant, which poised by magic, moves to the gentlest touch of truth and purity, but stands immoveable and fixed as Snowdon on that of a traitor;—further telling him, the gods command that one of the brothers should approach and try it; and therefore as they are wont, tender the chance of fate to the younger. Elidurus, with all the weight of his brother's infamy, and his own conscious innocence, submits. After a solemn invocation to the chorus, he prepares for the trial, apprised of the death that inevitably awaits him in case of detection.

Evelina conjures him to reveal the fatal secret, and acquitting him of any base design, asks him if his brother's purpose be honest? intimating at the same time, that she is aware of the guilty price that barbarous Rome had set upon her father's devoted head.

Arviragus here enters, and embraces his long lost sister, whom he is surprised to find kneeling at the feet of Elidurus. The approach of the Druids, however, and a promise of Elidurus not to escape the grove till they should have a parley, satisfies him, and he enters into a justification of his conduct, declaring he fled not, as had been imputed to him, but that he was levelled to the earth by a random shaft, where he lay till midnight among the slain; from whence, crawling to a lonely cottage he escaped, and now led to Snowdon's foot full twenty troops of hardy veterans to call his fire their leader. He then tells them that by some treacherous arts Rome now approaches those groves; for that as he landed he saw their vessels moored in concealment in a bay. This information urged the chorus to order Elidurus forth to instantaneous punishment for this treason, and sacrilege, which they naturally impute to him.—Elidurus braves all their threats, and refuses to reveal the secret; but tells them, if they will furnish him with a sword, and twenty honest Britons, he will quell those Romans. The chorus chide his rashness, adding, however, if the cause were good, by only blowing the sacred trumpet bound to the central oak, a thousand Britons, terrible in war, would instantly come forth, that should appal even Romans. Arviragus and Elidurus press to join them, to which the Druids at length consent, perceiving with Arviragus that the treachery was Vellinus's, to whom they promise safety, at the demand of his brother Elidurus.

Caractacus now appearing, embraces his son, and solicits forgiveness for unjustly accusing him of flight. He then tells the Druids that the traitor youth Vellinus was fled; and Elidurus at that moment coming forward to join the British forces, is told that his brother's flight had broke the tie that held their fealty, and therefore he must die. Evelina falling at the feet of the Druids, pleads for him in vain, for she sees him carried off.

Caractacus receiving now from the hand of the chorus the magic sword of old Belinus, stained with the blood of giants, is preparing with his son for the battle, when Elidurus enters to them armed, and joins his sincere and fervent prayer with them, for conquest over the Roman hosts. Arviragus and Elidurus, therefore, now march forth with Evelina's pathetic invocation to the gods for their joint safety. After pious omens, a bard enters to Caractacus, and tells him that the Roman troops had fled affrighted at a fall of the religious order of Mona. At the sound of the sacred trumpet, Arviragus and Elidurus, like twin-lions, rushed down with all their force, and drove the foe before them. The Roman captives are now brought before the British chief, who orders them to be treated as men should men, and not as Rome treats Britons.

At this instant the chorus returns in haste, affrighted, and tells them they are betrayed, for that she heard the traitor Vellinus's voice call to arms.—Caractacus instantly sallies forth to meet him.—Arviragus is now brought in wounded to Evelina, leaning on Elidurus's arm, and embracing his sister, and recommending her to the protection of his brother soldiers, expires. A bard now brings the news that the sacred grove is invested; yet they chaunt a solemn dirge over the corps of Arviragus. Aulus Didius with his Romans now enter, and taunt the sacred orders: soon after him Caractacus is led in, who, after embracing the manes of his son, with the true firmness of a British monarch, is led off with his daughter in chains, to grace the triumphal entry at Rome of the emperor Claudius.

The performers did great justice to their respective characters. Mr. Clarke in the two last acts discovered great feeling in Caractacus. Mr. Lewis was very spirited in Arviragus, as was Mr. Wroughton in Elidurus. Mr. Whitfield by no means did discredit to Aulus Didius; and Mr. Ward was more decent in Vellinus than in any other part. Mr. Aikin and Mr. Hull got great and deserved applause in the Chief Druid and Chief Bard; the latter, in particular, spoke the recitative with all imaginable feeling and energy.

Mrs. Hartley never appeared to so much advantage before, as she did now in the tender character of Evelina.—Her figure was uncommonly beautiful, and when she stood weeping over the body of her brother, we never saw any thing near so elegant and striking.

Dr. Arne's music is certainly good, and the chorusses are correct in point of harmony, and fine through all the accompaniments.

The three following airs gave great satisfaction to the audience.

AIR. Mr. Leoni and Mrs. Farrell.
 Welcome, welcome, gentle train,
 Mona hails ye to her plain;
 Here your genial dews dispense,
 Dews of peace and innocence.

AIR. Mr. Leoni.

Change, my harp, O change thy measures,
 Cull from thy mellifluous treasures,
 Notes that steal on even feet;
 Ever slow, yet never pausing,
 Mix'd with many a warble sweet,
 In a ling'ring cadence closing.

AIR. Mr. Leoni.

Radiant ruler of the day,
 Pause upon thy orb sublime;
 Bid this awful moment stay,
 Bind it on the brow of time;
 While Mona's trembling echoes sigh,
 To strains that thrill when heroes die.

An author, who sits down to write for the stage, should consider the genius of the people to whom he writes, and whose palates he is to please. Mr. Mason it may be answered, when he wrote this poem, did not intend it for dramatic exhibition. This would be a full defence, if he had not since fitted it for representation. In its present form it is evident from the cool reception it has met with, in spite of Mrs. Farrell's distinguished support, that he forgot the genius and taste of an English audience; that a fine poem may be a very indifferent play, and that the most exalted flights of imagery, supported by the genuine spirit of the muses, if destitute of business, and variety of incident, of a succession of interesting scenes, strength of character, and depth of plot, can hardly escape the inattention, if not disgust of the true lovers of the English drama. We cannot help remarking that the high esteem and reverence for the author were barely sufficient to keep it afloat, for we have since seen it represented to houses, far from being full or respectable. It would have met with a more favourable reception, we believe, if the mere declamatory part and the chorusses had been contrasted by the tender and passionate playing of Barry; but as a hint to all future bards, who may be inclined to pursue this path, we caution them to consider what little chance of success presents itself, should they be tempted to make a similar essay, when we inform them that not only the celebrated author of Caractacus miscarried, but that we are convinced, if Sophocles himself were to rise from the tomb, and make the experiment, his chorusses, long soliloquies, tedious narrations, where murders are foretold, and the greatest of all possible misfortunes chanted in the stile and manner of a popish requiem, without the intervention of human means to soften one or prevent the other, his most fortunate exertions in the stile of the Greek tragedy would miscarry; and that too, perhaps, with every mark of indignation. The managers were not without their merit, as mere managers; for they might reasonably suppose, that when such vile trash as the Seraglio, the Christmas Tale, and Selima and Azor, were permitted to escape without instant damnation, that one of the most interesting stories in British antiquity, told in the finest poetry almost extant in the English language, accompanied by the compositions of an Arne, and the enchanting sweetness, judicious stile, and marked and expressive execution of a Farrel, could not have failed of the most happy and desired success.

The next dramatic representation, was a new tragedy called Semiramis, written by captain Ascoug, a near relation of lord Lyttleton.

Scene: Babylon.

As the fable of this tragedy is generally known, there having been no less than five tragedies in French written upon the subject, and a good translation in English, by Dr. Franklin, from Voltaire's, we shall not dwell upon it here.

We shall only remark that this is little more than a version of Voltaire's piece, as rendered by Dr. Franklin; the captain having not stuck to the letter, but endeavoured to communicate the spirit of his original.

With regard to the language and diction of the piece, the critics differ; but as in most cases of controversy, the medium is generally nearest the mark, we think it may be fairly asserted, that had not so many tragedies been written upon the same subject, and so good a translation appeared in our language from Voltaire's, this would have escaped the severity of criticism. As it is, take it all in all, it may be pronounced a mediocre production—no great recommendation indeed to poetry, if we ask by Horace's rule.

It must be acknowledged the scenery and decorations did honour to the artist who regulates them at that theatre. The characters were very well dressed; and what was much more in favour of the author, they were performed beyond the usual standard of a first night's representation. Mrs. Yates in particular, in the character of Semiramis, was, we think, equal to her acting in any part we recollect seeing her in. Would we could add as much in favour of Mrs. Reddish!—but we suppose the managers will supply her part in future by Mrs. Hopkins, who certainly would do it far greater justice.
 Y y y y y z and

The prologue was puerile, and no way apposite, except it was to tell us the tragedy was written by an officer, a circumstance the audience did not seem very inquisitive about. The epilogue was written by Mr. Sheridan, jun. and testified marks of his genius.

Drury-Lane.

December 20. Romeo and Juliet was performed this evening to a very full and brilliant house, which assembled to see a young gentlewoman (a Mrs. Robinson) on her first appearance, in the character of Juliet. We shall avoid making any observations on the difficulty of succeeding in this part, farther than to remark, that a tolerable first performance of it requires no small portion of merit. Mrs. Robinson seems to be better calculated for the deeper and more solemn walk of tragedy, than for the tender, passionate, though mild and determined Juliet. She appeared to be well tutored, as to the management of her voice and delivery; but thus walking in trammels, she frequently lost sight of nature, and made some of the less interesting passages of her part weak and insipid. Whether she learnt this from Garrick, or Sheridan, is of very little consequence. It is a mere stage trick, designed to render by contrast, the other parts of her acting more marked and distinguished. It is unpardonable in a veteran; but in a new performer, we have observed it more than once fatal. Garrick was the only person with whom it ever succeeded. Mrs. Robinson's person is elegant, though rather below the middling standard. Her voice is full, clear, tolerably harmonious, and capable of sufficient variety. Her feelings are strong, and her features capable of a suitable expression. Her countenance, her voice, her feelings, her looks and native expression, all combine to fit her for the boisterous, violent, and terrible, rather than the tender emotions of love, pity, and humanity. She bends forward, which takes off from her height, whether from nature or affectation, we do not pretend to say. Mrs. Yates and Mrs. Hartley may venture to spare an inch of their fashionable bend; but we would advise Mrs. Robinson, to preserve her height to a single line. She should learn to look at the audience fully, according to her situation; and not by a continual rolling of her eyes, and when she does fix them, directing them to the upper region, give the part of the audience in the pit reason to suppose that she was either seeking out an acquaintance in the boxes, or was steadily contemplating the pleasing visage of some favourite friend in the shilling gallery. It might pass unnoticed, when she was on the stage alone; but it was surely intolerable, when her passionate, warm and faithful lover was present. She should likewise learn to walk with more grace, dignity, and variety of deportment; and not kick her heels about, as if she meant to prove to the audience, that Shakespeare was right, in introducing her as just brought down from the nursery, from the care and tuition of her prating and loquacious governess. Notwithstanding all her faults, Mrs. Robinson bids fair to be a first rate actress; but she should practice a greater attention to the minutiae of her profession; and observe a respectable decorum towards those whom it is equally her duty and interest to please.

Conrad and Caroline. An original History.

OF all the inhabitants of Dantzwick, none was held in higher estimation than Mr. Neuman. The honesty and punctuality of whose dealings as a merchant, and his politeness and benevolence as a man, gave his word an authority for ten times more than he was worth; though he never had occasion for any extraordinary exertion of his credit. Fortune seemed to have chosen him, in order to vindicate her own character from the charge of blindness in the distribution of her favours. To add to his happiness, he married a woman of uncommon beauty, and equal virtue and affability: but misery is so near to happiness, that they most frequently spring from the same source. His wife, his adored wife, died in her first labour; the child indeed survived, and for her sake he seemed to suffer life. He called her, after her mother Caroline; and as she grew up, there appeared such a resemblance in features and temper; that often, when he was fondling her in all the ecstasies of paternal joy, he would burst into a flood of tears. For her sake, he ever after declined re-entering into any connubial connections. As no care or expence was spared in her education, at the age of seventeen she was one of the most accomplished plished and celebrated young women of Dantzwick. About this time, a young gentleman on his travels, came to that city, strongly recommended to Mr. Neuman: his name was Conrad; he was the son of a Polish nobleman, whose fortune was small, but who maintained the pride of his family, with a long list of noble ancestors. Conrad was his eldest son, and, as he was a youth of a promising figure, and a more promising genius, on him his father had built a thousand schemes of future grandeur. In his visits to Mr. Neuman, he had frequent opportunities of conversing with Caroline, and love soon succeeded to admiration. What am I doing, said he one day to himself, Caroline is engaged on a visit, and I am jealous of the engagement—it was no longer ago than yesterday, that I saw her, and I am almost distracted that I cannot see her to-day; was this but bare esteem, any other party would dissipate the chagrin that this misfortune has occasioned; and I never felt myself less inclined to company than at present. I can never hope that my father will consent to such a match—A merchant's daughter—No, no, it will never—I must fly from this place as soon as possible. He was full of these reflections, when a lady passed at some distance; his heart was immediately in a flutter, he thought it Caroline, flew to join her, and curst his disappointment, when he found it another. Well, said he, I must fly from this place; but can I leave Mr. Neuman? can I leave Caroline, after all their civilities, without taking leave? No, I will order all my baggage to be packed to-night, take leave of them in the morning, and immediately set out to continue my travels, and forget her. Next morning, pursuant to his resolution, he went to Mr. Neuman's. Carolina entertained him in the absence of her father, and the hour appointed for his departure was past, before he recollected his errand; But I could not, said he to himself, set out without seeing Mr. Neuman; Mr. Neuman came, dinner was served, and he postponed his departure till next day. But before he left Mr. Neuman's he had an hundred times changed his resolutions, and the next day found himself still undetermined. One day he dropped some hints to Caroline of his intentions to leave them; she returned towards her harpsichord; he saw her eyes full of tears; from that moment, he thought no more of leaving Dantzwick, but of finding new pretences for staying there. Caroline, tho' her family could boast of no extraordinary honours, was in the eyes of a parent and a merchant, no way inferior to Conrad: so that if he saw their growing passion, he saw no reason he thought to interrupt it; for he could not imagine that the baron would refuse for his son the heiress of a man twice as rich as himself. In the midst of the felicity that he promised himself from their union, he was seized with a violent fever, that baffled all the skill of the physicians. He sent for Conrad into his chamber: I am dying, said he, I have but a few minutes to settle my affairs in this world, and prepare for the next. I have long perceived your passion for my daughter—I hoped to live to see you united—Heaven has twice given me a glimpse of happiness, and twice snatched it from me. I do not repine at the dispensations of Providence, it means me the more happiness hereafter, the less it grants me now. I know your heart, Conrad, I have no relations alive that I would trust with such a deposit, take the dearest pledge of my esteem to your guardianship. Oh, Conrad! be to her—Here death interrupted him, and Caroline fainted in the arms of her lover. It was the third night after his death, and preparations were making for his interment, when thro' carelessness or drunkenness of some of the servants, the house was set on fire, and burst into a blaze before it was discovered, so that it was with the utmost difficulty their lives were saved. There perished all the papers, jewels, and money of the late merchant, and half of Caroline's fortune at one stroke was lost: but, as if ill-fortune was determined to be as cruel to her, as she had been kind to her father, a rich ship freighted entirely on her father's account was wrecked on the coast of England. The creditors on hearing this, seized on the remaining effects, which being sold to disadvantage, a few hundreds of guilders was all the balance in Caroline's favour. Conrad who had wrote to his father for his consent to his intended marriage, as he had nothing now to alledge in behalf of the match, anticipated the refusal, which came the day after their marriage. Conrad on the receipt of it, endeavoured to keep his marriage a secret from the baron, but endeavoured it in vain; there are never wanting a set of creatures, who being incapable of happiness themselves, take a diabolical pleasure in disturbing the happiness of others. One of these (tho' an entire stranger to the baron) undertook to be the messenger of such unwelcome news; so that Conrad, a few months after his marriage, received the following epistle:

S I R,

For I shall no longer call you son, I have heard of your marriage and your ruin, but it shall fall upon your own head. I have stopped all remittances, for I will never support him, that was too base to support the honour of his family. My gates are shut to you for ever.

Conrad and his wife, however, while their little remained, forgot in the raptures of mutual affection the misery that hung over their heads. Conrad, loth to appear in a low condition where they had appeared in a splendid one, quitted Dantzick and retired to the Prussian dominions: but into what country could they travel where want would not overtake them? Caroline, said Conrad, we are unfortunate, but we have nothing to reproach ourselves with; I must do something for our subsistence, but what can I do? born of an illustrious family, I cannot even if I were capable of it, assume any low or mechanic occupation. Arms, my dear Caroline, are the only trade I understand, and the only trade, the lowest office of which a gentleman may embrace without dishonour, and from the lowest station of which, merit has sometimes drawn a general. But what shall I do with you, my beloved Caroline? What will you do with me, Conrad! take me with you. Have I brought you into misfortunes, and do you think that I have not courage enough to share them with you? No, Conrad, I will follow you to death, and if you die, die with you. The regiment into which Conrad enlisted, marched into Flanders the following summer. The dignity and politeness of Conrad's manners, soon convinced his officers that if he had not filled an higher station in life, he at least deserved it: and his valour and assiduity gained him the love and esteem of the whole corps to which he belonged. His Caroline shared along with him in all the fatigue and dangers of the campaign, which was far from being a successful one. In their retreat, some baggage was attacked, and taken by the enemy. But what was the anguish of Conrad, when he was informed that the waggon was taken, in which was his dear Caroline. Mustering up a few of his companions, he led them to her rescue, and such was the fierceness of the attack, that they continued cutting their way through their enemies, while any of them could raise a sword. Conrad himself fell covered with wounds, at the wheels of the carriage that contained his Caroline. She, notwithstanding the blood and dirt that covered him, knew her beloved Conrad, and flung herself from the waggon. He saw her, looked farewell, and expired. And whether from her fall or excessive grief, she died in convulsions soon after. Even the soldiers and enemies, charmed with his bravery and their conjugal affection, wept while they dug the grave, in which they interred them together.

MARTHA CAREFUL.

Indeed she was an Angel! or,

The Poor Poet.

ONE night in the melancholy month of November, as I was sitting in my garret, by the side of a fire with very little heat, and a candle with very little light, ruminating on the various follies and pursuits of men, reflecting on the riches of some, and the indigence of others; figuring in my mind the waste, riot, and superfluity of many among us poor mortals, and of my own excessive poverty, sometimes sighing, and wishing I had strength sufficient for a bricklayer's labourer: at others, my head reclining on my hand, my toe tapping, and my mind philosophizing on the nature of man, how few his real, how numerous his imaginary wants, and how exceedingly happy and charitable I could be, if I had thirty pounds per year. In the midst I say, of these my cogitations, I heard a double rap at the door, just as I was distributing out of my supposed plenty, half a crown to a blind beggar, and a bone to his dog. My reverie was at an end; a double rap was uncommon at the door of the poor, the rich seldom call there—I listened. My landlady was gone out, and the intercession for admittance was repeated. I took my candle, and ran down stairs.—My imagination hurried me away so fast, that I forgot my waistcoat was unbuttoned, and that my old brown coat had but one lap.—I knew not but it might be some lord who had accidentally heard of my poverty and merit, and had flown to my relief. There are, doubtless, numberless lords and great men who would have done it, had they heard of me. It was not their fault. In my haste to get down, one of my old shoe-slippers and my woollen night cap flew off. The rain that had half deluged my garret floor informed me, that I must not stay to gather them up, the poor creature ture at the door would be wet. I opened the door to a young lady—I thought at first it had been an angel. She started back a little. Indeed I had been very ill, and my cloaths were not quite so good as I could have wished;—she advanced, and begged in a trembling voice, to be sure it was a sweet one, that I would let her stand in the passage for a moment, and shut the door, for she was apprehensive of being pursued by some rude men, and being a stranger, she knew not how to avoid them.—Had she presented me with a roll and a red herring instead of that fair soft hand, it had not been half so welcome, though I cannot say but I was very hungry. I drew her in, and instantly shut the door. I told her that the people belonging to the house did not happen to be at home, but if she would kindly condescend to walk up into my poor garret, she should be very welcome.—To be sure it is but a poor place, continued I, but indeed you shall be very welcome. Her eyes glistened. She looked as if she had not power to deny my request; she sighed, I led, and she followed. My night-cap and slipper were replaced.—I handed her the only chair in the room: I was sorry it had not a back. I stood by the side of her and observed her give a timid glance round my poor garret, then turn her head away, wipe her eyes, and smother the rising sigh—Indeed she was an angel! I began to wish for riches, youth, and beauty, while I gazed upon her. Vain and silly man is always wanting, never satisfied—What right had I to be discontented, or wish for any thing but what I had—But man is never satisfied, as I said before.

Pray, sir, said the divine cherub, will you be kind enough to send for a bottle of wine, to the tavern over the way: I am somewhat faint—Yes indeed I would, I replied, if I had any money, with all my soul; but—I hope you—you will not be offended that I have it not in my power—I am very sorry for it—I would ask them to trust me, but I am afraid they will not—However I will try, and I will promise to pay them as soon as ever I can—I hope they will not laugh at me—I will try.

She caught hold of my hand as I was turning about, and almost drowned it with her tears—Pray, sir, said she, sobbing with pity and benevolence, as I thought, do not be offended that I intrude thus upon you, be pleased to take this, presenting me her purse; I am very hungry likewise, pray, sir, be so kind as to order them to send me a fowl or any thing they have—Do not be offended, sir—Offended! Oh that I could entertain you according to my wishes! said I—but pray do not send all this money by me, they perhaps may suspect that I have stolen it—They may perceive, nay they know indeed that I am poor—I offered the purse, she received it, though I thought she looked as if she wished I would keep it—She gave me half a guinea, and I did as I was desired.

The waiter followed me up stairs.—I cannot say but I imagined he had a very impudent kind of a look, and rather an inquisitive stare—though to be sure he might well be surprised to see so beautiful a creature, and so well dressed too, in my poor garret. I was amazed myself, nor could I scarcely believe I was awake. She gave him a shilling as his own perquisite. He took it, gazed on her, stared at me, cast his eyes round the room, and departed.

“Come, sir,” said she, “pray let me intreat you to eat a little bit of supper with me. I cannot eat, indeed, if you sit by without eating. Nay, pray, sir, come:—I will draw the table, and sit upon the corner of the bed. Do, sir, take the chair.”

Her eyes were brimful again. Indeed she was an angel!—I was so very hungry, and she asked in so sweet a manner, that it was impossible to resist. It was a fine fowl, and the sweetest I think I ever tasted in all my life. To be sure I was very hungry.—She said at first she was hungry likewise. I could not see any thing that she had eaten, except picking one of the side bones.—She seemed to mind nothing only helping of me. I told her of it. She gave me a smile of the most enchanting complaisance, and reply'd, she was entirely happy to see me eat—her hunger was abated.

Well, to be sure, every time I looked at her, every time I recollected myself, I could not help thinking this was an odd adventure.

When supper was over, and little remaining of the fowl, except the bones, the sweet young creature asked me how long I had lived in my present lodging?—I told her fifteen years, but that there was a new landlady come to the house, and I was afraid she would turn me out, for that I had had a severe fit of sickness, which had taken not only the trifle of money which I had, but had likewise unfurnished my garret, and that my quarter's rent had been due about a week, which had caused my present landlady, as I imagined, to speak in a very surly manner to me.—I would sell my bed to pay her, continued I, with all my heart, but they give so little for second hand things, that I am afraid that will not do.

Well,

Well, to be sure, I thought it very strange. I could not say a word, but this kind angel was wiping her eyes.

The waiter now came as he had been ordered, to fetch away the plates and other things which had been sent over with the fowl. As he was going out again he met my landlady entering the door.—

“Hey day!” exclaimed she, “what are those? and where have you been?”—

“Up stairs into the garret,” returned the waiter, “with a fowl, to your lodger and a fine young lady that is with him.”—

“Up stairs into the garret with a fowl!”

—“Yes, into the garret with a fowl and a bottle of wine, to raise his spirits I suppose:—I think they want it.—She is a fine young creature to be sure, but she has a plaguy queer choice.—“A fine young creature, and a bottle of wind! Very well, very well, upon my word!—A fowl too!”—Up stairs she bolted, and began—

“Why hark you, Mr. Shabberoon, you Mr. Poet, what is the reason that you doesn’t pay me my good thirteen shillings and two pence halfpenny that you owes me?—A fine way, indeed, to pay your rent, to be junketting with your fine madams upon wind and fowls! But I would have you to know, sir, that altho’ to be sure I’m but a poor parson, I am honest. There isn’t any parson in the parish keeps a more betterer or a more desenterer house nor I do. I keeps no bad houses.”

The sweet creature was shocked, and turned aside her head.

“Don’t turn up your nose at me.—I say I keeps no bad houses, not for the best nobleman that ever stepped the king’s ground: so don’t think to bring any of your kept madams into my departments, to bring an ill kiracler upon my house.”

“Madams!” said the young lady with the utmost timidity.—“Madams!—Yes Madams—You can’t take the law of me for that—I didn’t say you was a ——— mind, whatever I may think—And if you Mr. Farthing Poet must have your Madams, you shall get ’em in somebody’s else’s house, and not in mine I’ll promise you; and if you don’t pay me my rent to-morrow morning, I shall take out an executioner, and seize upon what few rags and ricks you have left. Thank God the landlord comes first.”

“Nay, pray do not do that,” said I: —“I will pay you as soon as I can, indeed.”

“How much is the rent?” said the trembling cherub.

“Why thirteen shillings,” said she, “the rent is, Madam, besides two-pence halfpenny that I lent him out of my own pocket, at varisum times, at a halfpenny and a farthing a time, and to be sure its very hard. I has nothing but what I works for, and I can’t afford to lend my salt, and give my eggs into the bargain. Purvisions are very scarce—then there’s rent, and winder money, and poors rates, and common shore, and scavanger, and I don’t know how much; and one can’t feed hungry children with bad debts, you know, Madam. I didn’t mean to fend you, Madam, I only wants my own. Nobody can be blamed for seeking after their own, Madam.—The shirt isn’t so near as the skin, you know, Madam, and I hope you doesn’t take any thing amiss, Madam, for when I considerates the thing, Madam, to be sure I can’t say as how you has any thing the appearance of a bad parson, Madam: to be sure I am a little passionate, Madam, but passionate parsons are always best, Madam, and it’s soon over with me;—and I am sure there’s nobody more better naterder, nor more better temperder, nor more readier to do a good turn nor I am, Madam.”

All the time during this last harangue, she kept softening her tone, which was rather shrill it must be owned at first, while her eye continually glanced towards the purse in the young lady’s hand.

Anecdote of General Lee.

THIS able officer, being disgusted in the English service, quitted it, and railed very much at king, minister, and court, in the public papers, praising, at the same time lord Chatham to the skies. This introduced him to that nobleman, who gave him a letter of recommendation to the king of Prussia, with which Mr. Lee went immediately to Berlin; he had an interview with the king, who asked him a variety of questions, and in conclusion, not liking his account of himself enough to employ him, gave him a letter of recommendation to the king of Poland. Mr. Lee then went to Warsaw, where the king was at that time, who directly appointed him one of his aids-de-camp; and the king living in a retired manner, he was generally at his table.—There Lee behaved himself with so much imprudence, and so utter a want of discretion, railing at the kings of England and Prussia, that the king of Poland was obliged civilly to dismiss him; upon which he came back to England, and lived very obscurely for some time, till at last the opportunity offered of the American service.

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

The Life of John Shute, Lord Viscount Barrington.

BARRINGTON (John Shute, Lord Viscount) was the youngest son of J. Benjamin Shute, of London, merchant and wholesale linen-draper, who was youngest son of Francis Shute, of Upton, in the county of Leicester, Esq. He applied to the study of the law in the Inner Temple, and, in 1708, was appointed a commissioner of the customs, from which he was removed by queen Anne in 1711. In that reign, John Wildman, of Becket, in the county of Berks, Esq; adopted him for his son after the Roman custom, and settled his large estate upon him, though he was no relation, and but of slender acquaintance. Some years after, he had another considerable estate left him by Francis Barrington, of Tofts, Esq; who had married his first cousin, who died without issue. On this account, he procured an act of parliament, pursuant to the deed of settlement, to assume the name, and bear the arms of Barrington. On the accession of king George I. he was chosen representative in parliament for the town of Berwick upon Tweed, without a Bribe; which circumstance, as he caused it to be inscribed on his monument, we may suppose even at that time to have been very singular. July 5, 1717, he had a reversionary grant of the office of master of the Rolls in Ireland, which he surrendered on the 10th of December, 1731. In the year 1720, he was created baron Barrington of Newcastle, and viscount Barrington of Ardglass. In 1722, he was again returned member of parliament for the town of Berwick; but the house of commons taking into consideration the Harburgh lottery, came at length to this resolution, that John, lord viscount Barrington, had been notoriously guilty of promoting, abetting, and carrying on that fraudulent undertaking; for which offence he was expelled the house. He again offered himself a candidate for the said town against the lord Pelworth, but lost his election by a small majority. He died at his seat at Becket, after a short illness of seven hours, on the 14th of December, 1734, in the 56th year of his age.

Lord Barrington married Anne, eldest daughter of Sir William Daines, knight, by whom he had seven sons and four daughters. He was a person of great learning and judgment, a disciple and friend of Mr. Locke; had a high value for, and diligently studied the holy scriptures, on which he made many valuable comments. He wrote, 1. Miscellanea Sacra, two vols. 2. An Essay on the Dispensations of God to Mankind.

The Life of Dr. Isaac Barrow.

Barrow (Isaac) an eminent mathematician and divine, as well as a bright example of Christian piety, 1776.

tian virtue, was the son of Mr. Thomas Barrow, a reputable citizen of London, and linen-draper to king Charles I. and was born in that city in October, 1630. He was sent first to the Charter-house school, for two or three years, where he discovered more of natural courage than inclination to study, being much given to fighting, and fond of promoting it among his school-fellows, so that he made little or no proficiency in learning; inasmuch that his father was so greatly disgusted with his manners and behaviour, that he is said often to have wished, if it pleased God to take away any of his children, it might be his son Isaac. But being removed to Felsted in Essex, his disposition took a different turn, so that he applied himself to his studies with great diligence, and made an extraordinary proficiency in learning. During his stay at Felsted, he was, on the 15th of December, 1643, admitted a pensioner of Peter-house in Cambridge, where his uncle, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph, was then a fellow; but when he was actually removed to the university, in February, 1645, he was entered at Trinity-college, his uncle, with some others, who had written against the Covenant, having the year before been ejected from Peter-house: and his father having suffered much in his estate by his adherence to king Charles, Isaac's chief support was at first from the generosity of Dr. Hammond, for which he has expressed his gratitude in a Latin epitaph on his benefactor. In 1647, he was chosen a scholar of the house; and though he always continued a warm royalist, and would not take the Covenant, yet his behaviour was such, that he gained the good-will and esteem of his superiors. He afterwards subscribed the Engagement; but having soon after repented of what he had done, he went back to the commissioners to declare his dissatisfaction, and got his name erased out of the list.

In 1648, Mr. Barrow took the degree of bachelor of arts, and the year following was chosen fellow of his college. But as those times were not favourable to the advancement of men of his sentiments, after his election he formed a design to engage in the profession of physic, and accordingly for some years applied to that study, and particularly made a great progress in anatomy, botany, and chemistry; though afterwards thinking that profession not consistent with the oath he had taken on his admission to the fellowship, he quitted medicine, and applied chiefly to divinity. While he read Scaliger on Eusebius, he perceived the dependence of chronology on astronomy, which put him upon the study of Ptolemy's Almagest; and finding that book and all astronomy to depend on geometry, he applied himself to Euclid's Elements, and from thence was led to the other ancient mathematicians, till he had conquered all the difficulties of that noble science by the force of his own genius and indefatigable labour. In 1652, he commenced master of arts, and on the 12th of July, the following year, was incorporated in that degree at Oxford. When Dr. Dupont, the Greek professor at Cambridge, resigned the chair, he recommended his pupil, Mr. Barrow, for his successor, who justified the character given of him by an excellent performance of his probation exercise. But not having interest enough to carry the election, Mr. Ralph Widdrington was chosen; which disappointment is thought to have been the reason of his forming a design to visit foreign countries: and in order to execute this purpose he was obliged to sell his books.

Mr. Barrow left England about the beginning of June, 1655, and went for Paris. There he found his father attending the English court, and out of his own small stock gave him a seasonable supply. The same year his Euclid was printed at Cambridge, which he had left behind him for that purpose. He continued in France the following winter, and sent the master and fellows of Trinity-college an account of his voyage in a poem, and some curious and political observations in a letter, both written in Latin. The ensuing spring he repaired to Leghorn, with an intention to proceed to Rome, but stopped at Florence; "where he had the favour, (says Dr. Pope) and neglected it not, to peruse many books in the grand duke's library, and ten thousand curious medals, and to discourse concerning them with Mr. Pitton, who found his abilities so great in that sort of learning, that upon his recommendation the grand duke invited Dr. Barrow to take upon him the charge and custody of that great treasure of antiquity:" but in this latter circumstance Dr. Pope appears evidently to have been mistaken.

The narrowness of Mr. Barrow's circumstances would now have obliged him to return home, had it not been for Mr. James Stock, a young merchant of London, who generously furnished him with money to support him in his travels. By this unexpected supply he was probably encouraged to enlarge his views; so that he not only continued in Italy that summer, but being prevented from visiting Rome (the place which of all others he most desired to see) on account of the plague, which then raged there, and not being willing to stay the whole winter at Florence, he returned to Leghorn, and from thence set sail for Smyrna, on the 6th of November, 1656. In this voyage the ship in which Mr. Barrow sailed was attacked by an Algerine pirate; and during the engagement he staid upon deck, and being stationed at one of the guns, assisted in the defence of the ship with great activity and bravery. The Algerines were at length obliged to sheer off; and by his behaviour in this affair, Mr. Barrow discovered that his natural courage continued the same, though his disposition for fighting had been long altered; and that he dreaded nothing so much as slavery, the most shocking prospect to a brave and generous mind. Therefore Dr. Pope says, when he asked him, "Why he did not go down into the hold, and leave the defence of the ship to those to whom it did belong?" He replied, "It concerned no man more than myself. I would rather have lost my life, than have fallen into the hands of those merciless infidels." At Smyrna he met with a kind reception from the English merchants, and particularly consul Bretton, upon whose death he afterwards wrote a Latin elegy. From thence he proceeded to Constantinople, where the like civilities were shewn him by Sir Thomas Bendish, the English ambassador, and Sir Jonathan Dawes, with whom he contracted a friendship, which ever afterwards continued. When he had been in Turkey somewhat more than a year, he went to Venice by sea, where, as soon as he was landed, the ship took fire, and was consumed with all the goods, but none of the passengers or seamen were hurt. Leaving Venice he made the tour of Germany and Holland, and came back to England in the year 1659.

The time being now arrived, at which the fellows of Trinity-college are obliged either to take orders, or quit the college, (which is seven years after they have taken the degree of master of arts) he got himself episcopally ordained by bishop Brownrig. Soon after the Restoration he was chosen Greek professor at Cambridge, and in his oration on that occasion, which is still extant, he paid high compliments to the memory of Sir Thomas Smith, Sir John Cheke, and others; and particularly commemorated Erasmus, who had been so nobly instrumental in reviving the study of the learned languages. He also complimented the University of Cambridge upon the good sense, true judgment, real wit, and extensive learning, with which it abounded; in which respects it had the advantage over all the Universities he had seen in his travels. He apologized for his own insufficiency and inability to fill the Professor's chair; but, as he had the honour to be elected, he should, he said, use his utmost endeavours to supply the want of genius by industry and diligent application. He congratulated his auditors upon the revival and encouragement of good literature and the politer arts by the king's restoration. And lastly, he expatiated upon the great antiquity, extensive use, peculiar energy, and superior advantages of the Greek language; and displayed the several merits of its writers in every branch of learning.

When he first entered upon his Greek professorship, he intended to have read upon the tragedies of Sophocles, but altering his plan he made choice of Aristotle's Rhetoric. The year following, which was 1661, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity; and on the 16th of July, 1662, by the recommendation of Dr. Wilkins, he was chosen Geometry Professor at Gresham College. While he continued in this station, he not only discharged the duty of it with great diligence and approbation, but likewise officiated for Dr. Pope, the Astronomy Professor, during his absence abroad. About this time he was offered a living of considerable value; but the condition annexed, of teaching the patron's son, made him refuse it, as too like a simoniacal contract. Upon the 20th of May, 1663, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, in the first choice made by the council after their charter. The same year the executors of Henry Lucas, Esq; having by his appointment settled a mathematical lecture at Cambridge, Mr. Barrow, by the assistance of his good friend Dr. Wilkins was chosen the first professor professor, and entered upon that province the year following : and the better to secure the end of so generous and useful a foundation, he took care, that himself and successors should be bound to leave yearly to the University ten written lectures. He was also invited to take the charge of the Cottonian library, but upon a short trial he chose rather to settle at Cambridge; and for that end, on the 20th of May, 1664, he resigned his Professorship at Gresham College.

In 1669, he wrote his Expositions on the Creed, Lord's Prayer, Decalogue, and Sacraments, which was a task enjoined him by the College, being obliged by the statutes to compose some theological discourses; which, as he says, so took up his thoughts, that he could not easily apply them to any other matter. The same year were published his Lectiones Opticæ, which he dedicated to Robert Raworth and Thomas Buck, Esquires, the executors of Mr. Lucas, as the first fruits of his institution. These lectures being sent to the learned Mr. James Gregory, Professor of the Mathematics at St. Andrews, in Scotland, and perused by him, he gave the following character of the author in a letter to Mr. John Collins. "Mr. Barrow in his Optics sheweth himself a most subtil geometer, so that I think him superior to any that ever I looked upon. I long exceedingly to see his Geometrical Lectures, especially because I have some notions upon the same subject by me. I intreat you to send them to me presently, as they come from the press, for I esteem the author more than you can easily imagine." But when his Geometricæ Lectiones, which were published in the year 1670, had been some time in the world, having heard of very few who had read and considered them thoroughly, except Mr. Gregory, and Mr. Sluſius of Liege, the little relish that such things met with, made him somewhat indifferent with regard to those speculations, and heightened his attention to the studies of morality and divinity. For with a view to this design he had, on the 8th of November, 1669, resigned his mathematical chair at Cambridge to his learned friend Mr. Isaac Newton, then Master of Arts, and fellow of the same College, who revised his Optic Lectures before they went to the press; and, as he ingenuously acknowledges, corrected some things, and added others. In a letter written by Mr. Barrow to Mr. John Collins, dated July 20, 1669, he acquaints him, that a friend of his had brought him some papers, wherein he had set down "methods of calculating the dimensions of magnitudes, like that of Mr. Mercator for the hyperbola, but very general; as also of resolving equations;" which he promises to send him. And accordingly he did so, as appears from another letter, dated the 31st of that month. And in a third letter of the 20th of August following, he says, "I am glad my friend's papers give you so much satisfaction; his name is Mr. Newton, a Fellow of our College, and very young, being but the second year Master of Arts; but of an extraordinary genius and proficiency in these things."

Upon quitting his Lucasian Professorship, he was only a Fellow of Trinity College, then his uncle, then Bishop of St. Asaph, gave him a small sinecure in Wales; and Dr. Ward, Bishop of Salisbury, conferred upon him a Prebend in his church: the profits of both which he bestowed in charity, and parted with them, as soon as he became Master of his College. In 1670, he was created Doctor in Divinity by mandate. Dr. Pope tells us, that Bishop Ward invited Dr. Barrow to live with him, not as a Chaplain, but rather as a friend and companion, though he frequently officiated in the absence of the domestic chaplain. About this time the Archdeaconry of North Wiltshire becoming void, the Bishop made an offer of it to Dr. Barrow, but he declined the acceptance of it. Soon after, a Prebendary of Salisbury being dead, and the Bishop offering Dr. Barrow the Prebend, he gratefully accepted it, and was installed accordingly. "I remember about that time, (says Dr. Pope) I heard him once say, 'I wish I had five hundred pounds.' I replied, 'That's a great sum for a philosopher to desire; what would you do with so much?' 'I would (said he) give it my sister for a portion, that would procure her a good husband;' 'which sum, in a few months after, he received, for putting a life into the corps of his new Prebend; after which he resigned it to Mr. Corker, of Trinity College in Cambridge.'" Dr. Pope also relates the following incident, which happened during the time that Dr. Barrow resided in Bishop Ward's family; which, though of no great importance, the reader may not be displeased to see. "We were once (says he) going from Salisbury to London, he in the coach with the Bishop, and I on horseback; as he was entering the coach, I perceived his pockets strutting out near half a foot, and said to him, 'What have you got in your pockets?' he replied, 'Sermons.' 'Sermons (said I) give them me, my boy shall carry them in his portmanteau, and ease you of that luggage.' 'But (said he) suppose your boy should be robbed?' 'That's pleasant (said I) do you think there are parsons padding upon the road for sermons?' 'Why, what have you? (said he) it may be five or six guineas; I hold my sermons at a greater rate; they cost me much pains and time.' 'Well then (said I) if you'll secure my five or six guineas against lay-padders, I'll secure your bundle of sermons against ecclesiastical highwaymen.' "This was agreed; he emptied his pockets, and filled my portmanteau with Divinity, and we had the good fortune to come safe to our journey's end, without meeting either sort of the padders before-mentioned, and to bring both our treasures to London."

On the promotion of Dr. John Pearson, Master of Trinity College, to the See of Chester, Dr. Barrow was appointed his successor in his mastership by the King's patent, bearing date the 13th of February, 1672, and was admitted the 27th of the same month. When his Majesty advanced him to this dignity, he was pleased to say, "he had given it to the best scholar in England;" which character of him was not taken up by report, but the doctor being then his Chaplain, the King had often done him the honour to discourse with him; and in his frictions way used to call him "an usafair preacher," because because he exhausted every subject, and left no room for others to come after him. The patient having been drawn for him, as it had for some others, with a permission to marry, he got that clause erased, thinking it not agreeable with the statutes, from which he desired no dispensation. Being thus settled, and to the height of his wishes, he concerned himself with every thing that might be for the interest of the college, and excused them from some expences and allowances, which they had made to his predecessors; and in particular he remitted to them the charge of keeping a coach for him, as had been done for other masters. He also earnestly promoted the affair of building their library, which was begun in his mastership. In the year 1675, he was chosen Vice-Chancellor of the University.

Dr. Barrow lived upwards of five years after his advancement to the mastership of Trinity College. Concerning his death, the following particulars are related by Dr. Pope. "The last time he was in London, whither he came, as is customary, to the election of Westminster, he went to Knightbridge to give the Bishop of Salisbury a visit, and then made me engage my word, to come to him at Trinity College immediately after the Michaelmas ensuing. I cannot express the rapture or the joy I was in, having, as I thought, to hear a prospect of his charming and instructive conversation. I fancied it would be a heaven upon earth; for he was immensely rich in learning, and very liberal and communicative of it, delighting in nothing more, than to impart to others, if they desired it, whatever he had attained by much pains and study. But of a sudden all my hopes vanished, and were melted like snow before the sun. Some few days after he came again to Knightbridge, and sat down to dinner, but I observed he did not eat: Whereupon I asked him, how it was with him? He answered, that he had a slight indisposition hanging upon him, with which he had struggled two or three days, and that he hoped by fasting and opium to get it off, as he had removed another, and more dangerous sickness, at Constantinople, some years before. But these remedies availed him not, his malady proved in the event an inward, malignant, and insuperable fever, of which he died May 4. Anno Dom. 1677, in the 47th year of his age, in mean lodgings, at a saddler's near Charing-cross, an old, low, ill-built house, which he had used for several years: for though his condition was much bettered by his obtaining the mastership of Trinity College, yet that had no bad influence upon his morals, he still continued the same humble person, and could not be prevailed on to take more reputable lodgings.* He was buried in Westminster-abbey; where his friends erected a monument to his memory, in the south wing, against the west wall, with his bust of white marble on the top, and an inscription on the front, drawn up by his much esteemed friend Dr. Mapletott

Dr. Barrow was, in his person, low of stature, lean, of a pale complexion, and somewhat short-sighted: but very strong and healthy. He could never be prevailed on to sit for his picture; but some of his friends found means to get it taken without his knowledge, while they diverted him with such conversation as engaged his attention. His life was irreproachable, and he was eminent for piety, modesty, and humility. He possessed a great extent of learning; and an uncommon force of genius; and his works are deservedly held in the highest estimation. The ingenious Mr. Granger observes, that "the name of Dr. Barrow will ever be illustrious for a strength of mind and a compass of knowledge that did honour to his country. He was unrivalled in mathematical learning, and especially in the sublime geometry." And it is observed by another writer, that "he may be esteemed, as having shewn a compass of invention equal, if not superior, to any of the moderns, Sir Isaac Newton only excepted." He took a large compass in his studies, and acquired a general acquaintance with all parts of solid learning. He was exceedingly well skilled in the Greek language, and much inclined to Latin poetry, with which he frequently diverted himself; many performances of that kind being extant in his Opuscula. He was calm and sedate, always contented with his condition, not depressed by adversity, nor elevated in prosperity; steady and constant in his devotions, beneficent to the necessitous; could reason coolly with the learned; and suit his discourse to the less knowing; and was very communicative to all who desired his assistance, which unhappily proved in some instances a prejudice to the public, by the loss of many papers, that were lent and never returned. He left little behind him, except books, which were so well chosen, that they sold for more than they cost. The manuscripts of his own composition were intrusted to the care of Dr. John Tillotson, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and Abraham Hill, Esq; with a power to print such of them as they thought proper: a trust which they executed with great fidelity. He printed only two sermons himself, one upon The duty and reward of bounty to the poor; and the other upon The passion of our blessed Saviour, which he did not live to see published. But several mathematical treatises written by him were printed during his life.

Dr. Barrow had much strength, as well as personal courage; and among other instances which have been urged in proof of this, is the following. As he was going out of a friend's house one morning, before an huge and furious mastiff was chained up, as he used to be all day, the dog flew at him: upon which "the Doctor caught him by the throat (says Dr. Pope) threw him, and lay upon him, and whilst he kept him down, considered what he should do in that exigent; once he had a mind to kill him, but he quite altered this resolution, judging it would be an unjust action, for the dog did his duty, and he himself was in fault for rambling out of his lodgings before it was light. At length he called out so loud, that he was heard by some of the house, who came presently out, and freed both the doctor and the dog from the imminent danger they were both in."

Dr. Pope observes, that Dr. Barrow was very free in the use of tobacco, which he thought assisted in composing and regulating his thoughts. But doubtless, as the same writer remarks, the sedativeness of his mind, close attention to his subject, and unwearied pursuit of it, till he conquered all its difficulties, joined with a great natural

tural sagacity and solid judgment, were the real reasons why he thought so justly, and wrote with that great accuracy and clearness. He transcribed his sermons four or five times over, his greatest difficulty being always to please himself. And therefore M. Le Clerc observes, that Dr. Barrow's sermons are rather treatises, or exact dissertations, than mere harangues to please the people; and that there are scarce any sermons comparable to those of this author. In 1683 all Dr. Barrow's English works were published in three volumes, folio, by Dr. Tillotson. The first of these volumes contains, thirty-two sermons on several occasions; a brief exposition of the creed, the Lord's prayer, the decalogue, and the doctrine of the sacraments; a treatise of the Pope's supremacy; and a discourse on the unity of the faith. The second volume contains, sermons and expositions on all the articles of the Apostles' creed. And the third volume contains forty-five sermons upon several occasions.

In 1687 was published in folio, "Isaaci Barrow S. S. T. professoris Opuscula, viz. determinationes, conciones ad cleum, orationes, poemata, etc. Volumen quartum." This is called Volumen quartum, as it was printed after the three English volumes in folio.

Dr. Barrow also published the following:—

1. Euclidis Elementa: Cantabrigiæ 1655, 8vo.
2. Euclidis Data: Cantabrigiæ 1657, 8vo.
3. Lectiones opticae 18, Cantabrigiæ in scholis publicis habitæ, in quibus opticoium phenomenon genuinæ rationes investigantur et exponuntur: Lond. 1669, 4to.
4. Lectiones geometricæ 13, in quibus præsertim generalia linearum curvarum symptomata declarantur: Lond. 1670, 4to.
5. Archimedis opera, Apollonii conicorum libri iv. Theodossi sphaerica, methodo novo illustrata, et succincte demonstrata: Londini 1675, 4to.

After his decease, in 1638, his Lucasian mathematical Lectures were also published at London, in 8vo.

The Life of Elizabeth Barton.

Barton (Elizabeth) vulgarly called the Holy Maid of Kent, a noted impostor, raised up by the Minister of Aldington in Kent, and other priests, to support the Romish church under its tottering condition, in the reign of king Henry VIII. She was servant to one Thomas Knab of Aldington, and had been long troubled with convulsions that distorted her mouth and limbs in an extraordinary manner, and threw her body into the strangest agitations. The continuance of this distemper at last so disposed her body, that when she recovered, she could throw it into the same distortions.——Mistress, the minister of Aldington, with several other ecclesiastics, thought her a proper tool to answer their purposes; they persuaded her to pretend that what she said and did was by a supernatural impulse, and taught her to act her part to the highest degree of perfection; she would be as it were in a trance for some time, and then coming to herself, after many strange contortions, would break out into pious ejaculations, hymns, and prayers; sometimes delivering herself in set speeches, sometimes in uncouth monkish rhymes, pretending that she had been honoured with visions, heard heavenly voices and the most ravishing melody, and had been favoured with revelations, declaiming against the wicked doctrines of the times, against heresy and innovations, exhorting the people to frequent the church, to hear masses, to use frequent confession, and to pray to our Lady and all the saints. Her awful management of this affair, together with her pretended piety, virtue, and austerity of life, not only deceived the vulgar, but several learned men, as sir Thomas More, Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Warham archbishop of Canterbury, the latter of whom appointed commissioners to examine her. She was now instructed to say in her counterfeited trances, that the blessed Virgin had appeared to her, and assured her, that she should never recover till she went to visit her image, in a famous chapel dedicated to her at Court at Strete. Thither she accordingly repaired, attended by above three thousand people, and several persons of quality of both sexes; she then fell into trances, and uttered many things in honour of the saints and the Popish religion, after which it was given out, that by the intercession of our Lady she was miraculously recovered of her distemper. She was then, by the archbishop's order, put into the nunnery of St. Sepulchre, Canterbury, where she pretended to have frequent visions and inspirations, and also to work miracles for all such as would make a profitable vow to our Lady of Court at Strete. Her pretended revelations were collected and inserted in a book, by a monk called Deering. The priests now gained great advantages by her, and the design of the contrivance being answered, she went on in this way for some years.

Emboldened by this success, she at last, by the advice of her associates, publicly declared, that God had revealed to her, that in case the king proceeded in the divorce of queen Catharine of Arragon, and married another wife while she was living, his royalty would not be of a month's duration, but that he should die the death of a villain. This coming to the ears of the bishop of Rochester, and others who adhered to the queen's interest, they held frequent meetings with the nun and her accomplices, and debauched many persons from their allegiance, particularly the fathers and nuns of Sion, the Charter-house and Sheen, and some of the obervants of Richmond, Greenwich, and Canterbury. One Peto, preaching before the king at Greenwich, denounced heavy judgments upon him to his face, and told him, "that he had been deceived by many lying prophets; but he, as a true Micajah, warned him that the dogs should lick his blood, as they had licked the blood of Ahab." Henry bore this insult with a moderation very remarkable in a prince of his impetuous temper; but to deceive the people, he appointed doctor Curwin to preach before him the ensuing Sunday, when that ecclesiastic justified the king's proceedings, and branded Peto with the epithets of rebel, slanderer, dog, and traitor. He was interrupted by a friar, of the name of Ellton, who called him a lying prophet, that sought to establish the succession to the crown upon adultery. He spoke with such virulence, that the king was obliged to interpose, and command him to be silent; and he and Peto were afterwards summoned before the council, but they were only reprimanded for their insolence. The ecclesiastics engaged in this conspiracy, encouraged by the lenity of the government, had resolved to publish the revelations in their their sermons throughout the kingdom; they had communicated them to the Pope's ambassadors, to whom also they introduced the maid of Kent, and they exhorted queen Catharine to persist in her obduracy. At length this confederacy began to be a very serious affair, and Henry ordered the maid and her accomplices to be examined in the Star-chamber; where they confessed all the particulars of the imposture, and appeared upon a scaffold erected at St. Paul's Cross, where the articles of their confession were publicly read, in their hearing. From thence they were conveyed to the Tower, where they remained till the meeting of the parliament, which having considered the case, pronounced it a conspiracy against the king's life and crown: and the nun, with her accomplices, were attainted of high treason. It appeared in the course of the enquiry, that a letter which, it had been pretended, the maid had received from the Virgin Mary, was written by one Hankerst of Canterbury; and that the door of a dormitory, said to have been opened by miracle, that the nun might go into the chapel and converse with God, was really opened for carnal communication between her and her accomplices. On the 20th day of April, 1534, the maid of Kent, together with her confederates, Bocking, Matthes, Deering, Risby, and Gould, were executed at Tyburn, where the nun confessed her imposture, laying the blame on her accomplices the priests, who had imposed upon her ignorance; she craved pardon of God and the king, and besought the people to pray for her and her fellow-sufferers.

The Life of John Barwick.

Barwick (John) a very eminent divine, was born at Witherlack in Westmoreland, on the 20th of April, 1612, and educated at Sedberg school in Yorkshire, where, says Mr. Granger, "he gave many early proofs of an uncommon capacity, and particularly distinguished himself by acting the part of Hercules, in one of Seneca's tragedies." In the eighteenth year of his age he was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he presently outshone all of his age and standing, and was so remarkable for his abilities, that, when he was little more than twenty years of age, he was chosen by the members of his college to plead their cause in a controverted election of a master, which was heard before the privy council. In the time of the civil war, he was instrumental in sending the Cambridge plate to the king; published the Querela Cantabrigiensis, in which he had the chief hand; and wrote against the covenant. He then retired to London where he undertook to manage the king's correspondence between that city and Oxford; which he executed with great dexterity and address.—He also carried on a secret correspondence with Charles, whilst he was at Carisbrook-Castle, and was, on many other occasions, of singular service to him. After the decapitation of his royal master, he served his son and successor, king Charles II. with the same zeal and fidelity. He was a man of extraordinary sagacity, had a fertile invention, an enterprising genius, as well as great courage and presence of mind. He was at length betrayed by one Bostock, belonging to the post-office: and underwent a long and severe imprisonment in the Tower of London. Here, however, though shut up in a dungeon, and otherwise treated with extreme rigour, yet, by the force of temperance (confining himself to a vegetable diet and to the drink of water) he recovered from a most dangerous and inveterate distemper.—Upon his enlargement, he renewed his correspondence with the king, and is said to have furnished lord Clarendon with a great part of the materials for his history. He conveyed money to his majesty, says Mr. Granger, after the execution of Dr. Hewit; and was so dexterous in all his conveyances, that he even eluded the vigilance of secretary Thurloe.

Upon the restoration of King Charles II. he was offered by his majesty, as a reward of his merit, first the bishopric of Sodor and Man, and afterwards that of Carlisle; but he refused them both, and contented himself with the deanery of Durham, together with the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, which he had some time before obtained. In 1661, he exchanged the deanery of Durham for that of St. Paul's, London; which last, though less valuable than the former, he readily accepted, conscious that his being called to it was solely for the service of the church.—This new preferment he enjoyed about three years, and dying of a pleurisy on the 22d of October, 1664, was interred in St. Paul's cathedral. Engaged almost perpetually in the hurry of an active life, he had little time for study and contemplation. He wrote, however, a few things, particularly the Fight, Victory, and Triumph of St. Paul; and an account of the life of Doctor Morton, bishop of Durham.

The Life of Mr. John Bastwick.

Bastwick (John) a physician, whose writings and punishment made a great noise in the last century, was born at Wittle, in Essex, in the year 1593, and was entered in Emanuel college, Cambridge, in 1614. Leaving the university without a degree, he travelled abroad for nine years, and at Padua was made doctor of physic. Upon his return to England he settled at Colchester, where he practised physic for some time. In 1633, he printed in Holland a treatise entitled, "Elenchus Religionis Papisticæ," with an appendix, called, "Flagellum pontificis et episcoporum latialium;" i. e. a confutation of popery, and a scourge for the pope and latin bishops. Though, in his epistle to the reader, he declared that he intended nothing against such bishops as acknowledged their authority from kings and emperors, our English prelates imagining that some things in these books were levelled at them, the author was cited before the high commission-court, and fined one thousand pounds, sentenced to be excommunicated, debarred his practice of physic, to have his books burnt, to pay costs of suit, and to remain in prison till he made a recantation. In pursuance of this sentence he was confined two years in the gate-house, where he wrote Apologeticus ad Præfules Anglicanos, &c. An apology for himself addressed to the bishops, and another book called the new litany, in which he taxed the bishops with an inclination to popery, and exclaimed against the severity and injustice of the high commission's proceedings against him. Upon this an information was exhibited against him, and in the end, he was sentenced to pay a fine of five thousand pounds, to stand in the pillory in the palace-yard, Westminster, minster, and there to lose his ears, and to suffer perpetual imprisonment in a remote part of the kingdom. This rigorous sentence was executed; and he was sent to Launceston-castle, in Cornwall, but was afterwards removed to St. Mary's castle, in the isle of Scilly. His wife was not permitted to have any access to him, though she often petitioned for that purpose, nor was even suffered to set foot in the island in which he was confined. Upon the meeting of the parliament, in 1640, a petition was signed by his wife and friends, that the justice and rigor of his sentence might be reviewed and considered; upon which it was ordered by the house of commons, that he should be brought back to London. Bathwick landed at Dover, and was every where received by vast numbers of people with acclamations of joy; and when he came to Southwark, he was met by great crowds of the citizens of London, with boughs and flowers in their hands, and conducted by them to his lodgings in the city. On the 21st of February following, the house of commons voted, that the several proceedings against him were illegal, unjust, and against the liberty of the subject; that the sentence should be reversed, his fine remitted, and he restored to his profession; and that, for reparation of his losses, he ought to have five thousand pounds out of the estates of the archbishop of Canterbury, the high-commissioners, and those lords who voted against him in the star-chamber; but the ensuing confusion of the times prevented the payment of the money.

Dr. Bathwick was alive in the year 1648; but how long he survived that period, or where he died, is uncertain.

The Life of Mr. William Bates.

Bates (William) an eminent nonconformist divine, was born in the year 1625, and educated at the university of Cambridge. He took the degree of bachelor of arts in 1647, and was admitted doctor in divinity in 1660. Soon after the restoration, he was appointed chaplain to king Charles II. He was also minister of St. Dunstan's in the west, but was ejected from thence by the act of uniformity. He was one of the commissioners at the conference in the Savoy in 1660, for reviewing the public liturgy, and assisted in drawing up the exceptions against the common-prayer. He was likewise chosen on the part of the nonconformist ministers, together with Dr. Jacob and Mr. Baxter, to manage the dispute with Dr. Pearson, afterwards bishop of Chester, Dr. Gunning, afterwards bishop of Ely, and Dr. Sparrow, afterwards bishop of Norwich.

Dr. Bates was honoured with the friendship of the lord-keeper Bridgeman, the lord chancellor Finch, the earl of Nottingham, and archbishop Tillotson. He had been offered at the restoration the deanery of Coventry and Litchfield, which he refused; and, according to Dr. Calamy, might have been afterwards raised to any bishopric in the kingdom, if he would have conformed to the established church. He resided for the latter part of his life at Hackney, and died on the 19th of July 1699, in the 74th year of his age.

During his life, he published a collection of lives of several eminent persons in latin; and since his death his works have been printed in one volume, folio. Dr. Calamy says, that Dr. Bates "was generally reputed one of the best orators of the age; and was well versed in the politer parts of learning, which so seasoned his conversation, as to render it highly entertaining to the more sensible part of mankind. His apprehension was quick and clear; and his reasoning faculty acute, prompt, and expert. His judgment penetrating and solid, stable and firm. His memory was admirable, and never failed that any one could observe, nor was impaired to the last at the age of seventy-four. His language was always neat and fine, but unaffected. His method in all his discourses might be exposed to the most critical censurer. His stile was imitably polite, and yet easy, and his very voice was charming. His conversation was much coveted by persons of all qualities, and that even when those of his character were prosecuted with the utmost rigour. He had a catholic spirit, and was for an entire union of all visible christians, upon moderate principles and practices. He was not for further impositions than the nature of things required; nor for having the church less free than Christ had left it. And yet for peace and union's sake, he would have yielded to any thing but sin. He was for free communion of all visible christians, of whatsoever persuasion in extra-essential matters, if they pleased."

Mr. Granger says, that Dr. Bates, "was a man of a good and amiable character; much a scholar, much a gentleman, and no less a christian. His moderation and sweetness of temper were known to all that conversed with him; among whom were eminent and pious men of various persuasions. Dr. Tillotson's friendship for him began early; and as his merit was invariably the same, it continued without interruption, to the end of that prelate's life. His abilities qualified him for the highest dignities in the church: and it is certain that great offers were made him; but he could never be prevailed with to conform.—He is esteemed the politest writer of his age, among the presbyterians."

The Life of Ralph Bathurst, M. D.

Bathurst (Ralph) M. D. an eminent poet, physician, and divine, was born in the year 1620. He was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he at first applied to the study of divinity, in which he made a very considerable progress; but the time of confusion coming on, he changed the course of his studies, and applied himself to physic. He took a doctor's degree in that faculty, in which he rose to such eminence, that he was, in the time of the usurpation, appointed physician to the state. After the restoration of king Charles II. he returned to the study of divinity; and having taken orders, was appointed chaplain to his majesty, and admitted fellow of the royal society. On the 10th of September 1664, he was chosen president of Trinity College; on the 28th of June 1670, he was installed dean of

Well;

Wells; and in the years 1673 and 1674, served the office of vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford. In April 1691, he was nominated by king William and queen Mary, to the see of Bristol, but refused it, choosing rather to reside in his college, the chapel of which he afterwards rebuilt in a very elegant manner. "His learning and talents, says Mr. Ganger, were various: he was the orator and the poet, the philosopher and the divine. He possessed an inexhaustible fund of wit, and was the facetious companion at eighty years of age. Ridicule was the weapon that he made use of to correct the delinquents of his college; and he was so absolute a master of it, that he had it always at hand.* His poetical pieces in the Musæ Anglicanæ are excellent in their kind; they are much in the spirit of Ovid, who was his favourite poet." Dr. Bathurst died greatly lamented by all that knew his worth, on the 14th of June 1704, in the 84th year of his age.

The Life of Mr. Richard Baxter.

Baxter (Richard) an eminent nonconformist divine, was born at Rowton, near High Ercal, in Shropshire, on the 12th of November 1615. He was unhappy in his education, with respect both to learning and piety; his school-masters being both ignorant and immoral. Learning was at no great height, in so remote a corner of the kingdom; neither could much improvement be expected in so barren a soil. His greatest help in grammar-learning was from Mr. John Owen, master of the free-school at Wroxeter, with whom he continued till he had been some time captain of his school, and advanced as far as his master's assistance could forward him. He had not afterwards the advantage of an academical education; and yet, says Dr. Bates, by the divine blessing upon his rare dexterity and diligence, his sacred knowledge was in that degree of eminence, as few in the university ever arrive to.

It was a proposal made by his school-master, that prevented his being sent to the university. When he was about to leave Wroxeter school, Mr. Owen advised that, instead of going to the university, he should be put under the care of Mr. Richard Wickstead, chaplain to the council at Ludlow, who had allowance from the king for one to attend him. There being no others under Mr. Wickstead's care, he represented this situation as likely to be more advantageous to young Baxter, than being under a tutor in the university. This proposal being agreeable to his parents, who were pleased with the thoughts of having their son so near them, they readily embraced it. But it did not answer their expectations; for Mr. Wickstead being himself no great scholar, took little or no pains with his pupil, though he was otherwise very kind to him: so that the only advantage he reaped by living with him, was in the free use of his library, which, by his great application, proved indeed of infinite

N O T E.

* Mr. Warton tells us, that he took a whip with him "when he went out to surprise the scholars walking in the grove at unreasonable hours;" but that he never made use of that illiberal weapon.

service to him. After he had spent a year and a half with Mr. Wickstead, he returned home to his father; and soon after, at the Lord Newport's request, supplied for a few months the place of his school-master, Mr. Owen, who was then in a consumption, of which he died. After this, Mr. Francis Garbett, minister of Wroxeter, read logic to our author for about a month, and excited him to a diligent prosecution of his studies.

Mr. Baxter had some design to enter into the ministry; but when he was about eighteen years of age, Mr. Wickstead endeavoured to persuade him to forbear further thoughts of that kind, and to leave the country for the court, with a view of making interest for some office there, by which he might have an opportunity of rising in the world, and becoming great and considerable. The scheme was agreeable to his parents, though not to himself: however, upon their instigation, he came up to Whitehall, being recommended to Sir Henry Hobart, then master of the revels. He was courteously received, and kindly entertained, but found nothing pleasing to him in a court life, and therefore soon laid hold of an opportunity of quitting it, and retiring again into the country. "I had quickly (says he) enough of the court, when I saw a stage-play instead of a sermon on the Lord's days in the afternoon, and saw what court was there in fashion, and heard little preaching, but what was as to one part against the puritans, I was glad to be gone: and at the same time it pleased God that my mother fell sick, and desired my return; and so I desired to bid farewell to those kind of employments and expectations."

After his return into the country, Mr. Baxter resumed his studies, and his thoughts of entering into the ministry; and Mr. Richard Foley of Stourbridge, procured his being appointed master of the free school at Dudley, with an assistant under him. In 1638, he applied to the bishop of Winchester for holy orders, which he received, having at that time no scruples as to conformity to the church of England; and indeed he had been used to join in the common-prayer with as much fervency as he afterwards did in any other prayers. It appears, however, that he had early formed favourable ideas of the puritans, and saw a great deficiency both with respect to learning and morals in many of the established clergy.

While he continued at Dudley, he had a numerous auditory; but when he had been above three quarters of a year there, he was by earnest importunity prevailed with to remove to Bridgenorth in Shropshire, to be assistant to Mr. William Madford. This situation was very agreeable to him, as Bridgenorth was exempt from all episcopal jurisdiction, except the archbishop's triennial visitation. He was scarce well settled here, before he was disturbed by the et cætera oath, which was framed by the convocation then sitting. All were enjoined to swear, "That they would never consent to the alteration of the present government of the church, by archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c." This oath gave great offence to Mr. Baxter, as well as to many others, who looked upon swearing to a blind et cætera as intolerable, because it took in all the officers of the the ecclesiastical courts, lay-chancellors, commissaries, and officials.

Among other important matters which were in agitation in the year 1640, a reformation of the clergy was set on foot, and accordingly a committee was appointed, to hear petitions and complaints against them. Multitudes from all quarters came up immediately with petitions against their ministers, charging them with insufficiency, false doctrines, illegal innovations, or immorality. Among other complainants, the town of Kidderminster in Worcestershire had drawn up a petition against their vicar and his two curates, as unqualified for the ministry; and they put it into the hands of Sir Henry Herbert, who was member for Bewdley. The vicar well knowing his own insufficiency, agreed to compound the business, and offered to allow 60*l.* per ann. (out of near 200*l.* which was the value of the living) to a preacher who should be chosen by fourteen nominated trustees. He that was chosen was to preach whenever he pleased, the vicar still reading the common-prayer, and doing every thing that might be matter of scruple; for the performance of which he gave a bond of 500*l.* Upon this, the bailiff of the town, and all the freeholders, invited Mr. Baxter to give them a sermon: and, upon preaching once to them, he was unanimously chosen to be their minister. He spent two years at Kidderminster before the breaking out of the civil war, and about fourteen years after it; and in all that time never resided at all in the vicarage-house, though authorized by an order of parliament; but the old vicar lived there peaceably and quietly, without any molestation.*

Notwithstanding the great usefulness of Mr. Baxter at Kidderminster, and the high estimation in which he was held by great numbers, yet, after the commencement of the civil war, such was the rage of the royalists in that part of the country against him, on account of the inclination which he had discovered to favour the cause of the parliament, that he found it necessary to retire to Gloucester; but being strongly solicited, he returned to Kidderminster. However, not finding himself safe in this place, he again quitted it, and took up his residence at Coventry. Here he lived in perfect quiet, preaching once every Sunday to the garrison, and once to the town's people. After the battle of Naseby, he was appointed chaplain to colonel Whalley's regiment, and was present at several sieges. He was obliged to leave the army in the year 1645, by a sudden illness, and retired to Sir Thomas Rouse's, where he continued a long time in a languishing state of health. When Cromwell had gained the superiority, Mr. Baxter expressed his dissatisfaction at his measures, though he did not think proper to preach against him from the pulpit. However, he once preached before Cromwell, after he was protector, and also had a conference with him; of which, and of his sermon, we shall give an account in Mr. Baxter's own words. "The Lord Broghill (says he) and the Earl of Warwick brought me to preach before Cromwell the protector, which was the only time that ever I preached to him, save once I ng before, when he was an inferior man among other auditors. I knew not which way to provoke him better to his duty, than by preaching on 1 Co*r.* i. 10. against the divisions and distractions of the church, and shewing how mischievous a thing it was for politicians to maintain such divisions for their own ends, that they might fish in troubled waters, and keep the church by its divisions in a state of weakness, lest it should be able to offend them; and to shew the necessity and means of union. But the plainness and nearness I heard was displeasing to him, and his courtiers; but they put it up.

"A while after, Cromwell sent to speak with me; and when I came, in the presence only of three of his chief men, he began a long and tedious speech to me of God's providence in the change of the government, and how God had owned it, and what great things had been done at home and abroad, in the peace with Spain and Holland, &c. When he had wearied us all with speaking thus slowly about an hour, I told him, it was too great condescension to acquaint me so fully with all these matters, which were above me; but I told him that we took our ancient monarchy to be a blessing, and not an evil to the land, and humbly craved his patience, that I might ask him, how England had ever forfeited that blessing and unto whom the forfeiture was made (I was fain to speak of the species of government only, for they had lately made it treason by a law to speak for the person of the king.) Upon that question, he was awakened into some passion, and told me it was no forfeiture, but God had changed it as it pleased him; and then he let fly at the parliament, which thwarted him; and especially by name at four or five of those members which were my chief acquaintance; and I presumed to defend them against his passion; and thus four or five hours was spent."

Mr. Baxter also informs us, that shortly after he had some further conversation with the protector. "A few days after (says he) he sent for me again, to hear my judgment about liberty of conscience, (which he pretended to be most zealous for) before almost all his privy council; where, after another slow tedious speech of his, I told him a little of my judgment: and when two of his company had spun out a great deal more of the time in such like tedious (but mere ignorant) speeches, some four or five hours being spent, I told him, that if he would be at the labour to read it, I could tell him more of my mind in writing in two sheets, than in that way of speaking in many days; and that I had a paper on that subject by me, written for a friend, which if he would peruse, and allow for the change of the person, he would know my sense. He received the paper after, but I scarce believe that he ever read it; for I saw that what he learned must be from himself; being more disposed to speak many hours, than to hear one; and little heeding what another said, when he had spoken himself."

After this, Mr. Baxter returned to Kidderminster, where he entered again upon his ministerial office, with good success. He was the more acceptable, on account of his charities and kindness to the poor. His income, indeed, was not great, but it was increased by the profit which he made of his writings; for which, he says, he sometimes received sixty or eighty pounds a year of the booksellers. He gave away a great number of his own books among the people of the town, and also bibles to those that needed them. "I found, says he, that my single life afforded me much advantage; for I could the easier take my people for my children, and think all I had too little for them, and that I had no children of my own to tempt me to another way of using it. And being discharged from the most of family care, keeping but one servant, I had the greater vacancey and liberty for the labours of my calling." He also studied physic, in order to enable him to be serviceable to the poor, which rendered him the more acceptable to his auditors. "God made use of my physick among them, says he, as a very great advantage to my ministry; for they that cared not for their souls, did love their lives, and care for their bodies; and by this they were made almost as obedient, as a tenant is of his landlord. Sometimes I could see before me in the church a very considerable part of the congregation, whose lives God had made me a means to save, or to recover their health: and doing for nothing to oblige them, that they would readily hear me."

Mr. Baxter came to London a little before the deposition of Richard Cromwell, and preached before the parliament the day preceding that on which they voted the king's death. He preached likewise before the lord mayor at St. Paul's a thanksgiving sermon for general Monk's success. Upon the restoration he was appointed one of the king's chaplains in ordinary. He was likewise offered the bishopric of Hereford by the lord chancellor Clarendon, but he refused to accept of it. He assisted at the conference at the Savoy as one of the commissioners, when they drew up a reformed liturgy.

It was not long after the restoration before the old vicar of Kidderminster was restored to his parsonage, notwithstanding his incapacity to discharge the duties of it. And Mr. Baxter, who had refused a bishopric, would gladly have been this man's cotemporary, but even this was denied him. Sir Ralph Cline was his secret enemy, and endeavoured to make it believed in London that many people at Kidderminster were against Mr. Baxter's being stationed there. There were eighteen hundred people who had been communicants with Mr. Baxter in that town, and when they were acquainted with this report, sixteen hundred of these set their hands, in one day, to a paper testifying their desire of having him reinstated among them. Lord Chancellor Clarendon pretended to be very desirous that Mr. Baxter should be settled at Kidderminster; but his professions seem not to have been sincere. He offered to preach there for nothing, but could not obtain permission. — Being thus disappointed, he preached occasionally, for some time, about London, and at length fixed with Dr. Bates at St. Dunstan's church, Fleet-street, and preached once a week, as lecturer, having an allowance made him on that account by the parish. He was also appointed by Mr. Aldrich, and some other citizens, to preach a lecture in Milk-street, for which they agreed to allow him 40*l.* per annum, but this he continued only about a year. At the same time he preached once every Sunday at Black-friars, where he would take nothing for his labour, lest he should thereby render the parishioners less able or ready to help their minister Mr. Gibbons. When the act of uniformity was passed, the terms of which Mr. Baxter could not in conscience comply with, a top was put to his public ministry: upon which he retired to Acton in Middlesex, that he might have the more leisure for writing. At the time of the plague in 1665, he went to Mr. Hampden's in Buckinghamshire, but after the ceasing of that calamity, he returned to Acton.

While Mr. Baxter resided at Acton, he preached every Sunday to his own family, and a great number of other persons resorted to his house to hear him. He did this, however, only during the interval of divine service at the church, which he constantly attended. — But even this gave to much offence, that by virtue of that unjust and oppressive statute, the top was made a warrant was signed by two justices, whereby he was committed for six months to New Prison, but being in habeas corpus, he was released by the court of Common Pleas, on account of an irregularity in the mittimus, upon which he removed to Tottenham, near Barchin. At this place he lived quietly and without disturbance. In 1671, he lost his house at Acton, which was the greatest part of his fortune. — The burning up of the king's cash here, in 1672, the nonconformists having obtained some indulgence, Mr. Baxter came up to London, and on one of the Tuesday Lectures at Purse-bail-hall, had a Friday lecture at Fetter-lane; but on Sunday he for some time preached on a top weekly, and afterwards more frequently in St. James's market-house. He was, however, once again hindered as he was preaching his lecture in Fetter-lane; but was soon released, because the warrant was signed by a city magistrate.

The times became so narrow and oppressive, he built a meeting-house in Oxen-bow, where he had preached there only once, before his top was taken to surprise and send him to the county gaol. This misfortune, however, he escaped; but the person who preached for him was committed to the gate-house, and continued there three months. Having been kept out of his new meeting-house a whole year, he took another in Swallow-street, but was likewise prevented from using that, a guard being fixed there for many Sundays together, to hinder him from entering it. However, he preached to a congregation at Southwark for many months. In 1682, he suffered more severely than he had ever done before on account of his nonconformity. He was suddenly surprised in his own house by many constables and officers, who apprehended him, upon a warrant to seize his person, for coming within five miles of a corporation, producing at the same time five more warrants, to detain for one hundred and ninety five pounds, a penalty for five sermons he had preached. Though he was much out of order, being just risen from his bed, where he had been in extremity of pain, he was contentedly going with them to a justice, to be sent to gaol, and left his house to their will. But Dr. Thomas Cox meeting him as he was going, forced him again into his bed, and went to five justices, before whom he swore, that Mr. Baxter could not go to prison without danger of death. Upon this the justices delayed till they had consulted the king, who consented that his imprisonment should be for that time forborne, that he might die at home. But they executed their warrants on the books and goods in the house, though he made it appear that they were none of his; and they sold even the bed which he lay sick upon. Some friends paid for them as much money as they were appraised at, and he repaid them. And all this was transacted without Mr. Baxter's having the least notice of any accusation, or ever seeing the justices or accusers; and afterwards he was in constant danger of new seizures, and therefore was forced to leave his house, and retire into private lodgings.

Mr. Baxter had but a very indifferent state of health during the greater part of his life; but in 1684 he grew so ill and weak, that he was scarce able to stand. Notwithstanding his being in this situation, some justices sent warrants to apprehend him, he being one in a catalogue which was said to contain the names of a thousand persons who were all to be bound to their good behaviour. Knowing that their warrant would not empower them to break open doors, he refused to open to them, though they were got into his house. Whereupon they set six officers at his study-door, who kept him from his bed and food by watching all night; and next day he yielded. They carried him to the court of quarter-sessions, when he was scarce able to stand, and bound him in a bond of 400*l.* to his good behaviour. He desired to know what his crime was, and who were his accusers; but they told him it was for no fault, but to secure the government in evil times; and that they had a list of many suspected persons that must do the same as well as him. He desired to know for what reason he was numbered with the suspected, and by whose accusation; but they gave him no information upon that head.

The various persecutions that Mr. Baxter, as well as a great number of other pious and worthy nonconformists, suffered at this period, reflect the greatest dishonour upon those bigotted Episcopalsians that were the cause of them. It is computed that by the act of uniformity, near two thousand ministers were ejected from their livings; though they were unexceptionable in point of learning and morals, and many of them were distinguished by their abilities, their industry, and their exemplary lives. But it was not thought sufficient to deprive them of their livings, they were not only to be driven out of the churches, but prohibited from worshipping God any where else in that way which their consciences approved. Indeed, in different ages of the church, men have pretended a mighty zeal for christianity, while they were acting not only in direct opposition to its plainest precepts, but in a manner inconsistent even with the dictates of justice and humanity!

In the beginning of the year 1685, Mr. Baxter was committed to the King's Bench prison, by a warrant from the Lord Chief Justice Jefferies, for his Paraphrase on the New Testament, which had been printed a little before, and which was called a scandalous and seditious book against the government. On the 6th of May, which was the first day of the term, he appeared in Westminster-hall, and an information was ordered to be filed against him. On May the 30th, he was brought to his trial before Jefferies at Guildhall, and found guilty; on the 29th of June following, he had judgment given against him. He was sentenced to pay a fine of five hundred marks, to lie in prison till he had paid it, and to be bound to his good behaviour for seven years. The following year Mr. Baxter obtained his pardon, by the mediation of the Lord Powis. His fine was remitted; and on Wednesday the 24th of November, 1685, he was discharged out of the King's Bench. He removed to a house which he had taken in Charter-house-yard, and re-assumed the exercise of his ministry as an assistant to Mr. Sylvester, which he continued about four years and a half, till he became to very weak as to be forced to keep his chamber; and even then he endeavoured to do all the good which his situation would permit. He died on the 8th of December, 1694, and was interred in Christ-church, being attended to the grave by a numerous company of persons of different ranks, and many clergymen of the established church. He ordered by his will that all his books should be distributed among poor scholars; and all that remained of his estate be disposed of for the benefit of the poor. He was married, but had no issue. His wife died some years before him: he published a short account of her, under the title of A Breviate of the Life of Mrs. Margaret Baxter.

Mr. Baxter met in his life-time with the usual fate of eminence, to be highly praised and highly censured. Dr. Bates said, that his books, which for number and variety of matter were sufficient to make a library, contain a treasure of controversial, casuistical, positive, and practical divinity; and bishop Wilkins affirmed, that he has cultivated every subject he has handled. But Mr. Long of Exeter said, it would be well for the world if Mr. Baxter's books were all burned. However, an excellent judge, Dr. Barrow, passed this judgment upon them, that "his practical writings were never mended, and his controversial seldom confuted." Bishop Burnet, in the history of his own times, calls Mr. Baxter "a man of great piety; and that if he had not meddled with too many things, would have been esteemed one of the most learned men of the age; that he had a moving and most pathetic way of writing; and was his whole life long a man of great zeal and much simplicity, but was unhappily subtle and metaphysical in every thing."

The late learned and ingenious Dr. Philip Doddridge had a very high opinion of Mr. Baxter, both as a man, and as a writer. In a letter written in 1723, to a friend, giving some account of his studies, he expressed himself thus: "Baxter is my particular favourite. It is impossible to tell you, how much I am charmed with the devotion, good sense, and pathos, which is every where to be found in him. I cannot forbear looking upon him as one of the greatest orators, both with regard to copiousness, acuteness, and energy, that our nation hath produced:

and if he hath described, as I believe, the temper of his own heart, he appears to have been to far superior to the generality of those whom we charitably hope to be good men, that one would imagine God raised him up to disgrace and condemn his brethren; to shew what a christian is, and how few in the world deserve the character."

Mr. Baxter's writings are very numerous. It is computed that he wrote at least an hundred and forty-five distinct treatises, whereof four were folio's, seventy-three quarto's, forty-nine octavo's, and nineteen in twelves and twenty-four's, besides single sheets, separate sermons, and at least five and twenty prefaces before other men's writings. Among Mr. Baxter's more considerable and celebrated pieces were the following: I. The Saints Everlasting Rest. II. A Call to the Unconverted: of this piece Mr. Baxter himself says, "This little book God hath blessed with unexpected success beyond all the rest that I have written, except the Saint's Rest. In a little more than a year there were about twenty thousand of them printed by my own consent, and about ten thousand since, besides many thousands by stolen impressions." It has been translated into the French, Dutch, Welch, and other European languages: And Mr. Elliot translated it into the Indian language. III. A Treatise on the Divine Life. IV. A Christian Directory; or, a Sum of practical Theology, and Cases of Conscience. V. Methodus Theologiae. VI. The Poor Man's Family Book; of this many thousands have been printed. VII. Paraphrase on the New Testament. VIII. A Treatise of Universal Redemption. Some years after his death, Mr. Matthew Sylvester published, from our author's original manuscript, "Reliquiae Baxterianae; or, Mr. Richard Baxter's narrative of the most memorable passages of his life and times." This work has been abridged by Dr. Edmund Calamy.

The Life of William Baxter.

Baxter, (William) nephew to Mr. Richard Baxter, of whom we have been treating, was born at Lanlughan in Shropshire, in the year 1650. His education was much neglected in his younger years; for at the age of eighteen, when he went to the school at Harrow on the Hill, in Middlesex, he knew not one letter in a book, nor understood one word of any language but Welch; but he soon retrieved his lost time, and became a man of great learning. He applied himself chiefly to the studies of antiquities and philology. In 1679, he published a grammar of the Latin tongue; and in 1695, an edition of Anacreon with notes; which was afterwards reprinted in 1716, with considerable improvements. In 1701, he published an edition of Horace, with notes; which was afterwards reprinted. In 1719, he published his Dictionary of the British Antiquities. His Glossary, or Dictionary of the Roman Antiquities, which goes no farther than the letter A, was published in 1726, after our author's decease, by the Rev. Mr. Moses Williams; and, in 1732, that gentleman also published proposals for printing our author's notes on Juvenal. Mr. Baxter had also a share in the English translation of Plutarch by several hands. He was a great master of the ancient British and Irish tongues, and well skilled in the Latin and Greek, as well as the northern and eastern languages. He kept a correspondence with most of the learned men of his time, particularly with the famous antiquarian Mr. Edward Lhwyd. Some of Mr. Baxter's letters to him are published in his Glossarium antiquitatum Romanarum. There are likewise in the philosophical transactions two letters of his to Dr. Halwood, one concerning the town of Veconium or Wroxeter in Shropshire, and the other concerning the Hypocausta or sweating-houses of the ancients; and another to Doctor Hans Sloane, secretary to the Royal Society, containing an abstract of Mr. Lhwyd's Archaeologia Britannica.

Mr. Baxter spent the greatest part of his life in the useful but laborious employment of teaching youth: for some years he kept a boarding-school at Tottenham High-Cross in Middlesex, where he remained till he was chosen master of the mercer's-school in London. In this situation he continued above twenty years, but resigned before his death, which happened on the 31st of May 1723, in the seventy-third year of his age.

WHICH ever be the case, the administration have now at least forfeited all claim to the confidence of this house and of the public. We are now told with great composure, by those very men who but a few months ago, laughed to scorn every foreboding word of prudence, that the whole power of this country is unequal to the undertaking; and that however reasonable it might have been last year to have foreseen the immensity of the war, yet that parliament in the last session would not have been disposed to have granted more expensive aids, and therefore that no more were then applied for; but that we are now dip't in, and must wade through. If an army of fifty thousand men, and one hundred ships of force, are now found necessary, the word to parliament is, you must go through, there is no retreat: It must be done. Every corner of the three kingdoms is to be ransacked for recruits; every power in Europe is to be solicited for mercenary aids; every trading vessel hitherto employed in the American commerce, is now destined to transport the means of destroying the commercial wealth of Great Britain, and all the sources of its naval empire. The noble lord has announced it to us, that he will, upon the 19th of this month, lay before us the most speedy and effectual way of accomplishing these important objects; and that is what, I presume, he calls, laying before us the state of the nation.

As I wish the public may no longer be deceived, but that they may be put into possession of the real state of facts, and of the probable expectation of consequences, I shall offer to the house some motions for the proper materials to be prepared and laid before us; to be our guide and assistance in forming our judgment and decision. The three great branches of national expence are, the navy, the army, and the ordnance;

nance; and each of these branches is divided into two parts, viz. expences which are voted upon specific estimates, and extraordinary expences which are incurred every year in the three services, partly at the discretion of the respective commanders, and partly at the discretion of the ministry in their several departments. These extraordinaries, in former times, were kept within narrow bounds, but of late years they are grown to an enormous amount, almost equal to the expences voted in each service upon estimate; which latitude, thus negligently and tacitly allowed to the ministers in dispensing the public purse, has been and I fear will continue to be, the cause of a most ruinous waste of the public revenue. As to the present year, the house have before them all the expences of the American war, which have been formed into specific estimates: but the unmeasurable part of the expence will be in the secret and hidden class of extraordinaries, left to the unrestrained discretion of ministers, commanders, commissaries and contractors. The house and the public are amused with nominal estimates, while this bottomless gulph is opened behind us, and not to be satiated but with the last farthing. If experience can teach us wisdom, it is high time that we were possessed of it. This chaos of extraordinaries may, doubtless, be reduced to some reasonable shape of computation. Ministers will hardly tell this house seriously, that they have not the least measure of what they recommend or undertake; nor, I think, would it be very decent for them to come in the next session with a boundless demand of debts incurred upon the confidence which we are now desired to repose in them, and to tell us then, we foresaw all these expences, but we concealed them carefully from you, that we might lead you insensibly on.

Then let us forecast the account now.—I shall begin with the navy.—The motion which I shall make upon the subject of the navy is, copied word for word out of the journals upon a former occasion, and a very accurate estimate was made in return, of the probable expence of the navy, article by article: therefore I am sure the minister can give us this information, if he will.

My motion is, “That there be laid before this house an estimate of the probable expence of his Majesty’s navy for the present year, distinguished under proper heads, upon the services voted by this house; shewing also how far the said expence may probably exceed or fall short of the sums already voted for those services; and also an estimate of the probable expence of transports and victualling during the present year.”

My second and third motions, respecting the extraordinaries of the army, and ordnance for land service, are nearly to the same effect, viz.

“That an estimate of the probable amount of the extraordinary services likely to be incurred by his Majesty’s land forces in one year, from March 9th, 1776, be presented, and laid before this house.”

“That an estimate of the probable expence of the office of ordnance for land service, during the present year, over and above the provision already made in this session of parliament, be prepared and laid before this house.”

These are the materials which, as it seems to me, are necessary for us to form our judgment upon. Many of them may be estimated with great accuracy; and, from the experience and assistance of the official lights which the noble lord has access to, he may give us a general view of the whole probable expence of the whole year. This is what I should call laying the state of the nation before us. By this time of the year, which is the month of April, you ought to have formed your plans. You cannot be ignorant of the number of ships which are destined for sea-service for this year. You know the complement of men for each rate; therefore you may know by how many they will exceed the number of seamen voted by parliament. In the forming such an estimate, the board of admiralty can give you a list of the seamen to be employed, the paymaster of the marines can send you the number of marines. The value of stores contracted for and to be purchased for ships, and building-yards, and rope-yards, ought to be minutely known, or else how is the navy to be provided? I will read you three or four principal heads of expence in the estimate of the navy, which was returned to this house on the 2d of May, 1772, (and which is printed in the journals) upon the very identical motion that I offer to you now. Take them as a specimen that the estimates that I now ask for may be very methodically made out, unless you are determined to withhold every requisite information from this house.

Value of stores and materials contracted for and to be purchased for his Majesty’s ships and yards.

Wages to inferior officers and workmen in his Majesty’s several dock-yards, &c.

Value of stores and materials, for the use of the several rope-yards.

Wages to seamen, calculated upon the list received from the admiralty, of ships to be employed at sea in the course of the year.

Value of provisions to be purchased, &c. &c.

These are enough for a specimen; the farther distribution of the heads of naval estimates may be seen in the original paper itself in your journals.

Let us know what we are doing. What is it that you cannot compute? Have you not made provision for stores and materials necessary to receive, repair, and rest your fleet at Halifax? or, if that place should fall into the hands of the provincials, have you made no supplemental provision for the safety of the navy, at the distance of three thousand miles? Let us have the opinion, whether we will seek our safety (more singularly at least) by a timely reconciliation with the once hospitable shore of America, or upon the dependence of some wild estimates of administration, made for commissaries and contractors; or, which is most probable, must we patiently stand by the consequences of their total neglect of every prudent and necessary precaution.

As for the extraordinaries of the land-service, some estimate may likewise be made of them, as well as of the naval extraordinaries; or, how are they to be provided for? What else is to guide administration in the execution of their own plan? Does not general Howe inform the administration from time to time what necessities he may stand in need of? His general letters of requisition during the last campaign, are now lying upon the table; and the noble Lord has told us, that the ministry do from time to time receive letters of more explanatory detail, according as he foresees such or such necessary services. Look at the bill of extras for the last year; are they not classified methodically into heads, of Supply to the forces at Boston—at Montreal—Quebec, &c.—Cloathing and accoutrements—Forage—Live-stock—Vegetables—Beer, &c. &c. Have you calculated any of these, to reduce them within some estimable compass? or do you merely hold out your measure to the ruinous profusion of commissaries, and the merciless avidity of contractors?

The last estimate of extraordinaries that I apply for, is from the board of ordnance. Will you tell us, that they are still at a loss for their computation? Is their powder not yet shipped? Are their guns not yet cast? Are their scaling-ladders not yet made? Are their baggage-waggons not yet built? Give us the best account you have; if it be but an estimate of the waggons which were reviewed the other day by the master-general of the ordnance of Portman-square.

You may give plain and direct answers to these enquiries, if you mean well: It is not a captious or perplexing estimate that I ask for, to announce of powder, or a gun-lock, or a hand-spike, I speak upon the scale of millions. You either cannot give these estimates, or you will not. If you will not, speak out, that we may know what we have to depend upon. If you acknowledge that you cannot, then will you dare to undertake the conduct of that war which you confess your own inability to form even an idea or an estimate? Will this House, will the public at large, commit a proposed armament of thirty, forty, or fifty thousand men, with a hundred ships of force, at the distance of three thousand miles, and upon a line of action of fifteen hundred, with the national honour at stake, to the hands of those men, who profess their inability to form any estimate but for the emolument of commissaries, and contractors?

If the minister will condescend to lay the true state of the nation fully before parliament, the question will then be fairly before this House and the public, whether they will, with their eyes open, enter into a civil war, which in any event must feed upon, and exhaust every vital source of this country, at the certain expence of ten or twelve millions for this year? Whether they will double that expence in the next campaign? And whether they will, in a third year, commit themselves, helpless, exhausted and defenceless, to the mercy of France and Spain, and of every power in Europe that can build its future prosperity upon our ruin? Have we forgot that it was the discontent of taxes and anticipations in war that brought us down, when in the midst of victory over the hereditary enemies of this country, to become the humble suitors of a timid peace? That it was this want of forecast in the day of our then prosperity, which has entailed upon us that load of millions which both then and since have severely served to quicken the sense of humiliating restrictions, and the regret of victories wantonly thrown away?—Then, let us be wiser now. The estimates that I call for are practicable. To tell us, that the precedent from which I take from my example, of the naval estimates delivered in 1772, was in the time of peace, is only saying, that it was less necessary then than it is now. My only reason for making this motion now is, because we are not at peace. Nor can the wisest of us all foresee the day, if you proceed a single step farther in these fatal measures, when this country may return to peace again.

I have now explained to the House the substance and view of my motions for estimates, which I fear will not be complied with, as I see no token of consent, or of any disposition on the other side of the House, to depart from their customary secrecy and silence: If the noble Lord, with his better lights and superior abilities, will lay before us the proper estimates and information, my end will be answered. If not, I can only offer to the House (what I could not offer to them as an object of any attention but at a dead lift) my poor services to hunt out these matters of inquiry, upon such lights as are not confined within the pale of official departments.

The whole extent of my proposition is this; either that the noble Lord would lay before this House the best evidence and information upon the case, by authentic estimates; or that he will allow me to offer my conjectural estimates, as a ground for the House to come to some safe opinion upon, or that he will give himself the trouble to point out in what part he may think them materially erroneous.

Having no wish to misrepresent, and hardly room to exaggerate, I commit myself freely to the candour of the House in the investigation of those necessary points of information, in which we are not likely to receive any assistance from more authentic estimates. I will endeavour to be as distinct and methodical as I can, at the same time trusting that the noble Lord will not cavil with me for little matters. Points of minute accuracy may be reserved for some other day. A few thousands more or less make no difference in my argument; I speak upon the scale of millions.

To bring the whole question into one point of view, we should state the following particulars:

First, the sums already voted upon £: estimate for the present year — 6157000
2dly, the sum remaining to vote upon estimate, computed at 750000
3dly, The probable excesses of the expences of the navy, army, and ordnance, over and above the provisions already made, computed at — 5300000

These three sums will make the total of the expence of 1776 — 1227000

To which we must add,

4thly, The amount of the present out-standing debts, viz.

Navy debt, on 31 December 1775	2698000
Excheq. bills	1350000
Civil list debt, as stated by lord Stair	800000
	4748000
Making a gross total of	16955000
Deducting from this total, 5thly, One year's produce of the ordinary revenue, computed at	4950000

The remainder unprovided for will then be 12005000. If the expence of the extraordinaries should exceed the proportion above stated, of which I can have no doubt, if this armament goes on according to its present train, just in the same proportion will this last unprovided sum of twelve millions and five thousand pounds be increased.

To avoid the imputation of aggravating matters, I had stated the extras of the three services at no more than five millions three hundred thousand pounds; and I desire it may be remembered that this was my reason: We may compute the least possible sum, but the greatest possible amount is incomputable. I will not venture to say what that may be. This is the true state of the question in one view, without aggravation or colouring. Upon the balance of this year there will remain unprovided for, the sum of twelve millions, or perhaps a great deal more.

I will now enter, as shortly as I can, into the detail, to justify the estimate of the several articles as I offered them to the House; always remembering, as I said before, that I speak upon the scale of millions. The twelve millions which I state as remaining unprovided for, may be fifteen millions; or, if it should possibly be no more than ten millions, though the latitude seems very great, yet, in my opinion, the argument is not altered: for I hope that neither this house, nor the public at large, being apprized, and in their sober sense, would be reconciled, to saddle themselves, at the end of the year, with an unprovided sum of ten millions, for a mere possible pitance of revenue from America, to be balanced by the certain destruction of national commerce, and even that poor possible pitance required to be collected and maintained by a perpetual standing force and civil war.

But to return to the articles of my estimate:

The first article is the amount of the sums already voted, being merely a summation of the articles as standing upon the votes

The second article of estimates remaining to vote, stated at	6157000
I explain thus.	750000
Militia to be embodied	500000
Sundry services	250000

Total £. 750000

As for the estimate of the militia, I have taken it from journals during the late war. I do not know that it will be voted at all this year; but that it seems reasonable to suppose, that the ministry will not leave us unguarded at home, and because a special act has been passed this session to enable the king to do it. It is not to be expected that I should know whether the whole is likely to be called out, or only part, or what part or proportion; for I verily believe the ministry do not know themselves. As to the two hundred and fifty thousand pounds for sundry services, I include some estimates already lying upon the table unprovided for.—The deficiency of the funds of 1758—possibly some deficiency of the grants of the last year—possibly some coinage expences—the rebuilding Somerset house, &c. &c.—So much for the first and second articles; the third is that which requires the most discussion.

The total of the third article being	5300000
I divide thus;
Navy extras	2500000
Army extras	2500000
Ordinance extras	300000
Total £.	5300000

As for the naval extras, the single article of transport service and victualling, will go deep into two millions five hundred thousand pounds: there is an estimate which I have seen in print, drawn up by an experienced and able hand, of all the necessary attendances upon an army of thirty thousand men; in that estimate, the necessary transports are stated at two hundred thousand tons. Then compute two hundred thousand tons at 11s. per ton per month or more, and add the victualling estimates, that is enough for the first article towards the two millions five hundred thousand pounds. The next article is beyond my power to specify; but I think I may venture to assume, that the present armament of one hundred ships of force in America cannot possibly be manned without ten or fifteen thousand men more than the number of men as yet voted. Your seamen, exclusive of marines, which are chiefly used as land forces, and many of them now shut up in Boston, amount to but little more than eighteen thousand. Your American armament singly would require that number. Your foreign stations cannot be stripped. The East-Indies, the West-Indies, the Mediterranean, Newfoundland, your home guard, many convoys that will soon be applied for (I have myself applied for one convoy already) ought to be supplied with as many more. Calculate the seamen, with their bounty money, or press money, and their ordinary rate of expence; then add stores consumed and destroyed, provisions for ships in sea-service, interest running on upon navy-bills, old arrears coming to light, with an endless catalogue of never-failing items, and I think I shall have out-gone my hint of two millions five hundred thousand pounds.

Comparing these considerations with the amount of the total naval expence of the early years of the late war, 1757 and 1758, the result is to the same conclusion; therefore I shall pass on to the second sum of two millions five hundred thousand pounds pounds calculated for army extras. If I could form any guess at the price of a bushel of wheat, or a sack of oats, transported by force of arms, from Bear Key to Ticonderago, or Crown Point, I might hope to make some impression upon this estimate. It must put to scorn all estimates of German extraordinaries; and put the extraordinaries for several years of the late war, for forage and provisions, amounted to four or five millions per annum. The petty extraordinaries of a few men, circumscribed within the peninsula of Boston for a few months, have amounted by the accounts of last year, to an enormous sum; then what estimate shall we form of a twelve-month's provision and forage for an army of thirty or forty thousand men at the distance of three thousand miles from home, besieging and besieged, spread, or at least expecting to be spread, over that immense continent, but without one hospitable acre to afford them sustenance! It is out of my bounds to undertake the calculation. If I have not over-rated the total, it is enough for my argument; and I fear, when the bill comes to be paid, it will be more than enough for us all. As to the office of ordnance, one word will settle that account; their usual stint during the last war, for extras, was three thousand pounds a year. In the year 1775 they got up to two hundred and twenty-three thousand pounds for extras; and I dare believe their industry will not be backward to support the good old custom of a round sum for unaccounted extras.

Having, as I hope, verified my estimate for the extras, and clearly having not over-rated them, I am returned to my first total of the expences of 1776, as stated above at 12207000

The amount of the present out standing debt, as already explained 4748000

The total of the supply of 1776, added to the debts outstanding, amounts, as before stated, to 16955000

As for the amount of the ordinary revenue, there cannot be much dispute.

A four shilling land tax, and the malt duty, yield net about 2250000

The sinking fund, upon an average of five years, somewhat less than 2700000

Total 4950000

The remainder therefore unprovided for will be as I stated before 12005000
(To be continued.)

ON November 11 the House went into a committee of ways and means: Lord North moved the following resolution, which was agreed to:

“That a tax of four shillings in the pound, and no more, be raised on all lands, places, and hereditaments, in that part of Great-Britain called England, Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, for the year 1777; and a proportionable cess, according to the ninth article of the treaty of Union, upon Scotland.”

Mr. Wyner said, he should not vote against the tax, but hoped it would not be made a precedent, or that so heavy a burden would be rendered perpetual. He observed, that the true grounds of the quarrel with America was about taxation, and before he would consent to give the measures pursuing against that country support, he had drawn that avowal from the minister in the most defined, positive, and explicit terms. His reason for particularly calling for this éclaircissement, was because he and the rest of the country gentlemen might know what they were about, what they were mortgaging their lands for, perhaps in perpetuity. He was, he owned, urged to this, because he took notice that, previous to the last session, the minister was scarcely two days of the same mind. In the committee of ways and means of last year, he was pressed on the subject, and declared, that taxation and nothing else was the object of the war. He imagined so from the beginning, and unless it was taxation, he could not discover what it was. He then talked of the profusion of grants, and the different curious ways there were devised to lavish and mispend them. As a proof, he said that he went a day or two ago into a seed-shop, and seeing a vast quantity of cabbage seed preparing to be made up, was curious to know what use such an amazing quantity was for; and was told it was to be sent to America. This made him enquire how much land it would sow; the man answered, it was enough to sow all the land from this to York.

He then animadverted on the irregularity of the proceeding, observing, within his long recollection of parliament, that he never remembered the land-tax to precede the army estimates, for supposing that a negative should be put on the army, after we have voted the supplies for maintaining them, would it not be in the power of the crown to keep them standing by a vote of this house, against its consent? He did not think that there was the least probability of any negative being so much as offered; but in a matter of such singular consequence, where there is even a possibility, the members of that house, who are the great constitutional guardians, ought to keep strictly on their watch, and not by sleeping on their watch, permit innovations, which may be hereafter drawn into precedent. He was willing to trust to ministerial promises, though he could say, that of late he had not very great reason to put much trust in them. He recommended fidelity to them, and assured them that public confidence would not continue to be obtained upon the cheap terms it had been customary of late to hold it. In short, he reminded the minister in particular, that that house had granted liberally to him whatever he demanded, and hoped in return he would be frugal and wisely economical.

Lord North replied to some of the honourable gentleman's observations, and said, it was no unusual thing to vote the land-tax before the army. The reason why that mode was now adopted, was, that the navy would amount to about as much as the land-tax would produce, which would be about two millions, not allowing for deficiencies and deductions. As to the cabbage seed, he was informed such an order had been sent home. He said however, he would enquire about it, and as to frugality, he did not know any expenditure that had been otherwise.

On Friday November 22, a motion was made to rescind the resolution of the House of last Sessions, for incapacitating Messrs. Sykes and Rum-bold, for bribery at the Shaftesbury election; and after a short debate on their petitions, the profe-cution against them was ordered to be discharged.

These have been the only public questions of importance agitated in the Lower Assembly during the course of this month.

Appendix, on Winter.*

GENTLE reader, by your leave,
Seeing Winter yet does rave,
Rushing from the blazy fire,
Yet again I strike the lyre:
Weening, if I play annis,
Many in such noise as this,
Will not well perceive a sound,
Which the elements confound.
Yet he moves in surly state,
Ready tempests round him wait;
Now these, now those, at command
Foam and bellow on the land;
Foam and bellow in the wood,
Sweep the valley, sweep the flood:
Bends the forest with a bound,
Growls the sky, and groans the ground,
From the sea the herron soars,
What noise is that? Ocean roars!
Fast the snowy whirlwind flies,
Thick and thicker from the skies;
But, anon, a clearer light
Springs, and all is rob'd in white.
Though the year no sweets display,
This must happen, ere a May;
This hereafter will bestow
Woods that wave, and fields that flow.
Hard the fate of those indeed,
Who must gain a daily meed
By sore toil; since that is lost
By the rigour of the frost:
Nothing but the flying snail
Will the rustick now avail;
Busy in the vale below,
Echo answers blow for blow.
Yonder peasant, as he stands,
Claps, to banish cold, his hands;
Life attempting to maintain
By insufferable pain;
While his wife and daughters peel
Humid fingers at the wheel:
But the boys, an idle crew,
Nothing, but lament, can do.
Lead my reader, love divine;
To the cottage where they pine;
Lead him with an aspect bland,
And a shilling in his hand:
Little from the hand of wealth,
Given as it were by stealth,
To the poor, yet honest hearts
Much felicity imparts.

The Unhappy Ghost. A Vision.

LONG done the labours of the busy day,
Now mortals wrapt in peaceful slumbers lay:
What time to earth delusive visions rise,
And midnight-dreams the troubled thoughts surprise;

Appendix, 1776.

Methought, as then reclin'd upon my bed,
I was by some resistless power led
To where an ancient ruin'd abbey stood,
Close by the confines of a spacious wood.
Around, by the clear moon I could perceive
The neighb'ring turf in heaps promiscuous heave,
And here and there a tomb-stone gave to know
The silent owner's name that lay below.

Whilst these I curious view'd, deep struck with awe,

I saw (for still my fancy thinks it saw)
A sudden gloom the pallid moon o'erspread;
And frightful sounds fill'd all my soul with dread;
I strove to flee, but still in vain I strove,
Congealed with fear, I had not pow'r to move:
At length methought, from where an aged yew
Hard-by the pile of mould'ring ruins grew,
A spectre form advanc'd towards the place
I trembling stood, advanc'd with awful pace;
And thus, methought, in solemn tone it said,
"Mortal, attend, and cease to be dismay'd;
Attend the lesson which to thee I give,
And learn from thence instruction how to live.

"Know that I was (ere chang'd as now you see)

A frail inhabitant of earth like thee I
My youthful years in vain pursuits were spent,
And choicest days to fruitless pleasures lent;
My parents counsel I as nothing priz'd,
Religion and religious men despis'd;
Yea, e'en to such a state my soul was brought,
It hated good, and mock'd all godly thought.
Whilst thus I posted on with mad career,
Destruction-ward, unaw'd by shame or fear,
A sudden fit of sickness, Heaven it pleas'd
To send, which fiercely on my body seiz'd;
Strong and more strong, the vengeful fever
grew,

And death with all its terrors struck my view;
Then, then too late I compunction wrung my breast,

A wounded conscience now would grant no rest;
In vain I saw my errors now at last,
And wish'd to make atonement for the past;
Departed now my lengthen'd hours of grace,
Nought but destruction star'd me in the face;
In vain I cry'd, for none could lend relief,
My friends might pity, but not ease my grief.
At length o'ercome, I yielded up my breath,
And fell a prey to unrelenting death.

"But, ah! were it allow'd me to relate
The miseries of my unhappy state,
'Twould make thy very heart with pity bleed,
But laws eternal strictly thus forbid."
A chilling terror here my slumbers broke,
The vision vanished, and I awoke.
